The indictment also alleges McLaughlin and others misappropriated funds from the state by creating fictitious jobs on his legislative staff and submitting false expense forms.

Among the expenses named in the indictment were more than $4,100 to maintain a boat in Tuckerton, N.J., and $4,200 for Long Island country club membership dues.

The indictment accuses McLaughlin of combining with others, not named in the indictment, to obtain hundreds of thousands of dollars in unlawful payments and things of value from street lighting contractors and other companies in the street lighting and traffic signal industry.

It also focuses at one point on a housing development created in 1950 by union leaders and electrical industry management that resulted in more than 30 large apartment buildings. As part of the development, residents created the Electchester Athletic Association Inc. to run a youth sports programs.

The indictment alleges McLaughlin used his position as state assemblyman to direct state money to that athletic association, then defrauded the association of more than $95,000.

DOJ_NMG_0082826

Meanwhile, the indictment noted, McLaughlin continued soliciting donations to the athletic fund with sponsorship forms thanking the contributor and concluding with the message: "A CHILD IN SPORTS STAYS OUT OF THE COURTS!"

Associated Press Writers Larry Neumeister in New York and Michael Gormley in Albany contributed to this report.

McLaughlin Pleads Innocent To U.S. Charges (NYS)

By Russell Berman, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, October 18, 2006

A Queens assemblyman who is one of the city's top labor leaders is facing a lifetime in prison after federal prosecutors charged him with stealing $2.2 million from the state government, union members, a political club, and a Little League baseball association.

The assemblyman, Brian McLaughlin, the president of the New York City Central Labor Council, surrendered to authorities yesterday at federal district court in Lower Manhattan and became the latest in a series of state legislators from New York City to come under criminal charges. He pleaded not guilty to 44 counts of racketeering, embezzlement, conspiracy, and fraud.

The U.S. Attorney for the Southern District, Michael Garcia, said Mr. McLaughlin's alleged crimes "add new meaning to the term 'hand-in-the-till.'"

A 186-page indictment alleges a complex scheme that Mr. Garcia called "stunning in its breadth and its scope." Prosecutors charge that Mr. McLaughlin, 54, accepted hundreds of thousands of dollars in kickbacks from city street lighting contractors, installed his cronies in fictitious positions with the state Assembly and the labor council to funnel cash to himself, and laundered money to hide his crimes and evade law enforcement.

Mr. McLaughlin allegedly used the money to buy an $80,000 Mercedes-Benz, purchase a wide-screen plasma television for a friend, and pay an initiation fee and membership dues, totaling at least $28,600, for a Long Island country club. The indictment also alleges he used the money to finance his son's wedding and make payments on his residences in Albany, Queens, and Long Island.

The charges signal a steep fall for Mr. McLaughlin, who was once talked about as a potential candidate for mayor. The authorities yesterday portrayed him as a man motivated by greed who used each of his leadership positions as a money-making venture.

"The Midas touch turned everything into gold. The McLaughlin touch made money disappear into his own pockets," the special agent heading the FBI's New York criminal division, Andrew Arena, said at a press conference announcing the indictment.

No one else was named in the indictment, but Mr. Garcia said the investigation was ongoing and did not rule out further charges.

Mr. McLaughlin did not comment in response to the accusations. "The case is now in the court of law, so we're going to save our comments for the courtroom," his lawyer, Jonathan Bach, said after Mr. McLaughlin was arraigned before federal Magistrate Judge James Francis IV yesterday. Two of the 44 counts are filed under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, which some have criticized when it is used in cases that don't involve traditional organized crime families.

The assemblyman was released on $250,000 bond.The maximum prison sentence for the 44 counts totals 535 years.

With yesterday's indictment, Mr. McLaughlin becomes the ninth state legislator representing the city to face charges in the last three years. Two others were charged in the last three months. State Senator Efrain Gonzalez Jr., a Democrat of the Bronx, was accused in August of using $37,000 in funds from a nonprofit group for personal expenses, including buying Yankees tickets and vacationing in the Dominican Republic. In July, Assemblywoman Diane Gordon, a Democrat of Brooklyn, was indicted for allegedly soliciting a $500,000 bribe. Both have pleaded not guilty and are seeking re-election.

First elected to the Assembly in 1992, Mr. McLaughlin is not seeking an eighth term this year, having said that he wanted to devote more time to union duties. He represents the 25th district in Queens, which includes Flushing, Whitestone, and Jamaica. Mr. McLaughlin has been a prominent supporter of Mayor Bloomberg and has backed several of his major development projects. A spokesman for the mayor declined comment yesterday.

The federal investigation of Mr. McLaughlin dates back years and became public in March when the FBI launched an early morning raid of the Central Labor Council's offices, removing boxes of documents.

As president of the council, Mr. McLaughlin led more than one million city union members. The umbrella group is the nation's largest municipal union association and is an affiliate of the AFL-CIO. Its leadership offered support for Mr. McLaughlin yesterday.

"Everyone should keep in mind that Brian McLaughlin has not been convicted of a crime and will be afforded the opportunity to respond to and defend himself against these allegations," the chairman of the council's executive board, Denis Hughes, said in a statement. Mr. Hughes is the president of the state AFL-CIO.

DOJ_NMG_0082827

Union leaders held a conference call early yesterday to discuss how to respond to the accusations against Mr. McLaughlin, a spokesman for the state AFL-CIO, Mario Cilento, said. Although Mr. McLaughlin took a sixmonth paid leave of absence beginning last month, he will remain as president of the labor council pending the charges, Mr. Cilento said.

While the investigation and the possibility of criminal charges against Mr. McLaughlin were well known to union leaders, some were said to be shocked by the extent of the alleged scheme.

The charges also put the Democrat running to replace Mr. McLaughlin in the Assembly, Rory Lancman, in a political quandary. Mr. Lancman is close to Mr. McLaughlin and had posted on his campaign Web site a photographic "tribute" to the assemblyman. That tribute has since been removed, although photos of Mr. McLaughlin remain on the site.

"Everyone is entitled to the presumption of innocence in America, but the government's allegations are extremely disturbing." Mr. Lancman said yesterday, adding that it was a "sad day" for the community.

According to the indictment, Mr. McLaughlin, over more than decade, used a variety of nefarious methods to steal money from several organizations, including the labor council, the Assembly, and his political campaign committee. He also allegedly stole more than $140,000 from a division of the union he ran, Local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. And he allegedly pocketed $95,000 that was intended for the Electchester Athletic Association, a Little League baseball program created for the children of union members.

The indictment further accuses Mr. McLaughlin of promoting a relative to head a labor council panel called the Commission on the Dignity of Immigrants. The relative was a chiropractor who had no experience working with immigrants, and there was no evidence he did any work for the commission. His entire salary went to Mr. McLaughlin, according to the indictment.

Prosecutors also say Mr. McLaughlin made union members perform menial tasks for him, treating them like his own "private workforce." Union members chased rodents in Mr. McLaughlin's basement, shoveled snow and hung Christmas lights for him, the indictment alleges.

The schemes and the servants allowed Mr. McLaughlin to "support his own version of 'Lifestyles of the Rich and Famous,'" the commissioner of the city's Department of Investigation, Rose Gill Hearn, said.

Dem Leader Charged (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Staff Writer; Compiled By Carl Macgowan

Long Island Newsday, October 18, 2006

Feds say Flushing Assemb. McLaughlin defrauded unions, Assembly and Little League of $2.2 million

Federal officials yesterday charged longtime Flushing Assemblyman Brian McLaughlin, a key Queens Democratic Party leader and a dominant labor leader in the city, with carrying out a scheme to enrich himself by plundering unions, the Assembly and even a Little League group of $2.2 million to pad his lifestyle.

McLaughlin, 54, who has a rent-controlled apartment in Flushing and a home in Suffolk County at 1 Hawks Nest in Nissequogue, surrendered yesterday morning at FBI headquarters in Manhattan to face a 44-count racketeering indictment accusing him of mail fraud, money laundering, bank fraud, federal labor law violations and other crimes.

If convicted of the most serious charge of bank fraud, he faces a 30-year prison term.

"This case lends new meaning to the term 'hand in the till,'" said Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia in announcing the charges.

"It is a case about greed, about a high-ranking union official stealing from union members by siphoning off dues and a State Assemblyman stealing ... by no-show jobs and fraudulent vouchers."

McLaughlin appeared before a federal magistrate judge in Manhattan U.S. District Court and was released on a $250,000 personal recognizance bond.

Defense attorney Jonathan Bach couldn't be reached for comment.

Garcia termed the charges "stunning in breadth and scope," ranging from McLaughlin allegedly taking hundreds of thousands of dollars in kickbacks from streetlighting contractors doing business with the city to embezzling Little League funds.

The money generated by the various schemes was used to pay for an $80,000 2002 Mercedes-Benz, marina fees for a boat, country club initiation dues, construction of a new Long Island home, credit card bills and a wedding rehearsal dinner for one of McLaughlin's sons, officials said.

The alleged theft was done so McLaughlin "could support his own version of lifestyle of the rich and famous," said Rose Gill Hearn, head of the city's Department of Investigation.

McLaughlin is accused of using union members while they worked on regular shifts for their bosses to do chores for him that included shoveling snow, changing light bulbs, cleaning out a barn and capturing rodents in the basement of his house, investigators said. According to the indictment, women who had a "personal relationship" with McLaughlin also reaped some financial benefits from his actions. McLaughlin is married and has five children.

Among McLaughlin's alleged victims were the Electchester Athletic Association of Flushing, which raises money to fund Little League programs. The association lost $100,000 through McLaughlin's misappropriation, the indictment charged.

Among the largest alleged thefts was $400,000 from streetlighting contracts, federal officials said. None of the companies were identified in the indictment.

Other alleged victims were a branch of Local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Central Labor Council, the Committee to Elect Brian McLaughlin and the Clinton Democratic Club.

Word had surfaced earlier this year that federal authorities were investigating McLaughlin.

He decided to take a leave of absence from his post as head of the New York Central Labor Council on Sept. 1, but continued to draw a $167,629 salary package.

In addition, he said he wouldn't seek re-election to the Assembly, where he has served for seven terms.

Brian McLaughlin

54 years old

Married

Has five children

In seventh term as Democratic assemblyman representing the 25th District in Flushing.

Last month, began six-month leave of absence from labor council amid federal probe of suspected bid-rigging on city streetlighting contracts.

Announced in January he would not run for re-election in order to spend more time serving the Central Labor Council, of which he has been president since 1995. The council represents 1.3 million workers in 400 union locals.

Compiled by Carl MacGowan

The accused

New York State Assemb. Brian McLaughlin was arraigned in federal court on corruption charges yesterday. Below, some of the cash amounts and allegations against him:

Amount Allegation

$400,000 Taken in illegal cash payments from contractors; also, three vehicles, one of which he gave to his son and a woman friend.

$330, 000 From his campaign committee to renovate and clean his Nissequogue house, paid for country club fees.

$100,000 From union dues to pay personal credit card bills and country club dues

$100,000 From a Little League based at the Pomonok Houses in Flushing.

$25,000 Pocketed from the state using a fictitious employee.

$19,000 From the William Jefferson Clinton Democratic Club of Queens, which he cofounded, for personal expenses, paying rent on his Albany home and a plasma television for a woman he had a "personal relationship" with

Other allegations

Stole funds from the J division of Local 3 of International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Used union members on shifts for contractors to do personal chores such as moving appliances, shoveling snow, putting up Christmas lights, plumbing work and catching rodents in his basement.

The Secret Life Of Labor King (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, October 18, 2006

He even stole from the kids.

The powerful boss of the city's biggest labor group was charged yesterday with a massive $2.2 million shakedown scheme - using his influence and seat on the state Assembly to line his pockets.

No one was immune from his greed, not union members - not even Little Leaguers.

Assemblyman Brian McLaughlin allegedly used the stolen funds to finance a high-flying lifestyle that included a Long Island mansion, luxury cars, country clubs and gifts for several lady friends.

"What we have here is a story of greed," said Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia in announcing the charges. "This case lends new meaning to the term 'hand in the till.'"

The sheer size of the scam put McLaughlin, 54, a seven-term Democratic legislator and longtime executive director of New York City Central Labor Council, an umbrella group that has more than 1 million members, into the pantheon of crooked powerbrokers.

Prosecutors said he has been stealing money for much of the past decade while he held both jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0082829

Added city Department of Investigation Commissioner Rose Gill Hearn: "This was all done so that the defendant could support his own version of 'Lifestyles of the Rich and Famous.'"

According to Garcia, no scheme was too small for the money-grubbing legislator who started his working life as an electrician, then earned bachelor's and master's degrees and rose to lead Local 3 of the Electrical Workers Union.

The feds said McLaughlin ran a squeeze play on Queens' Little Leaguers for years while serving as treasurer of the Electchester Athletic Association, located at a union-sponsored housing development in Queens.

McLaughlin allegedly stole nearly $100,000 while raising funds for the group, using the slogan: "A Child in Sports Stays out of the Courts."

And when a league official tried to use $2,800 to pay for legitimate softball expenses in June 2004, McLaughlin was enraged, the indictment says.

"All that f-----g money, he's f-----g spending on other stuff, that ain't his money," McLaughlin said. "That's mine."

Among other crimes allegedly committed by McLaughlin, according to a 44-count racketeering indictment:

He got $400,000 in illegal payments as well as three cars from contractors who hired Local 3 electricians. One car went to his son and the other to a female friend.

nHe diverted campaign contributions to pay for a female friend's widescreen plasma television and got $61,000 from a contractor to pay for a Mercedes-Benz for his wife. He also used campaign cash to pay for his son's August 2004 wedding by creating a no-show consultant's job for his daughter-in-law.

He employed a battalion of rank-and-file electricians to drive family members to doctor's appointments, hang Christmas lights, shovel out his horse barn and snatch up rodents running through his basement.

nHe forced Local 3 members to kick back monthly payments from the sale of scrap metals and other materials salvaged from their work.

He took $100,000 from an electrical workers union account and used it to pay credit card bills as well as dues for the North Hempstead Country Club.

He gave checks totaling $21,900 to a woman with whom he had a personal relationship; the money was taken from union funds. A second female friend was paid $6,000 out of his campaign committee funds. He also arranged for that same woman to be hired at the city labor council.

He also used the money to pay for school tuition for his son; the mortgage on his home in Nissequogue, L.I., and rent on an Albany residence.

McLaughlin had union members drive up to Albany using his E-ZPass so that he could get credit for the per diem he'd received from the Assembly for each Albany appearance.

At his arraignment in Manhattan Federal Court, McLaughlin pleaded not guilty to the indictment and was released on a $250,000 personal recognizance bond. McLaughlin, who could go to prison for the rest of his life, declined comment as he left the courthouse with his wife, Eva.

After the FBI raided both his union and Assembly offices this year, McLaughlin announced he would not seek reelection. Later, he took a leave of absence from the Central Labor Council.

With Greg B. Smithand Joe Mahoney

St. Peters Mayor Likely To Plead Guilty (SLPD)

By Valerie Schremp Hahn, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 18, 2006

ST. PETERS -- St. Peters Mayor Shawn Brown is expected to plead guilty Friday in his bribery case, authorities said Tuesday.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Albus said Tuesday that Brown "had indicated his intent to plead guilty." Brown, 34, is expected to appear before U.S. District Judge Henry Autrey to change his plea from not guilty.

Brown and his attorney, Scott Rosenblum, could not be reached Tuesday for comment.

By state law, if the mayor pleads guilty to a crime related to his job, he also forfeits his office.

Albus would not confirm whether a plea agreement had been reached but said it was customary to have one under these circumstances. A pre-sentencing report is usually made after a plea, and the defendant is sentenced about three months later. The charge carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and a fine of $250,000.

Brown was indicted in August on a charge of soliciting and accepting a $2,750 bribe from Redflex Traffic Systems Inc., which in June got the contract to install red-light cameras in St. Peters. Brown is accused of telling a Redflex employee he would veto the measure approving the system's installation unless the company paid him off. Redflex told the FBI and cooperated with the agency in giving Brown a check, authorities said. Brown has said the money was a campaign contribution.

Brown has remained free on his promise to show up for scheduled court appearances.

St. Peters city attorney Randy Weber said that if Brown had to leave office, the president of the board would become the acting mayor and would then call a meeting of the board within 10 days to elect someone to fill the position until the next municipal election. That will be in April, and candidates may run to fill the rest of the term, which ends in April 2008. Brown is serving his first term in office. He defeated longtime incumbent Tom Brown in 2004.

Board President Bruce Holt reacted with surprise and pity for Brown's family when told of the anticipated plea.

"I just wish him and his family the best, God bless him," said Holt. "He had a bright future."

Ex-GBI Agent Sentenced In Kickback Deal (AJC)

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 18, 2006

A former special agent with the Georgia Bureau of Investigation was sentenced Tuesday to one year and a day in federal prison for receiving illegal kickback payments and failing to maintain firearms records.

James R. Garmon, 52, brokered the sale of more than $5,000 worth of firearms that had been seized by Bartow County deputies to a local pawnshop, the U.S. attorney's office said.

GBI Director Vernon Keenan said his agency cooperated with the FBI's investigation.

"It is extremely disappointing when any GBI employee is implicated in criminal activity, especially an individual sworn to uphold the law," he said.

Prosecutors said that between December 2004 and October 2005, Garmon brokered at least three deals involving 81 firearms between Bartow officials and Warren's Pawn and Jewelry. He received at least $1,600 from the pawnshop for brokering the deal, prosecutors said.

Georgia law requires that seized firearms be kept by sheriff's offices for use, destroyed or sold to the highest bidder at public auction.

Garmon, a Cartersville resident, resigned from the GBI in March after the GBI was advised of the results of the investigation.

"To make a little extra money, this defendant, a former law enforcement officer, circumvented the process for legally disposing of seized firearms," said U.S. Attorney David Nahmias. "We will continue to hold public servants, especially those officials who have sworn to enforce the law, to the highest standard of lawful conduct."

— Associated Press

Feds Charge Alleged Pa. Mob Boss With Trying To Kill Witness (NSDY)

Long Island Newsday, October 18, 2006

HARRISBURG, Pa. -- An alleged mobster facing drug charges planned to kill a witness against him while out on bail, federal prosecutors said Tuesday.

A new indictment against William D'Elia, 60, of Hughestown, who reputedly heads the Bufalino crime family, charges him with solicitation of murder, witness tampering, obstruction of justice, violating bail conditions, money laundering and other offenses.

D'Elia told an informant in August that he would give him photographs of a witness who cooperated with prosecutors and told him to wait for a signal to kill the man, according to the 18-count indictment issued Tuesday.

He previously pleaded not guilty to charges he laundered drug proceeds through bogus companies, loans and consulting agreements. Those charges related to an investigation into John Doncses, who pleaded guilty in Florida six years ago to distributing more than 100 kilograms of marijuana.

D'Elia was arrested on the new charges last week, federal prosecutors said. A phone message seeking comment left late Tuesday afternoon at the office of Philip Gelso, listed in federal records as D'Elia's lawyer, was not immediately returned.

The U.S. Attorney's Office released information about the indictment shortly before the end of the business day Tuesday.

D'Elia has been linked to organized crime by the FBI, the now-defunct Pennsylvania Crime Commission, and former Philadelphia and South Jersey mob boss Ralph Natale. New Jersey gambling regulators banned him from that state's casinos in 2003.

A court affidavit filed Thursday in Scranton said D'Elia "is often said to be used as a mediator between families when there are disputes. D'Elia has met, on a frequent basis, with members of the Joseph Ligambi organization from Philadelphia and also has frequent contacts with western Pennsylvania and New York families."

Man Arrested On Child-porn Charges After Internet Sting (AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082831

ORLANDO, Fla. -- An Orange County man was arrested by federal agents after he sent sexual pictures of himself and his 15-month-old daughter over the Internet, authorities said.

The man was ordered to be held without bail at a court appearance in federal court Monday. He faces child-pornography charges, and has been assigned an assistant federal public defender.

The Associated Press will not release the man's name to protect his daughter's identity.

An Internet sting conducted by the Central Florida Innocent Images Task Force, which includes a Seminole County sheriff's detective, led to his arrest.

The man "admitted to producing three videos of himself and his daughter engaged in sexual activity," FBI agent Keith Scott wrote in a charging affidavit. The suspect also "admitted to transmitting these videos to multiple individuals over the Internet."

He also chatted online with a Tennessee-based FBI agent posing as a 13-year-old.

Internet subscriber and user records kept by Yahoo, BellSouth and Level 3 Communications linked the Yahoo screen name used by the suspect to his address at an apartment complex.

Agents showed the e-mailed video files to the girl's mother, who identified the child. The girl remains with her mother, who is not suspected of any wrongdoing, agents said.

A telephone message left at the federal public defender's office in Orlando, who is representing the man, was not immediately returned.

Grand Jury Indicts Capitol Intruder (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, October 18, 2006

A grand jury yesterday handed down an eight-count indictment to the man who breached Capitol Police security last month and led officers on a three floor chase inside the U.S. Capitol before he was apprehended on the basement floor.

The charges against Carlos Greene include fleeing a law enforcement officer, two counts of destruction of government property, assaulting, resisting or impeding certain officers or employees and unlawful possession of five grams or more of cocaine.

Also included in the charges were several firearms violations such as possession of a gun on Capitol grounds and carrying and possessing a firearm during drug trafficking offense.

Noe Called Coin Funds An ATM, Ex-aide Says (COLDISP)

By Mark Niquette, The Columbus Dispatch

Columbus Dispatch, October 18, 2006

Woman also says he thought friends would bail him out

TOLEDO — Coin dealer Thomas W. Noe once described the $50 million state investment he managed "as having access to an ATM," Noe's former administrative assistant said yesterday in testimony against her former boss.

"What he went on to say was, when he needed it, he would tap the coin funds," Sue Bahn told the jury during the second day of testimony in the trial of Noe and his handling of the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation coin investment.

Bahn, who worked for Noe for about two years at his Maumee coin shop and was trusted to pay his bills and balance his personal checkbook, said Noe made the comments in June 2005 after she questioned him about the controversy swirling around the investment at the time.

Prosecutors say Noe stole millions from the coin funds to pay debts and "to support the lifestyle that he felt he deserved."

Noe denies all charges, including theft, saying his contract gave him broad authority over the state funds.

In response to a question from Noe attorney John R. Mitchell on cross-examination, Bahn, whose last name was Metzger until she changed it in February, admitted there was no one else present during her talk with Noe and that he never directly referred to the coin funds.

But Bahn also said she asked Noe "if he took the money ... and if (Noe's wife) Bernadette knew."

When Mitchell questioned Bahn about why she did not disclose the information until after Noe had been indicted in February, she said, "I thought that he was going to tell the truth and make this right."

Bahn testified that Noe would make deposits into his personal account to cover expenses that sometimes reached hundreds of thousands of dollars in a month. She said there was an "escalation" of spending in 2004, including a $50,000 pool for Noe's home in the Florida Keys and other big-ticket purchases.

In response to a question from Mitchell, Bahn said she prepared Noe's application for a line of credit from the bank in January 2005 that put his net worth at $7.9 million. Mitchell had her repeat the figure three times for the jury.

But Bahn also testified that in a meeting with Noe after he made the comment about the ATM, Noe said he had "friends who were going to help him cover what was going on" to bail him out — and that Noe changed his mind about pursuing that option.

Bahn, who handled the presidential memorabilia and other noncoin collectibles at the Maumee shop, told the jury that the total value of such items bought with state money was $2.7 million at the end of April 2005.

Tom Wersell, director of special investigations for the workers' compensation bureau, testified that although agents expected to find about $13 million in coins at the Maumee shop in May 2005, they found only about $600,000 worth.

Noe's lawyers have argued that there was no requirement for a certain amount of coin-fund assets to be kept in Maumee rather than any of the other locations where state coins were held.

Meanwhile, actual coins from the state investment — kept in their protective plastic holders — were brought into court yesterday for the jury to see during testimony from coin expert David Tripp.

Tripp worked as a coin appraiser and consultant for Sotheby's auction house in New York, which the state hired to help evaluate coins after the investment was shut down in 2005.

According to the court, witnesses in today's proceedings are expected to include two other former Noe employees, bookkeeper Jeannie Beck and Priscilla Livingston, as well as former State Highway Patrol Lt. Howard W. Hudson III, who signed the affidavit used to secure the search warrant for a raid of Noe's shop in May 2005.

Coin Dealer's Ex-Ass't Speaks At Trial (AP)

By John Seewer, The Associated Press

AP, October 18, 2006

TOLEDO, Ohio -- A politically connected coin dealer accused of stealing millions of dollars the state had asked him to invest had treated the money like it was from his own ATM, his former personal assistant testified Tuesday.

Tom Noe, a one-time top GOP donor, is accused of stealing more than $2 million from the workers' compensation bureau's coin investment and spending it on his business and renovating his home in the Florida Keys.

His attorneys say the deal with the state allowed Noe to use the money however he wanted, including to pay off personal business debts.

Noe, 52, tapped into the state's cash whenever he needed, said Sue Metzger, whose duties included overseeing Noe's personal checking account from 2003-05.

Metzger said she met with her boss in the summer of 2005 after allegations of wrongdoing surfaced and asked Noe whether he took the money, she testified.

"He described it as having access to an ATM," she said.

The investment scandal has battered Republicans who control the state, raising Democrats' hopes of retaking the governor's office for the first time since 1990. Democratic U.S. Rep. Ted Strickland has a wide lead over Republican Ken Blackwell, Ohio's secretary of state, in gubernatorial race polls.

Prosecutors say Noe was deep in debt when he got the money, and he quickly used it to pay off his creditors.

Within a week, Noe put $1.75 million into his own business and wrote himself a $135,000 check to support "a lifestyle he felt he deserved," said Lucas County Assistant Prosecutor John Weglian.

Metzger, who also goes by the last name of Bahn, handled payment of all of Noe's bills and began noticing that his spending increased greatly in 2004. He bought a house in the Florida Keys and spent $50,000 renovating the pool.

In some months, his expenses exceeded hundreds of thousands of dollars, she said. She said his paychecks weren't enough to cover the expenses and he would deposit money from other sources.

She initially didn't know where the extra money was coming from. Noe later told her he was tapping into the state's investment fund, she said.

Noe, once a go-to guy for the Republican Party, has pleaded not guilty to theft, money laundering, forgery and corrupt activity charges. He faces up to 10 years in prison on the corrupt activity charge.

Weglian said Noe kept two sets of financial records _ one for the workers' comp agency and one for his own business. When state officials wanted to check the status of the coins Noe told them he had bought, he created false documents and borrowed coins from other dealers to trick investigators, Weglian said.

The workers' comp agency initially invested $25 million with Noe in 1998, followed by another $25 million in 2001.

Noe spent only a fraction of the state's investment on coins, prosecutors said.

State agents expected to find $13 million in rare coins when they searched Noe's business last year, Tom Wersell, director of investigations for Bureau of Workers' Compensation, testified Tuesday.

Instead, the agents counted up coins worth about $600,000, Wersell said.

Investigations into the coin investments already have led to separate ethics charges against Gov. Bob Taft, who pleaded no contest last year to failing to report golf outings and other gifts.

Noe, in a separate case, pleaded guilty earlier this year to funneling $45,000 to Bush's re-election campaign and was sentenced last month to two years and three months in federal prison. He won't begin that sentence until after the state charges are resolved.

The trial is expected to last at least six weeks, through Election Day on Nov. 7.

Noe Considered The State's Rare-coin Fund 'an ATM,' One Of His Former Assistants Says (TOLB)

By MIKE WILKINSON And STEVE EDER, BLADE STAFF WRITERS

Toledo Blade (OH), October 18, 2006

Tom Noe considered the state's $50 million rare-coin fund he controlled "an ATM" that he could use into whenever he needed money, one of his former top assistants said this morning.

Sue Bahn, who was hired by Noe to catalog collectibles at his former coin shop in Monclova Township, said Noe made the statement in 2005 as she asked him about the coin funds and the tough questions that were being raised in news accounts and by state investigators.

"He described it as having access to an ATM," said Ms. Bahn, who changed her name from Metzger earlier this year. "He said when he needed it he would tap into the coin fund."

Ms. Bahn, who also managed Noe's personal checkbook, said she started having concerns about Noe's business when Noe began spending more money on homes and remodeling in 2004.

"I saw an escalation in the expenditures in the personal account," Ms. Bahn said.

The monthly income of Tom Noe — he netted more than $120,000 a year — and his wife Bernadette wasn't high enough to cover the bills, she said. To cover the expenses, Tom Noe would make deposits that Ms. Bahn never saw.

"Whatever was needed, he'd make a deposit to cover it," she said.

Ms. Bahn's comments were the most interesting comments yet in a trial that is expected to last from four to six weeks.

She talked about finding a Noe family checking account that had never been balanced until she took it over and ordered bank statements. She also noted that Tom Noe was writing checks to his personal account from his business, Vintage Coins and Collectibles.

"That's when I said he's going to get in trouble with the IRS. But he's the owner, it was his business," she said.

In one of two private meetings with Noe about the coin funds, Ms. Bahn said he indicated he had a plan to cover up the problems. But he allegedly told her that something she said caused him to change his mind.

"He decided not to use his friends to bail him out but decided to take the bull by the horns and face it," she said.

Ms. Bahn said she pointedly asked Noe if he had stolen the money and if his wife, Bernadette, knew. She did not say what the answer was.

She testified she also talked religion with Noe.

In one meeting as the questions mounted about the coin funds, Ms. Bahn said she told Noe that God had a plan and a purpose. "I said God is after his heart. He may lose everything but he'll get it back."

On cross examination, Ms. Bahn testified she didn't tell investigators about the ATM comment by Noe when she first interviewed with them in November, 2005. She said she finally told them about six months ago.

When asked by John Mitchell, one of Noe's defense attorneys, why she waited so long to share, she said, "I thought he was going to tell the truth and make it right."

Ms. Bahn also testified that she copied a net worth statement of Noe in January, 2005, that indicated he was worth nearly $8 million.

Noe has pleaded not guilty to all of the charges against him. He has been accused of embezzling more than $2 million from the coin funds.

This morning, Tom Wersell, the director of investigations for the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation, testified that the bureau's chief legal officer asked him to show another executive how to delete e-mails in the weeks after the Tom Noe coin scandal erupted.

Mr. Wersell said he did not know why John Annarino made the request but that he showed former chief investment officer Jim McLean how to "double delete" e-mails.

Mr. Wersell, in his second day of testimony, acknowledged that the bureau has a information technology department.

The revelation came during cross examination of Mr. Wersell by Mr. Mitchell. Mr. Wersell had testified that many of the documents relating to the Noe coin funds were retrieved from Mr. McLean's office. He was fired last year by the bureau.

Nancy Smeltzer, a spokesman for the bureau, said this morning that the agency won't comment on the case.

"We don't have any comments on this case as it is going on right now," Ms. Smeltzer said. "We are like everyone else. We are waiting to see what happens."

Noe, 52, faces 44 felony counts related to charges that he took more than $2.2 million from the coin funds he managed for the bureau. If convicted, he faces decades in prison.

A little over a month ago, Noe was sentenced to 27 months in federal prison for illegally funneling more than $45,000 into the re-election campaign of President Bush in 2003. He will report to federal prison at the conclusion of the state trial.

Opening statements began yesterday morning, with testimony starting in the afternoon. The trial could last as long as six weeks.

FBI Director Wants ISPs To Track Users (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, October 18, 2006

Robert Mueller becomes latest Bush administration official to call for ISPs to store customers' data.

FBI Director Robert Mueller on Tuesday called on Internet service providers to record their customers' online activities, a move that anticipates a fierce debate over privacy and law enforcement in Washington next year.

"Terrorists coordinate their plans cloaked in the anonymity of the Internet, as do violent sexual predators prowling chat rooms," Mueller said in a speech at the International Association of Chiefs of Police conference in Boston.

"All too often, we find that before we can catch these offenders, Internet service providers have unwittingly deleted the very records that would help us identify these offenders and protect future victims," Mueller said. "We must find a balance between the legitimate need for privacy and law enforcement's clear need for access."

The speech to the law enforcement group, which approved a resolution on the topic earlier in the day, echoes other calls from Bush administration officials to force private firms to record information about customers. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, for instance, told Congress last month that "this is a national problem that requires federal legislation."

Justice Department officials admit privately that data retention legislation is controversial enough that there wasn't time to ease it through the U.S. Congress before politicians left to campaign for re-election. Instead, the idea is expected to surface in early 2007, and one Democratic politician has already promised legislation.

Law enforcement groups claim that by the time they contact Internet service providers, customers' records may have been deleted in the routine course of business. Industry representatives, however, say that if police respond to tips promptly instead of dawdling, it would be difficult to imagine any investigation that would be imperiled.

It's not clear exactly what a data retention law would require. One proposal would go beyond Internet providers and require registrars, the companies that sell domain names, to maintain records too. And during private meetings with industry officials, FBI and Justice Department representatives have cited the desirability of also forcing search engines to keep logs--a proposal that could gain additional law enforcement support after AOL showed how useful such records could be in investigations.

A representative of the International Association of Chiefs of Police said he was not able to provide a copy of the resolution.

Preservation vs. retention

At the moment, Internet service providers typically discard any log file that's no longer required for business reasons such as network monitoring, fraud prevention or billing disputes. Companies do, however, alter that general rule when contacted by police performing an investigation--a practice called data preservation.

A 1996 federal law called the Electronic Communication Transactional Records Act regulates data preservation. It requires Internet providers to retain any "record" in their possession for 90 days "upon the request of a governmental entity."

Because Internet addresses remain a relatively scarce commodity, ISPs tend to allocate them to customers from a pool based on whether a computer is in use at the time. (Two standard techniques used are the Dynamic Host Configuration Protocol and Point-to-Point Protocol over Ethernet.)

In addition, Internet providers are required by another federal law to report child pornography sightings to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which is in turn charged with forwarding that report to the appropriate police agency.

FBI Chief Addresses Police Chiefs (BOS)

By April Simpson, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, October 18, 2006

FBI Director Robert Mueller told the nation's police chiefs today that law enforcement must strike a careful balance between fighting crime and protecting the homeland.

Mueller said while violent crime more directly affects most Americans, the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks made anti-terrorism activities the FBI's top priority.

"I wish I could assure you that there will be never be another terrorist attack in America, but I cannot. The world remains a perilous place," said Mueller, who received a standing ovation before and after his speech at the International Association of Chiefs of Police 113th annual conference at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center.

Ex-F.D.A. Chief Pleads Guilty In Stock Case (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 17 — Lester M. Crawford, the former commissioner of food and drugs, pleaded guilty Tuesday to lying and conflict-of-interest charges in connection with stock he and his wife owned in companies regulated by the F.D.A.

Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson, who accepted Dr. Crawford's plea to two misdemeanor charges, scheduled sentencing for Jan. 22 in Federal District Court.

Dr. Crawford, 68, could face up to a year in prison and a fine of up to $100,000 on each of the two counts, but his lawyer has said she expects him to be placed on probation.

Senior employees of the agency are barred from owning shares in companies it regulates. Dr. Crawford and his wife, Catherine, accordingly sold their holdings in nine companies around the time he became deputy commissioner early in 2002, the government said.

But they retained shares in three others: the food giants Sysco and Pepsico, and Kimberly-Clark, which makes consumer health products and other goods.

In addition, Mrs. Crawford held shares in another regulated company, Wal-Mart, but her husband did not list them in his 2002 financial disclosure.

In addition, Dr. Crawford, who is a veterinarian and pharmacologist, exercised options to buy shares in a poultry biotechnology company regulated by the Food and Drug Administration in 2003 and 2004, earning almost $30,000 altogether. He did not list them in disclosure filings, as he should have, even though he properly reported the transactions on his tax returns, the government said.

The conflict-of-interest charges stemmed from the Crawfords' ownership of shares in Pepsico and Sysco while he was chairman of the Obesity Working Group at the F.D.A., which was reviewing calorie-content labeling for soft drinks.

There is no evidence that the obesity group's conclusions were altered because of the Crawfords' ownership of stock, Howard Sklamberg, an assistant United States attorney, told Judge Robinson.

Mrs. Crawford's brother, William W. Walker III of Birmingham, Ala., said his sister had told him "if they had to do it over again, they'd put everything in a blind trust."

UPDATE: Ex-FDA Chief Pleads Guilty To Charges (DOW)

Dow Jones, October 18, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (Dow Jones) -- Lester Crawford, the former head of the FDA, pleaded guilty Tuesday to two misdemeanor federal criminal charges he failed to disclose his financial interest in companies his agency regulated, according to media reports.

Crawford, who served as head of the FDA for two months in 2005, was charged by the Justice Department with filing misleading financial-disclosure reports about his holdings in Sysco Corp. (SYY) , Kimberly-Clark Corp. (KMB) and Embrex Inc. (EMBX) .

Crawford was confirmed as FDA chief in July 2005 after a long Senate debate. Critics had accused the longtime FDA official of allowing politics to affect medical-regulation decisions, such as delaying the approval of over-the-counter sales of the contraceptive Plan B.

Crawford also owned stock in Pepsico (PEP) , the soft-drink and food product maker.

Crawford was at one time head of an Obesity Working Group that was studying recommendations about food labels and calorie counts.

Court papers say both Pepsico and Sysco had financial interests at stake in the work being conducted by the group, which Crawford headed, according to a CNN report.

Crawford, 58, may face a sentence of up to six months in jail or house arrest and a fine of up to $50,000, his attorney told the media on Tuesday.

Ex-FDA Chief Pleads Guilty To Charges (MRKTWTCH)

DOJ_NMG_0082836

By Robert Schroeder

Market Watch, October 18, 2006

Admits failing to disclose his financial interest in FDA-regulated companies

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- Lester Crawford, the former head of the Food and Drug Administration, pled guilty Tuesday to two misdemeanor charges that he failed to disclose stock ownership in regulated companies and had a conflict of interest, according to federal prosecutors.

Crawford is scheduled to be sentenced on Jan. 22 and faces up to a year in prison on each charge. He pled guilty Tuesday afternoon before U.S. Magistrate Judge Deborah Robinson of Washington, D.C. as part of a plea agreement with federal prosecutors.

The charges against Crawford alleged he or his wife owned shares in Sysco Corp., which were regulated by the FDA, according to a Tuesday statement from the Department of Justice.

"One of the most important principles of our ethics laws is that public officials cannot have a financial interest in any decision that they make," U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Taylor stated. "Lester Crawford, who held one of the most important jobs in government, blatantly violated these principles. Today, he is being held accountable for his actions."

Crawford, 68, of Chevy Chase, Md., served as head of the FDA for two months in 2005. He was confirmed as commissioner in July 2005 after a long Senate debate. Critics had accused the longtime FDA official of allowing politics to affect medical-regulation decisions, such as delaying the approval of over-the-counter sales of the contraceptive Plan B.

Crawford, who also had owned stock in PepsiCo, was at one time head of an Obesity Working Group that was studying recommendations for FDA regulations about food labels and calorie counts. Crawford's ownership of Sysco and PepsiCo shares, and his role with the Obesity group, gave rise to the conflict of interest charge. Robert Schroeder is a reporter for MarketWatch in Washington.

Ex-FDA Chief Strikes Plea Agreement In Stock Disclosure Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Andrew Bridges, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-As head of the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, Lester Crawford oversaw a federal agency that regulates products that account for an estimated 25 cents of every dollar spent each year by U.S. consumers.

At the same time, Crawford, through his broker, oversaw an investment portfolio that included tens of thousands of dollars in shares in food, beverage and medical device companies regulated by the very federal agency he ran.

Crawford knew what he and his wife owned, but still failed to fully disclose that information as required by federal law, the Justice Department said in court papers charging him with filing false financial disclosure forms and conflict of interest. In some cases, Crawford even assured federal ethics officers that he and his wife had sold stock in FDA-regulated companies that the couple in fact continued to hold, according to the papers.

Because of that, the former FDA commissioner was set to plead guilty Tuesday to the two misdemeanor counts, said his attorney, Barbara Van Gelder. She said Crawford would not dispute the federal government's claims under the plea agreement.

A fine is likely, though the two counts each carry a maximum penalty of one year in prison.

"At the end of the day, he owned these stocks, and he will admit he owned them while he was at the FDA, and he will take responsibility for that," Van Gelder said.

Crawford and his wife owned stock in Pepsico Inc., Sysco Corp., Kimberly-Clark Corp., Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and other companies that fall under the regulatory control of the agency, the Justice Department said in accusing the former FDA commissioner of making a false writing. Crawford's ownership of those shares was prohibited under federal regulations, since the companies are considered to be "significantly regulated" by the FDA.

The Justice Department also accused Crawford of conflict of interest, charging that as chairman of an FDA panel studying the problem of obesity, he and his wife owned at least US$140,000 in stock in Pepsico, the mammoth snacks and drinks company, and Sysco, a major food distribution company.

Both companies had a stake in the outcome of the panel's recommendations, which included a proposal that would require companies to more prominently display calorie information on food and drink labels.

The papers also say Crawford failed to disclose his income from exercising stock options in Embrex Inc. of Research Triangle Park, North Carolina, an agriculture biotechnology company. The failure to disclose came even as Crawford properly reported his earnings from stock sales on his tax returns. Crawford had been a member of Embrex's board of directors, according to federal filings.

DOJ_NMG_0082837

Crawford, a veterinarian and food-safety expert, abruptly resigned from the FDA job in September 2005, but gave no reason for his decision to step down. He had held the top position for just two months, following his confirmation by the Senate, but had been acting head of the agency for more than a year.

Crawford refused to take a reporter's telephone call at Policy Directions Inc., the lobbying firm where he now works. FDA spokeswoman Julie Zawisza declined to comment.

On the Net:

Food and Drug Administration: http://www.fda.gov

Trial That Could Out Feds Alleged To Have Bogus Degrees Delayed (GOVEXEC)

By Karen Rutzick

Government Executive, October 18, 2006

Names of 135 federal employees who allegedly bought fake diplomas from an outfit in the western United States will not be revealed for at least one year, if ever, according to a U.S attorney's office.

Last week in Spokane, Wash., during a pretrial hearing for eight people accused of selling counterfeit degrees from nonexistent universities, a defense attorney told the judge that employees from the National Security Agency and the Health and Human Services, Justice and State departments were among 6,000 people who bought the diplomas, according to the Associated Press.

The AP also reported that Peter Schweda, attorney for alleged diploma mill operator Steven Randock, said the names of 135 government employees who supposedly purchased the degrees for promotions or pay raises would be released during the course of the trial.

The trial will not start for another year, though. Judge Lonny Suko of the District Court of the Eastern District of Washington delayed it until Oct. 1, 2007, to give attorneys more time to prepare. Suko said more than 150,000 pages of e-mails, 40 CDs of documents and up to 50 witnesses will be used.

Tom Rice, a spokesman for the U.S attorney's office in Spokane, Wash., which is prosecuting the case, said Schweda's assertions that government purchasers would be revealed "were not necessarily accurate."

Rice also said he cannot confirm or deny that there is a separate Justice Department investigation into federal purchasers of the fake degrees. The case was built around a sting operation by a handful of Secret Service agents.

"It has been said that [names] may become available in that trial, but sitting here discussing it with you, I don't see how it's relevant to the Randock trial who purchased them," Rice said. "That'd be like saying everybody who used cocaine would be introduced in the trial of Manuel Noriega."

The 40-page indictment for defendants Steven Randock, Dixie Randock, Richard Novak, Blake Carlson, Amy Hensley, Heidi Lorhan, Roberta Markishtum and Kenneth Pearson accuses them of conspiracy to commit mail fraud, among other offenses. Pearson pleaded guilty last week.

The defendants allegedly set up a number of bogus universities, including "Saint Regis University," "James Monroe University" and "Trinity Christian School." They then sold diplomas and fake transcripts without requiring any coursework or testing.

One of the fake universities, "Robertstown University," used a photograph of Blenheim Castle, the birthplace of Winston Churchill and home of the Duke of Marlborough, to depict its campus on a Web site, according to the indictment.

In 2004, the Office of Personnel Management held seminars to train federal managers on spotting fake degrees. OPM and congressional overseers stepped up efforts to thwart diploma mills after Laura Callahan, a senior director in the Homeland Security Department chief information officer's office, was found to have purchased her degrees from an alleged diploma mill in Wyoming.

OPM did not respond to requests for comment on any current investigation into federal employees involved in the Randock case.

Man Pleads Guilty In 3 Idaho Slayings (FINDLAW/AP)

By Nicholas K. Geranios, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

(AP) - COEUR D'ALENE, Idaho-The man accused of kidnapping two children from their Idaho home and killing their family pleaded guilty Monday to murder and kidnapping in a deal that leaves him still eligible for the death penalty.

Joseph E. Duncan III, 43, was charged with bludgeoning two adults and a teenager to death at the home near Coeur d'Alene so he could kidnap the family's two youngest children for sex.

DOJ_NMG_0082838

Duncan pleaded guilty shortly before his trial was to begin Monday. Under his plea agreement, he is to be sentenced to three consecutive life terms without parole in an Idaho prison. But authorities said that sentencing would be postponed pending federal prosecution that could result in the death penalty.

Kootenai County Prosecutor Bill Douglas said the sole survivor, young Shasta Groene, had agreed to testify against the man accused of holding her captive in the woods for seven weeks.

"This agreement is possible because of a brave little 9-year-old girl who was willing to confront Duncan face-to-face in the courtroom," Douglas said.

Federal prosecutors have said they intend to charge Duncan with kidnapping Shasta Groene and her brother Dylan and taking them to a primitive campsite in Montana and that they expect to seek the death penalty. Court documents allege he repeatedly molested the pair, then killed Dylan, whose body was found later at the campsite.

Shasta Groene was rescued after she walked into an Idaho restaurant with Duncan seven weeks after the slayings.

If the federal trial does not produce a death sentence, Duncan could be brought back for a death penalty hearing in state court, Douglas said.

Steve Groene, the children's father, is unable to speak because of recent throat cancer surgery. After the hearing, he wrote a message on a board that said: "We feel this is the best possible outcome."

The agreement calls for Duncan to cooperate with state and federal authorities. Duncan must also provide the key to unlocking coded files in his computer that could hold additional evidence.

Duncan, a registered sex offender who has spent most of his adult life in Washington prisons, was on the run from a child molestation charge in Minnesota at the time of the slayings. He declined to make a statement Monday before the judge.

Duncan was charged with three counts of first-degree murder in the attacks on Shasta's mother, Brenda Groene; Groene's fiance, Mark McKenzie; and Groene's 13-year-old son, Slade, in May 2005.

Ex-Stafford Man Admits Role In $10M. Stock Scam (ACP)

By J. STAAS HAUGHT, Staff Writer

Atlantic City (NJ) Press, October 18, 2006

CAMDEN -- A former Ocean County man pleaded guilty Monday in federal court to involvement in a stock fraud case that cost investors millions of dollars and involved partners from Canada, New York, Florida and New Jersey, including a man from Upper Township.

Joseph F. Morgan, formerly of Stafford Township and now of St. Pete Beach, Fla., admitted to U.S. District Court Judge Jerome B. Simandle that he helped swindle investors of about $10 million in a scheme that netted more than $20 million through stock price manipulations.

As part of the scheme, involving several co-defendants and other unindicted partners, Morgan and others used a system of illegal stock compensations, fraudulent companies and shady brokerage deals to take control of nearly 100 million shares of TeleServices Internet Group Inc. and then sold those stocks to unsuspecting investors.

The scam, which ran from December 1996 through October 2005, involved at least 16 publicly traded companies, all trading on the Over the Counter Electronic Bulletin Board System. The shares â€" called penny stocks â€"â€‰generally traded for less than $1, often as little as 5 cents.

An official with the U.S. Department of Justice said the scam operated like a pump-and-dump or boiler-room scheme, in which brokers drum up investors by suggesting the stock is ready for a major price lift. In this case, Morgan and others used their connections to move the stock around, giving investors the appearance of true market activity.

Many investors bought stocks only to see the price collapse a short time later.

Morgan and four co-defendants were initially charged in October 2005.

On Monday, the Justice Department said an Upper Township man also was involved in the scheme.

Rhett Howard Kirchoff, who owned DiMedio Kirchoff & Co. from 1995 to 1998, pleaded guilty in March to his involvement in the scam and is awaiting sentencing.

Morgan is scheduled to be sentenced Feb. 2. He faces a maximum of five years for each of the two conspiracy to commit wire fraud charges and a maximum of 20 years for the two conspiracy to commit money laundering charges to which he pleaded guilty. Morgan has also agreed to forfeit $3.5 million in property and assets.

Other New Jersey defendants include:

nâ€‰Thomas S. King, of Cherry Hill. King was the broker on an account owned by Robert Gordon, the CEO, CFO, chairman and director of TeleServices. The account was maintained at Kirchoff's company.

nâ€‰Robert Pozner, of Ridgewood Park. Pozner was a licensed securities seller with two New Jersey brokerage firms.

Gordon, Pozner and King have pleaded not guilty and await trial.

Crime In Florida Continues To Drop, Except Murder (AP)

By David Royse, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. -- Crime continued to drop in Florida during the first half of this year, but the rate of violent crimes, particularly murders, went up, according to state figures released Tuesday.

Crimes tracked by federal officials dropped from 412,743 in the first six months of 2005 to 411,608 in the first half of 2006, statistics compiled by the Florida Department of Law Enforcement showed.

That represented a decrease of 0.3 percent, continuing a downward trend that has put the state's crime rate at its lowest in more than three decades.

But there was a striking anomaly in this year's figures: an increase in the number of murders. Local police agencies reported 518 killings in Florida through the end of June, up 27 percent from the 408 murders the state saw in the first six months of 2005.

Violent crime in general is bucking the overall trend in Florida, increasing 3.2 percent in the first half of 2006 over the same period last year.

The increase mirrors a mysterious uptick in violent crimes and murders in cities nationwide.

Officials don't have a clear explanation for what may be making the murder rate jump, following small but steady declines through recent years that were attributed in part to tougher sentencing laws.

In Orlando, officials have noted that the city has already seen 41 homicides this year, surpassing its old record of 36 for an entire year, set back in 1982.

Jacksonville had seen 92 murders through the end of last week, passing the 91 the city had in all of 2005. While the city has seen a slowing of murders in recent months, it is on pace to have its highest number of homicides in more than a decade.

Local officials have noted that many murders are drug related, but it's not clear whether some increase in drug use or trade is causing the spike. In fact, officials aren't sure what's going on.

"It's happening across the country too, for some reason," Gov. Jeb Bush said Tuesday. "I don't know if there's any particular reason that can be identified."

Nationally, violent crime rose 2.2 percent last year, the first increase since 2001.

In a speech to police chiefs on Monday, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said federal officials are looking for trends in gang violence, drug trafficking, and how inmates released from prison may have contributed to the increase. Gonzales also acknowledged that some law enforcement agencies have been stretched a little by new duties in anti-terrorism efforts.

U.S. Judge Again Rules Lethal Injection Procedure For Executions Is Unconstitutional (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

(AP) - KANSAS CITY, Missouri-A federal judge has ruled for a second time that Missouri's use of a three-drug lethal injection for executions is unconstitutional, confirming his ruling last month that the procedure could cause "torturous" pain.

The ruling issued Monday by U.S. District Judge Fernando Gaitan Jr. follows his September ruling that said the death penalty protocol could subject inmates to an unreasonable risk of cruel and unusual punishment and halted all executions in the state.

Gaitan had first ordered in June that the Missouri Department of Corrections make sweeping changes to its execution protocol. At issue is how painful lethal injection can be if the three drugs used are not given correctly. If the injection is given improperly, an inmate could be in pain but would be paralyzed and unable to show it, Gaitan said in his September ruling.

In that order, Gaitan gave the state until Oct. 27 to provide a revised protocol. But the state resubmitted the same proposal Oct. 6, arguing that it was constitutional and asking the judge to reconsider his decision.

The state's attorneys had asked Gaitan to rule quickly, so they could file an appeal if he ruled against them.

"The state's response does nothing to address these concerns and indicates its lack of willingness to even attempt to comply with the court's order," Gaitan wrote Monday.

Gaitan's ruling comes in the case of Michael A. Taylor, one of two men convicted of raping and killing Kansas City teenager Ann Harrison in 1989. Taylor came within hours of death earlier this year before his execution was stopped by the legal challenge.

Gaitan ordered the state to improve the monitoring of inmates to be sure they get enough anesthesia during the execution process. He also ordered that a doctor trained in administering anesthesia either mix the chemicals or oversee the mixing of chemicals for executions.

DOJ_NMG_0082840

U.S. Won't Charge Berkshire Unit In Virginia Case (WSJ)

By Karen Richardson

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

General Reinsurance, a unit of Berkshire Hathaway Inc., is in the clear and won't be charged by federal prosecutors in their continuing criminal investigation into the collapse of a professional-liability insurer in Virginia, according to a statement by Berkshire.

Berkshire, the Omaha, Neb., holding company headed by billionaire Warren Buffett, said General Re received a letter yesterday from the office of the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia in Richmond stating that the federal prosecutor "does not currently view General Reinsurance as a target or subject in connection with the EDVA U.S. attorney's pending investigation of Reciprocal of America."

Stanley Twardy, an attorney at Day, Berry & Howard LLP representing General Re, said, "The U.S. attorney's office has advised us that General Reinsurance will not be charged in any way in connection with the ROA matter. The government has declined prosecution."

Four of General Re's current and former employees are also not targets of the U.S. attorney's Reciprocal probe, even though they had earlier received subpoenas, and one of the former employees was previously identified as a target, according to Berkshire's statement about the letter.

Berkshire has never disclosed the names of the current or former employees who received subpoenas. The company said it would continue to cooperate with the investigation.

Marc Hamburg, Berkshire's chief financial officer, didn't return a call seeking comment. Assistant U.S. Attorney David Maguire, the lead prosecutor in the Reciprocal case, also didn't return a call seeking comment.

In rare cases, U.S. attorneys issue statements or letters -- sometimes by request of parties involved in continuing cases -- to help clear up public uncertainty over whether they are targets of investigators. It is unclear whether Berkshire requested the letter.

Reciprocal, which sold professional-liability insurance, was a customer of General Re. Previously, criminal investigators were probing whether General Re for more than a decade helped executives of Reciprocal disguise loans as reinsurance, according to people familiar with the case.

Specifically, investigators had wanted to know if General Re aided an alleged program to deceive state regulators and policyholders of the Richmond-based insurer with transactions dating to the early 1990s. In June 2005, a federal judge in Virginia gave a 12½-year jail sentence to a former president of Reciprocal.

Man Is Convicted Of Two Counts Of Murder In L.I. Drunken Driving Case (NYT)

By Paul Vitello

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

MINEOLA, N.Y., Oct. 17 — A man who crashed into a wedding limousine last year, killing the driver and a 7-year-old girl while driving drunk in the wrong direction on a Long Island parkway, was convicted on Tuesday of two counts of murder.

The verdict against Martin R. Heidgen, 25, of Valley Stream, which came on the fifth day of deliberation after jurors twice said they were deadlocked, is one of only a few murder convictions won in fatal drunken driving cases anywhere.

And it was the first in Nassau County, where the high incidence of drunken driving has become a public policy issue that figured heavily in the 2005 election campaign for the office of district attorney.

“We would hope that this verdict sends a message that if you drink and drive and kill someone, you will be prosecuted for murder,” said the district attorney, Kathleen M. Rice, who won that election, at least in part by criticizing her predecessor, Denis Dillon, for purportedly timid use of murder charges in fatal drunken driving cases.

The family of Katie Flynn, the 7-year-old girl who was killed, had forcefully encouraged the district attorney’s decision to bring a murder charge, and attended every day of the five week trial with a group of rarely less than 50 supporters, both family and friends.

“Murder was the only acceptable verdict,” said Katie’s father, Neil Flynn, of Long Beach, after the jury’s decision, which was rendered while several jurors wept and others held their heads in their hands. “This man murdered my daughter, and we’re glad he’s moving on to prison, where I hope it’s as bad as I’ve heard it is.”

Katie Flynn and her family were returning from a wedding at 2 a.m. on July 2, 2005, when Mr. Heidgen’s pickup truck, traveling north in the southbound lanes of the Meadowbrook Parkway, plowed into their hired limousine. The limousine chauffeur driver, Stanley Rabinowitz, 59, of Farmingdale, was also killed. Katie’s parents, a sister and her grandparents were injured.

DOJ_NMG_0082841

From a hospital where she was recovering from her injuries, Katie's mother, Jennifer Flynn, told reporters several days after the crash that she had held her daughter's decapitated head in her lap at the scene and had to be physically separated from it by emergency workers.

Mr. Heidgen's lawyer, Stephen LaMagna of Garden City, said Mr. Heidgen's family was "devastated and disappointed" by the verdict. The defendant's parents and several relatives also attended each day of the trial. Mr. LaMagna said that Mr. Heidgen "has always expressed remorse for what happened," and promised to appeal the verdict, adding, "when the appeals court reviews the record, I hope they will see it for what it is." He would not elaborate.

The murder charge brought against Mr. Heidgen, murder in the second degree by depraved indifference, carries the same penalties as intentional murder — a minimum of 15 years and a maximum of 25 years to life — and has been the subject of several appellate court decisions in the last two years. Though the case law is still evolving, the drift of the appellate rulings has been toward increasing the burden of proof for a sustainable conviction.

Whereas "depraved indifference" was previously considered a self-evident set of circumstances, it is now understood as a state of mind that must be established with evidence. In his instructions to the jury in this case, Acting Justice Alan R. Honorof of State Supreme Court described that state of mind as one in which a person "engages in conduct which creates a grave and unjustifiable risk that another person's death will occur, and when he or she is aware of and consciously disregards that risk."

He said the depraved indifference state of mind "reflects a wicked, evil or inhuman state of mind."

Jurors who were interviewed said they saw depraved indifference in Mr. Heidgen's behavior not only because he was very drunk — three times the legal limit — and not only because he was driving the wrong way, but because he passed six cars over a distance of almost three miles before he crashed into the Flynns' limousine.

"We didn't think he was trying to avoid the accident," said the juror Michael Derita, 39, a graphics designer from Levittown. "He didn't try to get out of the way."

A majority of the jurors favored a verdict of murder from the beginning. Four held out for a lesser charge of manslaughter, Mr. Derita said. At one point during the five days of deliberations, with only two jurors favoring the lesser charge, one of them withdrew from the discussion altogether and "went to sleep for a couple of hours."

The jury filed into a hushed courtroom in the ninth hour of their fifth day of deliberations, at 5:10 p.m. Tuesday.

After the jury forewoman uttered the word "guilty" to the first of the two murder charges, the 50 or 60 friends and relatives of the Flynns, and several of Mr. Rabinowitz's relatives, exploded with a keening cheer that they then almost immediately choked back, falling silent again to hear the verdicts on the remaining charges.

The accumulated anxiety and emotion of the five-week trial and weeklong deliberations seemed to sweep through the room as relatives and friends of the crash victims fell into each others' arms, gasping and weeping.

Mr. Heidgen, an insurance salesman in Manhattan, was also found guilty of drunken driving and aggravated assault in connection with the other family members' injuries.

He was scheduled to be sentenced next month.

Williams Seeks $11 Million To Extend Anti-crime Package (WT)

By Matthew Cella And Amy Doolittle, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

Mayor Anthony A. Williams yesterday asked the D.C. Council for $11 million to continue and expand a package of emergency crime measures passed in July.

The legislation includes a request for $5 million for youth-violence prevention programs, $4.2 million for additional police overtime and $1.7 million for the city's burgeoning network of neighborhood surveillance cameras.

It also would renew four key provisions of the mayor's emergency package, which is set to expire at midnight tomorrow.

Those provisions authorized the use of neighborhood surveillance cameras, allowed some offenders to be held until trial, gave police access to juvenile criminal records and granted the mayor power to set the time of the juvenile curfew.

Today, the council is scheduled to vote on whether to renew the package for 90 days on an emergency basis. But, the council's general counsel first must determine whether the legislation violates a statute barring passage of the same law more than once on an emergency basis.

Charlotte Brookins-Hudson, the counsel, told The Washington Times last month that the bill would require a "very substantial modification" to be permitted under the statute, which is designed to prevent city officials from circumventing the congressional review period to which D.C. laws are subject.

Mrs. Brookins-Hudson could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Adrian M. Fenty, the Democratic nominee for mayor, cast the lone vote against the crime package in July. Reached last night, Mr. Fenty said he was "being briefed" on the mayor's proposal.

DOJ_NMG_0082842

Permanent anti-crime legislation that addresses the provisions of the emergency measure is before the council, but it cannot be enacted before December, at the earliest.

Mr. Williams yesterday also announced an end to the 10 p.m. juvenile curfew. Beginning Friday, curfew hours for those 16 or younger will return to 11 p.m. on weekdays and midnight on weekends.

"It has been useful," Metropolitan Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said. "It was a temporary measure. It just gave the mayor the authority to change the hours. It was never meant to be a permanent solution."

Chief Ramsey said the overtime money would be used to pay for expenditures the police department has incurred in recent weeks since officials spent the $8 million that the council appropriated for overtime in the emergency measure in July.

He said he expected to continue through the end of the month the crime emergency, which suspends the provisions of the police union contract that mandates a two-week notice before changing officers' assignments.

He said some of the overtime money would be used to fund overtime assignments after the emergency ends, but those would be on a limited volunteer basis.

The chief could not say how many more cameras he expected the department to purchase. He said that more than $1 million of the $2.3 million that the council authorized in July was spent on infrastructure but that those costs should be far less this time.

"The majority of it will go to cameras," he said. "I would think we would be able to get another 35-40."

Janis Bolt, a spokeswoman for the D.C. Office of Contracting and Procurement, said each camera costs $21,975.

CIVIL LAW:

Agency FOIA Administration Found To Be Improving (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, October 18, 2006

Agencies subject to the Freedom of Information Act are for the most part complying with an executive order outlining a two-year process for improving the implementation of the 40-year-old law, according to a new Justice Department report.

All 91 federal agencies subject to FOIA have prepared plans for improving the process of releasing federal documents to the public, refined the plans where necessary and posted them on their Web sites for public review, the report stated. Most agencies also fulfilled the order's first requirement successfully by appointing chief FOIA officers by Jan. 13, 2006.

In fiscal 2005, agencies handled more than 2.6 million FOIA requests at a cost of $300 million. This represents a 35 percent increase in activity over fiscal 2001, the report stated.

The executive order, signed by President Bush on Dec.14, 2005, directed agencies to ensure citizen-centered and results-oriented FOIA operations.

A number of improvement plans failed to properly address how the agencies would address backlogs of requests for information, the report stated. A few agencies have modified plans to comply with the order, including the Education Department, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, NASA, the National Archives and Records Administration and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

But a number of other agencies have yet to complete the modifications. These were the Agriculture, Commerce, Defense, Homeland Security, Labor and Veterans Affairs departments; the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Trade Commission, the General Services Administration, the Merit Systems Protection Board, the National Science Foundation, the National Transportation Safety Board and the Social Security Administration.

The report recommended a follow-up to a March 8 meeting of chief FOIA officers, a requirement that agencies review standard forms and correspondence formats used for FOIA purposes and increased use of technology for FOIA administration. Justice reviewers highlighted efforts at the Defense and Interior departments to use technology to streamline the process for releasing documents.

A recent governmentwide technology initiative is aimed at automating FOIA processes as a means of reducing backlogs. Several large decentralized agencies, such as the Housing and Urban Development and Veterans Affairs departments, reported they were seeking automated systems for tracking FOIA requests.

GSA reported that its "field office" structure contributes to an inability to accurately track the types of responses throughout the agency.

DOJ_NMG_0082843

The report stated that the Justice Department has focused on reducing backlogs by establishing a goal of closing the 10 oldest pending FOIA requests for records from its leadership offices on a regular basis. Other agencies, such as the Small Business Administration, do not have such backlogs, the report said.

Justice also urged agencies to follow GSA's lead by sending postcards to acknowledge the receipt of a FOIA request, rather than the standard written letters. This is a means of saving time and money for more substantial FOIA activities, the report said.

In the next step, agencies will be required to report on the implementation of the improvement plan's first stage by Feb. 1, 2007. Fiscal 2006 FOIA reports are due to President Bush by June 1, 2007. The fiscal 2007 report will be due in February 2008.

House Government Reform Management, Finance and Accountability Subcommittee Chairman Todd Platts, R-Pa., said in a statement the report provides a fair accounting of agencies' actions to improve the public's access to information.

But to further improve FOIA, Platts urged action on legislation he introduced to close loopholes in the law. The bill (H.R. 867), which would amend the FOIA, has passed out of Platts' subcommittee.

A companion bill in the Senate (S. 394) passed out of the Senate Judiciary Committee in September.

No Death Benefits For Studds's Spouse (WP)

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

BOSTON, Oct. 17 -- The federal government has refused to pay death benefits to the spouse of former congressman Gerry E. Studds (D-Mass.), the first openly gay member of Congress.

Studds married Dean Hara in 2004 after same-sex marriage was legalized in Massachusetts. But Hara will not be eligible to receive any portion of Studds's estimated $114,337 annual pension because the 1996 Defense of Marriage Act bars the federal government from recognizing Studds's marriage.

Peter Graves, a spokesman for the Office of Personnel Management, which administers the congressional pension program, said same-sex partners are not recognized as spouses for any marriage benefits. He said Studds's case is the first of its kind known to the agency.

Under federal law, pensions can be denied only to lawmakers' same-sex partners and to people convicted of espionage or treason, Graves said.

The homosexuality of Studds was exposed during a teenage-page sex scandal in 1983. He died Saturday at 69, several days after collapsing while walking his dog. Doctors said he had developed two blood clots.

Graves said Studds could have purchased an insurable interest annuity, similar to an insurance policy, which is allowed under both the civil service and the federal-employee retirement system and is not affected by the Defense of Marriage Act. Graves said he did not know whether Studds used that option.

Peter J. Sepp, spokesman for the nonprofit watchdog group National Taxpayers Union, estimated Studds's annual pension at $114,337. That would have made Hara, 48, eligible for a lifetime annual pension of about $62,000, which would grow with inflation, if the marriage were recognized by the federal government, Sepp said.

Hara declined to comment.

Gary Buseck, legal director for the group Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, said Studds's case may offer "a moment of education for Congress."

"Now they have a death in the congressional family of one of their distinguished members whose spouse is being treated differently than any of their spouses," Buseck said.

In 2004, Massachusetts became the first state to legalize same-sex marriage after gay couples successfully sued for the right to marry.

Studds was elected to Congress in 1972. In 1983, a 27-year-old man disclosed that he and Studds had had a sexual relationship a decade earlier when he was a congressional page. The House censured Studds, who revealed on the House floor that he was gay.

Constituents reelected Studds until he retired in 1997 to become a lobbyist for the fishing industry and environmental causes.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

California Letter Investigated For Warning To Immigrants (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082844

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 17 — Federal and state authorities are trying to determine who sent a letter to some Latinos in Southern California that falsely suggested that it would be a crime for immigrants to vote in the coming election.

The letter, written in formal, sometimes clumsy Spanish and signed "Sergio Ramirez," was mailed last week to an undetermined number of people with Spanish surnames in Orange County, the authorities said. It advised recipients that "if you're an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that can result in incarceration," or deportation.

While illegal immigrants are barred from voting, legal immigrants who have become citizens are permitted to do so.

The letter also stated that the federal government had installed a computer system to verify the names of new registered voters who vote in October and November and that anti-immigration groups would be able to access that information. Election Day is Nov. 7, but early voting is allowed Oct. 20-29 in Orange County.

Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, which along with the California attorney general's office is investigating the letter's source, said there was no such database.

"The letter contains false information," Ms. Magnuson said.

The letter was printed on stationery labeled with the name of the California Coalition for Immigration Reform, a strident anti-illegal-immigration group whose Web site features a video on how illegal immigrants bring disease to the United States.

But Barbara Coe, the group's leader, told The Los Angeles Times, which first reported the letter on Tuesday, that her group had not sent or authorized it, and that she did not know a Sergio Ramirez. On Tuesday, Ms. Coe did not return repeated phone calls and e-mail seeking comment.

Some Latino leaders expressed doubts on Tuesday about Ms. Coe's denial and said they suspected the letter was part of a concerted, long-term effort on the part of groups like hers to intimidate voters.

"They're taking as much action as they can to make the lives of Latinos as miserable as possible," said Brent Wilkes, the national executive director of the League of United Latin American Citizens, a civil rights group.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger called the letter racist and urged Bill Lockyer, the California attorney general, to prosecute those responsible with a hate crime. A collection of other civil rights groups also called on Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to investigate the letter as a violation of federal voting laws.

Nathan Barankin, a spokesman for Mr. Lockyer, said his office had been alerted to the letter on Monday morning, after a weekend in which Latino leaders fielded calls from outraged constituents.

"They could be naturalized citizens or they could be fourth-generation Californians," Mr. Barankin said of the recipients. "What we do know is that some of the recipients of this letter are legal and longtime registered voters in California."

Mr. Barankin said the letter could have violated two California laws. One bans the use of coercion or intimidation in an effort to prevent someone from voting; the other makes it illegal to knowingly challenge a person's right to vote on fraudulent and spurious grounds.

It was unclear, Mr. Barankin said, how many of the letters were distributed, but his office expected more complaints.

"We're going to determine who sent it, and why they sent it and then from that, if there's enough evidence to prosecute," Mr. Barankin said.

Orange County, between Los Angeles and San Diego, has seen a substantial increase in its Latino population over the last two decades. A 2005 estimate by the Census Bureau reported that nearly one in three Orange County residents was of Latino or Hispanic origin.

Representative Loretta Sanchez, a Democrat from Garden Grove, in northern Orange County, said that she had heard from a handful of constituents in her district who received a letter, and that she feared it could scare off first-time voters.

"Santa Ana and Anaheim are the new Ellis Island of the United States," Ms. Sanchez said, mentioning two Orange County cities with large Latino populations. "New people are becoming citizens every day, and who knows the sophistication level when they get a letter like this?"

But others thought the letter would have little effect.

"I think Latino voters are astute enough not to be intimidated," said John Trasviña, the interim president and general counsel for the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund in Los Angeles. "And they've seen the same tactics used against them in the recent past as well as the farther ago past. And they won't take it."

Election Board Votes To Send New Letter To 305,000 Misinformed Voters (AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

ATLANTA - The State Election Board on Tuesday approved a letter that will inform more than 300,000 Georgia voters who were told they needed a photo ID to vote that they can still use 17 forms of identification to cast a ballot on Nov. 7.

The board also approved radio and television public service announcements to be broadcast statewide. The Secretary of State's Office will be responsible for distributing the letter and ads, and will partially fund the efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0082845

The mailing is expected to cost $127,000, and the ads will be taped and aired using $16,000 from the election board budget previously reserved for voter education.

Both measures were approved at a special meeting called by election board member David Worley after he discovered nearly 200,000 voters - not the 20,000 initially reported by Vice Chair Claud "Tex" McIver - were told they would need to get a photo ID at the polls.

In all, the board of elections contacted by mail 305,000 registered voters believed to lack state-issued photo identification. Most received letters after a Sept. 19 ruling by Fulton County Superior Court Judge T. Jackson Bedford declaring the photo ID law violated the Georgia Constitution as an undue burden on voters.

At the meeting, Worley - the lone Democrat on the panel - questioned McIver on how the discrepancy was made and where he got his information. McIver approved the mailing of the additional letters after Bedford's ruling.

Worley said that mailing was a "deliberate attempt to make people think they needed a photo ID they did, in fact, not need."

McIver said he reported the information he was given about how many letters remained to be sent after the judge's order.

"I can assure you our staff did not get that information from the tooth fairy," McIver said, adding that he was also surprised to see that so many letters had gone out after the law was banned.

For months, lawyers have been battling over Georgia's photo ID law - one of several passed recently across the country - in state and federal court, and lawyers opposing Georgia's photo ID law are set to ask a judge on Friday to hold the state in contempt of Bedford's order.

Opponents claim the photo ID law is intended to discourage minorities, the poor and the elderly from casting ballots. In a motion filed Monday, the attorneys also asked the judge to force the state to send new letters to those voters.

The Chicago-based Rainbow/PUSH Coalition, led by the Rev. Jesse Jackson, sent a letter Tuesday to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales criticizing Georgia's actions and demanding that corrective action be taken to inform voters of the current election rules.

"Georgia and other states still insist on interposing burdensome obstructions between the American people and their right to vote in violation of the 15th Amendment," reads the letter, signed by Jackson. "The State Board of Elections...wants to pretend that mailing the notices was harmless error. It was either intentional voter fraud or grossly negligent disregard of the right to vote."

After the meeting, Worley said he was not satisfied with McIver's explanation of why he would report that only 20,000 letters were left to be mailed after the judge's order, but that he is satisfied that the issue will be corrected with the new mailing by the Secretary of State's Office.

"Based on the way this was handled, I didn't trust the Republican majority to do it properly the second time," Worley said.

McIver maintained he did not regret his decision to mail the first letter - which he called an education piece - and that he does not believe voter confusion exists over the photo ID law.

Supporters of the law - primarily Republicans - have said it is needed to prevent voter fraud, despite the absence of examples of in-person voter fraud.

FBI Forwards Rylee Investigation To Justice Department (ADG)

By DEBRA HALE-SHELTON

Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, October 18, 2006

The FBI has forwarded information from its investigation into Russellville police officers' fatal encounter with Bobby Joe Rylee last summer to the Civil Rights Division of the U. S. Department of Justice.

The Washington-based office will determine whether a federal civil-rights violation occurred in the forcible arrest of Rylee on July 15 in a parking lot along Arkansas 7 in Russellville, said Steven Frazier, a spokesman for the FBI office in Little Rock.

Rylee, 61, quit breathing several hours after police took him to the Pope County jail. He died five days later in a Little Rock hospital.

Russellville Police Chief James Bacon has said he understood the FBI was investigating at the request of Rylee's family. Frazier previously declined to comment on an ongoing investigation, which is FBI policy.

In August, Prosecuting Attorney David Gibbons of Clarksville declined to charge four Russellville police officers, saying they were justified in the force they used to subdue and arrest Rylee. Police said Rylee had fought with them and stabbed one officer in the arm with a ballpoint pen, which Gibbons concluded was a deadly weapon.

Rylee's family filed a federal lawsuit in Little Rock last month, contending that Russellville police officers beat Rylee before taking him to jail, where, the lawsuit said, he was refused medical attention despite life-threatening injuries. Police have said Rylee declined medical treatment.

"I believe we have forwarded the initial information that we have received about this case," Frazier said by telephone Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0082846

"Some of that has come from the [Russellville] Police Department, the media and others."

Frazier said all FBI civilrights investigations ultimately are presented to the Justice Department.

He said he had no idea how long the process would take.

He also said he could not say when the FBI forwarded the information to Washington.

Frazier said the Civil Rights Division can make one of three decisions: That there is a prosecutable violation. That there is "no prosecutive merit."

That more information and investigation are needed.

"In order for [the latter] to happen... there needs to be enough of an allegation to warrant additional investigation," Frazier said.

In a response filed last week with the U. S. District Court in Little Rock to the Rylee family's lawsuit, Pope County Sheriff Jay Winters and jail supervisor Luke Sawdy denied allegations of failing to provide medical care to Rylee when they should have known his injuries were serious.

Russellville police filed a separate response, denying allegations of beating or assaulting Rylee.

Both responses asked that the suit be dismissed.

Study Finds Race Disparity In Breast Cancer Mortality Rates (CHIT)

By Judy Peres, Ronald Kotulak And Peter Gorner

Chicago Tribune, October 18, 2006

A study showing an alarming gap in breast cancer death rates for black and white women in Chicago has mobilized health experts to find the root causes and recommend within a year ways to reduce the unusually high mortality among African-Americans.

Why black women are more likely to die of breast cancer is unclear, but medical leaders said genetics, lack of awareness about breast self-examination, inability to afford routine mammograms and limited access to medical facilities may play crucial roles.

Some Chicago researchers are also beginning to look at whether the stress of social isolation and living in impoverished or crime-ridden neighborhoods might make some women more vulnerable to cancer.

Another possibility is that some facilities serving black women are doing a poor job of detecting cancers early.

"Women are dying—overwhelmingly poor and black women—because of inadequate quality of the mammography process. That's our hypothesis," said Steve Whitman, director of the Sinai Urban Health Institute, which conducted the study released Tuesday.

The study, which has not yet been published or undergone the scrutiny of peers, found that the odds that a woman will die of breast cancer has been declining steadily for close to two decades, yet African-American women have been seeing the reverse. (The report did not analyze data for women of other races.)

As recently as the 1980s, mortality rates for black and white women in Chicago were both around 38 breast cancer deaths per 100,000 women per year, according to the study. The rates started to diverge in the 1990s, as overall mortality rates began to drop thanks to improvements in treatment and early detection.

By 2003, the last year for which statistics are available, the rate for Chicago's black women was 73 percent higher: 40.5 breast cancer deaths per 100,000, compared with 23.4 for white women.

For the U.S. as a whole, the mortality rate for white women is 25.2, compared with 34.6 for black women—37 percent higher. The study reported the gap in New York City was only 17 percent (35.8 for blacks, 30.7 for whites), which suggests "it's not just an issue of big urban areas," Whitman said.

Researchers have been trying for years to discover why black women in America have a higher risk of dying of breast cancer, even though they're less likely to get the disease.

Some studies have found biological differences that may cause black women to get more aggressive types of breast cancer. Experts say black women are more likely than white women to have a combination of three genetic defects that makes their tumors harder to treat.

"We've known for years that African-American women have a more aggressive type of breast cancer compared to white women," said Dr. Virginia Kaklamani, an oncologist at the Northwestern University Feinberg School of Medicine. "One of the reasons for that is that the kind of breast cancer they get is genetically worse."

At the University of Chicago, meanwhile, a large federally funded study is under way to look at social factors that might bring about biological changes that lead to breast cancer. The team includes specialists in the medical, biological, behavioral and social sciences.

DOJ_NMG_0082847

"We think the black-white disparity is due to complex interactions of genetic and environmental factors. By joining together is the only way we're going to get a handle on them," said study leader Sarah Gehlert, director of the Center for Interdisciplinary Health Disparities Research.

"Between 70 and 80 percent of all breast cancers are due to sporadic mutations, not inherited mutations. That means it's things that happen in the environment," Gehlert said.

"We think that if you live in really adverse circumstances in a neighborhood with a lot of crime, so the threat's always there, you'll be afraid to go out and will develop what we call a dysregulated stress response," she said. "And you'll be more likely to have spontaneous mutations of the breast cancer genes."

Gehlert said her study is based on the work of U. of C. psychologist Martha McClintock, who showed that socially isolated female laboratory rats suffered an increase in spontaneous breast cancers.

"We're testing this hypothesis in Chicago and Gary on 233 newly diagnosed African-American breast cancer patients," Gehlert said. "We go into their homes and look at their neighborhoods. Then we examine their tumors after they've been biopsied to see if they're due to spontaneous mutations or are inherited."

Experts also noted that black women also are more likely to get inferior care, fail to seek appropriate testing and be unable to afford routine mammograms.

Sandra Stewart, 55, who lives on Chicago's South Side, said she hadn't had a mammogram in 10 years when she felt a hardness in her breast one morning last October—breast cancer awareness month.

"Most of us can't afford it," she said. "I didn't have any insurance."

Scared, she called a cancer hot line she'd seen on TV and was able to receive a free mammogram. "They found an advanced cancer," she said. "The very same day, they sent me up for a biopsy."

The Stand Against Cancer project arranged for Medicaid to cover her treatment, and today Stewart is in complete remission.

To address the idea that the mammography available to black women may be of poor quality, the Sinai report calls on area hospitals and breast centers to collect and share mammography quality measures as the first step toward improving services.

"In health care, what gets measured gets better," said Alan Channing, president of the Sinai Health System.

Mammograms, which are specialized X-rays, are difficult to read, and their effectiveness in spotting cancer early depends in part on how well they are interpreted. The American College of Radiology has established quality standards and recommends that all mammography programs keep track of their performance. But many programs do not, and most do not release the data if they have it.

To stimulate transparency and perhaps challenge other facilities to release their data, the Sinai report includes quality measures for Mt. Sinai Hospital (part of the Sinai Health System) and Mercy Hospital.

The task force organized to figure out how to reduce Chicago's racial gap in breast cancer death rates will call a summit meeting in January with leaders in radiology, mammography, medical financing and others concerned about breast cancer.

"We expect experts from all the leading medical centers to participate, as well as breast cancer survivors and epidemiologists, and map out a plan to eliminate these terrible disparities," Whitman said.

The task force will be co-chaired by Ruth Rothstein, former CEO of the Cook County Bureau of Health and now president of the board of Rosalind Franklin University of Medicine; Sister Sheila Lyne, CEO of Mercy Hospital and former commissioner of the Chicago Department of Public Health; and Donna Thompson, CEO of Access Community Health Network.

Calling the co-chairs "the three most powerful women in health care in Chicago," Whitman said, "I think the task force has a real chance at fixing this. I'm optimistic."

Chris Rock's Mom Claims Discrimination (AP)

By Bruce Smith, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

CHARLESTON, S.C. -- Rose Rock, the mother of comedian Chris Rock, claims she was racially discriminated against when she was seated but ignored for more than a half hour at a Cracker Barrel restaurant along the South Carolina coast.

Rock said Tuesday she planned to sue the Lebanon, Tenn.-based company. A Cracker Barrel spokeswoman said the restaurant chain was investigating and taking the complaint "very seriously."

Cracker Barrel has in the past faced numerous lawsuits and a federal inquiry over complaints of refusing to serve black customers, discriminating against minority workers and firing gay employees. The company has taken steps to rebuild its folksy image and reach out to minorities.

Rock, who is from Georgetown, said she and her 21-year-old daughter were the only blacks at the chain's Murrells Inlet restaurant in April. She said when she asked the manager about the delay she was told they could have a free meal.

DOJ_NMG_0082848

"He never called over the waitresses and asked, `Why did these people sit here for an hour without service?'" she said. "The only thing he said was we could have a free meal and neither of us wanted to eat."

Cracker Barrel spokeswoman Julie Davis said the company doesn't "tolerate any form of discrimination."

"It has always been a violation of our policies and procedures and it is neither condoned nor allowed," she said. "We do not allow the type of behavior you are describing," Davis said.

Rock said she contacted the South Carolina Human Affairs Commission and was told her complaint would be handled, but "nothing ever happened."

The head of the commission, Jesse Washington, said Tuesday that after initial discussions, the complaint was finalized Aug. 7 and his agency also was investigating. He would not comment on the complaint.

"We get thousands of charges coming through here in the course of a year," he said. "It's not out of line _ the time frame on this. It is being investigated and we will be in touch with her when we have a report."

The Rev. Al Sharpton will join Rock on Wednesday in South Carolina to announce that Sharpton's Action Network will finance the planned lawsuit.

"I'm getting reports from all over the country about Cracker Barrel," Sharpton said from New York on Tuesday.

He also said state officials are slow to act on such complaints.

"When people are talking about there is no more discrimination, a lot of it is because they are not following this stuff up," Sharpton said.

Cracker Barrel, established in 1969, operates 547 restaurants in 41 states, according to the company's Web site.

Georgetown is about 60 miles northeast of Charleston.

ANTITRUST:

Feds OK Pilgrim's Pride Takeover Bid (AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

PITTSBURG, Texas --Chicken producer Pilgrim's Pride Corp. on Tuesday said federal regulators have cleared its proposed acquisition of Atlanta-based poultry company Gold Kist Inc., which opposes the bid.

Pilgrim's Pride launched its hostile $20-a-share takeover bid last month, after Gold Kist declined to make a deal in August, the company has said. The offer represents a premium of 55 percent over Gold Kist's closing stock price on Aug. 18.

Gold Kist has said the offer is not in the best interest of its shareholders.

On Tuesday, Pilgrim's Pride said the antitrust division of the Justice Department granted an early expiration to the waiting period mandated by antitrust laws.

Pilgrim's Pride President and Chief Executive O.B. Goolsby Jr. called the move "a positive step forward in our efforts to acquire Gold Kist."

The company's tender offer to acquire all outstanding shares of Gold Kist is scheduled to expire at midnight on Friday, Oct. 27.

Shares of Pilgrim's Pride fell 18 cents to $27.13 in morning trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Gold Kist shares rose 24 cents to $20.63 on the Nasdaq.

Kucinich Questions Giant Eagle Purchase Of Ohio Stores (PPG)

By Teresa F. Lindeman, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 18, 2006

Ohio congressman Dennis J. Kucinich, concerned about losing jobs in his region, is asking federal officials to look at potential antitrust issues when considering O'Hara-based grocer Giant Eagle's plans to buy 18 stores in the Cleveland area.

Rep. Kucinich, the former Cleveland mayor, presidential candidate and a fifth-term Democrat who is up for re-election, this week sent a letter to the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission asking that they investigate the potential for the sale to impact the price of food in the Cleveland area.

Giant Eagle, already a major player in the northeast Ohio market, said last week it would buy 18 Tops Market stores for an undisclosed amount from Dutch owner Ahold. The parent company put 46 Tops stores up for sale earlier this year and hopes to have buyers for the remaining 28 stores by the end of the year.

The O'Hara company supplied about 45 percent of the Cleveland-Elyria-Mentor grocery market as of June, according to TradeDimensions International in Wilton, Conn. Tops claimed a little more than 20 percent while Wal-Mart had about 6 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0082849

An antitrust review would try to determine if, after the sale, Giant Eagle could control the market to the point it could significantly raise prices, said Robert Fleishman, an antitrust lawyer with Washington, D.C., law firm Steptoe & Johnson. That might be hard to do in an era when supermarkets face increasing competition from retailers such as Target as well as dollar stores and convenience stores.

Even if the overall deal is not a problem, there might be particular Tops locations that officials would be concerned about. When the owner of Macy's bought Kaufmann's, the retailer agreed to sell certain overlapping locations to department store competitors, if possible.

However, Giant Eagle officials do not believe there's a problem. "Our attorneys researched the issue carefully and have advised that there are no antitrust problems with this acquisition," spokesman Dan Donovan said in an e-mailed response.

Rep. Kucinich has been concerned about the 4,000 part-time and full-time jobs at the Tops stores since the original announcement that the stores would be sold. His letter to federal officials cited a local newspaper report that a group of buyers had been interested keeping all 46 stores locally owned and operated.

A Tops spokesman said yesterday preserving jobs is a goal. He said the company would like to sell the remaining stores to supermarket operators but, "We will look at any and all offers."

(Teresa F. Lindeman can be reached at tlindeman@post-gazette.com or at 412-263-2018.)

Feds' Power To Renege On Immunity May Be Tested In U.S. Supreme Court (LAW)

By Lisa Brennan, New Jersey Law Journal

New Jersey Law Journal, October 18, 2006

A 3rd Circuit case at the door of the U.S. Supreme Court will test the federal government's power to revoke immunity from prosecution granted to antitrust violators who agree to rat on their rivals.

During an Oct. 27 conference, the Court will decide whether to hear Stolt-Nielsen, S.A. v. U.S., 06-97, which would test whether a court can enjoin the Justice Department's Antitrust Division from withdrawing immunity promised under its Corporate Leniency Program.

The case piques the interest of not only antitrust lawyers but also white-collar criminal defense attorneys, because the lifting of immunity means that all items of evidence a cooperating company has willingly handed over can become weapons in the government's arsenal.

"Stolt could have broad implications in every instance in which the government promises a benefit to a defendant in exchange for cooperation," says Alison Smith, a former Antitrust Division lawyer now at Haynes & Boone in Houston. "A corporation considering applying for immunity must now question whether the evidence it provides to the government will simply be used against it."

Smith says an eventual ruling by the Court "could clarify the nature and extent of the defendants' constitutional rights in these agreements" and "could determine the limits of the government's ability to revoke agreements unilaterally and the power of the courts to restrain the government's decision to prosecute."

Demonstrating the gravity of the case, no fewer than nine amici curiae have filed briefs supporting the petition for certiorari. One of them is the Association of Corporate Counsel, led by senior vice president and general counsel Susan Hackett. "The impact on my members is their concern that they can no longer make rational decisions that would suggest predictable results," she says.

Under the Corporate Leniency Program, companies that first report illegal antitrust activity can get immunity from indictment and prosecution. In exchange, they must incriminate themselves, turn over key documents, waive attorney-client privilege and fully cooperate with prosecutors seeking to convict their competitors. Companies that wait receive lesser degrees of leniency, similar to deferred prosecution agreements or single-count guilty pleas common in other corporate crime cases.

Since it was instituted in 1993, the program has been a strong magnet for cartel cases, attracting more than 100 applicants and generating $2 billion in fines, according to a former federal prosecutor, Donald Baker of Washington, D.C.'s Baker & Miller.

But the Antitrust Division's action in Stolt will cause some second-guessing among would-be participants. "If you're going to disclose what you did in exchange for leniency, and then the government turns around and pulls your ticket, it will have a potential chilling effect in all of these cases," says defense lawyer Michael Himmel, of Roseland, N.J.'s Lowenstein Sandler. "Corporations will have to think long and hard about coming forward for fear of being bitten."

The parties in the case are London-based shipping company Stolt-Nielsen, S.A., and two executives, who were indicted Sept. 6 for antitrust violations. A federal judge enjoined the indictment last year, but the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed on March 24.

DOJ_NMG_0082850

In that ruling, a two-judge panel said a district court judge has no power to enjoin prosecutors from filing an indictment because the equitable powers of the court do not exist when there is "an adequate and complete remedy at law." That remedy is to raise the immunity agreement as a defense after indictment, the court said.

U.S. District Judge Timothy Savage in Philadelphia, who decided the case below in January 2005, recited that Stolt had entered into the Antitrust Division's program and had provided information about a price-fixing and bid-rigging conspiracy that led to guilty pleas from two co-conspirators and more than $62 million in fines. Because the company had fulfilled its obligations under an immunity agreement, Stolt was entitled to an injunction barring the filing of an indictment, Savage held.

Prosecutors had argued that Stolt misled the government by claiming that its participation in the antitrust conspiracy had ceased in March 2002, but Savage found the government had explicitly immunized the company and its executives from prosecution for activity prior to Jan. 15, 2003.

Because the government drafted the agreement, it "cannot depend upon a tacit understanding of what it contends was meant during negotiations but was not memorialized in the integrated agreement," Savage said.

Savage concluded that the only way to protect the company's and its executives' due process rights was to decide, prior to indictment, whether the government could void the agreement.

The 3rd Circuit disagreed, finding the trial court's ruling not only ultra vires but also violative of separation of powers. U.S. Circuit Judge Thomas Ambro said the appeal presented "a significant constitutional question of first impression in this circuit: whether federal courts have authority, consistent with the separation of powers, to enjoin the executive branch from filing an indictment."

Although federal courts have such authority "in narrow circumstances, ... this is not such a case," wrote Ambro, joined by visiting U.S. Court of International Trade Judge Jane Restani. (Judge Samuel Alito Jr. was on the three-judge panel when the case was argued in September 2005 but did not participate in the ruling due to his elevation to the U.S. Supreme Court.)

According to court papers, Stolt admitted to participating in an international conspiracy to allocate customers, rig bids and fix prices on parcel tanker affreightment contracts for the shipment of specialty liquids to and from the United States and elsewhere.

On the basis of information Stolt provided, the government filed criminal charges and secured guilty pleas from two co-conspirators -- Odfjell Seachem of Norway and Jo Tankers B.V., which is based in the Netherlands.

Odfjell Seachem agreed to pay a $42.5 million fine, and Jo Tankers agreed to pay a $19.5 million fine. Two Odfjell executives and three Jo Tankers executives also entered guilty pleas. All five were sentenced to prison terms in the range of three to four months and paid fines totaling more than $600,000.

In April 2003, the Justice Department suspended Stolt's participation in the program on the grounds that it allegedly did not withdraw from the conspiracy in March 2002, as it had claimed, but had continued its illegal activity into the second half of 2002.

In June 2003, Stolt executive Richard Wingfield was arrested and charged with participating in the conspiracy to allocate customers, fixing prices and rigging bids between March 2001 and October 2002.

Under threat of indictment, Stolt filed suit in February 2004, seeking enforcement of its rights under the agreement. Wingfield's suit followed.

In March 2004, the Justice Department formally revoked Stolt's conditional leniency and notified the company that it intended to seek an indictment.

Although the Court on the average grants only one out of 70 petitions for certiorari, bulking up with amici improves the odds. Of the 27,000 cert petitions filed over three terms from 2002 to 2004, only six cases had as many as nine amici, and cert was granted in three of them.

The other amici supporting Stolt's petition are the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, the Washington Legal Foundation, the New York Council of Defense Lawyers, the New England Legal Foundation, the International Association of Independent Tanker Owners and the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg.

Futures Giants To Merge (CHIT)

By Greg Burns

Chicago Tribune, October 18, 2006

After decades of stormy courtship, Chicago's two major futures exchanges on Tuesday announced an $8 billion merger, as the stock market's hunger for their shares overcame long-standing differences.

The Chicago Mercantile Exchange, which saw its stock price soar after it went public in 2002, said it has agreed to buy its longtime rival in a deal that would put its leadership in control of the combined business.

DOJ_NMG_0082851

By the middle of next year, the Merc plans to abandon its sprawling trading complex along Wacker Drive and move into the historic Board of Trade building at LaSalle Street and Jackson Boulevard.

The new exchange will have average daily trading volume approaching 9 million contracts per day, easily surpassing all of its direct competitors, with a market capitalization of more than $25 billion.

Under pressure from their profit-minded shareholders, the two Chicago institutions have put aside a legacy of mistrust and antagonism over everything from seating arrangements at social events to who has a better system for electronic trading. Now Chicago has a united front as it battles for dominance in the global financial-services business.

Some exchange veterans who were pushing in vain for a merger as long as 30 years ago said they could scarcely believe it finally happened.

"This represents the culmination of a Don Quixote impossible dream," said Leo Melamed, who led the Merc off-and-on since the 1970s.

The stock of both companies shot up, with the Board of Trade soaring $17.48, to $151.99, and the Merc $13.25, to $516.50.

Leaders of both exchanges said the Merc takeover bodes well for the city. Mayor Richard Daley, who once separated a pair of exchange leaders who had a shouting match in his City Hall office, predicted the combination will be "good for the Chicago economy."

Though the exchanges directly employ fewer than 2,200, a number expected to shrink by several hundred after merger-related layoffs, they generate tens of thousands of local jobs through their trading activity. "This is going to go a long way to make sure those jobs stay here in Chicago," said Merc Chairman Terrence Duffy, who will serve as chairman of the combined CME Group Inc.

Without the merger, the two separate organizations could find themselves at a competitive disadvantage and more vulnerable to a takeover themselves.

Melamed said the merger will preserve Chicago's stature as a global center for managing financial risk. Fellow Merc leader Jack Sandner noted, "They used to call us the hog butchers to the world. We are now the risk managers of the world."

Shouting and waving

Indeed, as stockyards and steel mills have faded from the scene, the boisterous trading pits have filled the void. Hoarse, sweaty guys shouting and waving their arms as they stand shoulder-to-shoulder in their colorful jackets have become one of Chicago's most recognizable commercial images.

Lately, the markets have been busier than ever. Every day, bankers, money managers and speculators bet on the future direction of everything from interest rates to ethanol. With a tiny down payment, they can buy and sell vast quantities of whatever they choose to trade.

Known as "derivatives," the contracts changing hands at the Merc and Board of Trade provide the leverage that can turn small fortunes into big ones, like a stock market on steroids.

The annual incomes of top traders can exceed $10 million, though many more who roll the dice "bust out"—slang for going broke. Family and friends have taught each other the business, and folks from all walks of life have taken a shot at riches in the Chicago markets, which have survived scandals including the FBI sting in 1989 that resulted in sweeping indictments.

But derivatives have shrugged off their bad reputation in recent years as the market for them has kept expanding. Billions of dollars flow through the exchanges in a single trading session.

Both the Merc and Board of Trade got their start in corn, soybeans, butter, eggs and other agricultural commodities, and their rough-and-tumble traders still set benchmark prices for the global farm economy.

During the 1970s and '80s, the exchanges hit it big by applying the same trading formula that worked for pork bellies to bonds, foreign currencies and stock indexes.

Yet only recently have the exchanges fully embraced electronic trading, and much of Wall Street's enthusiasm for their prospects is based on computers enabling them to reach more customers globally.

Many believed a merger made strategic sense long ago. But for decades, the two home-grown businesses, so alike in many ways, were kept apart by jealousies and suspicions.

In 1980, then-Board of Trade Chairman Les Rosenthal attempted to engineer a merger with the Merc's Melamed, only to see the idea flounder because of the "we-they culture," Rosenthal recalled. "Who was top dog? Whose building would be out front? It was all silly stuff, but you couldn't get over that. The barrier has always been the culture of the two places."

The Board of Trade, formed in 1848, was for most of its history the larger, better-established and reputedly stodgier exchange, while the upstart Merc was scrappier and more willing to experiment with technology. Even the ethnic heritage of the members at each respective institution differed, with the Board of Trade leaning Irish and the Merc Jewish, though both memberships were overwhelmingly white and male.

DOJ_NMG_0082852

In the late 1980s and '90s, the exchanges were limited by the entrenched interests of arm-waving floor traders who controlled their governance. Floor traders worried that electronic markets would undermine their ability to make money.

As the Chicago exchanges restricted access to their products by refusing to combine their efforts, and move trading onto computer screens, the U.S. stock market flourished and competition grew at all-electronic exchanges and over-the-counter markets.

"Both exchanges were driven by hubris, egos and historical legacies," said Patrick Arbor, a former Board of Trade chairman. "Now they're owned by investment managers demanding performance and efficiency."

The Merc, which embraced electronic trading and sold shares to the public well before the Board of Trade, has become the city's No. 1 futures exchange by far.

As Melamed observed: "The culture changed completely."

Huge financial rewards

The stock market's enthusiasm for Merc and Board of Trade shares made Tuesday's takeover possible, Rosenthal said, not least because members have reaped huge financial rewards for surrendering control.

Membership "seats" on the Board of Trade were valued at about $1.47 million each when the exchange sold shares in October 2005 at $54 each. The stock received by the owners is now worth more than $4 million, and Merc shareholders likewise have prospered handsomely as their stock has shot higher.

"The Merc has a very valuable coin of the realm in their share price," Rosenthal said. "The Board of Trade put a price on itself, and the Merc said, 'Sold!'"

Other deals could be in the offing, as trading becomes increasingly electronic and investors seek to reduce trading costs.

"The timing is perfect," said Merc Chief Executive Craig Donohue, who will continue in that post at the combined company. "We're in an increasingly competitive environment."

The Merc's deal for the Board of Trade is expected to be completed by the middle of 2007.

Chicago Derivatives Exchanges In $8bn Deal (FT)

By Doug Cameron And Norma Cohen

Financial Times, October 18, 2006

Chicago's two main derivatives exchanges on Tuesday unveiled an $8bn (£4.3bn) merger plan that will increase momentum for consolidation in the financial exchange sector by creating a platform with unmatched global reach.

A combination of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange and the smaller Chicago Board of Trade would create the world's largest futures exchange. The merged group would have an estimated annual $125m in synergies to fund expansion into Europe and Asia, as well as fast-growing areas such as credit derivatives and foreign exchange, which remain dominated by over-the-counter trading.

The announcement follows a year of talks and flirtations with rival exchanges. An all-American solution arrives at a time when the competitiveness of US capital markets has come under pressure from regulatory changes that have driven users overseas.

It comes two years after the CBOT rejected an approach from the CME in favour of its own listing last year, a move that proved crucial in providing an agreed price for the smaller exchange, with both trading near record levels in recent weeks.

"The transaction was done with both companies in a position of strength," said Terry Duffy, CME chairman, who would chair CME Group, as the company would be known.

The deal will raise the ante on the New York Stock Exchange to close its transatlantic deal with Euronext, the Paris-based stock and derivatives exchange. It would also leave Deutsche Börse, the world's largest derivatives platform, with a shortage of friendly merger partners, in the light of Euronext's preference for a deal with the NYSE.

European analysts and investors said the deal raised pressure on Deutsche Börse to seek a rival merger that would create a viable competitor and on competition authorities in Brussels to approve that combination. "It makes the case for a merger of European competitors even more compelling," said Mamoun Tazi, analyst at Man Securities.

Craig Donohue, the CME chief, who would retain that role in the merged group, said he did not expect regulators to block the deal, which is forecast to close in mid-2007, subject to shareholder and antitrust approval.

Robert Fleishman, an attorney at Steptoe & Johnson, said that the Justice Department would probably find that the benefits of "demonstrable efficiencies" in IT operations, staffing, and trading floor platforms would outweigh potential negative competitive effects of the deal, particularly because technological leaps would make it difficult for the DoJ to predict how markets will be shaped in the future.

However, users said they would be watching closely for synergies to be passed on in the form of lower trading fees

DOJ_NMG_0082853

Futures Shock Chicago Merc To Buy Board Of Trade (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti, Alistair Macdonald And Edward Taylor

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

The Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and the Chicago Board of Trade agreed to join forces to form the world's largest financial market, one that will dwarf exchanges in the U.S. and Europe -- even the New York Stock Exchange.

The Chicago Merc announced plans to buy the smaller CBOT Holdings Inc. for about $8 billion. As the biggest deal yet in a global consolidation of the financial-exchange industry, the plan sets aside more than a century of crosstown rivalry.

The agreement reflects the rapid growth in the investment industry's hottest sector: derivatives, or contracts whose value is derived from the movements in other financial instruments such as stocks and bonds. The linkup will make trading in many such derivatives a simpler matter, while also raising concerns that the increased power of the combined exchanges could lead to higher fees for traders.

Having grown far beyond their roots in putting together buyers and sellers of eggs, butter and corn, the Chicago exchanges, together, will trade some nine million futures contracts a day. Futures contracts give investors the right to buy or sell something later at a set price. Thus, they are used to hedge risk, allowing investors to enjoy smoother growth of their assets without the bumps that come with simpler investments on, say, a portfolio of stocks.

"Chicago used to be known as the hog butcher of the world. The city now will be known as the world's risk manager," said John F. Sandner, a Chicago Merc board member.

Futures have also become tools for making investment bets: on commodities such as wheat or oil, on trends in the economy and on broad measures of the stock and bond markets. Futures contracts can be tied to price movements of stock indexes, bonds, interest rates and foreign currencies. Commodities now make up only about 2% of the CME's trading and around 18% of the CBOT's.

Though futures are little understood outside professional circles, a wide array of investors trade them, including hedge funds, pension funds, some individuals and even mutual funds that manage money for millions of people. In recent years, hedge funds and investment banks' own trading desks have used new technology and trading methods to fire in rapid trades to exchanges across the world, leading to a surge in trading volumes. Some exchanges, including the CME, have responded by catering directly to hedge funds, a sign of the growing power of some exchanges versus Wall Street firms in serving sophisticated investors.

The business of the Chicago exchanges thus is exploding, especially as they ramp up electronic trading. Doing so has enabled them to compete with European rivals that long ago moved away from the older model of a big floor on which traders jostle and shout. Last year almost 10 billion derivatives contracts, including futures, were bought or sold on the world's exchanges -- in a business that barely existed 20 years ago. Trading has grown by an average of almost 18% a year between 2002 and 2005, according to the World Federation of Exchanges.

FULL TEXT

Read the full text2 of the CBOT's announcement of the deal. WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

WSJ's Aaron Lucchetti discusses3 how the Chicago Mercantile Exchange's plan to buy CBOT Holdings will likely impact investors. 4 · Plus, CME Chairman Terrence A. Duffy and CBOT Chairman Charles P. Carey discuss5 the deal, commenting on whether the merger is a "game changer" and how this affects the derivatives landscape.

The Chicago deal illustrates the increasingly rapid pace at which financial exchanges world-wide are consolidating to lift profits by cutting costs. Exchanges have morphed from member-owned clubs into profit-hungry publicly traded companies. This gives them an incentive to make acquisitions and also a currency, their stock, with which to do so.

Distinct Styles

The Chicago exchanges' styles are distinct even though they're just a few blocks apart. The CBOT has long operated in a 45-story Art Deco building topped by a statue of Ceres, the Roman goddess of grain. The CME occupies modern sand-colored towers stacked above its trading floor -- a hectic scene of arm-waving, boisterous traders. The CME's largest contracts are Eurodollars. At the CBOT, grain remains important but has been eclipsed by Treasury-bond futures.

Both exchanges also trade options, which convey the right, but not the obligation, to buy or sell an asset later at a set price.

The two Chicago markets have a combined market value of $26 billion, and the underlying value of contracts they trade daily is a massive $4.2 trillion. Now, "it's going to be one big animal," said Steve Rodosky, head of U.S. government-bond trading at Pacific Investment Management Co., or Pimco, a large mutual-fund management company. "It will be a massive part of what the markets rely on every day and the only exchange to use for fixed-income derivatives."

The exchanges had talked occasionally about aligning for decades, but were deterred by rivalries between their floor traders, who owned the markets before they became public companies. This time, serious talks began before the CBOT went public in the fall of 2005. The talks revived about a month ago when CME executives contacted the CBOT, said people familiar with the matter. A flurry of meetings followed, including a dinner between the CME Chairman Terry Duffy and his CBOT counterpart, Charles Carey, at Gene & Georgetti, a famous Chicago steakhouse. About a week ago, the exchanges' executives shook hands on a deal.

DOJ_NMG_0082854

The Chicago markets sealed their agreement as the New York Stock Exchange and Nasdaq Stock Market continue separate bitter fights to close their own deals -- international transactions they hope will push them into Europe and take advantage of robust stock trading overseas.

NYSE Group Inc. announced a merger deal in June with Euronext NV, which trades both stocks and derivatives. But the Big Board is in a fierce battle to close the deal as Germany's Deutsche Börse pursues its own proposal to merge with Euronext in an all-European combo.

Chicago exchange officials pointed to the consolidation overseas as a catalyst for their own deal. "If you look at the discussions of consolidation, this is the best alternative for us," said Mr. Carey, a third-generation grain trader whose grandfather and uncle preceded him as chairman. All of them once worked the floors.

The proposed combination represents another triumph for electronic trading over pit trading. The Chicago Board of Trade started so-called open-outcry trading in 1848, and three years later traded its first corn-futures contract, for delivery of 3,000 bushels.

The Merc's value has surged, driven by the growth of its electronic trading system, called Globex. By 2001 the CME had passed the CBOT to become the largest U.S. futures exchange by number of contracts traded. The CBOT delayed embracing of electronic trading and then relied on an outside technology vendor to develop a system that was partially owned by a European competitor.

As part of the deal, the CME will close its trading floor and move the remaining trading in its pits to the CBOT, probably in late 2008. That will cut the number of major exchange trading floors in the U.S. to two: the CBOT's and the New York Stock Exchange's. The NYSE's, too, is endangered, owing to increased electronic trading there. Most exchanges in Europe and Asia rely fully on computers to match investors' orders to buy or sell.

The CBOT's Mr. Carey said the deal wouldn't have happened without the Board of Trade's 2005 initial public offering. Before the offering, the CME offered to buy the CBOT for the equivalent of less than $60 a share, according to people familiar with the matter. But the CBOT elected to go public first, and investors drove its shares up steeply from the start. It closed yesterday at $151.99 a share, up $17.48, or 13%, on the day. CME shares -- which are up tenfold from their December 2002 debut -- rose $13.25, or 2.63%, to $516.50.

The CME's Mr. Duffy is to become chairman of the combined firm, and CME Chief Executive Craig Donohue is slated to be CEO. Mr. Carey of the CBOT will be vice chairman. The deal effectively pushes aside the CBOT's chief executive, Bernard Dan, who will serve as special adviser for a year after the deal closes in mid-2007. The new company will have a large and potentially unwieldy board of 29 members, including 20 named by the CME.

The partners will save some $125 million annually on a pretax basis starting 12 months after the deal closes, according to Mr. Donohue. The savings will come from losing one trading floor, combining the technology platforms of the two companies and much of their staff.

The savings could be used to reduce fees for customers, though that might be small comfort to some investors: Both the CBOT and the CME have raised fees in recent years -- empowered by regulations that give them exclusive trading rights to their contracts. Stock exchanges, by contrast, face much more competition because shares can trade on different exchanges.

These exclusive rights, along with the Chicago exchanges' sheer size, will provide a formidable bulwark against the NYSE and other markets that are trying to get into the futures business. Successful futures contracts are lucrative for exchanges. This is especially so for the CME, because in addition to matching trades, it "clears" trades -- that is, guarantees that both sides of every trade get what they bargained for, either money or a viable contract. For several years, the CME has handled clearing for the CBOT.

Both exchanges have come a long way in recent years. They were put on the defensive at the time of the 1987 stock-market crash, as many argued that computerized futures trading exacerbated the losses, enabling stock declines to feed on themselves. Then a few years later, a Federal Bureau of Investigation sting operation exposed fraud on both Chicago trading floors.

As the stock market roared in the 1990s, giving the NYSE and Nasdaq record trading volumes, the Chicago exchanges struggled to compete with growing derivatives trading done off exchange, or over the counter. Big banks privately negotiated their own contracts and didn't need the financial guarantee provided by an exchange clearing house.

DOJ_NMG_0082855

Those trends reversed in this decade, giving far more power to the exchanges that trade derivatives. In the early 2000s, stock trading faced a bear market and U.S. recession. But the Chicago exchanges' business proved resilient, as a tide of hedge funds continued placing bets in markets that were doing well -- bonds, foreign currencies and commodities.

The Chicago exchanges got another boost after the collapse of energy giant Enron Corp. in the early 2000s underscored the danger of private deals that would prove worthless if a company defaulted on its obligations.

By 2002, the Chicago Merc's business had improved to the point where it sold its shares to the public. The stock soon soared. By 2005, the CME was worth well more than the NYSE, long the world's marquee exchange.

The NYSE copied the CME's strategy, announcing a public offering and following this year with its deal to buy Euronext -- thus getting into futures trading through that exchange's Euronext.liffe platform. The NYSE wants to use Euronext.liffe to grow into the futures business in the U.S. It doesn't intend to compete on products the Chicago exchanges already dominate. Instead, the NYSE will compete in new products that allow investors to bet on corporate credit risk, weather or economic indicators such as inflation.

The Chicago merger means fewer competitors in the futures industry, raising questions over whether the previously scrappy rivals will continue to innovate as effectively. That may be small comfort for the NYSE's designs on the futures business, because the Big Board now faces a much stronger competitor. Its market value would be larger than a combined NYSE-Euronext by about $3 billion.

Battle for Dominance

The Chicago exchanges have battled for dominance in the U.S. futures industry for decades -- each lobbying for an upper hand in regulations, competing for customers and vying to create and launch the next new blockbuster product. The rivalry thawed a few years ago, when the German-Swiss futures market Eurex made a run at the CBOT's Treasurys-bond futures contracts and Euronext.liffe took on the CME Eurodollar contract. The moves prompted the Chicago exchanges to cut fees and embrace electronics to keep their edge. The CBOT also agreed to have its contracts cleared by the Chicago Merc to save costs.

Since then, the per-trade prices that exchanges charge have crept back up. The result could be some antitrust concern. There also may be regulatory concerns about the combined company's ability to handle so much business on one technology platform. The deal faces regulatory reviews by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department antitrust lawyers. Current and former federal officials yesterday said it isn't likely to be derailed.

"The Justice Department is going to want to look over any overlap in products and services, and whether the deal will avert potential competition, especially in electronic-trading platforms," said Steven Sunshine, a former antitrust enforcer now with Cadwalader Wickersham & Taft. "I don't see any major hang-ups" given strong global competition. A U.S. official agreed, because the two exchanges specialize in different types of futures and don't overlap.

Exchange officials said there will still be plenty of competition -- the large volume of derivative trades done privately through commercial and investment banks. Mr. Donohue said, "We're not expecting any significant regulatory obstacles. We're in an increasingly competitive environment. The market is globalizing. The OTC market is much larger." CME officials maintain that greater efficiencies and cost-cutting would benefit customers and that its trading systems can handle the added stresses of the merger.

The combined exchange will tie together products on one platform that make sense to trade together -- the CME interest-rate futures with the CBOT's bonds, for example, and the CME's livestock contracts with CBOT's corn, wheat and soybean contracts. The exchanges also compete with New York commodity exchanges. The CBOT launched electronic metals trading in recent years, and the CME provided technology for electronic trading of the New York Mercantile Exchange's booming energy futures contracts.

The deal calls for a swap of each CBOT Class A share for 0.3006 share of CME Class A common. CBOT shareholders can elect to receive cash, but the cash portion of payment for CBOT will be limited to $3 billion. The CME could issue up to 15.9 million new shares as part of the deal. Of the up to $3 billion in cash it could spend, it would raise about $2 billion in new debt.

The Chicago Merc will own from 69% to about 80% of the combined company -- to be called CME Group Inc. -- depending on CBOT shareholders' decision on whether to accept cash or stock.

The historic deal comes as other U.S. exchanges have encountered some trouble completing their own deals. Nasdaq has built a 25.3% stake in London Stock Exchange PLC but is still being rebuffed by London, which rejected Nasdaq in an earlier approach in March. In all, LSE has had four approaches from potential buyers in two years.

And Deutsche Börse, in trying to block the NYSE from buying Euronext, has played the political card, lobbying European politicians and regulators to back a Europe-wide exchange group. The NYSE deal will be put before Euronext shareholders in December, but it is far from certain they will approve. Euronext operates stock exchanges in Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels and

DOJ_NMG_0082856

Lisbon as well as the Euronext.liffe derivatives exchange in London. Deutsche Börse operates the Frankfurt Stock Exchange and the Eurex derivatives exchange and trades products similar to those the CME and CBOT trade.

The CME looked at doing a deal in Europe, holding preliminary talks with Euronext and Deutsche Börse, but got nowhere, say people familiar with the matter.

Analysts said that the CME and CBOT merger won't immediately present a threat to Europe's derivatives trading platforms because it's hard for even large exchanges to take away business from an efficient electronic exchange in its home market.

In fact, the CME and CBOT tie-up could act as a stimulant to Europe's own lethargic consolidation race. It also could appease antitrust concerns in Europe about a possible combination of Deutsche Börse and Euronext, both big derivatives players. "The emergence of an even larger global competitor will be taken into account" when European antitrust regulators review deals that in the past concerned them, said Marc Reysen, a Brussels-based lawyer.

Asia has been largely absent from the global consolidation so far. Yesterday at the World Federation of Exchanges annual gathering in São Paulo, Brazil, exchanges focused on alliances in fast-growing emerging markets, not full-blown mergers. Euronext announced a plan to cooperate with Taiwan Stock Exchange Corp. And a host of Western exchanges, including the London Stock Exchange, are angling to sign agreements with the Bombay Stock Exchange that may include an investment.

The NYSE and Euronext have expressed interest in Asian exchanges once they complete their own deal. Some analysts said that after the Chicago exchanges finish their merger, the CME Group will be among the best positioned to expand internationally.

Lehman Brothers Holdings and William Blair advised the CME, which also had legal advice from Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom. J.P. Morgan Chase and attorneys from Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw LLP advised the CBOT. Lazard Ltd. and Latham & Watkins advised a CBOT board panel on the deal's merits.

Chicago Exchanges Combine Thunder (WSJ)

By Susan Carey And Joseph T. Hallinan

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

CHICAGO -- By setting aside decades of rivalry, the downtown trading pits here have secured the Windy City's place as derivatives market to the world.

Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc.'s planned $8 billion purchase of CBOT Holdings Inc., parent of the Chicago Board of Trade, would pair two exchanges that are leaders in global trading of futures and options, with combined average daily trading volume of nine million contracts, or about $4.2 trillion in notional value. The deal needs approval by regulators and shareholders.

"It's a great day for Chicago," said Robert Hamada, former dean of the University of Chicago's Graduate School of Business and a public director of the CBOT for 12 years. "If they had continued divvying up the market as they had been, they would have beaten each other to the ground," he says, paving the way for rivals to surpass and buy them.

Said John F. Sandner, a Chicago Merc board member: "Chicago used to be known as the hog butcher to the world. The city now will be known as the world's risk manager."

The move comes during an explosion in trading of futures, options and other derivatives as hedge funds and Wall Street firms develop more complex ways to make financial bets. The exchanges also have benefited from greater trading in physical commodities -- where the two exchanges are also leaders.

Though the two exchanges employ just 2,200, they have helped to keep the city a financial center even as its home-grown banking industry has steadily been bought out by larger rivals. The exchanges have also spawned numbers of trading firms.

New York has long overshadowed Chicago as a financial capital. But the CME has exploited electronic trading to dominate the markets in derivatives and futures in recent years. Futures contracts represent the right to buy or sell a commodity or financial instrument at a set time and price; derivatives are contracts whose values are derived from an underlying security or other asset. The deal could accelerate the trend toward electronic trading.

Traders who duck away from the trading floor to play ice hockey in the afternoon live in handsome homes along Lake Michigan and make seven-figure contributions to schools, theaters and other charities. One successful trader who now manages a trading firm said, only half-jokingly, "My job now is to convince 27-year-olds that it's OK to make only $2 million a year."

CME and CBOT have been bitter competitors for decades. But within the past 10 years or so, the relationship has thawed a little in the face of global trading threats from other exchanges and over-the-counter trading of derivatives. The path for this deal was paved in 2003, when the two agreed to combine their "clearing," or trade-processing, operations. The idea gained steam once the CBOT went public last year. CME became a for-profit organization and began trading in 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0082857

Chicago has other famous rivals, most notably baseball's White Sox and Cubs. But the rivalry between the blue-blooded CBOT and the upstart CME "was much, much more intense and acrimonious and deeper because it's about making money," said Mr. Hamada. "The Cubs and Sox rivalry is a phantom."

James McCann, who trades Eurodollar futures at the CME, says the bad blood between the two exchanges is "overdone." But the 36-year-old, who has worked at the CME for 12 years, recalls that "the last time I was at the Board of Trade, I was 10."

The deal calls for the CBOT to move its electronic trading to the CME's Globex electronic trading platform. The CME will move its "open outcry" trading pits to the CBOT about five blocks away. Those pits, where runners and traders do their business with loud voices and hand signals, are a shrinking part of the business.

The CBOT, founded in 1848, started out handling "to arrive" or "forward" contracts for flour, hay and corn. In 1930 the CBOT moved into its current 45-story building, an Art Deco Chicago landmark topped by a golden statue of Ceres, the goddess of grain -- a nod to the CBOT's origins as a place to trade cash grain. Today, though, most trading involves financial instruments such as U.S. Treasury securities. Some 82% of all of the contracts traded at the CBOT during 2005 were either financial futures or options on financial futures contracts.

The CME was founded as the Chicago Butter and Egg Board in 1898 and evolved into the Chicago Mercantile Exchange in 1919, focusing on agricultural futures. It moved in 1983 into 487,000 square feet of office space in a 40-story building overlooking the Chicago River and across the street from the Lyric Opera. That lease expires in 2008.

The exchange also occupies 70,000 square feet of trading floor that it leases from the CME Trust. A spokesman said the CME intends to move its trading floor activities into the CBOT-owned building a few blocks away, but hasn't decided what to do with its leased space. He said no decision has been made about where the merged entity will be located. In 1992, the Merc launched the first global electronic futures trading platform. Originally for after-hours trading, Globex now enables electronic trading 23 hours a day, five days a week.

Leo Melamed, chairman of the CME from 1969 to 1977, says yesterday's agreement to join forces has been a dream of his since the 1970s. "We are so much stronger together," he said. "Chicago will be the big beneficiary and the center of gravity for derivatives and risk management." The combination "makes a much more formidable force world-wide and a magnet of business in our industry."

2 Exchanges In Chicago Will Merge (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

CHICAGO, Oct. 17 — The Chicago Mercantile Exchange and the Chicago Board of Trade, longtime fierce competitors, said Tuesday that they would merge in an $8 billion deal creating the largest market for financial derivatives contracts in the world.

The transaction would be the latest in a wave of mergers among the leading financial exchanges, as they transform themselves from member-owned clubs to for-profit companies competing in markets that have become increasingly global and electronic.

The New York Stock Exchange, the Nasdaq Stock Market and smaller exchanges have announced mergers, and the New York exchange's recent pursuit of Euronext, operator of four European stock markets, is driven in large part by Euronext's derivatives exchange in London.

A combination of the two Chicago markets, which were founded in the 19th century to trade agricultural futures, would trumpet the spectacular rise of derivatives — financial contracts whose value is tied to or derived from currencies, interest rates, commodities or other things of value.

Derivatives have made risk more manageable for many businesses, including oil companies seeking to insure themselves against storms and banks trying to protect themselves against home mortgage defaults. Yet they have also fueled trading blow-ups, as in the near-collapse in 1998 of the hedge fund Long-Term Capital Management that shook the financial markets.

The business of trading such financial contracts has generated huge fortunes that have led many exchanges to begin looking for merger partners. They seek to create greater efficiency and more liquid markets where buyers and sellers more easily find what they want for the right price, much as on eBay.

By combining, the Chicago exchanges, to be named the CME Group, will have average daily trading volume of close to nine million contracts a day, representing $4.2 trillion in notional value, or the amount of the underlying assets, not the value of the contracts themselves. By a comparison of sorts, some 1.8 billion shares, or $87.2 billion, are traded on average on the New York Stock Exchange, the world's biggest stock market, every day, although those shares, unlike derivatives, represent direct ownership stakes.

"That makes us the risk capital of the world," said Terrence A. Duffy, the mercantile exchange's chairman.

DOJ_NMG_0082858

The combination of the two exchanges also signals the growing importance of Chicago as a center of global finance. The board of trade pioneered the concept of a futures contract — the delivery of a specific commodity by a certain date — in the 1860's, originally for grains like corn and wheat. The mercantile exchange led the push into electronic trading in the early 1990's.

Since then, these Chicago markets have been pressing further into the ever-growing world of trading derivatives contracts.

Derivatives can refer to a futures contract that is tied to the price of a commodity, like soybeans, and it can refer to arcane financial products not traded on any exchange, like credit default swaps, which can be negotiated between two hedge funds.

Often, the bet is not central to the underlying asset's role; a bet on the coin toss in a football game rather than the outcome of the game itself would be a derivative bet, for example. Or a contract to hedge the weather risks affecting crop prices, rather than the future prices of those crops, would also be considered a derivative.

Driven by companies' increasing desire to hedge risks, the derivatives markets have been growing rapidly. Since 2004, the notional value of interest rate, equity and credit derivatives has risen 44 percent, to $283.2 trillion, according to the International Swaps and Derivatives Association.

"The notional amounts are eye-popping," said Janet Tavakoli, president of Tavakoli Structured Finance in Chicago.

The two exchanges, situated a few blocks from each other in Chicago's downtown Loop, have storied histories. The board of trade once financed the formation of three regiments and an artillery battery for the union army during the Civil War, and the exchange's first building was torched in the Chicago Fire of 1871. The mercantile exchange began as the Chicago Butter and Egg Board, later branching out to frozen pork-belly futures and live-cattle futures contracts.

While a half-century older, the board of trade was slower to move to electronic trading and to issue public stock, causing it to lose ground to the mercantile exchange. The move to electronic trading, led by the Chicago Merc, has made the board of trade's clubby floor-trading world less relevant.

"The C.B.O.T. had to be dragged into the 21st century kicking and screaming," Ms. Tavakoli said.

Tuesday's announcement took some in the financial world here by surprise because the two exchanges, despite their intense rivalry, had discussed combining off and on for more than three decades. The ice began to thaw between them after they struck an agreement in 2003 for both to use the Chicago Merc's clearinghouse, the board of trade's chairman, Charles P. Carey, said in an interview.

After his exchange finally went public last year, the newly issued stock provided a currency to consider such a deal. "When we had member organizations," Mr. Carey said, "the hurdles were insurmountable."

Last December, over dinner at Gene & Georgetti's, a popular steakhouse here, Mr. Duffy and Mr. Carey began to discuss a deal seriously. The talks accelerated over the last eight weeks, Mr. Duffy said.

The combination is expected to save $125 million annually in the second year after the deal closes, mostly through cuts in administrative and technology areas, the companies said. The exchanges will combine their trading operations into one trading floor at the board of trade.

But the mercantile exchange clearly prevailed over its rival. Mr. Duffy will become chairman of the combined organization, with Mr. Carey, vice chairman. Craig S. Donohue, chief executive of the mercantile exchange, will head the CME Group. The mercantile exchange will have 20 of the 29 board seats.

The deal faces regulatory scrutiny and a stiff breakup fee of $240 million if either exchange walks away. Regulators are expected to examine whether the combined entity can leverage its share of the futures and derivatives market into pricing power.

The merger "will create a mammoth enterprise with extraordinary pricing power," said Meyer Frucher, the chairman and chief executive of the Philadelphia Stock Exchange. "Ironically, it may create more opportunities for others."

Mr. Duffy and Mr. Donohue said that with an increased focus on electronic trading, the merged exchanges will make markets more transparent and more liquid for investors.

Mr. Donohue said the CME Group would compete more aggressively to build the exchanges' derivatives market in Europe and Asia. Some traders said it would face tough sledding against Euronext's London-based derivatives business and the Deutsche Börse's Eurex derivatives market.

Jay Feuerstein, who heads Xenon Capital Management in Chicago, a hedge fund that focuses on trading futures contracts, said: "It will be tough for the mercantile exchange to take on the European exchanges and beat them. If they decide to offer some of the products that the Chicago exchanges offer, they have some built-in competitive advantages."

Mr. Feuerstein added, "I am going to trade where there is the deepest liquidity, the cheapest transaction costs and the least credit risk."

Still, while the deal could increase the CME Group's reach overseas, the combination could stifle plans by Euronext and the New York Stock Exchange to increase its derivatives business in the United States. Euronext agreed to merge with the Big Board this summer, explaining in part that the move could create revenue opportunities related to derivative operations, some of which included plans to grow in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0082859

The combination of the two exchanges “makes them into a very, very big competitor indeed," said Lynton Jones, a founder of Bourse Consult in London. “Euronext has been trying to get into U.S. markets without much success. They thought with the clout of the N.Y.S.E. behind them, they might do something. But I don’t see what that could be now.”

Exchanges Bank On Passing Antitrust Muster (CRAIN)

Crain’s Chicago Business, October 18, 2006

(Crain’s) — Exchange officials are assuming that antitrust concerns won’t stop creation of the world’s largest futures market, even though the proposed acquisition of the Chicago Board of Trade would give the Chicago Mercantile Exchange a near monopoly on U.S. futures trading.

“We've been very well advised by the Department of Justice on antitrust issues, and we're not expecting any regulatory issues,” Merc CEO Craig Donohue told investors Tuesday in a conference call.

A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment on the regulatory outlook, nor would she confirm whether any informal meetings already have taken place on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc.’s proposed acquisition of CBOT Holdings Inc.

The merger must also be approved by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) and the Securities and Exchange Commission, and exchange officials said it faces “modest” regulatory reviews overseas. A CFTC spokesman says the exchanges mainly have to certify that their bylaws and surveillance systems meet the agency’s requirements.

Advertisement

Related Article Topics | Related Industry News

That means the biggest hurdle is likely to be any antitrust questions the deal raises with either the Federal Trade Commission or the Justice Department, the latter of which is considered more likely to be the agency that reviews exchange mergers such as this.

Antitrust clearance will largely depend on how regulators define the market in which the two exchanges compete. Their combined trading volume of more than 1.4 billion contracts last year dwarfs the New York Mercantile Exchange’s 166.6 million contracts, and other U.S. futures markets are much further behind.

However, on a global scale, the combined firm would still face strong competition. Germany’s Eurex traded almost 785 million contracts last year, second only to the 883 million contracts traded at the CME.

London-based Euronext, with volume of nearly 344 million contracts, was not far behind third-ranked Chicago Board of Trade’s 561 million contracts.

“I wouldn’t say on the antitrust side that it’s a slam dunk, but they’ll have a very strong argument,” says Michael Greenberger, professor of law at the University of Maryland and a former head of trading and markets for the CFTC. “It is a global market and U.S. markets are in fierce competition with Europe and Asia. It’s almost a necessity for the U.S. to have this merger to remain competitive.”

But another longtime industry observer cautions that it could get complicated, especially if Congress decides to take a look at the deal’s implications.

“For mom-and-pop traders and individual speculators, they don’t necessarily trade globally,” says John Lothian, president of the electronic trading division of Price Futures Group Inc. in Chicago and publisher of an industry newsletter that bears his name. “Congress isn’t elected by hedge funds or big banks. The question is, how does this affect the little guy?”

Several years ago, he notes, the Merc and the CBOT competed for the rights to trade a futures contract based on the Dow Jones industrial average. The Merc lost, but went on to develop a contract based on the S&P 500 index, which proved to be far more successful.

“Innovation and competition are major drivers of success in the U.S. futures industry,” Mr. Lothian says. “My concern is, if you suppress competition, does that lead to less innovation?”

But the exchanges will point out that global competition, particularly if exchanges around the world consummate their mating dance, will keep them on their toes.

Another consideration is that over-the-counter trading of swaps and other derivatives adds trillions of dollars in off-exchange trading volume to the competition facing the exchanges.

“That’s the argument they will make, and it’s a legitimate argument,” says Mr. Lothian.

Tata Steel Offers $8 Billion For Corus (WSJ)

By Eric Bellman In Mumbai, India, And Jason Singer In London

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Tata Steel Ltd.'s formal proposal to buy British steelmaker Corus Group PLC for about £4.4 billion ($8 billion), if successful, would represent the biggest foreign acquisition by an Indian company and underscore the loosening of India's regulatory environment.

Tata's proposal, which would create a major global steel company, is expected to receive a recommendation from Corus's board later this week. Tata is likely to quickly clear India's foreign-exchange hurdles, where in some cases a committee must give permission for an Indian company to raise money for overseas activities.

The fact that such a big purchase is expected to pass regulatory muster in India is a turnabout from the past, when the country's rules on foreign-exchange and overseas purchases by companies were so onerous that high-technology companies needed central-bank approval to buy computers from abroad. In the past several years, those rules have eased significantly as India's international commercial ambitions have risen.

While Indian companies have been buying assets and whole companies overseas, a purchase of Corus by Tata could spark a wave of large foreign acquisitions by Indian companies that have expanded domestically amid brisk economic growth.

Corus yesterday confirmed reports that it has been in negotiations with Tata and said in a statement that the company, based in London, received a proposal "regarding a possible recommended offer for Corus at a value of 455 pence a share in cash." On the London Stock Exchange, Corus shares edged down to 479 pence ($8.92), off 0.5 pence.

The fact that the shares are trading higher than the price of Tata's proposal suggests to some investors that a rival bid may emerge. The deal also may be subject to regulatory hurdles outside India.

People close to the matter said Tata has largely completed a due-diligence inspection of Corus, which has steel plants in Britain and the Netherlands, and that Corus's board is likely to approve the deal. Corus's board is scheduled to meet tonight. Credit Suisse AG is advising Corus. Tata couldn't be reached for immediate comment.

Together, the two companies may be able to achieve about $345 million in cost savings. That estimate is based on the annual $15 per ton in savings anticipated by the combination of Arcelor SA of Luxembourg and Mittal Steel Co. of the Netherlands, the world's top two steelmakers by output that merged earlier this year. While Tata and Corus don't have overlapping operations, much of Corus's systems, administration and technology could be outsourced to India, where Tata Group companies provide low-cost services for U.S. and European companies.

Tata and other Indian companies that used to have to navigate New Delhi bureaucracy for the dollars needed to import new equipment today have little trouble raising billions at home and abroad either through bank loans or from investors. Meanwhile, Indian regulators who used to have to rubber-stamp each step of the process are staying out of the way.

When N.R. Narayana Murthy, the retired founder of Infosys Technologies Ltd., was starting his software-outsourcing company, he had to take regular trips to New Delhi to get approval to raise the few thousand dollars needed to import computers. Today, his company doesn't have to ask for anyone's permission. It will have sales of more than $3 billion this year and is planning to raise $1.5 billion on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Since 2000, the limit on acquisitions by Indian companies that could be made without regulatory approval has risen from 25% of a company's net worth to 200% last year. Former central bank Governor Bimal Jalan said companies today commonly inform the central bank of an acquisition.

A company looking to raise more than twice its net worth needs approval from a committee made up of members of the Reserve Bank of India, India's central bank; the Ministry of Finance; the Ministry of Commerce and Industry; and the Ministry of External Affairs.

Tata's net worth is estimated at $2 billion, analysts said. The company is planning to finance the acquisition through bank loans arranged in the United Kingdom and may breach the threshold for needing committee approval. But even here, Tata is unlikely to hit any road bumps. Because Tata is well-known and the steel industry is a solid investment area, approval for a Corus deal is likely to come easily, Mr. Jalan said.

Lilly Sets Deal To Acquire Icos For About $2.1 Billion (WSJ)

By John Carreyrou

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Eli Lilly & Co. agreed to acquire biotechnology company Icos Corp. for $2.1 billion in a move to gain full ownership of the erectile-dysfunction drug Cialis.

As the sole owner of Cialis, Eli Lilly is expected to muster a stronger challenge to Pfizer Inc.'s Viagra, the first drug approved for erectile dysfunction and the market leader in the U.S., with more than 50% of the market. Cialis -- made by the two companies' joint venture, Lilly Icos LLC -- has a 25% market share.

DOJ_NMG_0082861

Richard Evans, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. in New York, said Lilly is likely to put more marketing and sales resources behind Cialis than when it owned only half of the drug. "With the 50-50 split, it's practically difficult for Cialis to get the attention it deserves within Lilly," he said.

Take a peek2 at what to expect in the quarterly reports of other major companies.

Eli Lilly CEO Sidney Taurel discusses4 the deal and responds to a query whether Lilly was able to low-ball Icos since no one else was interested in buying it.

Launched in 2003, five years after Viagra, Cialis generated global sales of $456 million in the first six months of this year. Its sales are expected to exceed $1 billion -- the threshold beyond which a drug is considered to have reached blockbuster status -- next year. The drug's patent expires in 2017.

The market for erectile-dysfunction drugs had weakened as the drug makers pulled back on consumer advertising that was judged to be overly explicit and amid concerns that some of the treatments could cause eye problems. But those worries have abated, and some of the companies have restarted ad campaigns that take a less-controversial approach.

"We've seen a significant improvement in the market since then," said Sydney Taurel, Lilly's chief executive, on a conference call.

Mr. Taurel said he expects "significant numbers" of jobs will be eliminated at Icos. The company, based in Bothell, Wash., has 700 employees.

Under the terms of the deal, Icos shareholders will receive $32 for each share of Icos common stock. The bid represents an 18% premium to Icos's closing price Monday of $27.12.

Lilly shares fell 11 cents yesterday to $57.55 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, while shares of Icos rose $4.38, or 16%, to $31.50 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Lilly, of Indianapolis, said the deal, which is expected to close in late 2006 or early 2007, will reduce its 2007 earnings but will start adding to profit in 2008. The company expects to take a charge related to in-process research and development.

Vivendi's Universal Sues Two Web Sites Over Video Sharing (WSJ)

By Ethan Smith And Kevin J. Delaney

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group filed copyright-infringement lawsuits against two Internet companies, including one acquired by Sony Corp., over the ability they give users to upload and download video content with their Web sites.

Universal, in a statement, said the companies it had sued "build their business on the backs of our content and the hard work of our artists and songwriters -- without permission and without in any way compensating the content creators."

The suits, against Sony Pictures Entertainment's Grouper Networks Inc. and Bolt Inc., mark the first time a major media company has tried to use the courts to narrowly interpret "safe harbor" protections provided by the Digital Millennium Copyright Act of 1998 so it would exclude video-sharing sites. The DMCA provides protection from liability for copyright infringement to Internet companies if they meet certain criteria and follow so-called takedown procedures. Under the procedures outlined in the DMCA, sites have to remove any infringing copyright when notified specifically by the copyright holder.

Filed Monday in U.S. District Court for California's Central District, the suits follow recent deals reached by Universal and two other big music companies to license their video and music content to video-sharing giant YouTube Inc. A person familiar with the Grouper and Bolt matters said Universal had discussed licensing agreements with those companies, but said the talks never progressed.

Sony, which in August paid $65 million for Grouper, wasn't named in the suit, but Universal said it reserved the right to add Sony's film studio as a defendant. A representative for Bolt didn't respond to requests for comment. A Sony Pictures spokesman sent a statement from Grouper Chief Executive Josh Felser calling the lawsuit "without merit" and adding: "Our Web site is protected by federal law, and we're vigilant about taking down copyrighted content when we're properly notified."

"They're making a copy, so that's direct copyright infringement. Then they're posting it on their Web sites and financially benefiting," says Gill Sperlein, general counsel of adult-entertainment company Io Group Inc., which filed a complaint against video-sharing site Veoh Networks Inc., in June in U.S. District Court for California's Northern District. A Veoh spokesman declined to comment on the suit.

Record Labels Turn Piracy Into A Marketing Opportunity (WSJ)

By Julia Angwin, Sarah Mcbride And Ethan Smith

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

A video clip from Jay-Z's live concert in June at Radio City Music Hall is popping up on all sorts of illicit music-sharing hotspots. But Jay-Z isn't upset.

DOJ_NMG_0082862

That's because the rapper, at the request of Coca-Cola Co., agreed to allow distribution of the eight-minute clip -- which included promotions for Coke -- on the peer-to-peer sites, using technology usually used to thwart music pirates.

The unusual alliance demonstrates a new tack being taken by the music industry to deal with the challenge posed by widespread music piracy. For years, the industry has been suing individual downloaders and file-sharing services, hoping to discourage the practice. In a tactic little known outside the music industry, record labels have also started to hire outside companies to plant "decoy," or fake, files on the sites. (One such company, ArtistDirect Inc.'s MediaDefender, says it has deployed decoys for as many as 30 of the top 100 Billboard songs at any given time.) The decoy files frustrate users because they fail to download even though, thanks to the companies' technical expertise, they often claim the top spot in search results for a tune.

But now there's a growing recognition among some record executives and performers that the people who are downloading illegally are frequently huge music fans and that marketing to them may be more desirable in the long run than suing or otherwise harassing them.

Hence the alliance between Jay-Z and Coke. By inserting promotional material into the decoy files, and then planting those files prominently on file-sharing sites, record labels and other marketers can turn what is now an antipiracy tool into an advertising medium. "The concept here is making the peer-to-peer networks work for us," says Jay-Z's attorney, Michael Guido. "While peer-to-peer users are stealing the intellectual property, they are also the active music audience," and "this technology allows us to market back to them."

Concert outtakes aren't the only content. Audioslave, Ice Cube, Yellowcard and other music groups have used decoy files for their own version of viral marketing. With help from niche companies like Sparkart LLC and NFA Group's BuyDRM, they put snippets of a song into the files with the promise that a stream of the entire song will be "unlocked" for everyone once the promotion is forwarded to enough people. The hope is that this will motivate people to send the file to lots of friends.

Alternative rock band Dashboard Confessional tried that approach with its single "Don't Wait" to promote its latest album, "Dusk and Summer," released jointly on the independent Vagrant label and Universal's Interscope label. "It just emanated out of one more thing we could do on the Internet, because that's where our customers are," says Dashboard's manager, Rich Egan, who credits filesharing rather than radio airplay with the performer's success.

Right now, only about 1% of the decoy files on peer-to-peer sites include promotions or ads, but the potential audience is huge. While many well-known peer-to-peer services such as eDonkey and Grokster have been shut down by legal action, new ones pop up all the time. In September, an average of nine million people were logged on to the services at any given time, up from 6.8 million two years ago, according to BigChampagne, which tracks the industry. By comparison, last month YouTube attracted about two million visitors a day and MySpace.com attracted 16.8 million visitors a day, according to comScore Media Metrix.

The typical downloader is a tech-savvy male between 14 and 25 years old. "It's a wonderful audience that is very difficult to reach through any other means," says Mitchell Reichgut, a principal at Jun Group, the ad agency in Norwalk, Conn., that crafted the Coke promotion.

The record industry's approach toward downloaders began to change after last year's landmark Supreme Court ruling on Grokster. The Justices found that file-sharing companies like Grokster could be held liable for copyright infringement if their products encouraged consumers to swap music or movies illegally. Before the ruling, record labels worried that they might undercut their legal arguments if they used peer-to-peer sites for their own purposes. Now, "we're basically free to exploit these billions of fake files we're putting out," says Randy Saaf, chief executive of MediaDefender.

Still, marketing on peer-to-peer sites is "a bit of a tricky dynamic for entertainment companies," says Mr. Reichgut. He says many of his clients in the entertainment industry don't want to be identified.

Not so reticent is EMI Group PLC's Virgin Records, which says it's in talks with MediaDefender about marketing options. "It's an opportunity that will hopefully lead to a better experience for the artists, the labels and the consumers," says Virgin Chairman Jason Flom.

Labels typically must approve file-sharing marketing projects, says Peter Katsis, an executive at The Firm, an entertainment-management company. Coke, which devised the Jay-Z promotion as part of a bigger marketing push, says it wouldn't have gone ahead without the agreement of Universal Music Group, Jay-Z's record company. Helping facilitate the deal was Jay-Z's unusual role at Universal: He heads Def Jam Records, the Universal label that releases his albums. Coke did a similar decoy-file promotion using another Def Jam artist, the R&B act Ne-Yo, earlier this year.

Coke says that 3.5 million people downloaded the Ne-Yo video during the six weeks it was on the peer-to-peer networks, and the Jay-Z concert clip has already been downloaded more than 2.5 million times. "It has so far exceeded our goals that you should look for us to do more," says Katie Bayne, senior vice president of Coca-Cola North America.

DOJ_NMG_0082863

Some music acts are using peer-to-peer sites to gather marketing data. Over the summer, MediaDefender ran a promotion for the alternative music group Gin Blossoms. File sharers looking for songs got files with links that asked if they wanted to win a free iPod preloaded with Gin Blossoms tunes. If they clicked on the link, they landed on a page that asked them to fill in demographic data, including name, age and email address, and 25% of them did. MediaDefender executives say they were surprised so many responded, but they believe that placing the questionnaire on ArtistDirect, a well-known music site, gave the promotion legitimacy.

Meanwhile, some file-sharing sites are fighting back against the marketing-infused decoy files, which they consider spam. When they release new versions of their filesharing programs, they are including tweaks that can make planting the covert ads more difficult. The latest version of LimeWire, for example, won't allow people responding to other users' searches to easily include a link to a Web page.

At the same time, MediaDefender and other decoy-file distributors are constantly trying to beef up their own technology. "It's a constant cat and mouse game," says MediaDefender's Mr. Saaf.

Music Companies Sue 8,000 More In Anti-Sharing Fight (WP/AP)

By Jane Wardell, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Trade Group Files Cases in 17 Nations

LONDON, Oct. 17 -- The international record industry filed thousands more lawsuits around the world Tuesday against people it accuses of illegally sharing digital music.

The International Federation of the Phonographic Industry filed 8,000 cases in 17 countries, including its first in South America and Eastern Europe.

The lawsuits, which are aimed at "uploaders," include criminal and civil cases. Uploaders have put hundreds or thousands of copyrighted songs onto Internet file-sharing networks and offered them to millions of people worldwide without permission from the copyright owners.

The industry contends that such file-sharing has cost it billions of dollars in lost revenue.

The London federation, which represents 1,450 record companies around the world, said many of the people targeted are the parents of children who shared music files.

The music industry has been criticized for targeting individual Internet users in its legal warfare against piracy instead of the Internet service providers that host file-swapping sites. The ISPs are harder to pursue legally because they can claim to have no knowledge of piracy occurring on their networks.

"Around the world many people have already paid a heavy price for their illegal file-sharing," said John Kennedy, chairman of the federation. "They all thought they were unlikely to be caught, but teachers, postal workers, . . . scientists and people in a host of other occupations, as well as parents, have ended up having to dig deeply into their pockets.

"There is no excuse. People should understand that they can be caught whatever network they are using."

Legal action was extended for the first time to Brazil, where the industry federation said more than 1 billion music tracks were illegally downloaded last year and where record company revenue fell to $395 million last year from $724.7 million in 2000. Lawsuits were also filed for the first time in Mexico and Poland.

The federation said more than 2,300 people have been fined or paid compensation averaging at nearly $3,100.

The countries included in the new wave of lawsuits include Argentina, Austria, Brazil, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Hong Kong, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Mexico, Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Singapore and Switzerland.

The federation said it targeted uploaders using major unauthorized services, including BitTorrent, eDonkey, DirectConnect, Gnutella, LimeWire, SoulSeek and WinMX.

The group added that it was heartened by court judgments around the world in recent months that it said establish the liability of such operators for copyright infringement that they facilitate or promote and from which they benefit.

Game Theories (WSJ)

By Paul Ingrassia

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Rick Wagoner, the CEO of General Motors, has to be corporate America's Comeback Kid. But after a dramatic week in the battle to reshape GM and the global auto industry, Las Vegas billionaire Kirk Kerkorian -- GM's largest individual shareholder and Mr. Wagoner's nemesis -- might still hold a winning hand.

Just six months ago, Mr. Wagoner seemed on the verge of being fired. Losing $10.6 billion in a single year, descending into junk-bond status and drawing six separate SEC investigations of prior years' earnings might put any man's job in jeopardy.

DOJ_NMG_0082864

Then last summer Mr. Kerkorian proposed putting GM into a global alliance with Nissan and Renault, both led by turnaround maven Carlos Ghosn. The brazen proposal gave GM's board the chance to trim Mr. Wagoner's wings without a messy firing.

But Mr. Wagoner gamely fought back. Over the past year he's gotten health-care concessions from the United Auto Workers union and has convinced 35,000 hourly workers, nearly one-third of GM's U.S. total, to take buyout offers. He has agreed to sell 51% of GMAC, the company's financing arm, to raise needed cash. GM posted operating profits in the first half, excluding special charges. "The pace of the turnaround has shocked people," Mr. Wagoner recently declared.

It also rallied support from the GM board, which last week rebuffed the Nissan-Renault alliance, leaving Mr. Wagoner clearly in charge. His victory was sweetened when Mr. Kerkorian's representative on the GM board, Jerome B. York, quit in disgust.

Mr. York's scathing resignation letter evoked memories of an earlier dissident GM director, H. Ross Perot, who famously dismissed his board colleagues 20 years ago as "pet rocks." Ironically, in 1992 the GM board ousted the CEO and other top executives in the face of huge losses, and ushered in an era of boardroom activism.

A new report from consulting firm Challenger, Gray and Christmas predicts 2006 will be "the biggest CEO turnover year on record," which makes Mr. Wagoner's comeback all the more remarkable. But there are no subtleties here. The stakes are huge, and everyone is playing for keeps. Including Mr. Kerkorian, at least for now. Unless the reclusive magnate folds his cards, he still can make a lot of money as the next chapters in GM's drama unfold.

Scenario No. 1 at GM, clearly the best for all concerned, is that Mr. Wagoner succeeds in producing a durable turnaround. Mr. Kerkorian would be proven wrong about Mr. Wagoner, but one suspects that doubling his $1.6 billion investment in General Motors would be ample balm for the billionaire's public wounds.

How realistic is this scenario? The case to support it is simple. Mr. Wagoner says he has cut $9 billion out of GM's annual structural costs, thanks to the deals with the UAW and other measures. Suppose half of that amount, allowing for taxes and for the loss of half ownership of GMAC, flows to GM's bottom line.

That amounts to about $8 per GM share. Using a conservative price-earnings ratio of eight (half that of the broad stock market), General Motors shares should be selling for $64 apiece -- more than double the average amount that Mr. Kerkorian paid for his GM shares. Thus if Mr. Wagoner is right, Mr. Kerkorian stands to make a killing, though not quite as much as the $3 billion profit he pocketed from his timely investment in Chrysler in the early 1990s.

Of course, General Motors shares aren't selling at anywhere near $64 apiece, which brings up Scenario No. 2. Simply put, GM's current turnaround is more apparent than real, and the inadequacy of the company's progress will become obvious within the next year. In that case, unless his interest wanes, Mr. Kerkorian can start banging at the door again -- renewing his quest to reshape and revolutionize GM.

Scenario No. 2 holds that the quality of GM's recent operating profits is suspect. A big factor was sales of the company's new full-size SUVs, the Chevy Tahoe and Suburban, which were especially strong given the high gasoline prices in the first half of the year. GM, like all car companies, books profits when it sells vehicles to dealers, instead of when consumers buy the cars from dealers. At the end of September, GM had a 125-day supply of unsold Tahoes sitting on dealer lots, and a 150-days supply of unsold Suburbans. Those inventories are at least double the desirable level.

So GM overstuffed its dealer pipeline in the first half, which boost short-term profits but has necessitated production cuts -- which the company has announced -- in the second half. Now the company is launching a new line of full-size pickup trucks, creating a new pipeline to be filled. Or overfilled.

Meanwhile, the pending sale of a controlling stake in GMAC will raise cash but will impair GM's future earnings power. So this victory is really a strategic retreat, sort of like Dunkirk. And looming ahead is a settlement for the final restructuring of Delphi, GM's bankrupt former components unit, which GM says could cost it between $5 billion and $12 billion. This could eat up most of the profits from selling the GMAC stake.

Whether Mr. Kerkorian waits around for either scenario to unfold is unclear. The billionaire doesn't have to rush to judgment -- except that he happens to be 89 years old. If he chooses to sell part of his 9.9% stake in GM, he'd be positioned to profit if the stock goes up, or to repurchase the shares at a lower price if their price falls.

Meanwhile, shuttling between Paris and Tokyo is Mr. Ghosn, whose name rhymes, aptly, with "alone." The CEO of both France's Renault and Japan's Nissan has been left at the altar. Mr. Ghosn says he wants a North American partner in his alliance to enhance purchasing clout and to share common component costs -- including the hefty bills for developing new "green" engine technology. With Chrysler part of DaimlerChrysler and GM unwilling, Mr. Ghosn's only other chance is Ford. It just hired a new CEO, Alan Mulally of Boeing, but prior to that Chairman William C. Ford Jr. tried to lure Mr. Ghosn to run Ford.

Mr. Ghosn said no thanks, but the two men remain in touch. It's likely that Mr. Mulally will get time to formulate his own game plan for Ford. But he is 61 years old and isn't a Ford lifer, so he mightn't have the same instinctive hostility to an alliance with Nissan and Renault that Mr. Wagoner harbors. Thus Mr. Ghosn might yet find his North American partner, though it's too early to tell.

DOJ_NMG_0082865

This is a high-stakes poker game among rich and powerful men to control and shape one of the world's largest and most visible industries -- and one that tugs at emotions ranging from national pride to consumers' desires. Mr. Wagoner has just won a big hand. But the best bet is that the game will continue.

Mr. Ingrassia, a former Detroit bureau chief at The Wall Street Journal, is vice president for news strategy for Dow Jones.

ENVIRONMENT:

Union Takes Issue With Fitness Rules For Nuclear Plant Guards (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Two years ago, the Energy Department announced plans for creating "a special elite federal force" to protect high-priority nuclear plants. The department's nuclear weapons stockpile, "simply put, must not be allowed to fall into the wrong hands," then-Secretary Spencer Abraham said.

After 18 months of study, the department came up with a policy to create combat teams, much like the military's Delta Force or Navy SEALs, that could engage adversaries outside a nuclear weapons plant rather than wait for attackers from inside plant gates.

These elite combat units, however, are not made up of government employees. They work for companies that operate Energy Department plants or for contractors that provide guards and security officers.

And according to union officials, the contract officers are increasingly concerned about their employment status and would like the option to shift to the federal workforce.

Energy Department plants and facilities that use nuclear weapons material, especially plutonium and highly enriched uranium, are expanding the number of security jobs covered by rigorous physical fitness standards, and many officers are concerned they will lose their jobs. Officers are also uneasy about an Energy Department proposal that they think could reduce their pension and health-care benefits, the union representatives said.

A department official said contractors should be able to reassign into less demanding jobs those officers who do not meet the fitness standards for "offensive combative" positions. Any pension and health-care changes would affect only new hires, and the policy that would have triggered those changes has been suspended, pending further review, the official said.

The Energy Department also is not interested in exploring whether the officers should be "federalized." The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, said the option was debated in 2004 and discarded in 2005.

Bryan Wilkes , spokesman for the department's National Nuclear Security Administration, said no compelling reason was found that justified converting the officers into federal employees. "What we have is working great," he said.

But the National Council of Security Police, a union group representing officers at nuclear facilities, thinks the department's plans will undercut the goal of enhanced security in the post-Sept. 11 world.

In the past, nuclear weapons plants have assigned officers to offensive and defensive positions. The Energy Department's policy shift is prompting plants to realign their security posture and convert more positions to the offense, union officials said.

For the offensive positions, a security officer must run a mile in 8 minutes and 30 seconds and complete a 40-yard dash in no more than 8 seconds. Defensive positions require a half-mile run in 4 minutes, 40 seconds, and a 40-yard dash in 8.5 seconds.

The union group said the physical fitness standards do not take into account a person's age or sex, placing officers in their 40s at a disadvantage. Hundreds of officers will not meet the standards for offensive positions and will be forced to take lower-paying jobs at the Energy Department plants or will be let go, union officials said.

"We're asking to be treated fairly," said Mike Stumbo , the council's president.

Stumbo said the department's policy will accelerate turnover among younger officers who see little chance of completing a career at the plants.

BWXT Pantex LLC, the Energy Department contractor with the largest guard force, said the company thinks many older officers and female officers "are fully capable" of meeting the physical standards.

BWXT Pantex also said jobs are being identified for officers who do not meet the fitness standards. The company also said it will seek to negotiate a new contract with the guards union "that includes a competitive benefits package."

DOJ_NMG_0082866

The company reported a turnover rate of 6.7 percent for security officers in fiscal 2006, but Robert J. Lynch , president of the Pantex Guards Union, said his tally shows that about 10 percent of the guard force has left the Pantex plant this year.

Lynch said the company has not told the union what it plans for older officers who cannot meet the fitness standards.

Many union members would like to see the Bush administration reopen debate on whether they should be converted to federal employees, Stumbo said. That status would give them a greater chance at stable careers and retirement benefits, he said.

"For our guys, the fundamental argument is, if we are asked to die or kill for our country, we should have the full measure and involvement of the government's support," Stumbo said.

Benefits Of Fish Exceed Risks, Studies Find (WP)

By Sally Squires, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Experts Advise 2 Servings a Week

The health benefits of eating fish regularly outweigh the danger from mercury and other contaminants even for pregnant women and children, two major reports concluded yesterday as scientists tried to resolve a slippery question that has long vexed consumers.

The findings, which were reached by independent teams of scientists, pointed to significant benefits for both young and old. In adults, the death rate from heart disease was 36 percent lower among those who ate fish twice a week compared with those who ate little or no seafood, according to a study being published today in the Journal of the American Medical Association. Overall mortality was 17 percent lower, the study by Harvard School of Public Health researchers found.

A second, federally funded report released by the Institute of Medicine (IOM) echoed the conclusion that the heart benefits of eating seafood outweigh the risks and said infants also benefit from the healthy fats found in seafood.

Omega-3 fatty acids found in fish promote healthy vision and brain development in infants whose mothers consume fish or seafood during pregnancy or while nursing, the report said. These healthy fats also appear to decrease the risk of delivering a preterm, low-birth-weight baby.

Even so, because of methyl mercury concerns, the IOM report stuck with the current federal guidelines that advise women who are nursing, pregnant or plan to become pregnant, as well as children age 12 and younger, to refrain from eating swordfish, shark, tilefish and king mackerel. These two groups can safely consume up to 12 ounces of other fish per week, the report said, but they should also limit white (albacore) tuna to six ounces a week because of its high levels of methyl mercury, which can be toxic to the brain and hearing.

The new findings are expected to help put to rest a hotly debated nutritional debate that often left perplexed consumers asking, "What do I do about fish?"

"Having this report will be really good," said Walter Willett, a professor of epidemiology and nutrition at the Harvard School of Public Health, who was not a co-author of either study.

Environmental groups echoed that assessment.

"Overall, they are reasonable recommendations," said Rebecca Goldburg, a senior scientist with the nonprofit advocacy group Environmental Defense who reviewed the IOM report before its release.

But Goldburg and others also raised concerns about the impact the findings could have on marine life if people worldwide try to dine on seafood twice a week, because there isn't enough to go around. Goldburg, who regularly serves her own family seafood, urged consumers to make smart choices "that are good for their health as well as for the oceans. If we want fish to be abundant, choose seafood that is farmed or fished in an environmentally responsible manner."

Although the new findings may help to settle the question of the risks of eating seafood, there is still disagreement about the extent of the health benefits. A study published earlier this year in the British Medical Journal found no overall reduction in mortality, no decrease in heart disease risk and no reduction in cancer from consuming omega-3 fatty acids.

Goldburg said, "I feel quite comfortable with the evidence that seafood is good for you but am a little taken aback by the conclusion that the benefits are as sweeping as in the JAMA study."

Other recent studies have hinted that omega-3 fatty acids may also help protect against diabetes and cancer, slow the progression of early Alzheimer's disease, and perhaps ameliorate depression and other mental disorders, including attention-deficit disorder in children. But the IOM report found that the evidence of those benefits is unclear, and the Harvard study did not address those questions.

Both reports found little evidence to fuel concerns that eating fish exposes people to large amounts of dioxins, polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs) and other harmful organic chemicals that have been linked to seafood consumption.

Experts hope that the findings will end the confusion that often occurs at seafood counters and in restaurants.

DOJ_NMG_0082867

"Consumers need better guidance on making seafood choices," said Malden C. Nesheim, chair of the committee that wrote the IOM report, which was sponsored by the National Oceanographic and Atmospheric Administration and the Food and Drug Administration.

The findings of both reports are consistent with current recommendations of the U.S. Dietary Guidelines and the American Heart Association, which advise eating two meals -- roughly three ounces per serving -- of seafood per week.

By simply substituting broiled, steamed or baked seafood -- especially fatty species such as salmon -- for meat or poultry a couple of times per week, consumers can increase their intake of omega-3s and help reduce the amount of unhealthful saturated and trans fat they eat.

People need "a quarter-gram per day on average [of omega 3s], so one to two servings of cod per week will not get you there," said Dariush Mozaffarian, a Harvard cardiologist and co-author of the JAMA study. "On the other hand, one to two servings per day of farm-raised salmon will."

Large, federally funded nutritional surveys suggest that most people do not get enough omega 3s.

"About 75 percent of women of childbearing age and about 85 percent of pregnant women consume less than six ounces of seafood per week," noted Mozaffarian. Omega 3s cross the placenta and help build developing brains in fetuses and in infants during the first months of life.

"That certainly is one of the benefits," said David C. Bellinger, a professor of neurology at the Harvard School of Public Health and a member of the IOM committee.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

GAO Faults FBI Sentinel Staffing Process (FCW)

By David Hubler

Federal Computer Week, October 18, 2006

The FBI is moving quickly to staff its six-year, $425 million Sentinel program, which will replace the agency's failed Virtual Case File project and antiquated intelligence analysis and investigative case management systems, according to a new Government Accountability Office report prepared for the House Judiciary Committee.

But the report states that the Sentinel staffing process is focusing only on the program office's immediate staffing needs and not on the "kind of strategic human capital management that GAO's research and evaluations have shown to be essential to the success of any organizational entity."

Specifically, GAO found that the FBI staffing plan "was not derived using a documented data-driven methodology and does not provide for inventorying the knowledge and skills of existing staff."

Sentinel has not looked ahead to future staffing needs, analyzed gaps between current employees and future workforce needs, or formulated a strategy for filling those expected gaps, the report states.

GAO warned that "unless the FBI adopts a more strategic approach to managing human capital for the Sentinel program and treats human capital as a program risk, the chances of delivering required intelligence and investigative support capabilities in a timely and cost-effective manner are reduced."

GAO has recommended that the FBI establish policies and procedures for strategically managing IT programs' workforce needs and treating and managing the Sentinel vacancies as a program risk.

According to the report, the FBI has agreed with the recommendations and is taking steps to correct the program.

Awards recognize N.Y., Texas info-sharing programs

The Texas Department of State Health Services won for a system aimed at preventing drug abuse, and New York won for a system that enables statewide distribution of information on potential hazards.

Florida county chooses Oracle ERP system

Polk Oracle Web Enabled Resources automates business processes such as financial management, procurement and payroll management.

Agencies struggle to defend IT spending

Most departments and agencies justify a majority of their IT investments, but DHS, the VA and the Army Corps of Engineers could defend less than half of theirs, according to a report.

Agencies struggle to defend IT spending

Most departments and agencies justify a majority of their IT investments, but DHS, the VA and the Army Corps of Engineers could defend less than half of theirs, according to a report.

DISPENSARY DIRECTOR GRANTED RELEASE ON $1 MILLION BOND (BCNW)

Bay City News Wire, October 17, 2006

A medical marijuana dispensary director who is accused of marijuana cultivation and money laundering was granted release on $1 million bond by a federal magistrate in San Francisco today.

Sparky Rose, 36, director of the New Remedies Cooperative in San Francisco, is one of 15 people arrested in a sweep by federal agents on Oct. 3.

The agents also seized nearly 13,000 plants, a Porsche car belonging to Rose and $125,000 in raids of the dispensary, related offices in Oakland and San Francisco and two San Francisco warehouses where marijuana was allegedly cultivated.

All 15 defendants are charged in a federal criminal complaint with marijuana manufacture and distribution and Rose is additionally charged with money laundering.

U.S. Magistrate Nandor Vadas granted the bail release for Rose after prosecution and defense lawyers told him they had agreed on the $1 million amount.

The bond will be made up of $200,000 in equity from the Maryland house of Rose's mother and stepfather, plus individual surety bonds signed by Rose's ex-wife and two friends.

Defense attorney Nanci Clarence said it would take a day or two to complete the arrangements for the bond.

Clarence told the magistrate that prosecutors have informed her that an indictment in the case is expected to come from a federal grand jury in Los Angeles rather than San Francisco.

Through his attorney, Rose agreed to delay further proceedings until next month while the indictment is awaited. Vadas scheduled a status conference before a magistrate in San Francisco on Nov. 14.

Clarence said outside of court that Rose operated the medical marijuana dispensary "in a very businesslike way" and that Rose "exemplifies the notion of a responsible dispensary."

The cooperative was formerly known as Compassionate Caregivers Inc. and at one time operated dispensaries in Oakland, Los Angeles and several other cities.

Although a California law approved by voters in 1996, the Compassionate Use Act, allows seriously ill patients to use medical marijuana, federal drug laws make no exception for the state law.

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration regional chief Frederico Pena said after the Oct. 3 arrests that anyone who breaks the federal laws to run an allegedly lucrative drug trade "is not compassionate, they're criminal."

An affidavit filed in the case by a DEA agent alleges that cash deposits to a New Remedies Cooperative bank account in Hercules amounted to more than $2.3 million between December 2005 and July 2006.

The affidavit said the money was used to pay employees of the cooperative, including $331,000 paid directly to Rose during that period.

Marijuana Club Director Released On Bail (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, October 17, 2006

(10-17) 15:03 PDT -- A federal magistrate today approved a $1 million bail release for the head of a Bay Area medical marijuana club that was raided two weeks ago by federal agents. Sparky Rose, 36, director of the New Remedies Cooperative, was one of 15 people arrested during the Oct. 3 sweep of eight sites and the only one still in jail. He is charged with conspiracy to grow and distribute marijuana and with money laundering.

Today, Rose was granted bail by U.S. Magistrate Nandor Vardas with the approval of federal prosecutors.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents seized nearly 13,000 marijuana plants, $125,000 and four vehicles, including Rose's leased Porsche, at a dispensary in San Francisco's Mission District and other sites in San Francisco and Oakland.

The raid was one of a recent series of enforcement actions by federal authorities against medical marijuana clubs and suppliers in California, where voters passed an initiative in 1996 allowing patients to use the drug with a doctor's recommendation. Federal drug law prohibits marijuana possession and cultivation, classifies it with the most dangerous drugs and recognizes no legitimate use.

The case originated in the Los Angeles area, where a related organization, Compassionate Caregivers, was raided last year by federal agents, prosecutors said in court filings.

Rose worked for years in Web site design and marketing, fell victim to a downturn in the Internet business and took a job with Compassionate Caregivers in San Francisco in 2003, his lawyer, Nanci Clarence, said in court papers. The local organization was renamed New Remedies last year.

DOJ_NMG_0082869

Clarence disputed an Oct. 3 assertion by Javier Pena, regional director of the DEA, that Rose and his fellow defendants were "using the pot clubs as facades to make millions of dollars" under the guise of serving medical patients.

"This was not a sham," Clarence said today. "This was run in a transparent way. He filed tax returns, he paid estimated quarterly taxes, he paid workers' comp and health insurance and he ran it like a business, just the way local authorities and state authorities have asked him to.

"This is a clash between state and federal governments, and on some level a culture war."

Drug Probe Nets Eighth Guilty Plea (SSJR)

Springfield State Journal Register, October 17, 2006

A man federal prosecutors say was at the center of a high-profile drug investigation last fall pleaded guilty Monday to drug charges and agreed to forfeit his interest in seven properties in Springfield and Taylorville.

Danny J. Sidener Jr., 27, of the 900 block of West Waco Street in Taylorville pleaded guilty before U.S. District Judge Jeanne Scott to conspiracy to distribute five kilograms or more of cocaine, distribution of 500 grams or more of cocaine, use of a telephone to facilitate a drug offense and possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug-trafficking crime.

He faces a minimum of 15 years in prison when sentenced Feb. 26.

Sidener, represented by Springfield attorney Jeff Page, also agreed to forfeit his interest in seven properties he bought with proceeds from the crimes at 905 W. Waco St. and 816 W. Franklin St., both in Taylorville; and 610 S. Illinois St., 2307 S. 12th St. and 2315, 2319 and 2323 S. Sixth St., all in Springfield.

Scott said she understood that a third party may have a claim on the South 12th Street property and could object to the forfeiture.

Sidener is the eighth person to plead guilty in connection with the case, which began with indictments last fall.

The mandatory minimum sentence for the drug conspiracy count is 10 years to life in prison. Being in possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug crime is a minimum five-year sentence that must be served consecutively to any other sentence he receives.

Assistant U.S. attorney John Childress said that between Jan. 4, 2004, and Oct. 28, 2005, Sidener conspired with Michael Mohan, Peter Sidener, Earl Sidener and others to distribute powder cocaine in central Illinois.

Childress said Danny Sidener obtained more than five kilograms of cocaine and "fronted" it to the others, who then could resell it or front it (advance on credit) to other resellers.

Sidener also admitted that on Oct. 28 he used a cell phone to set up a delivery to Mohan at the latter's home in the 1200 block of Leland Avenue, then delivered 1,500 grams of cocaine.

Law enforcement officers obtained a search warrant and found the cocaine, Childress said. They also searched Sidener's car and found a 9mm Ruger and 16 rounds of ammunition. Sidener allegedly told officers he carried the gun to protect himself from other drug dealers.

On Oct. 28, agents were watching Danny Sidener as he drove up to Mohan's home to make the cocaine delivery.

Someone overheard on a police scanner mention of Mohan's address and alerted Sidener, who fled.

He crashed his car into an Illinois state trooper's, police said, and prosecutors are seeking $2,945 in restitution for the collision damage. Sidener disputed that claim in court Monday, and the issue probably will be taken up at sentencing.

The government, in a separate civil forfeiture action, also is seeking to confiscate about $52,500 in alleged drug money from one of Sidener's bank accounts and almost $9,000 from another.

Court documents filed last month indicate that Springfield police were first notified in mid-1999 that Sidener was delivering large amounts of marijuana and cocaine in the Springfield area.

Between 2000 and 2004, agents learned Sidener allegedly received large amounts of cocaine from a supplier in Chicago and would then redistribute it to other dealers in the Springfield area. He received between five and 10 kilos of the drug each time, the documents say.

They also indicate that on Oct. 28, the day Sidener was taken into custody, he told police he had retrieved $42,000 from a storage unit and purchased two kilos of cocaine from his source.

Sidener allegedly told authorities that he began to buy cocaine in Chicago in 1999 or 2000, and that in 2003, he stepped up his purchasing to two or three times a month and bought another 60 pounds of marijuana every other month from a Chicago source.

Sidener asked Scott how far back his relevant conduct - uncharged misconduct that the government must sufficiently link to the current charges - might count against him at sentencing.

Scott said conduct "a couple of years" in the past might be considered "if the government links it up properly."

DOJ_NMG_0082870

The court documents said Sidener told police he had not had a job for several years, but that he bought houses, fixed them up and resold them. He also said he owns rental property.

One of Sidener's alleged co-conspirators told authorities he'd known Sidener nearly all his life and that Sidener's last legitimate job was in high school, when he worked at Domino's Pizza.

Since last October, eight others have been charged in related cases with conspiring to distribute cocaine in Springfield and central Illinois.

Seven who previously pleaded guilty are scheduled for sentencing on the following dates: Adam Martin, 28, of the 2200 block of Lindbergh Drive, Nov. 27; Dondi D. McIntosh, 33, of the 2100 block of Peoria Road, Dec. 11; William W. Thomas, 28, of the 1200 block of West Edwards Street, Nov. 6; Michael D. Mohan, 28, of the 1200 block of Leland Avenue, Nov. 20; Gerald M. Vondebur 41, of the 2100 block of Fairway Drive, Dec. 11; Jerrad A. Pruitt, 27, of the 4000 block of Hazelcrest Road, Dec. 18; and Earl V. Sidener, 27, of the 1100 block of North Virginia Street, Jan. 8.

Peter Sidener, 39, of the 300 block of Cranmer Drive is scheduled for a final pretrial conference Nov. 20 and a trial Dec. 5.

The charges are the result of an Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force investigation by the Drug Enforcement Administration, Springfield Police Department, Illinois State Police and the Central Illinois Enforcement Group.

Federal authorities announced in August that the cocaine investigation was complete after nine indictments. However, federal officials also forwarded the names of six other people to the Sangamon County state's attorney's office for possible prosecution. Because five of the six have connections to county government or law enforcement, the state's attorney's office then referred the cases to the state appellate prosecutor's office to determine whether charges should be filed.

The six are Sangamon County Clerk Joe Aiello, former assistant state's attorneys John "Jake" Kelley and Dan Mills, former public defender John A. Maurer, former federal probation officer Kevin Kelly and former bank loan officer Blair Fein.

Nevadans To Vote On Legalizing Marijuana (AP)

By Sandra Chereb

AP, October 18, 2006

RENO, Nev. - Gambling, prostitution, and now pot? Organizers of a Nevada ballot measure hope voters in a state where almost everything goes will go one better and legalize marijuana.

If it passes Nov. 7, Nevada will be the first state to allow adults to possess up to an ounce of pot that they could buy at government-regulated marijuana shops.

The Committee to Regulate and Control Marijuana, which has pushed medical marijuana and decriminalization laws around the country, thinks Nevada - with its embrace of certain vices and its streak of Western independence - is a perfect venue.

In an editorial last spring, the rural Lahontan Valley News argued that gambling, Nevada's most powerful industry, caters to "visceral pleasures," and that it would hypocritical to oppose the legalization of marijuana on moral grounds.

Proponents of the measure also argue that the legal system wastes time and money on low-level marijuana offenses, and that taxing and regulating pot would put drug dealers out of business while freeing law enforcement to focus on violent crime and more dangerous drugs such as methamphetamine.

"Put it into a tightly controlled and regulated environment. We think that makes a lot of sense," Neal Levine, executive director of the committee.

Opponents, including law enforcement, the nation's drug czar, and civic and business groups, argue the measure would encourage the use of other drugs, and they question whether it will even prove to be a good source of tax revenue.

"The fact is, growing, distributing and warehousing marijuana will still be a federal offense," said Todd Raybuck, a Las Vegas police officer and spokesman for the Committee to Keep Nevada Respectable, which opposes the measure.

Question 7 allows people 21 and older to possess an ounce of marijuana in their homes - the same amount allowed under Nevada's medical marijuana law. Currently, possession of an ounce or less is a misdemeanor punishable by a $600 fine.

Twelve states have decriminalized small amounts of marijuana - that is, possession is punishable by a ticket and a fine - and 11 allow its use for medical purposes. Possession of up to an ounce at home is legal in Alaska under a court ruling there, but the case is under appeal.

Colorado residents will vote next month on whether to legalize possession of up to an ounce of marijuana by those 21 and older, similar to an ordinance Denver voters approved last year.

But the Nevada measure goes further. It directs Nevada's Department of Taxation to set up procedures to license and regulate marijuana growers, distributors and retailers. At the same time, it doubles penalties for selling or giving pot to minors and for vehicular manslaughter while under the influence of drugs or alcohol.

DOJ_NMG_0082871

The legislation also imposes a $45-per-ounce excise tax, with some of the proceeds going toward the budget and alcohol, tobacco and drug abuse programs. An ounce of pot on the street costs upwards of $300, depending on the quality.

A 2002 study by researchers at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas estimated taxing and regulating marijuana would generate $28.6 million in revenue.

The Justice Department in Washington did not respond to calls and e-mails seeking comment. In June, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled people who smoke marijuana for medical reasons can be prosecuted under federal drug laws, and Raybuck said it is doubtful federal agents would tolerate commercial pot ventures in Nevada.

In 2002, Nevada voters overwhelmingly rejected a move to legalize up to three ounces of marijuana. The latest measure got onto the ballot after 86,000 people signed petitions.

A poll conducted in September for the Las Vegas Review-Journal found 51 percent of voters opposed Question 7, while 42 percent supported it and 7 percent were undecided.

The measure has found some surprising allies.

"Make no mistake, I don't think using marijuana is a wise choice for anyone," said the Rev. William C. Webb, a Baptist minister who joined dozens of other religious leaders in announcing their backing. But "if there has to be a market in marijuana, I'd rather it be regulated with sensible safeguards than run by violent gangs and dangerous drug dealers."

U.S. Official Says Rise In Afghan Opium Production Leading To Purer Heroin In Europe (AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

MADRID, Spain Skyrocketing opium production in Afghanistan has led to increasingly pure heroin being sold in Europe and prices could fall if the trend continues, a senior U.S. anti-narcotics official said Tuesday.

Thomas Schweich, principal U.S. deputy assistant secretary of state for international narcotics, issued the warning after the United Nations reported last month that Afghanistan's opium production for 2006 increased 49 percent from last year, exceeding the demands of the world's heroin users by a third.

"We're already noticing on the streets of Europe much more pure opium and that's going to lead to more deaths and more health problems," Schweich said in an interview with The Associated Press.

"The other thing is for the price to go down, which hasn't happened yet," Schweich said, noting that an increase in supply often drives prices down.

Afghanistan produces more than 90 percent of the world's opium and heroin, and the drug trade has had a corrosive effect on President Hamid Karzai's struggling post-Taliban government.

The booming trade accounts for at least 35 percent of Afghanistan's economy, financing warlords and Taliban insurgents alike.

Despite the strong increase in Afghanistan's opium production for 2006, the Afghan and U.S. governments have no plans to change counter-narcotics strategy in the region, Schweich said.

"When the U.N. came out with those statistics, that's for planting that occurred the previous fall," said Schweich, who met with Afghan government officials in Kabul last month. "They really reflect the relatively ineffective delivery of the program in its very first year."

In the coming year, the two governments will continue a public information campaign that presents farmers with alternatives to growing opium, Schweich said.

Such alternatives, which include growing wheat or fruit trees or raising livestock, are substantially less lucrative and can be unattractive to farmers struggling to survive in a country where more than half of the population lives below the poverty line and 40 percent is unemployed.

In addition to the public information campaign, the Afghan government is to step up opium crop eradication efforts and the prosecution of drug growers and traders, Schweich said.

"With serious drug problems it does take time," he said. "I'm hoping we don't have to wait 10 years to see improvement."

Afghanistan's Opium Production Soaring 'out Of Control,' U.N. Agency Warns (AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

VIENNA, Austria Afghanistan's opium production has soared "out of control," the U.N. drugs and crime agency warned Tuesday, adding that proceeds from the opium harvest were being used to fund the resurgent Taliban.

The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime is calling on NATO and Afghan troops to attack heroin labs, opium bazzars and convoys transporting the narcotic, said Preeta Bannerjee, a spokeswoman for the agency.

Opium production in Afghanistan rose 59 percent in 2006 to a record 165,000 hectares (408,000 acres) — representing 92 percent of the world's opium, according to U.N. figures.

DOJ_NMG_0082872

"You can say that Afghanistan is pretty much out of control," Bannerjee said.

In contrast, opium poppy cultivation in Southeast Asia's 'Golden Triangle' — Laos, Myanmar, and Thailand — declined by 29 percent this year 24,160 hectares (59,700 acres) Bannerjee said. She credited combined efforts by U.N. organizations and aid agencies for helping farmers find alternative crops for reducing production levels by 85 percent since 1998.

"Afghanistan is practically ... supplying the world's opium," Bannerjee said. "There's also evidence that the country is increasingly hooked on its own opium."

The agency has said that about 2.9 million people were involved in growing opium, representing 12.6 percent of the Afghan population, and that revenue from this year's harvest was predicted to hit more than US$3 billion (€2.4 billion).

Local farmers sell their crops to the Taliban, who resell them and use the revenues to fund themselves, Banerjee said. Since producers are subsistence farmers, it remains a question of giving the farmer a sustainable alternative, she said.

Opium Production Down In Golden Triangle (UPI)

UPI, October 17, 2006

VIENNA, (UPI) -- Opium poppy cultivation in Laos, Myanmar and Thailand, the Golden Triangle, dropped 29 percent last year, the U.N. drug agency reported Monday.

The region is the world's second-largest source of opium, although it is now dwarfed by Afghanistan, the Office on Drugs and Crime report said. Executive Director Antonio Maria Costa said Afghanistan will soon be the only source if the trend continues.

"This is a remarkable success in the reduction of illicit crops, which is so far unmatched anywhere in the world," Costa said. "It represents an important step towards the goal of eliminating the cultivation of illicit crops worldwide."

The number of acres devoted to poppy cultivation in Thailand and Laos actually increased slightly but starting from a very low base. That increase was more than outweighed by a sharp drop in poppy cultivation in Myanmar, the country formerly known a Burma.

In 1998, about 33 percent of the world's opium came from the Golden Triangle, a figure that has dipped to less than 5 percent.

UN Drug Agency Reports Sharp Fall In Golden Triangle Opium Production (VOA)

Voice of America, October 18, 2006

The United Nations' drug agency says there has been another sharp fall in opium cultivation in the area of Southeast Asia known as the Golden Triangle, where Burma, Thailand and Laos meet. But, U.N. officials are now concerned about the increased use of methamphetamine-type stimulants across the region.

Photo: Scott Bobb (VOA)The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime - the UNODC - says its annual survey of opium production in the Golden Triangle region shows poppy cultivation there fell by 29 percent this year.

Burma, the main poppy growing country of the region, reported a more than 30 percent decline in areas under cultivation from the previous year.

Burma is the second largest opium grower globally after Afghanistan, which accounts for more than 90 percent of the world's supply of heroin.

Burma's northern Shan State produces 90 percent of the country's opium. The ethnic Wa community there declared a total ban on opium cultivation and trade last year.

The decrease in Burmese production means that a plan to eradicate opium in the Golden Triangle by 2014 remains on target. The region's share of world poppy cultivation dropped from 66 percent in 1998 to 12 percent last year.

But Leik Boonwaat, the UNODC Representative in Laos, said recently there is still a need for international support for development programs to assist opium growers to move toward alternative crops.

He said, "There is a need to provide the relief to former opium farmers, in order to enable them to adapt to new alternative livelihoods or new ways of life, and it's also important to enable the national poverty reduction programs to be able to incorporate all these areas."

The UNODC report says the two other countries in the Golden Triangle, Thailand and Laos, are almost opium free.

But the gains from the decrease in opium cultivation are being offset by a rise in methamphetamine and ecstasy abuse in Southeast Asia. A recent report by the UNODC found that methamphetamine is a concern across the region.

The UNODC's Leik says, in Laos, methamphetamine is a particular problem among young people.

"For methamphetamine in Laos, it's mostly targeting the youth - school children. We have children as young as 12 that are addicted, and this is causing great concern. We see it in the schools, we're seeing it in urban areas, we're seeing it in rural areas," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0082873

Factories producing methamphetamine-type stimulants are found along the Burma-Thailand border, with millions of tablets finding their way onto the Thai market each year.

Drugs Group In Afghan Exit Order (BBC)

BBC News, October 18, 2006

Poppies grow in most Afghan provinces The Afghan government has ordered the closure of all offices of a group that wants to promote new ways of dealing with the global drugs problem.

The Interior Ministry said the Senlis Council, had been "confusing farmers" and had been a factor in the increase in poppy cultivation.

Senlis has suggested the legal use of Afghan opium for medical purposes.

A spokesman for Senlis said it had not received any formal notification that its offices were to be closed.

He denied its activities had increased poppy cultivation.

Correspondents say there has been tension over a recent council report blaming the government for a failure to stop farmers growing poppies.

Afghanistan is building a new counter-narcotics police force but reports say the force only has personnel in nine of 34 provinces.

Only six provinces are reported to be opium-free.

Review: Prisoner Flights Are Expensive (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

Pricey contracts and empty seats plague government flights that move U.S. prisoners to new jails and deport illegal immigrants, a Justice Department review concluded Tuesday.

Additionally, the Justice Prisoner and Alien Transport System does not always have large enough crews to subdue onboard security threats, Justice Department Inspector General Glen A. Fine found.

"Given the variety of transportation needs and the nature of the individuals being transported, inherent risks exist in managing a transportation system like JPATS," Fine concluded, using the acronym for the air transit system.

The U.S. Marshals Service, the Bureau of Prisons, and Immigration and Customs Enforcement use and pay for the flights. More than 305,000 prisoners and illegal aliens flew on them last year, costing an estimated $87 million.

The program makes sure prisoners and illegal immigrants make their court appointments, are transferred efficiently and are deported quickly.

But the review found several flaws, including that:

_The government pays far more to lease large jets under multiple-year contracts than it would by buying the aircraft outright. For example, the 30-year cost of leasing a used Boeing 737 jet would come to $840 million, compared to buying a new one for $540 million.

_Poor planning led to empty seats on the flights, some of which were only half-full during an audit between 2004 and the last three months of 2005.

_Only 13 percent of 1,028 flights audited had a larger security crew aboard than required. The review did not disclose the required crew-to-passenger ratio, but inspectors said the shortage exposes the flights "to potential security threats when transporting prisoners or aliens."

The flights program is managed by the U.S. Marshals Service. In a Sept. 6 letter responding to a draft of the review, Marshals Director John F. Clark agreed with all 15 of Fine's recommendations for improvement.

___

On the Net:

Justice Department Office of Inspector General: http://www.usdoj.gov/oig/index.html

Audit Faults 'Con Air' On Safety (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

A government-operated service that transports prisoners and aliens in federal custody throughout the United States, Central America and the Caribbean does not have the means to ensure that safety procedures are being followed and lacks the ability to predict long-term capacity needs, according to a report released yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0082874

The Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General said the Justice Prisoner and Alien Transportation System (JPATS), run by the U.S. Marshals Service and known to many as "Con Air," also needs to reduce costs by maximizing the number of passengers scheduled for each flight.

"The overall demand for prisoner and alien transportation has grown over the past six years, but our audit found that JPATS has not yet developed a planning tool that allows it to project prisoner and alien movements more than one year into the future," Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said.

"This lack of capacity planning has led to underutilization of available seats on JPATS aircraft because JPATS has not amended its flight schedules to maintain a more optimal use of its resources," Mr. Fine said.

JPATS uses three government-owned and six leased aircraft to move prisoners and aliens for the Marshals Service, the Federal Bureau of Prisons and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. In addition, it transports prisoners for military, state and local law-enforcement agencies as needed.

In fiscal 2005, JPATS transported 305,649 prisoners for a wide array of judicial proceedings, such as the removal of deportable aliens -- including those who committed crimes in the United States. Many of its planes were acquired through government surplus programs or asset forfeiture. They represent the only government-operated, regularly scheduled passenger airline in the nation.

The inspector general's audit said a review of data on 1,034 flights from fiscal 2004 to the first quarter of fiscal 2006 found that although 74 percent of the seats were filled on flights originating from one of the three hubs reviewed, fewer than half of the seats were filled on flights originating from the remaining hubs.

The report also said JPATS has been using short-term leases for its large aircraft since early 2005, despite studies by the Government Accountability Office and the Office of the Federal Detention Trustee that said purchasing the aircraft or entering into long-term leases could cut costs.

Although the audit said JPATS had developed adequate internal policies to ensure that it conducts its air transportation in a safe and secure manner, it added that JPATS "generally does not have the necessary systems in place to ensure that it adheres to its own standards on safety and security."

The audit listed 15 recommendations to help manage the JPATS program. Officials at JPATS agreed with the recommendations and are in the process of implementing them.

Activists' Passion Turns To Violence (SEAPI)

By Phuong Cat Le, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 18, 2006

One worked with the nation's top atmospheric scientists; the other was an aspiring journalist. Now they both face years in prison for the ELF arson fire at a UW research facility

Jennifer Kolar and Lacey Phillabaum seem unlikely criminals.

Well-educated young women passionate about environmental causes, they share a love of the outdoors and similar backgrounds. Both grew up in Spokane and attended the same public high school.

Those who know Phillabaum call her bright, outspoken, sometimes in-your-face but never dull. She was a skilled debater in high school and college and once worked for a well-regarded non-profit that promotes sustainable agriculture.

Kolar

Kolar studied under one of the nation's top atmospheric scientists while pursuing a doctoral degree and had the makings of a good scientist, her adviser said, but her heart seemed elsewhere.

The women were concerned about what was going on around them -- the logging of old-growth forests, the slaughter of animals for sport. Like many Northwest activists, they pushed for change.

Phillabaum

But their activism morphed into something more dangerous -- and now both are headed to prison.

Before dawn on May 21, 2001, Kolar cut the glass that allowed fellow Earth Liberation Front members to sneak into the University of Washington office of professor Toby Bradshaw, who was studying the genetics of fast-growing hybrid poplar trees. Phillabaum's role is still unclear, but she was also on the scene, court documents show.

Bradshaw and other researchers at the UW Center for Urban Horticulture would be arriving within hours, so the ELF squad must have worked quickly to plant the firebombs -- plastic buckets of fuel rigged with cheap digital timers, assembled in someone's garage. Their goal: destroy the research on genetic engineering of poplars to avert an "ecological nightmare" for native forests.

The fire ignited in Bradshaw's office spread through the building and raged for hours. Rare books, endangered plants and decades of botanical research went up in flames, causing $7 million in damage.

DOJ_NMG_0082875

By then, Kolar, Phillabaum and the three others involved in the arson had disappeared.

At the UW, researchers tried to salvage their work. A new facility was built. But the trail to the perpetrators seemed to peter out. For nearly five years, the crime went unsolved.

While investigators searched for clues, Kolar and Phillabaum didn't go into hiding.

Kolar bought a two-story house in Wallingford, raced in local regattas and was active in a Seattle yacht club. Phillabaum pursued a career as a journalist, freelanced articles and sought mentoring from a professional journalism group. Others involved in the arsons also went on to do other things.

"The series of arsons stopped in 2001, and since then many of the people implicated in those have gone on to lead lives in the mainstream society," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Andrew Friedman in Seattle.

But investigators eventually closed in.

In December, federal agents arrested many of those believed responsible for a series of arson attacks across five states, including an Oregon poplar farm that had been torched at the same time as the UW center.

Three people were indicted earlier this year: Justin Solondz, 27, formerly of Jefferson County, who is believed to have fled the country; William Rodgers, 40, who committed suicide in an Arizona jail cell weeks after his arrest; and Briana Waters, 30, a Berkeley, Calif., violin teacher who faces trial.

This month, federal prosecutors identified for the first time the two remaining suspects: Kolar, 33, and Phillabaum, 31.

Both women are cooperating with authorities and have admitted to belonging to ELF and participating in the UW firebombing. The FBI has branded ELF an underground radical group and a top domestic terrorism threat.

At their January sentencing in Seattle, Kolar faces between five and seven years in prison; Phillabaum faces three to five. Defense attorney Gilbert Levy declined a request to interview his client, Phillabaum. Kolar declined comment through her attorney, Michael Martin.

"Paradoxes and ironies abound here, and they're all wedded to a tragedy," said David Frank, a University of Oregon professor who knew Phillabaum when she was in his debate program.

"How could such bright, articulate, well-meaning people ... how could they have been tempted by violence?"

From sit-ins to firebombs

Phillabaum was socially conscious even as a teenager at Shadle Park High School, former school officials say. She grew up in Deer Park, and her parents were partners in a Spokane law firm. In high school, she was voted "Teacher's Pet" in her senior year and won debate contests.

"She had a strong mind of her own," said Emmett Arndt, a former assistant principal at Shadle Park.

At the University of Oregon, Phillabaum studied art history and graduated in three years. She continued to debate in college, partly "to learn more about the reasons why the environment was under threat," said Frank, who teaches rhetoric.

The program taught students to use reason, research and persuasion to affect change, but Phillabaum left after a year, feeling frustrated with the lack of action, he said.

Typical of many students, "she found her way into activist groups," he said. "She was surrounded by people who were equally frustrated, equally angry. Out of those conversations came a dedication to more violent actions to achieve their actions."

"She was probably feeling frustrated with the system, with the exploitation of the Earth and species, and not having immediate results with above-ground organizing," said an associate of Phillabaum's, who asked not to be identified.

In college, she worked on Insurgent, a left-leaning campus publication that critiqued foreign policy.

The mid-1990s was the height of protests against logging on public lands, and Phillabaum was in the thick of it. She protested timber harvests in Oregon's Umpqua National Forest and joined others in blocking a logging road to Warner Creek, according to news accounts.

"You couldn't call her commitment into question," said a Eugene, Ore., activist who has known her for a decade.

At a 1997 tree-sit in Eugene, Phillabaum and others tried to save 40 trees from being leveled for a downtown development. Police arrested her and others for criminal trespassing. She was fined $100 and sentenced to three days in jail, according to the Lane County District Attorney's Office.

In other aspects, Phillabaum led a relatively normal life. She had a lot of friends, was well-grounded and came from a loving family, those who know her say. She spent a lot of time in the outdoors -- rafting rivers and hiking mountains.

An aspiring journalist, she also edited Earth First! Journal, which calls itself the voice of the radical environmental movement. In February 2001, she landed a job at In Good Tilth, a newsletter sent out by Oregon Tilth, a non-profit promoting sustainable farming.

"She was an exemplary employee," said Chris Schreiner, Oregon Tilth's quality-control manager. "She brought a new level of quality and content to the newsletter."

DOJ_NMG_0082876

She worked at the newsletter for four years. She also joined the Society of Environmental Journalists and sought mentoring help from veteran reporters, said the group's executive director, Beth Parke.

In 2005, Phillabaum moved to Charlottesville, Va., to take a writing job at the C-VILLE Weekly. The alternative paper fired her after three months, said editor Cathy Harding, who declined to say why.

Phillabaum's double life was quickly catching up to her.

In December 2005, federal agents arrested Stanislas Meyerhoff, 29, of Charlottesville, who they accused of masterminding the UW and Oregon tree farm firebombings. At the time, Meyerhoff was Phillabaum's boyfriend, a Charlottesville newspaper reported. Meyerhoff pleaded guilty to conspiracy and arson charges in July.

Phillabaum's role in the UW arson would soon be revealed, as would Kolar's.

'It's a puzzle'

It's not clear whether Phillabaum and Kolar knew each other at Shadle Park, but they overlapped at the school, located in a middle-class neighborhood of north Spokane.

Kolar graduated two years before Phillabaum and went on to the University of Colorado in Boulder. She majored in applied mathematics and later earned a master's degree in astrophysical, planetary and atmospheric sciences, according to the school.

"I never thought that atmospheric sciences was her passion, or something that was her lifelong ambition," said Merritt Deeter, an atmospheric scientist who shared an office with Kolar when both were grad students. "She kind of prided herself on her activist nature."

Kolar was bright and skilled but distracted, said her doctoral adviser, Peter Webster, now a professor at the Georgia Institute of Technology.

"If she had applied her passions to science, she would have been a good scientist, but she had other things that were much more important to her," Webster said.

She was passionate about animal rights and often protested against animals being hunted for sport, Webster said. "It's not the least bit surprising to me that she carried her passions that far."

In grad school, Kolar volunteered for such groups as Rocky Mountain Animal Defense. She tried to stop the Denver Zoo from allegedly sending surplus animals to hunting ranches, said David Crawford, the group's founder.

He stressed that his group doesn't condone violence and that she left in 1996.

In July 1997, Kolar allegedly took part in an arson that destroyed a horse slaughterhouse in Redmond, Ore.

She's expected to admit her role in that crime, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Peifer in Portland. She also has pleaded guilty to attempting to firebomb a Colorado gun club that organized turkey shoots in 1998.

Kolar settled in Seattle several years ago. She bought a house in Wallingford a year after the UW arson, joined the Corinthian Yacht Club in Seattle and competed in Puget Sound regattas. Her profile on that club's Web site noted that she loved the outdoors and co-owned the Manta Ray, a 30-foot performance sailboat.

Kolar was a crew member on a boat that recently won at the Swiftsure Lightship Classic, said the skipper, Alex Wigley.

"It's a puzzle. It just blindsided me," said Wigley, who described Kolar as capable, funny and intelligent.

"This whole event has made me wonder how well I know anyone."

P-I reporter Phuong Cat Le can be reached at 206-448-8390 or phuongle@seattlepi.com.

IMMIGRATION:

Border-fence Bill Awaits Signing (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

The White House is pleading with Congress to send over the bill authorizing 700 miles of fence on the U.S.-Mexico border so the president can sign it immediately, but Republican leaders on Capitol Hill want to wait until closer to the election and to have a public signing ceremony.

"Send us the damn bill. We'd like to autograph it," said a senior administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to allow for more freedom to discuss politics and policy.

"Our object was to sign it last week so we can have port security and border security together and herald an effort to control all of the borders of the United States. We even had ways to talk about what we were doing at the airports," the official said.

DOJ_NMG_0082877

Congressional Republicans, though, are convinced the issue is a political winner and want to hold onto the bill so it will be signed closer to next month's congressional elections. Once the bill is sent to the president, he has a limited amount of time to sign it before it dies as a pocket veto.

"It's a timing issue: We want it signed closer to the election when folks are paying attention and those who want to take advantage of the messaging opportunity can do so, and the White House is aware of this," said an aide to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican. House Republican leadership aides confirmed that strategy.

Mr. Bush has already signed a spending bill with money for some fencing, but has yet to sign the bill actually authorizing the double-wall fence along nearly 700 miles of the border. Congress passed both bills in the waning days of the legislative session last month.

Many blogs from across the political spectrum have speculated he is trying to scuttle the bill with a pocket veto, but Mr. Bush has said he will sign it, though in private, without a signing ceremony.

Congressional Republicans said that is a bad move at a critical political time.

"A public signing ceremony with the maximum amount of fanfare in a high-profile place would be the best thing the president could do to help out Republicans who are having trouble in their re-elections," said Rep. Steve King, Iowa Republican, adding that such a ceremony would go a long way to counteract cynicism from voters who question the White House's commitment to border security.

"People think we're not going to get it done," he said.

The bill's actual status is somewhat murky. Calls to the House clerk's office were referred to the House Administration Committee, and a spokeswoman was not able to say where the bill was.

Mr. King said he has assigned his staff to track down the bill because he, too, wants to know where it stands.

The Bush administration official said the bill's status has been explained several times, but "I for the life of me could not explain it to you."

The official rejected a signing ceremony, and said the White House doesn't want voters to expect too much out of the wall.

"We've got to be careful," the official said. "We are doing a lot on the border, and we cannot raise expectations that this bill of 700 miles of fence is going to happen immediately."

The official said the Department of Homeland Security doubts the value of 700 miles of fencing, instead saying that between 316 miles and 377 miles makes the most sense.

"You talk to the members of Congress about the 700 miles, and there's not a single member who can give you a plausible explanation of how they arrived at 700 miles," the official said. "We'll build every mile of fence that is useful and necessary to build, and if they tell us to build 700, we'll find a way to build 700 miles of fence, but let's not kid ourselves."

The official also said those members of Congress who want to tout their support for the fence are already doing it.

"Every place where they voted for it, they're out there talking about it. Anybody who thinks a one-day signing ceremony is the end-all, be-all, ought to be up talking to the congressional leadership telling them to send us the damn bill so we can sign it," the official said.

Part of the White House's aversion to fanfare may be the context of the broader immigration debate.

Mr. Bush had fought for a bill that would include a guest-worker program for future foreign workers and citizenship rights for most of the estimated 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens already in the country.

But House Republicans insisted on passing border-enforcement legislation first, and, after initially supporting a broader bill, Mr. Frist agreed to bring the bill up on the Senate floor, where it passed overwhelmingly.

Mr. King said that if Mr. Bush doesn't have a public ceremony for the bill, "there's something substituting at the White House for good political judgment."

There has been a marked difference in how Republicans have handled the issue during this year's campaign. While Mr. Bush never mentions the issue on the campaign trail, Republican candidates use it in districts and states across the nation.

"When the border-fence bill is finally signed by President Bush, I hope that it is given the pomp and circumstance that it deserves," said Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican and chairman of the Congressional Immigration Reform Caucus, who has helped several Republican candidates campaign on the immigration issue.

He pointed to a report released yesterday by the House Homeland Security Committee that he said showed the Southwest border has become "the entryway for Middle Eastern terrorists, Mexican drug cartels and human smugglers."

Several lobby groups have asked Mr. Bush to veto the bill, including the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, the National Council of La Raza and the Mexican government.

But at a press conference last week, Mr. Bush said he is committed to building the 700 miles of fencing, though he said the Department of Homeland Security will decide where and that he wants sensors and cameras to watch the border.

"We're going to do both," he said. "We're just going to make sure that we build it in a spot where it works."

DOJ_NMG_0082878

Smugglers Seen Getting 'Sophisticated, Organized' (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

Law-enforcement authorities along the U.S.-Mexico border are outgunned and outmanned by drug smugglers armed with automatic weapons, grenade launchers, bazookas, improvised explosive devices and state-of-the-art communications and tracking systems, a congressional report said yesterday.

"While the United States has taken positive steps to secure its borders, much more is needed to combat an increasingly powerful, sophisticated, organized and violent criminal network, which seeks to move illegal contraband ... into our country for profit," said the House Homeland Security management, integration and oversight subcommittee report.

The 39-page report said drug-trafficking organizations and alien-smuggling networks are "proliferating and strengthening their control" of key corridors along the nation's Southwest; that Mexican drug cartels wield "substantial control" over the U.S.-Mexico border; and that criminal organizations and networks are "highly sophisticated and organized."

It also found that drug-trafficking cartels, alien-smuggling networks and U.S.-based street gangs, including MS-13, are increasingly coordinating with one another to achieve their objectives, and that federal, state and local law-enforcement report "new and ever-increasing levels of ruthlessness and violence" associated with the gangs.

The report echoes complaints from the Texas Border Sheriffs Coalition, which repeatedly has said the federal government's inability to secure the Southwest border has resulted in a dramatic rise in violence against U.S. authorities and made it easier for terrorists to enter the country.

Texas' Zapata County Sheriff Sigifredo Gonzalez Jr. told Congress in March the cartels "have the money, equipment and stamina" to bring increased violence to the border, much of it aimed at law-enforcement authorities.

Sheriff Gonzalez told The Washington Times at the time that the coalition -- which includes all 16 border sheriffs -- was concerned about terrorists using Mexican drug and alien smugglers as cover to cross the border.

Each year, hundreds of illegal aliens from countries known to harbor terrorists or promote terrorism are routinely encountered and apprehended while attempting to enter the U.S. illegally, the House report said.

"The federal government has taken positive steps to secure its borders, but much more is needed to combat an increasingly powerful, sophisticated, and violent criminal network, which has been successful in smuggling illegal contraband, human or otherwise, into our country," the report said.

"The growth of these criminal groups, along the Southwest border, and the potential for terrorists to exploit the vulnerabilities which they create, represents a real threat to America's national security," it said. "It is imperative that immediate action be taken to enhance security along our nation's Southwest border."

The report recommended enhancing Border Patrol resources, constructing physical barriers in vulnerable and high-threat areas, and implementing state-of-the-art technology, cameras, sensors, radar, satellites and unmanned aerial vehicles to ensure maximum coverage of the nation's Southwest border.

President Bush on Oct. 4 signed into law a bill that calls for the hiring of 1,500 more Border Patrol agents and an increase in the number of detention beds for apprehended illegal aliens by 6,700. Congress has approved a bill authorizing the construction of 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border, which Mr. Bush has promised to sign when it gets to his desk.

Mr. Bush also has called for improving border security with high-tech equipment.

Yesterday's House report also noted that federal law-enforcement authorities estimate that 10 percent to 30 percent of the migrants seeking to illegally enter the United States are apprehended and 10 percent to 20 percent of the drugs bound for this country are seized. It said that in 2005, as many as 4 million to 10 million illegal aliens crossed into the United States; and as much as 5.6 million to 11.2 million pounds of cocaine and 34.3 million to 68.6 million pounds of marijuana entered the United States.

The report also called for an expanded use of the expedited-removal policy; building a secure communications network for Border Patrol and state and local law enforcement; and mandating a comprehensive risk assessment of all Southwest border ports of entry and international land borders to prevent the entry of terrorists and their weapons.

During his testimony before a House Judiciary subcommittee, Sheriff Gonzalez said law-enforcement officers have found many items along the banks of the Rio Grande indicating ties to terrorist organizations. He said Border Patrol agents found a jacket near the border with Arabic military badges, one with an airplane flying over a building and heading toward a tower.

TAX:

Feds Indict Actor Wesley Snipes For Tax Fraud (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0082879

By Lorenza Munoz And Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Wesley Snipes, whose flash and dash style of acting carried him from the streets of the South Bronx to movie stardom, has been indicted on charges of conspiracy and tax fraud, federal officials announced today.

Snipes, 44, was also charged with six counts of failing to file income tax returns. If convicted of all of the charges, he could be sentenced to as much as 16 years in prison.

Snipes' whereabouts could not be determined, said Steve Cole, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office for the Middle District of Florida.

"We made an attempt to contact him through his attorneys and now with the news conference," Cole said in a telephone interview. "Maybe he'll find out from the media and turn himself in."

The indictment is the latest reversal for the star whose diverse career starring in action, comedic and dramatic roles dazzled fans for more than 20 years.

From his success in the 1986 football film "Wildcats" to a drug lord in "New Jack City" to a sports hustler in "White Men Can't Jump" to his superhero turn in the "Blade" movies, Snipes has been a stellar fixture on the screen.

But Snipes' off-screen personal and financial difficulties have mounted in recent years. His Florida mansion was in foreclosure, his former agency sued to collect an overdue debt and an admitted former crack addict took him to court in a paternity case that the star eventually won after reams of bad publicity.

Today's indictment accuses Snipes, formerly of Windermere, Fla., Eddie Ray Kahn, of Sorrento, Fla., and Douglas P. Rosile, of Venice, Fla., with conspiracy to defraud the Internal Revenue Service and presenting a fraudulent claim for payment to the IRS.

According to the indictment released by the Justice Department, Kahn was the founder and leader of American Rights Litigators and its successor, Guiding Light of God Ministries. The businesses sold fraudulent tax schemes, authorities said in a statement.

Rosile was identified as a former accountant who continued to work after his CPA licenses were revoked in Ohio and Florida. He allegedly prepared fraudulent tax returns for American Rights Litigators, which charged its members a fee, half of which it allegedly paid to Rosile. In addition, ARL would collect 20% of any refund and half of that went to Rosile.

Snipes, Kahn and Rosile are accused of making it appear that Snipes had no liability for federal income taxes.

According to authorities, the claim is known as an "861 argument," which asserts that U.S. citizens and residents can be taxed only on income derived from certain foreign-based activities and not on income earned within the United States — a position that has been rejected by the courts.

The defendants filed two amended federal income tax returns for Snipes, claiming almost $12 million in refunds from 1996 and 1997 income taxes. The indictment also accuses Snipes of failing to file his 1999 through 2004 federal income tax returns.

"Our system of government depends on citizens paying their fair share of taxes," U.S. Atty. Paul I. Perez of the Middle District of Florida, said in a statement. "Those who intentionally and unlawfully harass the IRS through deceit, trickery and fraud undermine the collection of revenue that is vital to every aspect of the operation of our government."

According to spokesman Cole, the indictments were handed up last week. Authorities contacted Snipes' lawyers on Friday and asked that the actor surrender for arraignment today. The lawyers said that they no longer represented Snipes, Cole said.

Rosile surrendered today, but Kahn was believed to be in Panama, Cole said..

Success came quickly for Snipes. He was a presence as a street thug in Michael Jackson's 1987 "Bad" video and within two years distinguished himself as Willie Mays Hayes in the film "Major League."

The 1991 Spike Lee film "Jungle Fever" made Snipes a star. The story of a doomed interracial romance caught the nation's attention. He was featured in Ebony and landed on the covers of Jet and Newsweek. The Washington Post dubbed him "the most celebrated actor of the season."

By 1993, he was commanding $10 million a picture and a cut of 10% of the project's gross profits.

But his fame did not help him in spring 1991 when LAPD officers, responding to a stolen vehicle report, stopped Snipes and forced him to lie spread-eagle on the pavement with a gun to his head. Snipes was driving a rental car from the set of "The Waterdance," an independent movie he was filming. Someone on the set had mistakenly reported the car stolen.

In August 1993, Snipes was arrested in Hollywood after he got into an accident and paramedics found a concealed 9-millimeter semiautomatic pistol on him. He pleaded no contest.

In May 1994, a woman named Loretta Marshall filed suit against Snipes alleging that a year earlier at the Glam Slam Nightclub, Prince's old club in downtown L.A., the actor had spilled a drink on her and then told her, "Smile or I will seduce you and make you smile." He then grabbed Marshall's crotch, according to the suit. The case was settled confidentially.

Two months after that suit was filed, Snipes pleaded no contest to reckless driving in a Florida court after leading police on a 120-mph, 30-mile motorcycle chase before crashing. He was ordered to perform 80 hours of community service, fined $500 and placed on six months' probation.

In 2002, the William Morris Agency took the rare step of filing a claim against the actor, a onetime client, over a $500,000 loan before it was finally repaid. The agency has declined to comment other than to say the matter had been settled.

Actor Snipes Faces Indictment On Tax Fraud Charges (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, October 18, 2006

This is one "bad guy" role that Wesley Snipes doesn't want. In a federal indictment unsealed Tuesday, prosecutors hit Snipes, the prolific actor and movie producer, with eight counts of tax fraud.

According to the indictment, Snipes allegedly not only avoided paying millions in income taxes from 1999 through 2004, but he fraudulently tried to get an $11 million refund for taxes paid in the 1990s.

Prosecutors also filed charges against two Florida men who acted as tax advisers to Snipes, Eddie Ray Kahn and Douglas Rosile.

Snipes, who used to have a residence near Orlando, has starred in nearly 50 movies including White Men Can't Jump, New Jack City and the highly successful Blade series. But he reportedly also has run into a series of financial and legal difficulties. In this case, prosecutors allege that Kahn and Rosile convinced Snipes that under an unusual interpretation of federal law, known as the "861 argument," only income derived from foreign-based activities was taxable. A U.S. court has never supported the argument.

Kahn founded a group known as American Rights Litigators and Guiding Light of God Ministries. Although GLGM described itself as a "Christian ministry and organization established to assist men and women in their pursuit of truth and freedom as Americans," the government alleges GLGM is a for-profit operation that sells fraudulent tax schemes. According to the indictment, Snipes paid Kahn a consulting fee and paid to become a member of his American Rights Litigators group.

Rosile, an accountant whose CPA licenses to practice in Ohio and Florida were revoked, worked with Kahn to file tax returns for GLGM clients to claim refunds based on the "861 argument." According to the indictment, if the government refunded money based on the "861" theory, Kahn would take 20% of the refund and pay half to Rosile.

Despite warnings from previous tax advisers that his movie-related income was taxable and the "861" scheme was bogus, Snipes apparently sided with Kahn and Rosile in 2000 and stopped paying income taxes, the indictment says. Using the "861 argument," Snipes tried to recover $4 million in taxes paid for 1996 and $7 million for 1997. The government also claims that Snipes tried to pay some of his income taxes from 2000 to 2002 by sending $14 million in bogus checks to the U.S. Treasury.

Paul Perez, the U.S. Attorney in Tampa who filed the charges, said in a statement: "Those who intentionally and unlawfully harass the IRS through deceit, trickery and fraud undermine the collection of revenue that is vital to every aspect of the operation of our government." The Associated Press reported that Perez said Snipes has not been arrested because authorities don't know his whereabouts. Two of the charges that Snipes faces each carry a maximum sentence of five years. The remaining six charges carry up to one year each.

A spokesman for Snipes could not be reached for comment. Kahn and Rosile also could not be reached.

U.S. Indicts Actor Snipes In Tax-Avoidance Case (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Action star Wesley Snipes, who once played a Treasury agent in the film "Boiling Point," was indicted for trying to cheat the government with false tax-refund claims and failing to file personal returns for six years.

The charges stem from a well-known but illegal scheme that asserts that U.S. citizens only have to pay taxes on income earned from foreign sources. The scheme purports that wages and other income earned in the U.S. aren't taxable. The Internal Revenue Service and various courts have ruled that the argument is a misreading of the tax code.

If convicted on all eight counts handed up against him, Mr. Snipes could be sentenced to a maximum of 16 years in prison.

Along with Mr. Snipes, Eddie Ray Kahn, of Sorrento, Fla., and Douglas P. Rosile, of Venice, Fla., were also indicted for allegedly defrauding the IRS and presenting a fraudulent claim. Mr. Kahn is the alleged head of a commercial business that promoted and sold the fraudulent tax scheme to Mr. Snipes. Mr. Rosile was the accountant who prepared Mr. Snipes's tax returns.

According to the indictment, the Justice Department is charging that Messrs. Snipes, Kahn and Rosile attempted to make it appear as if Mr. Snipes had no liability for federal income taxes. As part of the scheme, the defendants allegedly prepared and filed two amended federal income-tax returns for Mr. Snipes, fraudulently claiming refunds for 1996 and 1997 income taxes previously paid, totaling almost $12 million. The indictment also alleges that Mr. Snipes didn't file his 1999 through 2004 federal income-tax returns.

DOJ_NMG_0082881

Mr. Snipes is one of the more than 200 mostly high-wealth individuals who were part of Mr. Rosile's and Mr. Kahn's attempts to "help" American taxpayers argue that the tax system itself is a hoax, and that they didn't have to pay taxes on income earned within the U.S. The Justice Department sued Mr. Rosile in 2002 and forced him to turn over a list of most of his clients.

Mr. Rosile's clients would typically pay him $100 for preparing their tax returns, and if there was a refund, 20% would go to Mr. Kahn's group, called American Rights Litigators, or its successor, Guiding Light of God Ministries. The Justice Department alleges that the groups helped defraud government coffers of at least $36 million.

Mr. Snipes couldn't be reached for comment.

Wesley Snipes Is Indicted On 8 Counts Of Tax Fraud, Accused Of Seeking $12M In False Refunds (AP)

By Phil Davis

AP, October 18, 2006

TAMPA, Fla. — Actor Wesley Snipes was indicted Tuesday on eight counts of tax fraud, accused of trying to cheat the government out of nearly $12 million in false refund claims and not filing returns for six years.

Prosecutors said Snipes fraudulently claimed refunds totaling nearly $12 million in 1996 and 1997 on income taxes already paid. The star of the "Blade" trilogy and other films including "Jungle Fever" and "White Men Can't Jump" was also charged with failure to file returns from 1999 through 2004.

According to the indictment, Snipes had his taxes prepared by accountants with a history of filing false returns to reap payments for their clients. The firm American Rights Litigators would receive 20 percent of refunds from clients, according to the indictment.

"It's a conspiracy against the IRS, basically to harass the IRS, from doing its lawful job in term of collection of taxes," U.S. Attorney Paul I. Perez said at a news conference.

If convicted of all the charges, Snipes could face 16 years in prison — five years each on two conspiracy counts and one year each on six counts of failure to file income tax returns.

Snipes, 44, who had a home in Windermere near Orlando, has not been arrested because authorities don't know where he is, Perez said. Snipes' manager and attorney did not return phone messages from The Associated Press.

"We've spoken to his former attorneys over the weekend," Perez said. "We presume that he knows, and of course after this press conference he will definitely know."

The indictment said Snipes conspired with American Rights Litigators' founder Eddie Ray Kahn and tax preparer Douglas P. Rosile Sr. to file false refund claims based on a bogus argument that only income from foreign sources was subject to taxation.

That included a claim for a $7.3 million refund for 1997, in which an amended tax return reported Snipes' adjusted income as zero.

The Justice Department sued Rosile in 2002 for allegedly filing bogus tax refund claims totaling more than $36 million on behalf of clients in 32 states. The suit is still pending.

Snipes was not named as a defendant in that case, but the lawsuit said the preparer's largest claim was an amended income tax return filed on behalf of the actor and dated April 14, 2001.

Rosile is in custody in Ocala, Perez said, and the third defendant named in the indictment, Kahn, is believed to be out of the country.

A call to an attorney who is representing Rosile in the 2002 lawsuit was not returned. It wasn't clear if he had any other legal representation. Federal court records indicate that he filed for bankruptcy on June 29.

Perez said the IRS considers the tax preparation business founded by Kahn as a "tax protest organization."

Associated Press writer Lara Jakes Jordan in Washington contributed to this report.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signs $532.8B Defense Spending Bill (AP-Y)

AP, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082882

With a long list of caveats, President Bush signed a bill Tuesday authorizing $532.8 billion in defense spending, including a 2.2 percent pay raise for members of the military.

The measure, for the 2007 fiscal year that began Oct. 1, authorizes $70 billion in supplemental funding to support the war on terror's operation costs, personnel expenses, equipment needs and other costs.

The White House released two pages of administration disagreements and reservations about provisions that lawmakers put in the bill.

Bush took issue with a provision that would require the Navy to keep its current number of 12 aircraft carriers. The administration is seeking permission to retire the USS John F. Kennedy.

The statement singled out about a dozen provisions that would require the White House to provide Congress with information on various subjects. Bush reminded lawmakers of "the president's constitutional authority to withhold information, the disclosure of which could impair foreign relations, the national security, the deliberative processes of the executive or the performance of the executive's constitutional duties."

Among other disputed areas, the statement said sections of the bill purported to make consultations with certain lawmakers a precondition to carrying out the law. The statement said it would regard that requirement "as calling for but not mandating such consultation."

Law Caps Interest On 'payday Advances' To Servicemembers (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, October 18, 2006

Consumer loans to servicemembers will be limited to 36% annual interest next year under a law President Bush signed Tuesday that is aimed at store-front lenders clustered around military bases.

The law is a response to "payday advance" stores that market short-term loans, typically charging $15 or $20 per $100 loan for periods of up to two weeks or a borrowers' next payday. Borrowers generally renew loans several times before paying them off, and the fees result in effective annual interest rates of 400% or more, a Defense Department study concluded.

Congress approved the limits before adjournment this month. Bush signed it into law as part of a larger defense bill.

Military officers pushed for the law, saying the loans saddled low-paid enlisted men and women with debts that ruined their finances, jeopardized security clearances and left them unable to deploy to Iraq or other assignments.

"What we're hoping is a lot of payday lenders will pack up and go elsewhere because they can't bilk the military for the exorbitant interest rates," says John Irons, a retired Navy captain and director of the Navy-Marine Corps Relief Society in San Diego, which counsels and aids sailors and Marines.

"This will be a great help," says Capt. Mark Patton, commanding officer of Naval Base Point Loma. "It is a great statement by Congress on the importance of the financial health of our military, especially right now when our readiness is so strained by the demands of war."

The Defense Department report said the average borrower pays $827 on a $339 loan and called the lending predatory. The 36% rate cap means lenders can charge no more than $1.38 on a $100 loan for two weeks — an amount lenders say is too low to be profitable.

"That's why the 36% rate cap means we're getting out of the military business," said Steven Schlein, spokesman for the Consumer Financial Services of America, a trade group whose members operate half the 22,000 short-term lending stores across the USA.

Darrin Andersen, president of the group, said the industry will still offer loans to civilians. "While this will only have a slight impact on our industry's bottom line, it will have a large impact on individuals in the military who will have to look elsewhere when they are in need of a short-term loan," he said.

The limit was added to the defense bill in a House-Senate conference after passing the Senate overwhelmingly. The House of Representatives did not initially approve it, but opposition melted in the face of the Pentagon report and media attention, said Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., a sponsor of the limit.

"It means that we're going to protect our servicemen and women from this kind of abuse," he said.

Michael Calhoun, president of the Center for Responsible Lending, said Congress should "extend these protections to all of America's working families."

Bush Sets Defense As Space Priority (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082883

President Bush has signed a new National Space Policy that rejects future arms-control agreements that might limit U.S. flexibility in space and asserts a right to deny access to space to anyone "hostile to U.S. interests."

The document, the first full revision of overall space policy in 10 years, emphasizes security issues, encourages private enterprise in space, and characterizes the role of U.S. space diplomacy largely in terms of persuading other nations to support U.S. policy.

"Freedom of action in space is as important to the United States as air power and sea power," the policy asserts in its introduction.

National Security Council spokesman Frederick Jones said in written comments that an update was needed to "reflect the fact that space has become an even more important component of U.S. economic, national and homeland security." The military has become increasingly dependent on satellite communication and navigation, as have providers of cellphones, personal navigation devices and even ATMs.

The administration said the policy revisions are not a prelude to introducing weapons systems into Earth orbit. "This policy is not about developing or deploying weapons in space. Period," said a senior administration official who was not authorized to speak on the record.

Nevertheless, Michael Krepon, co-founder of the Henry L. Stimson Center, a nonpartisan think tank that follows the space-weaponry issue, said the policy changes will reinforce international suspicions that the United States may seek to develop, test and deploy space weapons. The concerns are amplified, he said, by the administration's refusal to enter negotiations or even less formal discussions on the subject.

"The Clinton policy opened the door to developing space weapons, but that administration never did anything about it," Krepon said. "The Bush policy now goes further."

Theresa Hitchens, director of the nonpartisan Center for Defense Information in Washington, said that the new policy "kicks the door a little more open to a space-war fighting strategy" and has a "very unilateral tone to it."

The administration official strongly disagreed with that characterization, saying the policy encourages international diplomacy and cooperation. But he said the document also makes clear the U.S. position: that no new arms-control agreements are needed because there is no space arms race.

The official also said the administration has briefed members of Congress as well as a number of governments, including Russia, on the new policy. The public, however, has not learned much about it: The policy was released at 5 p.m. on the Friday before Columbus Day, with no public announcement.

The National Space Policy follows other administration statements that appeared to advocate greater military use of space.

In 2004, the Air Force published a Counterspace Operations Doctrine that called for a more active military posture in space and said that protecting U.S. satellites and spacecraft may require "deception, disruption, denial, degradation and destruction." Four years earlier, a congressionally chartered panel led by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld recommended developing space weapons to protect military and civilian satellites.

Because of the political sensitivities, several analysts said, the Pentagon probably will not move forward quickly with space weapons but rather will work on dual-use technology that can serve military and civilian interests. But because many space initiatives are classified, Krepon and others said, it is difficult to know what is being developed and deployed.

Some of the potential space weapons most frequently discussed are lasers that can "blind" or shut down adversary satellites and small, maneuverable satellites that could ram another satellite.

The new Bush policy calls on the defense secretary to provide "space capabilities" to support missile-warning systems as well as "multi-layered and integrated missile defenses," an apparent nod toward placing some components of the system in space.

The new document grew out of Bush's 2002 order to the National Security Council, with support from the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy, to assess the nation's military and civilian space policies. The review has already led to a major shift in emphasis at NASA, away from research and unmanned exploration to returning Americans to the moon and then sending them on to Mars.

Some sections of the 1996 Clinton policy and the Bush revision are classified. There are many similarities in the unclassified portions, and the NSC and the Defense Department emphasized that continuity. But there is a significant divergence apparent in the first two goals of each document.

Bush's top goals are to "strengthen the nation's space leadership and ensure that space capabilities are available in time to further U.S. national security, homeland security, and foreign policy objectives" and to "enable unhindered U.S. operations in and through space to defend our interests there."

Clinton's top goals were to "enhance knowledge of the Earth, the solar system and the universe through human and robotic exploration" and to "strengthen and maintain the national security of the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0082884

The Clinton policy also said that the United States would develop and operate "space control capabilities to ensure freedom of action in space" only when such steps would be "consistent with treaty obligations." The Bush policy accepts current international agreements but states: "The United States will oppose the development of new legal regimes or other restrictions that seek to prohibit or limit U.S. access to or use of space."

A number of nations have pushed for talks to ban space weapons, and the United States has long been one of a handful of nations opposed to the idea. Although it had abstained in the past when proposals to ban space weapons came up in the United Nations, last October the United States voted for the first time against a call for negotiations -- the only "no" against 160 "yes" votes.

The U.S. position flows in part from the fact that so many key weapons systems are now dependent on information and communications from orbiting satellites, analysts said. The U.S. military has developed and deployed far more space-based technology than any other nation, giving it great strategic advantages. But with the superior technology has come a perceived vulnerability to attacks on essential satellites.

The new policy was applauded by defense analyst Baker Spring of the conservative Heritage Foundation. He said that he supported the policy's rejection of international agreements or treaties, as well as its emphasis on protecting military assets and placing missile defense components in space. He also said that he liked the policy's promotion of commercial enterprises in space and its apparent recognition that private satellites will need military protection as well.

The issue of possible hostilities in space became more real last month when National Reconnaissance Office Director Donald M. Kerr told reporters that a U.S. satellite had recently been "painted," or illuminated, by a laser in China. Gen. James E. Cartwright, the top U.S. military officer in charge of operations in space, told the newsletter Inside the Pentagon last week that it remained unclear whether China had tried to disrupt the satellite.

New U.S. Space Policy Emphasizes Security (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

President Bush has signed a new National Space Policy that rejects future arms-control agreements that might limit U.S. flexibility in space and asserts a right to deny access to space to anyone "hostile to U.S. interests."

The document, the first full revision of overall space policy in 10 years, emphasizes security issues, encourages private enterprise in space, and characterizes the role of U.S. space diplomacy in terms of persuading other nations to support U.S. policy.

New Space Policy 'Sets Up' Intel Turf War (UPI)

UPI, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 17 (UPI) -- The new U.S. policy on space exploration and exploitation sets the stage for a turf battle between intelligence and the military, says one expert.

Steven Aftergood, the government transparency campaigner at the Federation of American Scientists, says the new policy, released recently by the White House, "creates overlapping and possibly conflicting responsibilities" for Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte and Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld.

Aftergood noted that the section of the policy on national security was higher up in the document than in the 1996 policy it replaced, which "perhaps reflects a higher priority" for national security concerns.

The national security section of the policy tasks the defense secretary to "establish specific intelligence requirements that can be met by tactical, operational, or national-level intelligence gathering capabilities." It also gives him responsibility for "space situational awareness," in which capacity he "shall support the space situational awareness requirements for the director of national intelligence."

For his part, Negroponte is instructed to "establish objectives, intelligence requirements, priorities and guidance for the intelligence community to ensure timely and effective collection, processing, analysis and dissemination of national intelligence." But he is also told to "support military planning and satisfy operational requirements as a major intelligence mission," and "provide intelligence collection and analysis of space-related capabilities to support space situational awareness for the U.S. government."

Neither the Pentagon nor Negroponte's office immediately responded to a request for comment.

Sealed Filings Increase At High Court (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082885

When the Supreme Court debates the constitutionality of the federal "partial birth abortion" law next month, it will have some sensitive information in its hands that no member of the public can see.

Specifically, the justices will have the full transcript of a 2004 deposition by an Oregon doctor who apparently mentioned the names of colleagues in the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists who may have performed abortions.

It was part of the file in the case of Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, but when it made its way to the Supreme Court this summer, the organization and Planned Parenthood requested that the parts of the doctor's deposition that name doctors be filed with the Court under seal.

Solicitor General Paul Clement concurred and filed a motion, and on Oct. 2, the Court said yes -- one of six cases that day in which the Court granted motions to file petitions under seal. It was, according to a database search, the largest number of unrelated cases in which the Court granted such motions in a single day.

In the Planned Parenthood case, the Court's action means an extra measure of privacy for a handful of physicians. As Daniel Edelman, a lawyer for the physician who was deposed, put it, "The last thing we'd need is for some lunatic to get names from the deposition and go and attack one of the doctors."

But in some of the other cases, the justification for secrecy is less obvious. And to some, the day's actions symbolize a little-noticed trend over the past decade toward allowing secret filings at the Supreme Court. Whereas decades ago such motions were discouraged and often denied at the Supreme Court, now they are routinely granted. No motion to file under seal has been denied since 2003. The Court itself votes on the motions without any hearing at which opposition can be heard. Typically, when the Court grants a motion to seal, a redacted version is made part of the public record.

The number of filings under seal is still tiny -- only 12 in this calendar year out of more than 7,000 petitions filed. And Court insiders assert that the spike in motions granted is a fluke, not a reflection of any change in policy. "This may just be an outlier year," says Thomas Goldstein, a partner at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld who has studied the numbers. [Editor's note: Goldstein writes a column for Legal Times.]

But the number of cases filed under seal was significantly lower in the 1990s and 1980s, and sealing files was rarely done before then, reflecting the Court's historical preference for conducting its business in public.

Stephen Shapiro, co-author of "Supreme Court Practice," says that especially with the current mix of business and intellectual property cases, as well as post-9/11 disputes, the conservative Court, under both William Rehnquist and now John Roberts Jr., may be more sympathetic than it once was to sealing Court files. "Conservative justices might believe that a seal was proper to protect trade secrets and real government secrets, bearing on national security," says Shapiro, a partner at Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw.

But Shapiro sees the trend permeating all federal courts, not just the Supreme Court, and he is concerned. "Filings under seal are attempted in cases where the seal is not necessary or proper, and the Court should be watchful to prevent abuses of this kind," Shapiro says.

At the Supreme Court level, he says, it is often a matter of convenience for lawyers on both sides of a case to leave under seal a filing or opinion that was sealed by a judge at an earlier stage.

IN THE SHADOWS

That appears to be the explanation in at least one of the motions for filing under seal granted on Oct. 2. In Cooperativa de Seguros de Vida v. FAC, a dispute over Medicare reimbursement claims, the district judge sealed his own opinion to protect the terms of a settlement that was reached between the parties.

Alan Horowitz of D.C.-based Miller & Chevalier, who wrote the petition for COSVI, says, "Why the district court ordered it sealed is not clear to me." He adds that almost everything that was sealed in the district court opinion was detailed in the public opinion of the 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Horowitz asked the high court clerk's office if he could omit the district court opinion from his petition, hoping to avoid the need to seek permission to submit it under seal. But the answer was no, so the motion to file a sealed appendix was the only option.

The petition itself is public, with the appeals court decision attached. If the Court grants review in the case, Horowitz says, he'll likely ask the district court to unseal the original opinion. "This case is not really emblematic of anything," says Horowitz. "It's just an oddball situation."

But private petitioners are not the only ones that seek to file papers under seal. The state of Maine did so in Rowe v. New Hampshire Motor Transport Association, and the motion was granted Oct. 2. At issue is whether Maine's law prohibiting the sale by mail of tobacco products to minors is pre-empted by a federal law that bars states from regulating air and land delivery services.

DOJ_NMG_0082886

United Parcel Service, one of the carriers affected by the case, requested that certain information in the record about how it tracks deliveries be kept confidential. Both parties tried to narrow the amount of text to be redacted, but some remained, according to Maine Deputy Attorney General Paul Stern.

"I sent it over to UPS, and there were only a couple of small things they wanted redacted, and we said fine," says Stern. "I didn't care. We didn't particularly want to ask for sealing."

The brief as filed with the high court contains several blackened lines of type masking sentences that appear to refer to UPS procedures. Stern adds, "You can get an excellent understanding of the case without these facts."

Other cases in which the Court allowed redacted filings on Oct. 2 include Jane Doe v. United States, a Pennsylvania case in which the petitioner sought to protect "sensitive grand jury proceedings."

SEND IN THE CLOUDS

The Court's preference for keeping its files public goes back decades. One milestone was the landmark Pentagon Papers case of 1971, in which Solicitor General Erwin Griswold asked the Court to allow it to file secret briefs and even to hear the case in camera. Over the objection of three justices in New York Times v. United States, the Court rejected the proposal for a closed oral argument, but it did permit some filings under seal.

The Court even enshrined the public interest in open court records in a 1978 case, in which it said, "It is clear that the courts of this country recognize a general right to inspect and copy public records and documents, including judicial records and documents."

That case was invoked in the 2003 litigation over the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law. The Court still granted a dozen motions to seal different parts of the massive briefing in the case, including records of Federal Election Commission investigations in which witnesses had been promised confidentiality.

Most of the time, motions to seal records are made without objection, but in a post-9/11 case, M.K.B. v. United States, media organizations sought to intervene. At both the district court and 11th Circuit levels, the case and filings were secret. It was only through an error at the appeals court clerk's office that a reporter for the Miami Daily Business Review, a sister paper to Legal Times, was able to determine what the case was about: a habeas proceeding brought by Mohamed Kamel Bellahouel, an Algerian native who had been held in federal prison in part because as a waiter, he had served meals to two of the 9/11 hijackers.

When the petition reached the Supreme Court, several media organizations -- including ALM, which publishes Legal Times -- sought to intervene to open the record. The motion was denied.

Bush Triad Visit On Tap (WXII)

WXII-TV Winston-Salem, North Carolina, October 17, 2006

President George W. Bush is visiting North Carolina for the third time in 2006 and appearing in the Piedmont-Triad for the first time in more than 10 months.

Bush on Wednesday will visit Waldo C. Falkener Elementary School in Guilford County, followed by a closed lunch with community leaders in Randleman. He'll also visit the Victory Junction Gang Camp in Randolph County, which serves children with chronic medical conditions or serious illnesses.

At the elementary school, Bush will speak about the No Child Left Behind Act.

Officials at The White House said Bush will end his visit with a private Republican National Committee dinner at a home in Greensboro.

Bush hasn't appeared in the Piedmont-Triad since December, when he visited Kernersville to talk about the economy and tax relief, among other items. He visited the Deere-Hitachi plant and spoke to about 500 employees and invited guests.

Democrats are speaking out against some of Bush's policies during the president's Wednesday visit.

Rep. Brad Miller called the No Child Left Behind Act one of Bush's "most well-known policy failures." Miller claimed the Bush administration has underfunded the initiative by $40 billion over the last four years, "leaving states with new mandates, but not enough funding."

"I'm pleased President Bush is able to squeeze a visit to a school into his fundraising visit to North Carolina," Miller said in a prepared statement. "But if President Bush really listened to parents and teachers he would know already that without funding to close achievement gaps, No Child Left Behind is just one more mandatory test. His failure to provide the promised funding for education is leaving every child behind."

In July, Bush praised service members in a speech at North Carolina's Fort Bragg. The president told a cheering crowd that U.S. troops will overcome persistent violence in Iraq.

In April, Bush defended his war strategy during a speech at a community college in Charlotte, saying Iraq is the central front in the war on terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0082887

Stay with WXII 12 News and WXII12.com for more on this story.

Bush To Visit N.C., Shotwell To Attend (REIDRVW NC)

By Jennifer Williams

The Reidsville Review (NC), October 18, 2006

Rockingham County Schools Superintendent Rodney Shotwell has plans to attend the presidential address Wednesday at Falkener Elementary in neighboring Guilford County.

"Any time you can see the president of the United States you should," Shotwell said. He said he received an invitation and accepted. Shotwell said the last president he had an opportunity to see was during his college years, when he saw Reagan.

The presidential visit will highlight the success of an at-risk school under the No Child Left Behind legislation. The No Child Left Behind Act of 2001 was one of the first bills President George W. Bush signed into law after coming into office in 2000. Shotwell said the law holds educators accountable for each student.

NCLB tests students and groups their scores by race, gender, socioeconomic status, and special needs. This has exposed some vulnerable areas of public education in Rockingham County Schools. Twelve of Rockingham County's 25 Schools, or 48 percent, met Adequate Yearly Progress during the 2002-2003 school year. Scores improved during the 2003-2004 school year with 20 of 25 schools, or 80 percent, of Rockingham County Schools meeting AYP goals. Scores dipped again in 2005 when 12 of 25, or 48 percent, made AYP. Preliminary scores for the 2005-2006 school year show that 17 of 24 schools, 70.8 percent, met AYP standards. Reading scores for all grades were released in July. High school math scores were released Oct. 5, and remaining math scores will be released early next month. Final AYP results for the county will be available next month after math scores are finalized.

Shotwell said there are positives and negatives to the NCLB legislation.

"I think it has been effective for what it's trying to do. It forces us to look at all of a school's subgroups," Shotwell said Tuesday. Shotwell and other school board members were pleased with the 2006 increases in AYP scores compared to 2005, but scores also revealed problematic trends. Historically Black students, students with disabilities, and students of low socioeconomic status have performed poorly on AYP examinations in Rockingham County. Under NCLB, if one subgroup does not meet AYP standards it could jeopardize a school meeting the standards. The amount of federal funding a school receives and how it is allocated is dependent upon AYP scores.

"We are addressing all these areas along with total school improvement and this is in great part due to the outcomes in NCLB. Under the North Carolina model we look for growth as a school in each grade level," the superintendent said.

The legislation has posed some funding problems for county schools that are already pressed financially by rising costs of operation and denied funding increases from the county. Shotwell said he would like to see a change in the funding formula under NCLB so that schools would not suffer.

There was a statewide dip in AYP scores. Civics and writing sections were added to end of grade tests and a growth formula was implemented for the first time. The new formula also caused a delay in scores being released.

Staff writer Jennifer Williams can be reached at jwilliams@reidsvillereview.com or (336) 349-4331.

Liking Math Subtracts From Scores, Study Finds (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, October 18, 2006

Washington - Kids who are turned off by math often say they don't enjoy it, they aren't good at it and they see little point in it. Who knew that could be a formula for success? The nations with the best scores have the least happy, least confident math students, says a study by the Brookings Institution's Brown Center on Education Policy.

Countries reporting higher levels of enjoyment and confidence among math students don't do as well in the subject, the study suggests. The results for the United States hover around the middle of the pack, both in terms of enjoyment and in test scores.

In essence, happiness is overrated, says study author Tom Loveless.

"We might want to focus on the math that kids are learning and just be a little less obsessed with the fact that they have to enjoy every minute of it," said Loveless, who directs the Brown center and serves on a presidential advisory panel on math.

Other countries do better than the United States because they seem to expect more from students, he said. That could also explain why high performers in other nations express less confidence and enjoyment in math. They consider their peer group to be star achievers.

Even efforts to make math relevant may be irrelevant, says the study, released Wednesday.

Nations that try to teach math in terms of daily life have the lowest test scores.

DOJ_NMG_0082888

Loveless says pleasing kids comes at the expense of mastering skills.

His findings come from the 2003 Trends in International Mathematics and Science Study, a test of fourth-graders and eighth-graders across the globe. Along with math questions, students were asked whether they enjoyed math and whether they usually did well in it.

The eighth-grade results reflected a common pattern: The 10 nations whose students enjoyed math the most all scored below average. The bottom 10 nations on the scale all excelled.

Japan, Hong Kong and the Netherlands were among those with high scores and lower enjoyment or confidence among students.

Within a given nation, the high-confidence kids did better than their peers.

Enjoying Math Not Always A Plus (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, October 18, 2006

All you need is love … unless you're doing algebra. Then you need to work it on out.

That's the take-away message from a new study with an unusual finding: The more kids like math and say they do well in it, the less likely they are to do well.

The study, being released today by the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank, finds the starkest difference among eighth-graders around the world who were asked if they enjoy math.

The 10 "happiest" nations all performed below the international average. The 10 "unhappiest" all scored above average, including Sweden, England, Japan, Taiwan, South Korea and the Netherlands.

U.S. eighth-graders fell somewhere in the middle and followed the same pattern. They were slightly unhappier in math than the average 13-year-old, but they performed a bit better than average.

The happiness factor plays a minimal role in math achievement for millions of children, says study author Tom Loveless, who calls the difference in scores "huge" between the happiest and unhappiest nations.

The data suggest simply making math relevant and enjoyable isn't enough, he says. "If we want the United States to be high-achieving and among the world's best nations, obviously we have to do something beyond that."

The findings come as educators fret about math and science skills and five weeks after the National Council of Teachers of Mathematics urged elementary and middle schools to take a more back-to-basics approach.

Such changes have been long sought by traditionalists but criticized by those who say kids must learn creative problem-solving as well as nuts-and-bolts arithmetic, algebra and calculus.

Frank Wang, former chairman of Saxon, an Oklahoma publisher of popular back-to-basics math textbooks, says you can have both.

"You can have fulfillment. You can have satisfaction and esteem building. But it can't be at the price of the fundamentals."

Wang, who is starting an Internet company to bring advanced math to urban students, says mastery takes years of drill and practice. "Whichever way you cut it, there's a certain amount of tedium to the math."

It's odd that many parents frown upon academic drills, but not athletic drills, he says. "No one questions a football coach when he says we have to have two-a-day practices in 100-degree heat. People don't question it because they feel it's a necessary price to win."

The Brookings study, based on the 2003 Trends in International Mathematics and Science Study, a sample of math and science achievement by fourth- and eighth-graders worldwide, found U.S. fourth-graders vary from the global pattern in that they liked math just a bit more than most and performed a bit better.

In general, though, even kids' own conceptions of how well they do in math are a bad indicator of whether their country scores well.

Fourth- and eighth-graders in nations where more kids said, "I usually do well" in math tended to have lower scores. The less likely a kid was to say he or she usually did well, the higher the nation's scores.

What's perhaps most startling: Kids in Singapore, a math powerhouse, didn't regard themselves nearly as highly as those in the USA: 39% of U.S. students said they "usually do well" in math. Only 18% in Singapore said the same.

But the Singapore kids knew much more math than the U.S. kids. In fact, the least confident Singapore students scored higher than the most confident in the USA.

A former sixth-grade teacher, Loveless is renowned for taking a contrarian point of view and backing it up with data.

In 2003, he made headlines by mining recent research and concluding that most U.S. kids do less than one hour a day of homework. At the same time, the media were writing about how homework was overtaking many families' lives.

DOJ_NMG_0082889

For Math Students, Self-Esteem Might Not Equal High Scores (WP)

By Jay Mathews

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

U.S. Lags Behind Countries That Don't Emphasize Self-Regard

It is difficult to get through a day in an American school without hearing maxims such as these: "To succeed, you must believe in yourself," and "To teach, you must relate the subject to the lives of students."

But the Brookings Institution is reporting today that countries such as the United States that embrace self-esteem, joy and real-world relevance in learning mathematics are lagging behind others that don't promote all that self-regard.

Consider Korea and Japan.

According to the Washington think tank's annual Brown Center report on education, 6 percent of Korean eighth-graders surveyed expressed confidence in their math skills, compared with 39 percent of U.S. eighth-graders. But a respected international math assessment showed Koreans scoring far ahead of their peers in the United States, raising questions about the importance of self-esteem.

In Japan, the report found, 14 percent of math teachers surveyed said they aim to connect lessons to students' lives, compared with 66 percent of U.S. math teachers. Yet the U.S. scores in eighth-grade math trail those of the Japanese, raising similar questions about the importance of practical relevance.

Tom Loveless, the report's author, said that the findings do not mean that student happiness causes low achievement. But he wrote that his analysis of the international math assessment, the 2003 Trends in International Mathematics and Science Study, shows that U.S. schools should not be too quick to assume that happiness is what matters in the classroom.

"It is interesting that people grasp this notion in other areas of self-improvement -- eating healthy foods, getting exercise, saving for retirement -- but when it comes to education, for some reason, the limitations of happiness are forgotten," Loveless wrote.

Several countries in Asia and some in Europe tend to beat the United States in math scores, even though their students show less satisfaction with performance and less love of math, and even though the lessons they receive are less "relevant," the report found.

The report is likely to stoke a debate over teaching math and other subjects that has divided the United States for at least a century. Progressives say that what students choose to study and how they feel about education should matter as much, or more, in the classroom than test results; traditionalists say that gain requires some pain and that tests matter.

Alfie Kohn, a progressive author and lecturer, questioned the findings. "Let me get this straight," Kohn said. "Kids who get higher scores on standardized tests are unhappy and self-doubting, so that means we should question the importance of happiness and self-confidence, rather than the importance of these tests?"

Gerald W. Bracey, an educational psychologist and columnist for the education journal Phi Delta Kappan, said the report overlooked countervailing trends in Japan, Singapore and other countries that do better than the United States on eighth-grade math tests. Officials in those countries say their education systems are not yielding graduates who have the same level of creativity as American graduates. Some Asian nations have begun to copy aspects of U.S. education, including the emphasis on letting students search for answers rather than memorize them.

The Brookings report notes that in most countries, including Korea and the United States, students who like math and think they are good at it have higher math scores than those who don't. Perspective matters, Loveless wrote: Japanese students who would be considered good at the subject if they were in the United States think that they are not so good when compared with their peers in Japan.

The international test results from 2003 and related surveys from 46 countries show that the world's most confident eighth-grade math students are found in the Middle East, Africa and the United States. Of the 10 countries with the highest levels of student confidence, only Israel and the United States scored higher than average on the international test, and their scores were far below those of the much less confident students in Japan, Korea, Hong Kong and Taiwan.

The surveys asked teachers in each country whether they relate math lessons to daily life at least half of the time. In Chile, 87 percent of teachers answered affirmatively, the highest mark on the relevance scale. Japan was at the bottom of the list.

"The more relevant the math, the lower-scoring the nation," Loveless wrote.

Chester E. Finn Jr., president of the D.C.-based Thomas B. Fordham Foundation, said the report shows that schools need not be fun to be effective. "Schools should work on academics, not feelings," Finn said. "True self-esteem, self-confidence and happiness are born of true achievement."

Reid Faces FEC Complaint (HILL)

DOJ_NMG_0082890

By Elana Schor

The Hill, October 18, 2006

Conservative group Citizens United yesterday announced plans to file a complaint with the Federal Election Commission (FEC) about Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) use of campaign funds to contribute to the Christmas fund in his condominium.

Reid, taking heat for his failure to report on annual financial disclosures that he had transferred ownership of land in suburban Las Vegas to a limited liability corporation, said Monday he would reimburse his campaign committee for $3,300 in annual donations to the Ritz-Carlton Christmas fund to stave off any allegations of ethical impropriety.

Citizens United President David Bossie, not satisfied by this, said he would dispute the issue with the FEC.

"Senator Reid knows better than to use political contributions for personal services," Bossie said in a statement. He made waves in conservative circles for his recent call that Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) resign in the wake of the former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) congressional page scandal.

One Democratic leadership aide, firing back at GOP attempts to impugn Reid's record, pointed to a 1992 FEC complaint filed against Bossie by former President George H.W. Bush. That complaint stemmed from a Citizens United ad asking voters to call a phone number that played fake conversations between former President Clinton and alleged mistress Gennifer Flowers.

Reid's office referred requests for comment to Reid's Monday statement on his reimbursement.

Legal Fees Are Drain On Lewis' War Chest (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands), the House Appropriations Committee chairman whose ties to lobbyists have come under scrutiny, has spent more than $750,000 from his campaign fund for defense lawyers, according to his latest spending report.

Federal investigators are examining Lewis' association with lobbyists who have secured millions of dollars in congressional earmarks for their clients. Lobbyists and their clients have contributed heavily to Lewis' political war chests, records show.

Lewis has denied any wrongdoing. But the investigation is taking a toll on his campaign treasury.

Legal fees were his single biggest expense for the most recent period: More than $550,000 was paid to the law firm Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher between July 1 and Sept. 30.

And he paid the firm a $200,000 retainer in June.

"Congressman Lewis has availed himself of excellent legal representation so that this matter may be resolved expeditiously while he focuses his efforts on doing the work of the people of the 41st District of California," his spokeswoman, Barbara J. Comstock, said.

"We are confident that Congressman Lewis has honorably served his constituents and that he will be fully exonerated once this investigation is completed," Comstock said, adding that Lewis had cleared the use of campaign funds to pay legal fees with the House Ethics Committee.

His lead lawyers are Robert Bonner, who once headed the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles as well as U.S. Customs and Border Protection, and Joseph Warin, a onetime federal prosecutor.

In a twist, U.S. Atty. Debra Wong Yang of Los Angeles, whose office has been investigating Lewis, announced Tuesday that she was resigning her federal job to join Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher. She could not be reached for comment, but a spokeswoman for the law firm said Yang would have "no involvement whatsoever" with Lewis.

Even with the legal fees, Lewis — whose challenger is so little-known and -funded that the congressman hasn't hired a campaign manager or opened a campaign office — entered the home stretch of the campaign with more than $1 million cash on hand, according to his report.

Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a watchdog group that posted Lewis' legal fees on its website, said some of the congressman's donors "work at some of the most prolific lobby shops specializing in federal earmarks."

Earmarking is the largely secret process that committee chairs and other powerful members of the House and Senate use to insert spending directives into pending legislation without going through the normal budget review process.

The use of earmarks has soared in recent years.

Lewis isn't the only member of Congress who is spending campaign funds for legal fees.

Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Roseville), whose ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff have become an issue in his reelection bid, used more than $38,000 from his campaign funds to pay an attorney to deal with the Justice Department on his behalf.

DOJ_NMG_0082891

Doolittle's office said in a statement that the attorney, David Barger, contacted the agency to express "the congressman's willingness to be helpful and satisfy the Justice Department that the congressman had done nothing wrong."

Textile Makers Tap Political Opportunity (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

As lawmakers hit the home stretch of tight races, textile makers are leveraging voters' economic anxieties to win industry protections and derail free-trade initiatives.

Before Congress left Washington for final campaigning, anxious lawmakers shelved several items that the Bush administration had pushed as part of its trade agenda, but which the textile industry opposed. Now the question for the White House is how to get those efforts back on track -- especially if Democrats, who are traditionally less friendly to free trade, take control of one or both houses of Congress in November's voting.

The textile industry's maneuvering shows how Republican vulnerabilities in midterm elections have created opportunities for some special-interest groups.

Economic unease among voters -- fueled by foreign competition, especially from China, and the loss of U.S. manufacturing jobs -- figures in nearly a dozen close House races in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana and Iowa. Similar forces are roiling important Senate races, especially those for Republican-held seats in Pennsylvania, Missouri and Ohio.

Democrats must pick up six seats to win control of the Senate and 15 for a majority in the House. Amid such thin margins and with economic issues prominent in voters' minds, textile-industry officials and their congressional allies have seized the opportunity to push their own agenda.

"We look for our strategic spots," says Augustine Tantillo, executive director of the American Manufacturing Trade Action Coalition, a textile trade group.

So when Bill Thomas, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, introduced a bill Sept. 21 that would give trade preferences to Africa and Haiti, lobbyists for Amtac and the National Council of Textile Organizations, another textile group, swung into action. They were especially worried about provisions in the bill that would allow Haiti to use more foreign-made fabric, such as cheap cloth from China, to make clothes, while still qualifying for duty-free access to the U.S. market.

The groups appealed to Rep. Robin Hayes, a North Carolina Republican, for help. A schoolteacher and former textile worker is running on the Democratic ticket in a closely watched race against Mr. Hayes, who agreed to lead the opposition against the Haiti bill. Mr. Hayes spoke to party leaders, then wrote a letter to Speaker Dennis Hastert arguing that the legislation could expose U.S. workers to "devastating" new competition.

The day before the Sept. 26 vote, lobbyists for the two textile groups took Mr. Hayes's letter and headed to Capitol Hill to rally support among other textile-district lawmakers. Ultimately, 16 Southern Republicans signed on, including Mr. Hayes's North Carolina colleague, Rep. Charles Taylor.

Mr. Taylor has come under criticism from constituents for allegedly failing to record his vote during the 2005 House debate on Mr. Bush's signature free-trade initiative: the Central American Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Taylor said that his voting card malfunctioned and that he should have been listed in opposition. But his Democratic challenger has seized on the mix-up during the campaign.

Mr. Hayes also has come under scrutiny for his vote on Cafta. The congressman initially voted against the pact, but switched under pressure from Speaker Hastert.

Cafta squeaked through the House by two votes, including one cast by Mr. Hayes. So when he sent Republican leaders the letter opposing the Haiti bill, they pulled the measure from the floor, congressional aides and lobbyists said.

Hayes spokeswoman Carolyn Hern said the congressman viewed this as an important chance to help a local industry: "You have to capitalize on every opportunity you get."

Textile groups also tapped nervous Republicans to fend off competition from Vietnam. The fight began in May, when the White House backed a plan for the Southeast Asian nation to join the World Trade Organization, the body that oversees the global trading system.

Led by the National Council of Textile Organizations, industry officials raised concerns on Capitol Hill about the potential threat posed by Vietnam. Vietnamese textile imports are tightly controlled, but any import limits would be removed once the country joins the WTO, sparking fears among U.S. producers of a surge in Vietnamese textile imports.

The industry made two important Republican allies in the fight: Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina and Sen. Lindsey Graham, of South Carolina. Neither is up for re-election this year. But Ms. Dole is leader of her party's bid to retain control of the Senate, and both she and Sen. Graham are mindful of the importance of the Vietnam issue to the textile industry in their states.

DOJ_NMG_0082892

The pair pledged to block legislation needed to clear the way for Vietnam to join the WTO, until the Bush administration addressed industry concerns. Tensions heated up after Labor Day, when the White House began pressing for action before Mr. Bush's trip to Hanoi in November. Bush aides held negotiations with Sens. Graham and Dole, along with industry officials, in mid-September, in a bid to end the face-off.

U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez ultimately committed to "systematically monitor" Vietnam imports and initiate enforcement actions if required. Specifically, the government could initiate antidumping duties on imported goods found to have been shipped to the U.S. at below-market prices and to have caused injury to the domestic industry. The U.S. and other countries have moved to check Chinese textile imports following the end of a global textile quota system.

Republican leaders now hope to vote on the Vietnam legislation in a lame-duck congressional session before Mr. Bush departs for Hanoi.

Laura Jones, executive director of the U.S. Association of Importers of Textiles and Apparel, a group representing J.C. Penney Co. and other large retailers, has decried what she describes as the "secret deal" between the industry and the administration.

"This is much bigger than Vietnam," she said, adding that the administration's eagerness to bargain will encourage only more political gamesmanship. "Anyone can be held hostage," she said.

Textile makers and lawmakers agree the administration commitment has wider implications -- but for different reasons.

"In South Carolina and North Carolina, this is just a huge deal," said Greg Gross, Sen. Dole's chief of staff. He suggested she had an eye on the larger significance of the case. "The textile issue resonates more broadly, as a sign of problems occurring in [other] parts of the country," Mr. Gross said.

OTHER NEWS:

Wholesale Prices Fell Last Month (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Wholesale prices fell in September at the fastest pace in more than three years as energy costs plunged, the government said Tuesday in a report that offered some assurances that inflation is easing.

The producer price index, which measures prices paid to factories, farmers and other producers, fell 1.3% in September. That was the first drop since February and the biggest decline since April 2003, the Labor Department said.

The falloff in September was led by a dramatic drop in energy costs. Gasoline prices fell a record 22.2% last month, while costs for heating oil and natural gas also declined.

Excluding food and energy costs, which are often volatile, wholesale prices rose 0.6% in September, the biggest increase since January 2005. The gain was largely attributed to a sharp increase in prices for cars and trucks as automakers were cutting sales incentives, which are factored into vehicle prices at the wholesale level. Such a gain is unlikely to be repeated, says William Hummer, chief economist at Wayne Hummer Investments.

“I don't think we have to worry about the automotive industry being a source of inflation,” he says. “It's a blip.”

Investors reacted negatively. The Dow Jones industrial average fell 30.58 points to 11,950.02.

The inflation numbers came out a week before Federal Reserve policymakers are scheduled to discuss interest rates. Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues are expected to leave their target for short-term interest rates, which influence borrowing costs across the economy, at 5.25% at the conclusion of their two-day meeting Oct. 25.

With the economy slowing and inflation showing signs of moderating, the Fed will be sitting on the sidelines for some time, predicts Keitaro Matsuda, senior economist at Union Bank of California.

“The Fed can keep rates stable and watch what is happening,” says Matsuda, who expects the Fed's next move will be a cut in the second half of 2007.

Data on inflation at the consumer level will be released today. In other economic news Tuesday, the Fed said industrial production fell 0.6% in September as a drop in output at factories and utilities more than offset a rise in production at mines. The drop was the steepest in a year.

Wholesale Prices Fall, But Some Signs Of Inflation Persist (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082893

A sharp drop in the price of gasoline helped push wholesale prices down in September at the fastest pace in three years, the Labor Department reported yesterday.

The Producer Price Index, a measure of what businesses charge one another for finished goods, fell 1.3 percent in September. It has risen in all but two month so far this year.

That bit of good news in the government report masked some unexpected signs of higher inflation. When the volatile prices of energy and food are omitted, the core index of producer prices — an inflation measure watched by economists and the Federal Reserve — increased more than expected in September, pushed up mainly by higher automobile prices.

The 0.6 percent rise in the core index, which was the largest month-to-month jump in nearly two years, helped sour what was shaping up to be a record-setting day yesterday on Wall Street. On Monday, the Dow Jones industrial average flirted with 12,000. But yesterday, stocks fell as the mixed report on producer prices overshadowed strong corporate profits from Merrill Lynch, Johnson & Johnson and others. [Page C12.]

The bond market, however, had the opposite reaction. Bond prices rose yesterday while yields fell, a sign that traders did not think the rise in core producer prices would be a concern in the months ahead.

Wall Street had not expected the Labor Department report to show such elevated core prices. Economists had forecast a 0.2 percent increase in the core index for September. By contrast, the overall index, including food and energy, fell 1.3 percent last month, more than in any month since mid-2003.

Despite that decline, the core-index figures raised a question of whether inflation has started to moderate, as some other statistics had suggested. It may also dampen expectations that the Fed will lower interest rates any time soon.

"This is a warning for economic forecasters not too get too sanguine," said Gregory L. Miller, chief economist of SunTrust Banks. "Sometimes we get these indicators that remind us we're not in control."

On Wednesday, the Labor Department will release another barometer of inflation, the Consumer Price Index. Economists expect September's data will show a 0.2 percent rise in the core rate, according to a survey by Bloomberg News. That would mean that inflation is running well above a level that Fed members have said they consider healthy.

In the last two months, the Fed has stopped tightening monetary policy and has held its benchmark short-term federal funds rate at 5.25 percent. With the economy slowing, many economists and investors have been betting that the Fed may cut rates in the foreseeable future.

A fresh sign that the economy is cooling came yesterday, when the Commerce Department reported that industrial production unexpectedly fell 0.6 percent in September.

Still, members of the Federal Reserve's policy-setting Open Markets Committee, including the Fed's chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, have said they remain concerned about rising prices. And minutes from their Sept. 20 meeting, released last week, show that uncertainty over inflation was a subject of much discussion at the Fed.

Economists noted that the September jump in the core index of producer prices was largely a result of rising auto prices and was probably not a major concern. Reversing a recent downward trend, auto prices rose in September at the fastest rate in 15 years. That added more volatility to the index, whose fits and starts from month to month can make reading the broader trend difficult.

"Once you sort through the noise, there's very little inflation," said Joshua Shapiro, chief United States economist with MFR. "Just as last month's numbers didn't tell you we're having significant deflation at the core producer level, this month's number doesn't tell you the opposite."

Data Revive Fears Of US Hard Landing (FT)

By Jamie Chisholm In London

Financial Times, October 18, 2006

Fears that the US economy may yet experience a hard landing were revived on Tuesday after a report showed industrial production in September fell by much more than expected.

Stocks tumbled after traders digested the news that output in the manufacturing, mining and utilities sector contracted by 0.6 per cent against forecasts for a decline of 0.1 per cent.

"One soft month does not make a trend – it could be a seasonal fluke – but this is a surprise," said Ian Shepherdson at High -Frequency Economics.

The Federal Reserve said utility company output fell 4.4 per cent, a drop that partly reflected reduced demand for air conditioners. Manufacturing output fell 0.3 per cent, while mining expanded by 0.7 per cent.

However, with the industrial sector accounting for only about 15 per cent of US GDP, and the monthly numbers considered erratic, some commentators were more sanguine.

DOJ_NMG_0082894

John Silvia of Wachovia said that while industrial production had risen by 3.6 per cent in the past three months, compared to a gain of 5.2 per cent on a year-on-year: “There is very little evidence to support talk of recession but our case for moderation remains.”

Nevertheless, treasury yields fell as Wall Street calculated that the disappointing data increased the likelihood of the Fed delivering a cut in interest rates.

Bonds also received a boost from a report that showed producer prices fell by 1.3 per cent in September, the biggest decline in more than three years as gasoline prices dropped sharply.

This was a far greater fall than forecast but optimism was tempered by the news that factory gate inflation, which excludes energy and food prices, recorded an above forecast increase of 0.6 per cent.

Output, Pricing Data Indicate A Cooling Economy (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

A drop in the nation's factory output last month and lower wholesale prices suggest a cooling U.S. economy in which inflationary pressures are easing, a combination that could keep the Federal Reserve from changing interest rates anytime soon.

Output at the nation's factories, mines and utilities fell 0.6% in September after a flat performance in August, the Federal Reserve reported. The decline was particularly sharp at utilities, which produced less power than usual because of mild weather. Many manufacturing industries also ramped down production because of weaker demand for cars and houses.

The Labor Department, meanwhile, said a big drop in oil prices pushed wholesale prices down 1.3% in September, the first time producers of food, energy and materials have seen prices fall since February. Prices excluding food and energy -- so-called core producer prices -- rose 0.6% in September after falling the two previous months, largely because of volatility in the auto sector as summer incentives expired. Nonetheless, core prices fell at an annual rate of 0.3% in the third quarter after rising in the previous two quarters at 2.3% and 3.9% rates, respectively.

The two reports point to relief on the inflation front. That is the outcome Fed policy makers hoped to achieve when they stopped their two-year campaign of interest-rate increases in August, and many economists say policy makers will leave the federal-funds rate at 5.25% for the rest of the year.

"It would be absurd to think the Fed would tighten monetary policy after a number such as [this]" on industrial production, said Roger Kubarych, senior economic adviser for HVB America. "Unless there is a quick turnaround in the next couple months, it is more likely than before that the first easing move will come in early 2007," he said.

On Monday, San Francisco Fed President Janet Yellen said it makes sense to keep rates steady "for a time" as the impact from past rate increases fully sinks in.

Economists had expected an oil-induced decline in producer prices last month, and many expect the Labor Department today to report that consumer prices also fell last month. A report on new-home construction today may also provide a telling indication of the economy's strength.

With the nation's housing-market slumping, home builders have scaled back construction to reduce excess inventory. Auto makers are in a similar situation, cutting production schedules and reducing their work forces. The struggles in both sectors contributed to the weaker reading on industrial production last month.

"Housing and motor-vehicle activity is clearly declining and these industries will have very poor fourth-quarter performances," said Daniel Meckstroth, chief economist at the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI. He said weaker demand for cars, houses and other big-ticket items, coupled with excessive inventory levels, is "a recipe for a period of slow industrial growth."

Separately, the National Association of Home Builders said its index of home-builder sentiment rose slightly to 31 in October from 30 in September. Readings on current conditions remained bleak, but assessments of future sales conditions improved somewhat.

NAHB President David Pressly, a home builder in Statesville, N.C., said that more than 75% of the association's builders are offering "substantial" sales incentives to limit cancellations but said conditions may soon improve. "The market correction appears to be approaching the bottom in terms of sales volume, and we expect the supply-demand balance to improve considerably before long," he said.

Dow Industrials Retreat In Their 12000 Quest (WSJ)

By Serena Ng

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

After edging toward a new milestone early in the week, the Dow Jones Industrial Average pulled back as investors took pause and grappled with mixed inflation news.

DOJ_NMG_0082895

The Dow, which closed Monday less than 20 points from the 12000 mark, fell more than 90 points early yesterday, then recouped some of the losses in the afternoon. It ended down 30.58 points, or 0.26%, at 11950.02 -- still up 11.5% this year.

The Labor Department said its producer-price index, which tracks wholesale-goods prices, declined 1.3% in September, more than economists had estimated. But higher car prices caused the "core" price index, which excludes volatile food and energy items, to rise 0.6%, more than expected. "The numbers were neither good nor bad, but they left the feeling that inflation is still an issue," said Jim Paulsen, chief investment officer at Wells Capital Management.

The market will get another reading on inflation today: the consumer-price index. It could behave in a similar fashion, with the headline being pushed down by lower energy prices and higher prices showing up elsewhere.

Treasury bonds rallied early in the day, then gave up most of the gains when stocks rebounded.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.37%, or five points, to 1364.05 and is up 9.3% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index fell 0.8%, or 18.89 points, to 2344.95.

"Stocks have had a very strong run and were probably a little overbought" heading into Tuesday, said Brian Reynolds, chief market strategist at M.S. Howells. "Inflation is not a problem fundamentally, but psychologically, it's caused some huge whipsaws in the mind-sets of stock traders."

Shares of Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings and Chicago Board of Trade parent CBOT Holdings jumped 2.6% and 13%, respectively, after the exchanges said they would merge.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell; bonds rose. The 10-year note gained 3/32, or 93.8 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.774%.

The dollar weakened, to 118.86 yen from 119.12 yen. The euro rose against it to $1.2548 from $1.2532.

Elder Bush Calls Economy Strong But Consumers Unsure (DMN)

By Karen Robinson-jacobs

The Dallas Morning News, October 18, 2006

Former President George Bush said Tuesday that although he believes the U.S. economy is strong, he's worried that the average citizen might not be getting that message.

Speaking at a restaurant industry conference in Dallas, Mr. Bush pointed to third-quarter earnings gains, robust growth in the gross domestic product and "unemployment that has fallen to good levels."

"The unmistakable picture that those statistics mean to me is that the economy is strong," the 41st president told attendees of the Multi-Unit Foodservice Operators conference, who gave him a standing ovation when he entered the room.

"There is a concerted effort to make it appear that the economy is bad," said Mr. Bush, the father of President George W. Bush.

The economy is a key concern to the restaurant industry, especially the casual-dining segment, which includes Dallas-based Brinker International Inc. and Carlson Restaurants Worldwide, which owns the T.G.I. Friday's brand.

That segment, more so than the fast-food sector, has suffered as consumers cut back due to higher energy costs and rising interest rates.

The former president, a Republican who lost his bid for re-election in 1992 to Democrat Bill Clinton, was mindful of the impact of economic perceptions .

"The economy had gotten a lot better," he said of the period during his final campaign. "I wasn't a good enough communicator.

"The perception of the economy is what controls the election," he said. "The economy will ultimately determine the outcome of the election."

Mr. Bush joked that for eight years after leaving office, he avoided publicly criticizing the next presidential administration.

"I've obviously extended that same courtesy to the current president," he said.

Although Mr. Bush's speech touched briefly on food themes – mostly to joke about his wife cooking fish – it was his comments about a partnership with Mr. Clinton that seemed to connect with many audience members.

Speaking of the work the two are doing to raise money for victims of floods, hurricanes and other natural disasters, Mr. Bush compared Mr. Clinton's energy level to that of the Energizer bunny, adding, "It's been a joy working with him."

Talk Of Raising Gas Tax Is Just That (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082896

There might be a simple way to trim U.S. oil imports, reduce greenhouse-gas emissions, encourage alternatives to petroleum and ease world energy shortages.

The method: raising taxes on gasoline or crude oil. Economists and policy experts across the political spectrum think it's a good idea. And with gasoline prices falling, now might be the perfect time to do it without eliciting cries of pain from U.S. drivers who have become somewhat accustomed to high fuel prices.

But on the long road to a new energy policy, the idea of a higher gasoline or crude-oil tax is just another bit of roadkill.

Because of the thorny politics of raising taxes, the 18.4-cent-per-gallon federal gas levy hasn't changed since Oct. 1, 1993. And few policy experts expect a higher tax soon.

"We know the broad contours of some things that have to happen," said Douglas Holtz-Eakin, former director of the Congressional Budget Office who is now at the Council on Foreign Relations. "You have to price oil on a permanent basis to provide incentives to shift away from it. It's the key issue -- and the hardest one to make progress on."

Leon E. Panetta, a former congressman and President Bill Clinton's first budget director, sees things the same way.

"I don't think there's any question that as a matter of policy it makes a lot of sense to move in that direction," he said. "But politically it's a very high hurdle to get over."

Panetta knows from experience. When Clinton took office, Vice President Al Gore argued for a big gas-tax increase to promote conservation, and many administration members agreed, Panetta recalled. But, he said, "there were also those like Treasury Secretary [Lloyd] Bentsen who said, 'Are you out of your mind?' "

By the time Congress was done, what started out as a 50-cent-a-gallon proposal ended up as a 4.3-cent-a-gallon increase. Since then, just to keep up with inflation, the tax would have had to rise 6 cents, but it hasn't budged.

Many economists support oil taxes because otherwise the prices paid by consumers do not include costs -- such as pollution -- that society pays separately. Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) has estimated that the U.S. military cost of protecting Middle East oil supplies runs around $50 billion a year.

Such hidden costs were called "externalities" by the British economist Arthur Pigou. N. Gregory Mankiw, an economics professor at Harvard University and former chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, has created his own Pigou Club, which he describes as "an elite group of economists and pundits with the good sense to have publicly advocated higher Pigovian taxes, such as gasoline taxes or carbon taxes." But the club exists only on his Web site.

One member is Kenneth S. Rogoff, a Harvard economics professor and former chief economist of the International Monetary Fund. "A sharp hike in energy taxes on gasoline and other fossil fuels would not only help improve the government's balance sheet, but it would also be a way to start addressing global warming," Rogoff wrote before the IMF and World Bank meetings in Singapore last month. "What better way for new U.S. Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson, a card-carrying environmentalist, to make a dramatic entrance onto the world policy stage?"

But for now, Paulson has left a gasoline tax increase waiting in the wings.

One illustration of political gridlock on the issue is a new Council on Foreign Relations task force report on how U.S. dependence on oil imports undermines U.S. foreign policy. The group agreed that there is a big problem but couldn't agree on how to curb gasoline consumption.

The report listed three approaches: raising gasoline taxes; setting tougher automobile fuel-economy standards; and imposing a nationwide ceiling on gasoline consumption, with people allowed to buy and sell rights to use more than their annual allotments.

"No strategy will be effective without higher prices for transportation fuels or regulatory incentives to use more-efficient vehicles," the report said. But the task force didn't say which of the three it favored and it didn't say how much a tax might be.

Holtz-Eakin, a member of the group, said new efficiency standards would have a delayed effect on consumption because it takes time for auto companies to retool and for people to buy new cars. A higher gasoline tax would have an immediate as well as a long-term effect.

But other members of the group, including Martin S. Feldstein, a Harvard economics professor who was chairman of President Ronald Reagan's Council of Economic Advisers, and Charles J. DiBona, former president of the American Petroleum Institute, vigorously oppose gasoline taxes.

"It was not possible to get a consensus," said James R. Schlesinger, a co-chairman of the task force.

Schlesinger, who favors a tax on imported oil, said, "I still have some black and blue marks from 30 years ago," when he was energy secretary for President Jimmy Carter, who proposed a 50-cent increase in federal gasoline taxes. "We were laughed out of the Senate," Schlesinger recalled.

A one-cent federal gas tax was first imposed in 1932. An increase to 9 cents a gallon from 4 cents a gallon was approved by Reagan on Jan. 6, 1983. On Nov. 5, 1990, a reluctant President George H. W. Bush signed a deficit-reduction compromise with the Democratic-controlled Congress that increased the federal gas tax by 5 cents. The budget bill of 1993, signed by Clinton, increased the tax to its current level.

DOJ_NMG_0082897

The politics of a gasoline tax involve two key issues: what to do with the money and how to address the fairness of the tax.

Most of the tax goes to a trust fund used to build highways, which advocacy groups say undermines conservation goals by encouraging more driving. Energy-policy experts say any extra tax money could be used to promote alternative energy or energy-efficiency programs. Because a gasoline tax, like a sales tax, disproportionately hurts low-income people, who pay a larger percentage of their earnings for basics such as fuel, other experts argue that the additional money should be used to give offsetting tax breaks to low-income families.

This year, some new proposals have emerged for limiting gasoline consumption. Lugar has proposed that the government set a $45-a-barrel price floor for crude oil, partly to encourage investment in alternatives such as ethanol.

Feldstein favors giving every adult credits on a debit card but capping the overall consumption level. People could sell spare credits or buy them as needed. Oil companies would be clearinghouses for the program.

Mankiw responded online: "Do we need to create a new administrative bureaucracy because politicians are afraid to use the word 'tax'? I hope not."

Curing The World's Oil Addiction (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

THE FIRST STEP TOWARD CURING an addiction is to admit its existence. So it was encouraging when President Bush admitted in January that "America is addicted to oil." But America hasn't been good about going to recovery meetings — which makes it harder for the U.S. to get the world's other oil addicts to go too.

For China, India, Japan and every other industrial nation, a steady supply of oil is essential to economic growth. And as competition for oil increases, so does the temptation to make it the focus of foreign policy. Bush has warned against the hazards of this approach, and U.S. history — especially in the Middle East — is a catalog of its dangers. But he'd be more convincing, to Americans and other world leaders, if his policy more closely matched his rhetoric.

Now other nations are beginning to do as the U.S. does, not as it says. China has an $8-billion investment in Sudan's oil sector, for example, which helps explain why it turns a blind eye while the thugs who run Sudan ravage Darfur. The argument used to be that as China's economy became more integrated with the world's, it would become a more responsible player in world affairs. This was half right. For the most part, ideology has given way to pragmatism in Chinese foreign policy. Beijing tries to avoid conflict with its biggest trading partner, the United States.

But this same pragmatism also leads China to pursue other policy goals at odds with the U.S. China professes to be genuinely worried about nuclear proliferation, for instance, yet U.S. diplomats have made no headway in persuading Beijing to back U.N. sanctions against Tehran. Perhaps not coincidentally, China imports 11.5% of its oil from Iran and is considering investing at least $70 billion to get more.

And it's not just China competing for oil. Energy-poor Japan is highly dependent on Middle East oil and so was cool toward Israel for decades (relations are better now, but still low-key). India, meanwhile, with 17% of the world's population and just 0.8% of known oil and gas reserves, is also racing to secure supplies. It hosted Venezuelan President (and Bush nemesis) Hugo Chavez last year and signed an oil deal with Venezuela. South Korea gets a third of its oil from Saudi Arabia and is trying to hedge its bets by investing in fields from Venezuela to Vietnam.

The rise of Asian powers — and their pursuit of policies designed to secure a steady supply of oil — is a geopolitical watershed, albeit a predictable one. Even if the U.S. were to reduce its oil dependency, its ability to act multilaterally could be constrained by the energy arrangements of other nations.

For these and other reasons, the development of alternative energy technologies that can reduce demand at home and be exported abroad is both an economic necessity and a national security priority. It's far too important to be left to the environmentalists — or the states, the lobbyists (for nuclear power or ethanol) or even to philanthropists such as Richard Branson. In our globalized economies, lasting peace is unlikely without energy security.

An Oil Habit America Cannot Break (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

"Americans can always be counted on to do the right thing . . . after they have exhausted all other possibilities."

-- widely attributed to

Winston Churchill

On energy, we're disproving even this cynical axiom. Our main energy problem is our huge dependence on imported oil.

DOJ_NMG_0082898

For years, some remedies have been obvious: Tax oil heavily to spur Americans to buy more fuel-efficient vehicles and to drive a bit less, raise sharply the government's fuel economy standards so those vehicles are available, and allow more oil and gas drilling. In recent years, we've done none of these things. It's doubtful we will anytime soon. "Other possibilities" seem inexhaustible.

Under present policies, U.S. oil demand will expand 34 percent by 2030, the Energy Department projects. There will be more people, cars, planes and travel. Imports would satisfy all of the increase. We should try to prevent or minimize that. With China and India's oil demand increasing, American restraint would relax pressure on prices and reduce oil's usefulness as a political weapon. Consuming 25 percent of world oil, we're hardly powerless. But instead of doing what we might, we're awash in delusions.

Item: As gasoline prices have receded from $3 a gallon, many Americans attribute the decline to politics. In one Gallup poll, 42 percent of respondents said the Bush administration had manipulated prices to improve Republican prospects in congressional elections. Gee, if the White House could fix prices so easily, why let them rise in the first place? (The drop reflects small shifts in supply and demand: an end to summer driving, high oil inventories and fading fears that Iran will cut supplies.) Item: We're still enthralled by energy "independence" even though -- as a new report from the Council on Foreign Relations makes clear -- it's impossible for "at least several decades." In 1973, President Richard Nixon announced Project Independence, which was to eliminate oil imports by 1980. In 1973, the United States had net oil imports of 6 million barrels a day, 35 percent of our consumption. In 2006, net imports average 12.4 million barrels a day, or 60 percent of use. Nixon's advisers warned him that his goal was unattainable. In the foreseeable future, it still is. Anyone suggesting otherwise is misinformed or dishonest.

No plausible combination of alternative fuels or "conservation" can soon substitute for all that imported oil. Even if that weren't true, many other countries -- most of the world economy to which we are tightly tied -- would remain dependent on oil imports. So we'd be hostage indirectly.

The problem is not that the world will soon run out of oil. Global oil use now totals 31 billion barrels annually. Proven oil reserves are about 1.3 trillion barrels, reports Oil & Gas Journal. That's 42 years of supply at present consumption rates. Yes, consumption is rising -- but more oil will be found. Even when it's all gone, other hydrocarbon deposits can be, at higher prices, converted into oil. John Hofmeister, president of Shell Oil, claims that the oil shale in Colorado amounts to another 1 trillion barrels and that Canada's oil sands total 1.3 trillion barrels. Indeed, the oil sands are already producing.

The problem is not even imports. It is that most imports come from countries that are potentially insecure, unstable or hostile. More than 700 billion barrels of reserves, slightly more than half, lie in the Persian Gulf; 80 billion are in Venezuela, 76 billion in the former Soviet Union, 39 billion in Libya. New exploration in these countries is difficult; supply interruptions are an ever-present threat.

Unfortunately, the steps we should take involve immediate political costs -- they'd be unpopular -- while the benefits would emerge slowly and seem modest. Suppose, for example, we opened coastal areas and parts of Alaska, including the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, to drilling. U.S. oil and natural gas production would rise. But the increases would occur only after five or 10 years, and they might merely offset declines in existing U.S. fields. To a casual observer, the benefit would be barely visible.

Or imagine we raised the government's fuel economy standards for new vehicles -- say, from 27.5 miles per gallon for cars to 40 mpg. Because factories can't be converted instantly, the shift would be spread over 10 to 20 years. Replacing today's more than 225 million cars and light trucks would also be gradual and hardly perceptible. We'd also need a tax on fuel of at least $1 to $2 a gallon. Without mandated higher fuel prices, many Americans wouldn't buy more efficient vehicles. They'd recondition bigger sport-utility vehicles and sedans to keep them running. Or more driving would offset potential fuel savings. With low fuel prices in the 1990s, average annual driving per car rose about 1,500 miles, to almost 12,000.

So we probably won't do much about our oil habit. Any realistic proposal would ignite a firestorm of protest. Environmentalists would denounce more drilling. Auto companies would protest new fuel economy standards. Most important, the public would denounce a steep energy tax, even if it were introduced gradually with most proceeds rebated by lowering other taxes (as is desirable). And these unpleasant steps would merely reduce our dependence from what it would otherwise be. It's a hard case to make.

Because Americans want painless salvation, our politicians proffer visions that promise just that: a shift to hydrogen fuel or a surge in ethanol. The first may be futuristic wishful thinking; the second is mainly a costly giveaway to farmers. Both are deceptions, new excuses not to do the "right thing."

Some Seeing Red Over Red-light Tickets (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082899

Cameras that snap photos of motorists running red lights have been upheld as constitutional by courts in five states and Washington, D.C., but some car owners refuse to concede defeat and are continuing to challenge them.

Red-light cameras — in use in more than 100 cities, according to the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety — have set off furious resistance in many of the cities where they have been installed.

Now it's the city of Chicago's turn. Three Chicago-area car owners are suing the city, which the trio claims ticketed each of them for running red lights even though none of them was at the wheel.

In a class-action lawsuit, Parveen Idris of Bloomingdale and two other plaintiffs say the city's ticketing program is unconstitutional because it cranks out $90 tickets to vehicle owners no matter who is driving the car.

"I have gotten a lot of calls," says Robert Holstein, one of two attorneys who filed the suit. "People are irate. They weren't driving their vehicle, and they have no way to defend themselves."

Idris says in the lawsuit she was traveling in Turkey at the time her car was photographed running a red light and she received the ticket in the mail.

Jennifer Hoyle, a spokeswoman for the city's Law Department, says the city expects to prevail in court because other city ordinances that are similarly enforced have survived court challenges.

Opponents in some cities have claimed they were denied their constitutionally protected right to due process because the red-light program presumes — as it does in Chicago— that the vehicle owner is the driver at the time the violation occurs.

State courts in Colorado, Oregon, North Carolina, Iowa and California, as well as the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals and the Superior Court in Washington, D.C., have rejected constitutional challenges to the cameras.

Hoyle compared the red-light tickets to parking tickets, which also are issued to vehicle owners even though the city doesn't know who parked the car.

"As a vehicle owner you have a responsibility to ensure you are not lending your car to someone who will use it illegally," Hoyle says.

She added that red-light tickets, like parking tickets, are considered by the city to be "administrative tickets," not moving violations, and can be paid by mail. "It's not something that you have to go to traffic court for. It doesn't count against your driving record as a moving violation," she says.

Red-light cameras have been credited with reducing front and side crashes by 25%, according to a Federal Highway Administration study last year, but rear-end crashes were found to have increased 15%.

Richard Retting, a spokesman for the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety, says some courts have required cities to revise how red-light programs are administered.

In Chicago, opponents also object to the way that the program is operated.

"It's not the camera," Holstein says. "It's that the ordinance doesn't charge the driver and strips the owner of any defense." Holstein says Chicago has collected more than $90 million in fines. The suit asks that the fines be refunded in cases in which the car owner was not driving when the offense occurred.

Yes On All Judges (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

TWO OF CALIFORNIA'S SEVEN Supreme Court justices are up for retention this year. Carol A. Corrigan was appointed by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in January and is facing voters for the first time. Joyce L. Kennard was appointed by former Gov. George Deukmejian in 1989 and has weathered previous elections. Both of these excellent jurists should be retained.

Corrigan is a centrist former Democrat, now a Republican, who led an effort to turn standard legalese jury instructions into more understandable English. A former prosecutor and trial judge, she has written well-reasoned and carefully crafted judicial opinions, and her appointment has moved the court of six Republicans and one Democrat further to the center. Kennard had been a Los Angeles Superior Court judge and state Court of Appeal justice. Tough and probing in oral argument, she writes opinions that are both principled and pragmatic.

California's up-or-down vote on appellate justices is meant to balance judicial independence with public oversight. It doesn't always work out that way; justices tend to either be rubber-stamped at the ballot box or targeted for defeat by single-issue activists. In 1986, voters ousted Chief Justice Rose Bird and associate justices Joseph Grodin and Cruz Reynoso after a campaign focusing on their rulings to delay executions or overturn death sentences. No justices have been tossed out since, but not for lack of trying.

A more subtle danger to the courts' integrity is voters who fail to read up on the justices or, worse, flippantly vote no because of any one of a number of specious reasons. But judicial independence depends on citizens learning as much as possible about the courts and the justices.

DOJ_NMG_0082900

California's Court of Appeal is an intermediate court divided into six geographic districts. Justices of the 2nd District hear appeals from trial courts in Los Angeles, Ventura, Santa Barbara and San Luis Obispo counties. The following justices are on the ballot, have served with distinction and deserve a "yes" vote: Robert M. Mallano, Frances Rothschild, Roger W. Boren, Victoria M. Chavez, Patti S. Kitching, Richard D. Aldrich, Norman L. Epstein, Thomas L. Willhite, Nora M. Manella, Steve Suzukawa, Richard M. Mosk, Sandy R. Kriegler, Arthur Gilbert, Dennis M. Perluss, Fred Woods, Laurie D. Zelon, Candace D. Cooper and Madeleine Flier.

For Los Angeles Superior Court, four offices offer voters a choice. For Office No. 8, Bob Henry, a California deputy attorney general, has broad experience in criminal and civil law. For Office No. 18, Daviann Mitchell is a former police officer who now prosecutes gang crimes as a Los Angeles deputy district attorney. Two other current deputy district attorneys also deserve to be elected: Hayden Zacky for Office No. 102 and David W. Stuart for Office No. 144.

Bad Drug Reactions Send 700,000 To ER Each Year (WT/AP)

By Lindsey Tanner, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

CHICAGO -- Harmful reactions to some of the most widely used medicines -- from insulin to a common antibiotic -- sent more than 700,000 Americans to emergency rooms each year, landmark government research shows.

Accidental overdoses and allergic reactions to prescription drugs were the most frequent cause of serious illnesses, according to the study, the first to reveal the nationwide scope of the problem. People older than 65 faced the greatest risks.

"This is an important study because it reinforces the really substantial risks that there are in everyday use of drugs," said patient-safety specialist Bruce Lambert, a professor at the University of Illinois at Chicago's college of pharmacy.

Even so, the study authors and other experts agreed that the 700,000 estimate was conservative because severe drug reactions can often be misdiagnosed.

The study found that a small group of pharmaceutical mainstays was most commonly implicated, including insulin for diabetes; warfarin for clotting problems; and amoxicillin, a penicillinlike antibiotic used for all kinds of infections.

"These are old drugs, which are known to be extremely effective. We could not and would not want to live without them. But you've got to get the dose exactly right," Mr. Lambert said. He was not involved in the research.

Those 65 and older faced more than double the risk of requiring emergency-room treatment and were nearly seven times more likely to be admitted to the hospital than younger patients.

The results, from 2004 to '05, represent the first two years of data from a national surveillance project on outpatient drug safety. The project was developed by the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the Food and Drug Administration and the U.S. Consumer Product Safety Commission. The study was published in today's Journal of the American Medical Association.

The database included 63 nationally representative hospitals that reported 21,298 severe drug reactions among U.S. adults and children treated in emergency rooms during the two-year period. The tally is based on what emergency-room doctors said were complications from using prescription drugs, over-the-counter medicines, dietary supplements or herbal treatments.

The researchers said that when those numbers are extrapolated, it brings the total to 701,547 complications nationwide each year.

"Experts had thought that severe outpatient drug events were common, but no one really had good numbers" until now, said lead author Dr. Daniel Budnitz, a CDC researcher.

Complications included diabetics on insulin passing out from low blood sugar, excessive bleeding in patients on warfarin, and severe skin rashes in patients taking amoxicillin. Drug reactions were severe enough to require hospitalization in about 17 percent of patients.

"The numbers are quite troubling," said Jim Conway, senior vice president at the Institute for Healthcare Improvement. The tally underscores that "there is a tremendous number of consumers in the United States taking medication."

Blue Cross Settling Patients' Lawsuits (LAT)

By Lisa Girion, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

The big insurer, accused of illegally canceling some policies, agrees to pay its ex-customers.

Facing the threat of punishment from regulators, Blue Cross of California has agreed to settle more than 70 lawsuits and claims filed by patients who accused the state's largest health insurer of illegally canceling their coverage after they got sick.

The settlements will allow the former policyholders to pay hefty medical bills that they were stuck with after losing their insurance.

DOJ_NMG_0082901

Lawyers involved in the cases, who confirmed that they had been resolved, said the dollar amounts of the settlements were confidential.

In exchange for the money, the patients agreed to drop allegations that Blue Cross had terminated their coverage to avoid paying for treatment.

The accords could be part of an effort by Blue Cross to deflect public criticism, mollify regulators and avoid courtroom showdowns, although critics say the insurer still needs to reform its practices.

State regulators have fined Blue Cross in one case of canceled coverage, and more sanctions are expected.

Blue Cross, owned by Indianapolis-based WellPoint Inc., the nation's largest provider of health benefits, maintained that it was following the law. It declined to comment on the suits, saying talks to settle them were confidential.

William Shernoff, a Claremont lawyer representing many of the plaintiffs, said his clients wouldn't have to worry about medical bills ever again.

"Every one of our clients is pleased," he said. "But that's only half the story. The other half of the story is making sure it doesn't happen again and getting the right procedures in place."

The settlements follow a series of Times stories examining the cancellations and the hardships they caused for patients, their families, hospitals and physicians. Among those agreeing to settlements is a Riverside couple, described in a Sept. 17 article, who were forced to put their home up for sale after they were hit with a mountain of medical bills. Another settlement accord involves the family of a 6-year-old Murrieta girl, also described in the article, who was dropped by the insurer in the midst of treatment for a life-threatening tumor in her jaw.

At issue in the suits is individual health insurance, purchased by people who do not have group coverage through an employer or other organization. Unlike with group insurance, an insurer can deny coverage to a person it deems too risky based on the applicant's medical history and answers to a detailed health questionnaire.

The suits accuse Blue Cross of routinely violating state laws prohibiting insurers from canceling coverage unless a policyholder lied to obtain it. The suits allege that the application questionnaires were intentionally vague and confusing and were designed to trap applicants into making innocent mistakes that could later be used as excuses to cancel coverage. Blue Cross, according to the suits, scrutinized questionnaires only after it received a claim for a costly or potentially chronic condition.

At least five other health insurers, including Blue Shield of California, face similar lawsuits filed by customers. In recent weeks, two state agencies that oversee the industry have expanded investigations into the alleged practice. Last month the Department of Managed Health Care issued its first fine — $200,000 against Blue Cross — after finding that the company improperly revoked a Southern California woman's policy. The amount of the fine was criticized by consumer advocates as insignificant for WellPoint.

It remains unclear whether the proposed settlements would lead to substantial changes in Blue Cross' business practices or state regulations. Some see the accords as a sign that the state's largest health insurer intends to reform its practices. Others view the settlements as a way for the company to sweep the matter under the rug and move on.

"This is a standard way to avoid setting any precedent for future accountability," said Bryan Liang, director of the Institute of Health Law Studies at California Western School of Law in San Diego. Blue Cross "can easily pay off individuals, and those individuals have to take it to move on with their lives and recover from the horrors of having their health insurance taken away."

Blue Cross, like other insurers, contends that it is allowed to drop policyholders regardless of whether medical history omissions are intentional. The industry says the power to revoke policies is necessary to combat fraud and hold down costs.

Regulators say a policy cannot be canceled for an unintended discrepancy between the policyholder's application and medical records.

Consumer advocates said they feared that unless regulators got tough on insurers, the practice would continue and the opportunity for meaningful reform could be lost.

"Regulators have to come in with a big stick, because otherwise Blue Cross and the other HMOs are going to buy off the individuals," said Jamie Court, president of the Foundation for Taxpayer and Consumer Rights, based in Santa Monica. "This has to be about more than money. It's got to be about forcing the companies to uphold the law, and that's the job of the regulators."

Amy Dobberteen, assistant deputy director of the Department of Managed Health Care, said the agency was taking the complaints seriously.

"Our investigations have begun on all major players on a systemic level and on a case-by-case basis," she said. "There's a lot to look into. We've certainly been looking into it diligently, and I don't think we've been moving slowly on this. We're acting."

California Insurance Commissioner John Garamendi pledged last spring to investigate Blue Cross' cancellation practices but hasn't reported any findings. A spokesman said Garamendi had heightened scrutiny of Blue Cross.

DOJ_NMG_0082902

"We are continuing our probe into retroactive rescissions," said spokesman Norman Williams. "We recently refocused our personnel to look more closely into this issue."

Shernoff, the plaintiffs' attorney, said he would continue to press Blue Cross for substantial changes, such as reviewing an applicant's medical records before issuing coverage and canceling only when the insurer finds evidence that a policyholder intended to defraud the company.

He gave Blue Cross credit for discussing reforms. The company outlined operational changes last month designed to ensure that policies were not revoked in error. It is in discussions with lawyers and regulators on whether those steps adequately address the concerns raised in the suits.

"All the other insurance carriers are in denial," Shernoff said. "Blue Cross at least is not in denial anymore. They are in rehab now."

*

lisa.girion@latimes.com

Pirro: He's A Novice. Cuomo: She's Involved In A 2nd Investigati (NYT)

By Jonathan P. Hicks

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

ROCHESTER, Oct. 17 — Jeanine F. Pirro and Andrew M. Cuomo used their second and final debate on Tuesday to exchange personal attacks, with Mr. Cuomo being labeled an untested novice and Ms. Pirro accused of being the target of a second criminal inquiry, adding a new element to a campaign that has come to resemble a soap opera.

Ms. Pirro, the former Westchester County district attorney, was by far the more aggressive, using every opportunity to attack Mr. Cuomo as an inexperienced prosecutor devoid of ethics or integrity.

"I understand what it means to be a top lawyer in this state," Ms. Pirro said at one point. "My opponent was a junior prosecutor 21 years ago."

The hourlong debate was held in the studios of WXXI-TV, a public broadcasting station here, and was cosponsored by the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle. The program was taped in the morning and broadcast in the evening on public broadcasting stations in most of the state. In the New York City area, it was to be shown at 12:30 a.m. Wednesday, on a public broadcasting station.

For his part, Mr. Cuomo cast Ms. Pirro as a career politician with little experience outside criminal prosecution. He also offered a new attack against his Republican rival.

He cited an article in The New York Sun on Tuesday detailing a letter written by John Spencer, the Republican candidate for the United States Senate, when Mr. Spencer was mayor of Yonkers. The article stated that Mr. Spencer wrote a 15-page letter to Attorney General Eliot Spitzer accusing Ms. Pirro of using her position as district attorney to protect public officials from scandal and to punish political opponents.

"The office she's seeking is investigating her," Mr. Cuomo said.

Immediately after the debate, Cuomo campaign aides supplied copies of the article to reporters in the television studio, and Mr. Spitzer's office said it had an "open investigation" into the matter. Mr. Spencer's letter, which was written three years ago, said Ms. Pirro "protects the corrupt officials, punishes the weak people caught in the corrupt web and insures that they are not in a position to point fingers."

Ms. Pirro did not address the matter during the debate. Reporters asked her afterward about her reaction to Mr. Cuomo's charges about Mr. Spencer's letter.

"I don't know what he's talking about," Ms. Pirro said. "I guess Mr. Cuomo thinks John Spencer is someone he should endorse. If he's that credible."

In the debate, however, Ms. Pirro, who is trailing in the polls, was relentless in her criticism of Mr. Cuomo, using every question as a fresh opportunity to make an attack.

She hammered repeatedly at Mr. Cuomo's ethics, charging that while housing secretary, he pursued legal action against a businessman, Andrew L. Farkas, who later settled the case with federal officials in an agreement signed by Mr. Cuomo's counsel. Years later, Mr. Cuomo went to work for Mr. Farkas's new company, earning $1.2 million over two years. Mr. Farkas and his associates have also contributed $800,000 to Mr. Cuomo's campaign.

On several occasions, Ms. Pirro said Mr. Cuomo lacked the integrity needed to pursue major reforms in Albany.

"My opponent's reform agenda, which is to do what I say and not what I do, is the height of hypocrisy."

In response, Mr. Cuomo said: "My opponent is very good at making false, reckless charges. I've released 14 years of tax returns to show that."

DOJ_NMG_0082903

Ms. Pirro shot back: “I’ve released 12 years of tax returns. In order to be a trial lawyer, you need to have your facts in order to convey them to a jury.”

Mr. Cuomo steered away from the topic that has been consuming the Pirro campaign, that she is now the subject of a federal investigation into whether she planned to secretly tape her husband to determine if he was having an affair. Ms. Pirro has responded to the matter by disclosing their marital problems, and recently her husband, Albert J. Pirro Jr., has joined in, publicly chronicling their difficulties in often painful detail.

During the debate, Ms. Pirro touched on the topic only once, when asked by one questioner about the relevance of personal issues.

“All families have problems,” Ms. Pirro said. “And I think these issues are personal and they should not be the subject of federal inquiries. I deserve to be judged on my record as a strong woman who believes in reforming Albany and who not just talks about it.” She then attacked Mr. Cuomo over his dealings with Mr. Farkas.

By relentlessly attacking Mr. Cuomo, Ms. Pirro appeared intent on raising questions about his capacity to be attorney general and on continuing her slight climb in the polls, where she continues to trail by double digit figures.

“My opponent is a self-described nonpracticing lawyer,” Ms. Pirro said in her closing statement. “The choice can’t be more clear,” she said, adding that she wanted to be “the first woman attorney general of this state.”

Mr. Cuomo sought to rise above the fray, appearing unruffled by the attacks. He seemed far more comfortable when he was discussing topics such as the need for an independent commission to end partisan legislative redistricting and the need to make financial information regarding lawmakers and lobbyists more accessible to the public.

In fact, some of Mr. Cuomo’s supporters at the debate suggested that his aim was to remain positive and to limit his attacks on Ms. Pirro, reasoning that many viewers, particularly women, might react negatively.

Still, Mr. Cuomo responded to Ms. Pirro’s attacks with some of his own, particularly on Mr. Spencer’s letter to Mr. Spitzer. Mr. Cuomo said that Mr. Spencer “accused my opponent of using her prosecutorial office to play politics in Westchester. That, to me, is a serious issue.”

As they did in their first debate, on Sunday in Manhattan, both candidates said they would prosecute Alan G. Hevesi, the state comptroller, for using a state worker to drive his ailing wife.

Elections May Leave Bush An Early Lame Duck (WP)

By Peter Baker And Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

On desks around the West Wing sit digital clocks counting down the days and hours left in the Bush presidency, reminders to the White House staff to use the time left as effectively as possible. As of 8 a.m. today, those clocks will read 825 days, four hours. But if the elections go the way pollsters and pundits predict, they might as well read 20 days.

At least that would be the end of George W. Bush's presidency as he has known it. If Democrats win one or both houses of Congress on Nov. 7, the result will transform the remainder of Bush's time in office and dramatically shift the balance of power in Washington. Ending a dozen years basically passed in exile, congressional Democrats would have a chance to help steer the nation again -- following a campaign spent mostly assailing Bush's vision rather than detailing their own.

Around Washington, key figures in both parties have been trying to figure out what a Democratic victory would mean. Bush has been meeting privately with Cabinet secretaries in recent weeks to map out an agenda for his final two years in office. The White House says it is not making contingency plans for a Democratic win, but Bush advisers are bracing for what they privately recognize is the increasing likelihood. And Democratic leaders have been conferring about what they would do should voters return them to power.

Emboldened by victory, and bitter from grievance, Democrats could use their ascendance to block Bush's agenda, force him to respond to theirs and begin a new era of aggressive oversight and investigation. A Democratic victory, analysts in both parties said, could mean that some of Bush's tax cuts would not be renewed, attempts to revive his Social Security investment plan would be doomed and efforts to further broaden national security powers in the face of civil liberties concerns would be thwarted.

Most worrisome to the White House is the subpoena power that Democrats would gain with a majority in the House or Senate. For years, Republicans have been mostly deferential in scrutinizing the Bush administration, but Democrats are eager to reexamine an array of issues, such as Vice President Cheney's energy task force, the Jack Abramoff scandal and preparations for the Iraq war.

"It obviously affects things a lot," said Charles Black, a Republican lobbyist with ties to the White House. "History tells you that administrations have a hard time achieving things in their last two years. I think the president wants to be as aggressive as he can with a good menu of ideas.

DOJ_NMG_0082904

"If he had to deal with a Democratic majority in one house or both," Black added, it makes it that much harder.

Steve Elmendorf, a former House Democratic leadership aide, said of Bush, "He would lose control of his agenda. He would have to make a decision: Does he want to compromise and work cooperatively with the Democrats, or does he want to keep pushing what he's been pushing and lose all the time?"

The most salient analogy may be the last time Congress changed hands, after the 1994 elections. President Bill Clinton was left trying to assert that "the Constitution gives me relevance" even as new House Speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) and his Republicans seized the initiative. Clinton ultimately recovered through a mixture of confrontation with Republicans, most notably in a government shutdown, and "triangulation" in which he embraced some of their priorities, such as overhauling the welfare system.

The difference is that Clinton's presidency was still young, while Bush is heading into the twilight of his administration -- and is stuck in an unpopular war. But some Republicans think that Bush could play off overreaching Democrats as Clinton did with Gingrich. Or he could pivot to the more bipartisan mode he promised to bring from Texas and seize opportunities for progress in areas such as immigration, where his proposed guest-worker program has been blocked by his own party.

"One of the lessons for President Bush if he loses one or both chambers is the California example," said Sergio Bendixen, a pollster for Democrats. "Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger at this time in 2005 was considered to be in deep trouble. But now he is a shoo-in for reelection. How did he turns things around? He has gone from a very partisan Republican to somebody who was working with the other party. I wouldn't be surprised if Bush does the same thing."

John Bridgeland, a former Bush domestic policy adviser consulted by the White House in recent planning, said that regardless of who wins the election, the president would benefit from cooperating across party lines. "Without doing so, it will be more difficult to get things done that will be lasting," he said. "You can do things by executive order, but they may not survive into other administrations."

Bipartisanship, though, has been in short supply since Bush became president. In his first term, he negotiated support from both sides for his No Child Left Behind education law even as Democrats took control of the Senate in June 2001 because of a party switch. But as a practical matter, Bush faced an opposition chamber in Congress for just 98 days before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, after which both parties rallied behind him for a time. Republicans won back the Senate in 2002.

Bush has had a difficult enough time winning support from a Republican Congress over the past two years, and some expect the party to turn on him even more if it loses, particularly because of the Iraq war, which has been an albatross for GOP candidates. When the voting is done, pressure may rise from within Bush's own ranks to rethink Iraq policy, as evidenced by comments by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), who recently said that Bush should take a new course if the situation does not improve in 60 to 90 days.

But presidents have broad leeway to set foreign policy regardless of the legislative branch, and a Democratic Congress may exert more direct influence on domestic matters. Bush has been preparing his post-election agenda in a series of meetings, sitting down one-on-one with nine members of his Cabinet in the past month to review ideas. Bush insists that the sessions not consider a victory by Democrats, participants said. But the discussions have focused on items that could attract bipartisan interest, such as further efforts to rebuild the hurricane-torn Gulf Coast, reauthorization of No Child Left Behind and renewal of farm legislation.

"He's fired up for the last two years of his administration," Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said in an interview after meeting with Bush. Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, said after his own session: "He's pushing all of us, pushing himself. I don't think there's going to be any letup."

Bush aides recognize that no matter who wins next month, the president has at best a year to push through any last major initiatives before the 2008 presidential race takes over the national political agenda. Portman, a former House member, said he hopes there will be "a timeout on partisanship" after next month's election that can be exploited in 2007. "It's a critical year," he said.

The agenda-planning meetings are the brainchild of White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten, who handed out the countdown clocks to fellow Bush aides earlier this year. Bolten wants to use the process to develop new ideas and find ways to measure the success of old ones, colleagues said.

"There's still plenty of time to get important things done if people on both sides of the aisle are willing to work together to do it," Deputy White House Chief of Staff Joel Kaplan said in an interview. "Two years is a long time." After the election, Kaplan said, Bush will "look for partners in Congress" to accomplish priorities, such as extending his tax cuts, developing alternative energy supplies and promoting American competitiveness.

The question in the White House is whether Democrats would be willing to be partners. While Democrats see Bush as relentlessly partisan, his aides think Democrats have been deliberately obstructionist even on issues of little dispute. Against that backdrop of mutual suspicion, the two sides may find it difficult to come together.

DOJ_NMG_0082905

"The Democrats are so blinded by their hate of Bush, they'll have a hard time even having a bill-signing with him," Republican lobbyist Ed Rogers said. "That might make for some good political contrasts, but not much substance."

Ron Kaufman, who was White House political director for George H.W. Bush, said: "If they try to take down the president, if you will, it would be really stupid. It would play into the long-term interests of the Republican Party."

Leon E. Panetta, who became Clinton's White House chief of staff after the 1994 Republican victory, agreed: "My fear is that the Democrats after 12 years of trench warfare and a pretty rough time -- these people are pretty battle-scarred from that -- basically come out and seek vengeance for everything that's taken place. If they do that, I think they make a pretty big mistake because the public will say, 'These guys are no different than Tom DeLay and his crowd.' "

Others doubt the Democrats would make that mistake. Former House majority leader Richard K. Armey (R-Tex.), who squared off against Panetta in that era, said Democrats would be in better shape to transition from opposition to governing than his Republicans were in 1994 because enough seasoned veterans are still around, such as Rep. John D. Dingell (Mich.).

"The best Democrats, people like Dingell, on oversight have a tendency to say, 'Let's get into the programs and see how they work and how they could be better,' " he said. "That's healthy oversight. . . . They may stay away from political oversight looking for scandals and stay with programmatic oversight. They do it well and they may want to play against expectations."

No Spoils For The Victors (NYT)

By Bruce Bartlett

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

GREAT FALLS, Va.

EVEN before the Mark Foley scandal broke, Democrats' chances of getting control of the House of Representatives were pretty good. Now, with the incompetence of the Republican leadership's handling of that affair, the odds of Democratic control are looking very good indeed.

With liberals like New York's Charlie Rangel in line to head important House committees like the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, some investors are starting to worry about tax increases on the rich and business bashing-legislation. Needless to say, Republicans are doing what they can to stoke such fears.

As a Republican, I have a message for those fearful of Democratic control: don't worry. Nothing dreadful is going to happen. Liberals have much less to gain than they believe.

I speak with some knowledge. In 1994, after Republicans took control of Congress, my fellow conservatives and I met to plan a legislative agenda. My colleagues were ecstatic. In one fell swoop we were going to do all the things that Democratic control of Congress had effectively blocked since 1954, when the last Republican Congress was defeated.

I didn't make myself very popular by reminding people that Bill Clinton was still going to be president for at least another two years. How were we going to get these measures enacted into law over his all-but-certain veto? Flush with victory and convinced that they had a mandate from the American people to pass a conservative legislative agenda, my friends simply dismissed my concerns as defeatist.

Well, Cassandra wasn't very popular, either, but she was right, and so was I. Within a year, the conservative revolution was all but over. When Republicans forced a showdown with Mr. Clinton over the budget, they ended up blinking. After that, Republicans in Congress lost their reformist zeal and settled into playing the political game pretty much the same way the Democrats had for the previous 40 years: using federal money to buy votes to hold on to power any way possible.

My Democratic friends no doubt feel the way we Republicans did in those heady days of 1994 before political reality came knocking. Many probably think they will finally get the truth about what the White House knew about Iraq before the invasion. They may think they can use the power of the purse to force a withdrawal. Some may even imagine that articles of impeachment can be brought against President Bush, while others plan to enact national health insurance and other pet liberal schemes.

To all this I say: Ain't gonna happen. For starters, President Bush will still occupy the White House for the next two years. And although his veto pen may have been misplaced for most of the last six years, he found it again this summer.

For another thing, Democrats are unlikely to get more than a very thin majority in the House. If they get the Senate as well, it will not be with more than a one-vote margin. Consequently, effective control will be in the hands of moderates who often work with Republicans on specific issues. In a delicious bit of irony, Senator Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, lately excoriated by the liberal wing of the Democratic Party, may end up holding the balance of power in the Senate.

As for impeachment and cutting money for Iraq, such actions would be politically insane and the Democratic leadership knows it. They will make the White House pay a price for Iraq, but will ensure that they don't get blamed for any debacle resulting from failure to provide adequate money for our troops.

DOJ_NMG_0082906

Democrats may have more success using Congressional committees to investigate accusations of wrongdoing by the Bush administration, but that will be much harder than they think. The Republicans cut thousands of committee staff positions when they took control, and it will take considerable time to find the money and staff to do any serious investigating.

Also, the Bush White House can simply use all the stalling techniques that the Clinton White House perfected to frustrate Congressional investigations by Republicans. The only thing left to worry about is expiration of the Bush tax cuts, which Democrats will certainly not want to extend. But most of them don't expire until 2010, so there is no urgency. Anyway, there is no certainty that continued Republican control of Congress would assure extension of the tax cuts. If party control were all that mattered, they would have been extended already.

In short, there is really no reason for conservatives, businessmen or investors to worry particularly about a Democratic victory in November. Congress will be on automatic pilot for the next two years regardless of which party is in control.

Which Way To Win? (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

As we head toward Election Day 2006, political analysts are focusing on a few dozen tossup races that will determine whether the Democrats take the House and Senate. But there's a larger, overarching battle this year between two visions of America: testing whether it's a country defined by its political center or one defined by its political extremes.

This assessment of America's meta-politics is distilled in "The Way to Win," a new book by two of the media's best political observers, Mark Halperin of ABC News and John F. Harris of The Post. They see two basic strategic ideas at work in today's politics: the "synthesizer" approach of former president Bill Clinton, and the "clarifier" tactics of President Bush and his political guru, Karl Rove. Here's the way Halperin and Harris describe the two styles:

"Clinton Politics is the politics of the center. It holds that Americans for the most part, with the exception of irate groups at the edges, are less interested in ideology than in practical solutions to basic problems. People would prefer politics to be polite, civil, and compromise-minded."

"Bush Politics is the politics of the base," the authors continue. "A successful leader will stand forthrightly on one side of a grand argument. Then he or she will win that argument by sharpening the differences and rallying his most intense supporters to his side."

People from the Old Media, like me, instinctively prefer a centrist style of civilized debate. Of course we do, say Halperin and Harris. We are the gatekeepers of the old order. The shrill voices of the New Media -- the bloggers and talk-radio hosts and other partisan megaphones that Halperin and Harris describe as the "Freak Show" -- don't just threaten our beloved center. They might eventually put us out of business.

So what's working this campaign season? As I read this year's races, the centrist approach seems to be making something of a comeback. I base that judgment on a sampling of several dozen campaign ads that have been gathered by washingtonpost.com (available at http://projects.washingtonpost.com/politicalads/). This survey shows that even in some of the key tossup races, many candidates are looking for that warm and fuzzy place in the middle of the political landscape.

Take Rep. Harold Ford, a candidate for the U.S. Senate in Tennessee. He's running even with Republican Bob Corker in part by holding the middle ground as a "values" Democrat. One ad shows him in church, with this endearingly honest opening line: "I started church the old-fashioned way: I was forced to." Corker's ads, out of the Rove playbook, take a sharper line, summed up in one spot with the phrase: "Who's he kidding?" Despite the attack ads, Ford is running far better than expected.

In Missouri, the Republican incumbent, Sen. Jim Talent, seems to be trying to find the center as well. One ad touts his nonpartisanship: "Most people don't care if you're Red or Blue, Republican or Democrat," says the ad, which boasts of legislation Talent has co-sponsored with Democratic colleagues such as Ron Wyden, Chris Dodd and Chuck Schumer.

Talent's move to the center is countered by his opponent, Claire McCaskill, who has highlighted Talent's opposition to stem cell research in poignant ads featuring Missourians with medical problems who might be helped by such research.

In Montana, Democrat Jon

Tester is running ahead of Republican Sen. Conrad Burns by presenting himself as the ultimate regular guy, a lumpy ex-farmer with a bad haircut. One of his spots, "Creating a Buzz," actually celebrates his crew cut. In Maryland, meanwhile, Republican Senate challenger Michael Steele may have the ultimate mindless, warm-and-fuzzy pitch, in which he rebuts a fake newspaper story, "Steele Hates Puppies," by holding a cute little mutt and saying: "For the record, I love puppies."

The great synthesizer himself, Bill Clinton, was out campaigning this week for Deval Patrick, a member of the Clinton Justice Department who is running for governor of Massachusetts. "Everyone knows that, somehow, the wheel has run off of our national discourse and our common life," Clinton said Monday. "And people don't want us to shout at each other any more. They want to be talked to, reasoned with, lifted up."

DOJ_NMG_0082907

Is Clinton right about the country? Are Democrats doing well in this campaign season because Americans want to find their way back to the civilized center? Or are they profiting from the Democratic base's rage at George W. Bush? That's the troubling question that lingers after reading Halperin and Harris's book: If the Democrats win next month, will they be the heirs of Clinton's vision of politics or of Rove's? Are we heading for unity or even sharper division?

What Democrats Would Do (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Against their better judgment, the Democrats are starting to taste it. In the House, the number of Republican incumbents polling under 50 percent considerably exceeds the number of seats the Democrats need to pick up to make Nancy Pelosi speaker. Controlling the Senate depends on winning two of the contests in three Upper South states -- Missouri, Tennessee, Virginia -- that could go either way.

And then what? Putting a fleet of carts before a herd of horses, let's look at the legislation that the Democrats would push through the House and just maybe through the Senate. (Even if they win the upper house, of course, they'll still need the support of a number of Republicans to overcome a filibuster.)

In the House, the Democrats have made clear that there's a first tier of legislation they mean to bring to a vote almost immediately after the new Congress convenes. It includes raising the minimum wage, repealing the Medicare legislation that forbids the government from negotiating with drug companies for lower prices, replenishing student loan programs, funding stem cell research and implementing those recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission that have thus far languished.

All these measures command massive popular support. The reason they've not been enacted is that House Republicans have passed rules making it impossible for the Democrats to offer amendments to any significant legislation, thereby sparing themselves the indignity of having to choose, say, between the interests of their financial backers in the drug industry and their constituents.

Cognizant that they will owe their victory in part to the public's revulsion at the way Congress does (or avoids) business, the Democrats also plan to revise House rules to enable the opposition party to introduce amendments and to sit on conference committees, from which Republicans have routinely excluded them since Tom DeLay became majority leader. They also will ban members from accepting gifts and paid trips from lobbyists.

By bringing such measures to a vote in the House, and conceivably in the Senate as well, the Democrats will be in the enviable position of doing both good and well: promoting long-overdue policy shifts that the public supports and putting their Republican colleagues in a pickle. Confronted with an up-or-down vote on raising the minimum wage or making medication for seniors more affordable, many Republicans will side with the Democrats. Should the Democrats win the Senate, Republicans will have to calculate the risks of filibustering such mom-and-apple-pie measures. These bills will also pose a conundrum for conservatives such as John McCain, whose presidential aspirations have not been clouded by having to vote on these issues.

Should they make it through both houses, many of these measures will face a presidential veto. George W. Bush has already vetoed stem cell legislation, and he has staunchly opposed raising the minimum wage since the day he entered politics. What will congressional Republicans do if they're confronted with a series of vetoes of popular legislation? How large will the lame duck president loom in their calculations?

Not every issue that the Democrats will address if they control Congress will be so easy. The war in Iraq -- to which, if they win, they will owe their victory -- will surely prove the most nettlesome. If the Baker-Hamilton commission recommends a phased withdrawal, as some reports have speculated, the Democrats may be handed a relatively easy way out, whether or not the administration goes along with it. Should the administration persist in staying the course, Congress then could pass the kind of legislation it passed in the last years of the Vietnam War, stipulating the kinds of uses to which our military spending could -- and could not -- be put. At the same time, the ranking House Democrats in military matters -- Pennsylvania's John Murtha and Missouri's Ike Skelton -- might seek to increase the size of the Army, which the Iraq war has shown to be stretched to its limits.

In the course of this year's campaign, Democrats have been pleasantly surprised by the support their proposals for greater energy independence have won in all regions and sectors of the country. They will surely boost funding for alternative energy projects, which they see as a way not just to reduce greenhouse gases but to generate jobs as well. Many congressional Democrats also want to mandate stricter fuel efficiency standards, traditionally a cause that some auto-state Democrats have opposed, even though the Big Three's resistance to such standards is one reason their sales are plummeting.

"We're kidding around if we don't deal with that issue," says one leading Hill Democrat. "The time for that debate has arrived." It's part and parcel, he hopes, of life in the majority.

DOJ_NMG_0082908

Rove Foresees GOP Victory (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

White House political strategist Karl Rove yesterday confidently predicted that the Republican Party would hold the House and the Senate in next month's elections, dismissing fallout from the sex scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley.

At a luncheon with editors and reporters at The Washington Times, Mr. Rove -- who is widely credited as the architect of the party's historic 2002 midterm election gains -- said Republicans are beginning to make significant headway in defining their party's differences from congressional Democrats, especially on national security.

"I'm confident we're going to keep the Senate; I'm confident we're going to keep the House. The Foley matter has impact in some limited districts, but the research we have shows that people are differentiating between a vote for their congressman and a member from Florida," Mr. Rove said, referring to the Republican who resigned last month after his sexually explicit online messages to former congressional pages were discovered.

President Bush has begun to paint this year's election as a choice between strength and weakness on national security -- and the stark differences will show Americans the true nature of Democrats, Mr. Rove said.

"It is useful to remind people what [Democrats] said and what they do. I think they have given us here, especially in the last couple of weeks, a potent set of votes to talk about. You had 90 percent of House Democrats voting against the terrorist-surveillance program, nearly three-quarters of Senate Democrats and 80 percent of House Democrats voting against the terrorist-interrogation act. Something is fundamentally flawed."

In the hourlong interview, Mr. Rove was upbeat, telling stories from the campaign trail and joking about skewed political coverage that disproportionately shows Democrats poised to take control of Congress

Mr. Rove's optimism is not shared by pollsters, many of whom predict a Republican loss in the House -- with some saying the party could lose as many as 40 seats. The mood in the White House has shifted in recent days, with some beginning to concede the threat to the Republican majority in the House of Representatives, which they won in 1994.

Yesterday, Vice President Dick Cheney acknowledged the risk to the House Republican majority.

"I really think we're going to do reasonably well. And I think we'll hold the Senate, and I also think we got a good shot at holding the House," Mr. Cheney said on Rush Limbaugh's top-rated national radio program.

"I think the key will be who goes to the polls on Election Day. And certainly, it's always tough when you're in the midterm of your second presidential term in office."

But Mr. Rove said Republican candidates still hold a huge cash edge over Democrats, which will give them clout in the final three weeks of the campaign.

"This morning, I loved it: The [Associated Press] ran a story saying these Democrat congressional candidates outraised their Republican incumbents in the third quarter. Well, what they didn't say was that part of the reason that they did is that we raised the money earlier so that we'd be able to deploy it," he said.

Of the 52 races listed in the tossup and lean categories of a leading election analyst, Republican candidates have more cash on hand than their opponents do in at least 34 races, according to the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Although Mr. Rove had previously predicted a loss of eight to 10 House seats, he said he remains confident that Republicans will not lose more than 15 -- the magic number that would flip control of the chamber to Democrats.

Democrats have to pick up six seats to gain control of the Senate -- virtually impossible, Mr. Rove said.

There are 40 Republican senators who are not up for re-election this year, he pointed out, and at least seven who are running comfortably ahead. With just a few wins by incumbents -- such as Arizona Sen. Jon Kyl, Missouri Sen. Jim Talent and Virginia Sen. George Allen -- Republicans would have 50 seats. With Mr. Cheney's tiebreaking vote, that would assure Republicans' continued control of the Senate.

Although Mr. Talent is locked in a tight race, Mr. Rove said the Missouri Republican "is one of the best candidates ... keen and smart and able ... a very disciplined candidate."

Although Missouri is "very competitive," Mr. Rove said, "There gets to be a point at which, though, it begins to lock in, and Talent appears to be moving that direction. ... I look at the Missouri data, and I can just smell that this race is edging toward a point where ... they're just getting ready to lock in."

The White House strategist is closely monitoring races across the country. He receives "68 polls a week for Senate, governor and House races," Mr. Rove said. "My head is about ready to explode."

Mr. Rove said history is on the Republican Party's side, noting that 97.5 percent of incumbents have been re-elected since 1996. This time, he said, there are "significantly" fewer open House seats than the Democrats had in 1994, when Republicans swept to power under then-Rep. Newt Gingrich's leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0082909

Early in this campaign cycle, Mr. Rove said the White House compiled a list of 80 Republican incumbents who might face difficulty. From there, top strategists made sure "that they all had a campaign plan, that they all knew that they had a risk, that they all went out there and raised a bundle of money, and that they had a plan that was measurable."

"As a result, that's done a lot to get people prepared," he said.

And, in some ways, the campaign is just beginning, Mr. Rove added.

"For most Americans, particularly the marginal voters who are going to determine the outcome of the election, it started a couple weeks ago," he said. "Between now and the election, we will spend $100 million in target House and Senate races in the next 21 days."

Cheney Unsure Of GOP Control Of Congress (AP-Y)

AP, October 18, 2006

President Bush says flatly that Republicans will keep control of the House and Senate in the November elections. Vice President Dick Cheney doesn't sound quite so certain.

"I think we'll hold the Senate and I also think we got a good shot at holding the House," the vice president said Tuesday in an interview with radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh.

In the House, Democrats need a 15-seat pickup to gain control. In the Senate, they need six.

Cheney was asked if he felt frustrated that Republicans are speculating on how may House seats they might lose.

"Well, I think it's a natural, normal situation at this stage," Cheney said. "But I really think we're going to do reasonably well. ... I think the key will be who goes to the polls on Election Day."

The vice president said that "it's always tough when you're in the midterm of your second presidential term in office. Historically, those are the most difficult elections for the incumbents in the White House."

There Goes The GOP Base — And Probably Both Houses (HILL)

The Hill, October 18, 2006

The Republican base, that vaunted entity whose every mood swing has controlled the zigs and zags of the Bush administration policy, has moved out, according to the latest Gallup polling. Karl Rove's heroic efforts to preserve its fealty have failed to move Republican base voters. Karl cannot compensate for Bush's failure to project his issues as the midterm disaster for the Republican Party nears.

The Gallup poll of Oct. 6-8 shows that, in the wake of the Foley scandal, the number of "white frequent churchgoers" who are planning to vote Republican has dropped from 58 percent to 47 percent since last month. The margin of their support for Republicans over Democrats, 26 percentage points in September, has entirely disappeared and the parties are tied among this core element of the Republican base.

The Gallup poll also reveals that Democrats now win all eight major issues, including terrorism and morality. Asked which party would do more to enhance "moral standards in the country," Democrats now win 47 to 36! And on terrorism, Democrats now have a 47-to-42-percent advantage.

The Foley scandal has wrought extraordinary damage to the Republican Party and appears to have had a particularly negative impact on the base. No amount of blame shifting onto Democrats for breaking the story or for holding it until September is likely to compensate for the evidence that House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) did not act promptly to expose it himself. According to the latest Fox News poll, 61 percent of voters believe that Hastert knew about the Foley affair early on and did nothing to stop it.

Churchgoing whites are the core of the Republican base. The fact that they are now breaking even in the approaching midterm elections foretells total disaster for the GOP. For this group to leave is, quite literally, the political equivalent of the last dog dying! It is now likely that they will lose both houses of Congress.

With this kind of defection, Republican Sens. Mike DeWine (Ohio), Conrad Burns (Mont.), Rick Santorum (Pa.), Jim Talent (Mo.) and Lincoln Chaffee (R.I.) seem likely to be gone. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's (R-Tenn.) seat seems likely to go to Rep. Harold Ford (D-Tenn.). And Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) may also be on his way out. In New Jersey, after trailing Tom Kean Jr. for most of September, Sen. Robert Menendez (D) seems to have moved out to a small lead that will probably grow.

And all of this trend is before the final weeks when downscale Democrats, who have not yet focused on the elections, "come home" and vote their historic party loyalties.

The defection of the Republican base is likely to be felt even more keenly in the House races. The very gerrymandering that GOP leaders had hoped would leave their House margin invulnerable may now backfire as the Republican white churchgoers, whom the district lines had incorporated into swing Republican districts, now defect and vote Democrat or stay home in massive numbers. The gerrymandering designed to keep Democrats out may have the perverse effect of keeping disaffected Republicans in the swing districts, magnifying their effect on the election.

DOJ_NMG_0082910

Can the Republican Party reunite with its base? It's hard to see how they can win it back until the 2008 election. A Hillary Clinton candidacy would obviously help them to regain the fierce loyalty of their base, but she would also bring in millions of single women voters who would support her candidacy by huge margins. The recent census data showing that half of all households are unmarried indicates how extensive a political force single women can become.

In the long term, of course, Democratic policies on same-sex marriage and abortion are likely to bring the base back to its traditional bearings, but these issues seem to be having little impact on holding the Republican majorities in Congress.

Morris and McGann, husband and wife, have written several books together, including "Rewriting History," a rebuttal to "Living History" by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

Congressional Republicans Find Spending May Not Decide Races (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Just weeks before Election Day, most embattled Republican House incumbents have less campaign cash than they expected, despite raising more money than their Democratic challengers. Republicans had to spend heavily in recent weeks to buck an unfavorable national climate for the party.

In Connecticut, Republican Rep. Nancy Johnson spent $3.5 million on her re-election bid through Sept. 30 compared with Democratic challenger Christopher Murphy, who spent just $1.5 million, according to filings with the Federal Election Commission. Ms. Johnson ended the third quarter with $1 million in the bank compared with about $368,000 in Mr. Murphy's account. Even so, her race is still considered a "toss up" -- or one with no clear favorite -- by the Cook Political Report, a nonpartisan group that tracks campaigns, because of voter discontent with President Bush and the Iraq war.

The third-quarter financial disclosure reports are important barometers of momentum and 11-hour strength since they are the final ones released before Nov. 7.

"In some ways, the major Republican opponent hasn't been the Democratic challenger as much as it's been the daily news cycle," says Anthony Corrado, a campaign finance expert at Colby College, in Waterville, Maine.

Meanwhile, most Democrats running for open House seats held by retiring Republicans have raised more cash than their opponents, giving their party a chance to make net gains in the race for control of that chamber.

Democrats also are showing strength in several close Senate races, by out-raising their opponents in the third quarter or maintaining a competitive position despite heavy spending by incumbents.

In Virginia, Republican Sen. George Allen has raised $13 million for his re-election bid and spent $8.5 million. But he remains in a dead heat with Democratic newcomer Jim Webb, who has raised $4.6 million and spent just $1.8 million. Mr. Allen enters the final month with $5.6 million in the bank, but Mr. Webb can still compete statewide with his $2.7 million in cash.

Carl Forti, a spokesman for the House Republican campaign committee, said his party's candidates have enough cash to block a Democratic takeover. "Democrats can no longer fabricate momentum in long-shot races; candidates either have the cash to cross the finish line or they don't," he said.

Sarah Feinberg, a spokeswoman for the Democratic House campaign committee, says there never was much doubt that "Republicans and their special interest friends would out-raise their challengers." Amid polls indicating dissatisfaction with Congress and the White House, Ms. Feinberg says Democratic candidates don't need to match incumbents' fundraising to win.

Republican leaders this week reminded candidates to focus on local issues, such as money they have brought home to build roads and bridges or for libraries and schools. Meanwhile, the national party continues to supplement candidates' efforts, investing millions of dollars in advertising and distributing flyers that call Democrats soft on terrorism and inclined toward tax increases.

But Republicans' effort to change the subject is proving expensive and difficult. Despite investing in attacks on Democrats, the number of competitive races has increased. And, according to financial disclosure reports, incumbents have been forced to spend considerably more than challengers in a number of races that now look too close to call.

In Pennsylvania, for instance, Republican Rep. Curt Weldon has spent $1.5 million compared with his opponent Democrat Joseph Sestak's $750,907 and the race remains a toss-up. Worse still for the incumbent, at the close of the third quarter, Mr. Sestak had $1.5 million in the bank compared with Mr. Weldon's $1.1 million.

Mr. Weldon's political fortunes grew complicated this week when it was disclosed that federal investigators are delving into the lobbying efforts of the congressman's daughter and one of his political supporters.

In Indiana, Republican Rep. John Hostettler's lackluster fundraising may have caught up with him. The six-term incumbent has raised $452,600 for his campaign compared with the $1.5 million collected by Democrat Brad Ellsworth, a former local sheriff. Mr. Hostettler has spent just $184,447 and ended the third quarter with $269,700 in the bank. Meanwhile, Mr. Ellsworth has spent $1 million in his campaign and still has $413,500.

DOJ_NMG_0082911

There is some good news for Republicans.

In the race for the open seat of retiring Illinois House Rep. Henry Hyde, Democrat Tammy Duckworth looks to have miscalculated financially, and hampered her campaign's ability to compete in the final weeks.

Ms. Duckworth, an Iraq war veteran, has raised roughly $2.8 million. But she spent the bulk of it in September on television ads responding to negative commercials against her by the House Republican committee. Heading into the home stretch, she now reports having $206,000 in the bank while her Republican opponent, Peter Roskam, has $1.5 million.

Having Money Isn't Everything, But It Can Be Deciding Factor (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan And Aaron Blake

The Hill, October 18, 2006

For months, Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), has said Republicans would keep their majority in the House because they have the advantages of "members, money and message."

House Republican incumbents have socked away more money than their Democratic challengers in 34 of 52 competitive districts and in some cases Republicans lead Democratic challengers by a ratio of seven to one, said NRCC spokesman Carl Forti in a statement.

But some of those figures are misleading because some candidates, such as Democrats Tammy Duckworth (Ill.) and Joe Courtney (Conn.), have spent exorbitant sums on television advertising buys.

In seven competitive Senate races, state Treasurer Bob Casey (D-Pa.) and Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) lead incumbent GOP Sens. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) and Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.). In Tennessee's open seat race, Rep. Harold Ford (D-Tenn.) holds a narrow lead over former Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker (R). In Maryland and Minnesota, the candidates are within $500,000 of each other in cash on hand.

Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) holds a commanding lead over Democrat Jim Webb, but Webb raked in $3.4 million in the third quarter. And in Missouri, Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.) has a $4 million lead over challenger Claire McCaskill (D) largely because she has made a large media buy for the final weeks leading up to Election Day.

History shows that money has its limits. In 1994, the last time an anti-incumbent wave swept the country, Democratic incumbents out-raised Republican challengers but Republicans picked up 52 House seats and won a majority in the Senate, too.

With three weeks remaining until voters head to the polling booths, one question for Republicans and Democrats alike is whether a tipping point has been reached: can heaps of money overcome the negative sentiment directed toward Republicans because of the war in Iraq and the House page scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.)?

"The Republicans are fighting against constant news out of Washington that things are not going right," said Tony Corrado, a political scientist at Colby College. "The Democrats have the resources needed to respond to attacks and the Republicans [are] playing defense spending campaign money … to fight a wave of public opinion."

"If you haven't raised your money, you're not where you need to be," said a Democratic lobbyist. "Unless the RNC can come in with a tidal wave of cash, it won't matter if there's no message, I don't care how much money you throw at it."

If money is less a factor in tight races in a bad political environment, the looming question for both parties is whether the GOP's vaunted turnout operation can save their incumbent members.

Several strategists from both parties said the turnout operation should give the Republicans a three-point edge in most competitive races. Whether that edge dissipates amid the Foley sex scandal and the Iraq war is an open question.

"I don't believe that's the case yet … money can buy intensity," said a senior White House official, adding that the RNC, NRCC and state parties had $56 million more than the Democratic Party and that since 1974, candidates who outspend their opponent by $200,000 won 97 percent of the time.

Republicans still hold an advantage because competitive House contests are fought in distinct districts, making them more insulated than Senate races from national trends. That means that when the House changes hands, it is a seminal event: both times the House has changed hands in the past 50 years, the Senate has flipped as well.

"We're not at that point, particularly not in congressional races," said Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.). "We work inside a very different universe. Outside a couple dozen seats most Republicans represent seats in which President Bush's approval rating is in the high 40s and low 50s. Bush is not going to hinder [a Republican candidate]."

And even if some candidates have reached a point where money does not matter, having enough money can create options. For example, Rep. Marilyn Musgrave (R-Colo.), who found herself in an unexpectedly tight race in 2004, bragged last week that the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) had withdrawn a $600,000 television advertising buy. The DCCC's decision gave the NRCC a break because it will not have to counter the DCCC's advertising with its own.

DOJ_NMG_0082912

But DCCC chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) told reporters on Monday that Musgrave shares a media market with Rep. John Salazar (D-Colo.), implying that the money was for Salazar. Now the DCCC can decide where to spend $600,000 that Salazar does not need. The DCCC can repurchase airtime in northern Colorado for Musgrave's opponent, Democrat Angie Paccione, redirect that money to protect vulnerable incumbents in Georgia, or spend on second-tier races in California.

"Money can't solve everything," said Cole. "But money can spare you strategic dilemmas."

GOP Bright Spots Few In Senate Races (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

National Republicans are dumping more than $1 million into Senate races in the Democratic strongholds of Maryland and New Jersey but are facing a bleak field elsewhere, strategists from both parties say.

"Every week, it gets better," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC). "Every week we get closer to our goal of taking the Senate and I'd say right now we're on the edge. What looked like a distant possibility six months ago is a very, very real possibility right now."

Democrats this year, unlike past elections, are running on a strong national security agenda and have taken the upper hand in fundraising, he told reporters yesterday. Mr. Schumer played several ads paid for by the DSCC in conservative states such as Virginia and Tennessee attacking Republicans for their continued support of the Iraq war. In each ad, the Democrat says changes must be made without offering specifics.

"National security is a win for Democrats," said Mr. Schumer, adding that North Korea's recent nuclear test will help the party. "What happened in North Korea ... inures to our benefit."

In addition, he said the party will have poured "a minimum of $20 million" into the local efforts that make sure their voters show up at the polls, a tactic mastered by Republicans in recent years.

"We've been in the wilderness for a while," Mr. Schumer said.

While Republican strategists privately acknowledge that the races look tough for the GOP, they remain confident that they will keep Democrats from gaining the six seats they need to win control of the chamber.

Brian Nick, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said yesterday that Republicans have paid $650,000 for advertising in the reliably Democratic state of Maryland, where Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele hopes to beat Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin for the seat being vacated by Democrat Paul S. Sarbanes. They are dumping another $500,000 in New Jersey, another Democratic state where Republican Tom Kean Jr. hopes to beat incumbent Sen. Robert Menendez.

"The Democrats have been forced to spend money in Michigan, Maryland, Washington and New Jersey because they are being pressed on holding these seats," Mr. Nick said. "This defies the national political climate and is money that is not going toward attacking our incumbents."

Mr. Schumer said yesterday that Mr. Menendez was not his first choice for the seat but that he has been a "great candidate."

Republicans, meanwhile, appear increasingly pessimistic about their chances of keeping incumbent Sens. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania and Mike DeWine of Ohio. Polls continue to show both men trailing.

In Pennsylvania, challenger Bob Casey Jr. has raised amounts of money on par with Mr. Santorum. In Ohio, Mr. DeWine maintains the cash advantage but national Republicans have dropped plans to continue spending heavily on advertising there.

"The bottom is sort of beginning to fall out in Ohio for them," Mr. Schumer said of the state that handed President Bush his re-election victory in 2004.

Funding Constrains Democrats (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Top Democrats said yesterday that they are planning to significantly expand the number of GOP House seats they will target during the final 20 days of the campaign but that financial disputes and fundraising problems are hindering the effort.

Democrats said private polls have convinced top party officials that they could pick up 40 or more seats -- nearly double their internal projections from a week ago -- if they spend enough money on television advertising for long-shot races. Strategists James Carville and Stan Greenberg are among those pleading with party leaders to go deep into debt to run ads in as many as 50 GOP-held districts.

DOJ_NMG_0082913

Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) has privately signed off on targeting a new group of GOP incumbents who were once considered safe for reelection, starting with Rep. Gil Gutknecht in rural Minnesota, officials said.

The number of seats Democrats could pick up "is expanding, no doubt about it," Emanuel said. "But you have to figure out what is smoke and what is fire."

Emanuel said he believes as many as 58 seats are now in play.

Still, several Democrats complained that the party is on the verge of blowing a once-in-a-decade political opportunity because of financial troubles.

The Democratic National Committee has no plans to help finance a last-minute push because it just took out a loan to spend up to $10 million more, primarily on Senate races, and particularly in Virginia and Tennessee, a top official said. "We are looking, but unfortunately there is not much more we can do," said DNC spokeswoman Karen Finney.

Harold Ickes -- a Democratic operative who recently created an independent political group called the September Fund with a goal of raising $10 million to $20 million for House and Senate campaigns -- said his group cannot afford to target races beyond those that Democrats have already identified as must-wins to capture control of the House for the first time since 1994.

"It has been more difficult raising money than I expected," said Ickes, noting that his group has raised between $5 million and $10 million, half its original goal. "My sense is there is more optimism than is probably warranted," he said about Democratic prospects.

If Ickes's statement is correct, most of his group's money has come in recent weeks. According to the latest Federal Election Commission filings, Ickes's group had raised slightly more than $1 million through Sept. 30.

Greenberg added: "I don't see the evidence the big donors are stepping up."

More broadly, Democrats are deeply divided over the smartest political strategy for profiting from a political environment that has deteriorated for Republicans in the aftermath of the Mark Foley page scandal.

Some Democratic officials and donors want their money concentrated to maximize the chances that the party captures the minimum number of seats necessary to gain majorities in the House and the Senate, rather than having resources spread too thin by spending on second-tier targets. The party needs to pick up 15 seats to win control of the House and six to take power in the Senate.

But Carville, Greenberg, Emanuel and others are now arguing in private deliberations that Democrats have a historic chance to not only win the House but also capture enough seats to build an effective governing majority. They are telling donors that it is worth the risk to shoot for a 40-plus seat gain, which would give Democrats a large enough majority to guarantee that they could move legislation and carry out investigations of the Bush administration.

"You would be crazy not to get your donors to do whatever they can and borrow what you need" to run ads in every competitive race, Greenberg said. Based on his polling, Greenberg is telling party leaders that it is not unrealistic to envision a 41-seat gain, which would give Democrats the same governing majority Republicans had after their 1994 takeover.

"I am saying this is a twice-in-a-lifetime environment," Carville said. "You try to maximize it."

Republicans have tacitly acknowledged that Democrats are right about the expanding field of competitive races. In recent days, for instance, national GOP organizations have pumped money into a race for an open seat in Idaho and into other races that were previously regarded by both parties as out of reach for Democrats.

This is not an easy bet for Democrats. It would be virtually impossible to expand the number of House seats with fully competitive races without taking some money away from efforts to win back the Senate.

Democrats said big donors such as George Soros, a billionaire financier who has funded liberal causes, are refusing to help Democrats offset the GOP's edge in spending by outside political groups. A top official who often speaks with Soros and other major benefactors said they remain upset by the Democratic failure to win the White House and Congress in 2004 and have turned their attention to long-term efforts to build a network of think tanks and advocacy organizations to support liberal causes. The richest donors also see presidential elections as more glamorous and worthy of high-level support, the official said.

A spokesman for Soros was out of the country and unreachable.

Bob J. Perry, a Texas realtor and staunch Republican, is on pace to single-handedly outspend many of the Democratic political groups such as Ickes's. Perry has given more than $7 million to efforts targeting nearly a dozen Democratic candidates, including several that are considered long-shot bets.

Bill Buck, a founder of Majority Action, an independent organization hoping to elect a Democratic House majority, said his group is investing $500,000 in New York's 19th district against Rep. Sue W. Kelly (R) -- a race that was hardly on anyone's radar screen at the start of the election campaign. Kelly is being challenged by John Hall, best known for writing the lyrics to the 1970s hit "Still the One." But Democratic officials said any effort to target a new group of GOP House members will have to be financed by the DCCC.

DOJ_NMG_0082914

The DCCC is likely to go deep into debt, perhaps topping the $11 million deficit it racked up in 2004. The committee can borrow as much as a bank is willing to lend. The other option is to take money out of Republican districts that the party is confident it is almost certain to win.

This approach carries a big risk, however. If the party pulls ads in districts such as the Indiana base of Rep. Chris Chocola, who is trailing by double digits in private Democratic polling, it might allow an established GOP incumbent to creep back up in the race.

Congressman Says Earmarks Could Cost GOP Power (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Peter Eisler

USA Today, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — A leading Republican critic of special-interest spending earmarks said Tuesday that the GOP risks its congressional majority by defending the practice.

Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., said a report Tuesday in USA TODAY was the latest in a series of revelations casting an ethical cloud on earmarks, a way lawmakers direct money in a spending bill to a specific item or program.

Flake's opposition to earmarks helped prompt a temporary House rule change requiring the disclosure of some sponsors of earmarks. He said he hoped that rule could be made permanent but faced opposition from Republican supporters of earmarks.

"Until we change that mindset, I don't know that we're going to curb the practice (of earmarking)," Flake said. "Maybe it'll take two years in the wilderness of being in the political minority. I hope that's not what it takes."

The newspaper found that lobbying groups employed 30 family members last year to influence spending bills that their relatives with ties to the House and Senate appropriations committees oversaw or helped write. Combined, they generated millions of dollars in fees for themselves or their firms.

News of two FBI investigations involving lobbyists with family ties to Congress surfaced in the past week. Authorities are investigating whether an aide to Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., broke the law by helping her husband get Pentagon earmarks for his firm's lobbying clients. Agents raided the home of Pennsylvania Republican Rep. Curt Weldon's lobbyist daughter, Karen Weldon, on Monday in a probe of whether Weldon gave favors to his daughter's clients.

Specter, Weldon and the lobbyists deny any wrongdoing.

Neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate have formal rules prohibiting contact between lawmakers and staff and the lobbyists related to them. Efforts for comprehensive ethics changes in Congress have stalled, including a Senate bill that would bar senators from "official contacts" with lobbyists who are close relatives.

Republicans killed those proposals, said House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, who could become House speaker if Democrats win control of the House next month. She said her party would tighten rules to require sponsors of earmarks to identify themselves.

In the Senate, Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee said through a spokeswoman that senators should consider the need for office policies if they or someone on their staff is related to a lobbyist.

"Certainly, making sure there are no appearances of impropriety is an issue," Amy Call said.

Public Wary Of Links With Lobbyists (USAT)

By Peter Eisler And Matt Kelley

USA Today, October 18, 2006

An overwhelming majority of Americans believe it's wrong for lawmakers and their staffs to have contact with relatives who are lobbyists regarding government matters. But a survey of lawmakers suggests they don't see a problem.

A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll shows that 80% of respondents believe such actions are inappropriate. By contrast, few members of the House and Senate appropriations committees say they have policies that prevent lobbying by relatives.

Four committee members who responded to a USA TODAY survey have policies that prevent relatives from lobbying them or their staffs. All are senators: Dick Durbin, D-Ill., Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., and Arlen Specter, R-Pa.

None of the House members who responded reported having such a policy. The newspaper surveyed all 94 members of the appropriations committees; 37 answered the survey.

"We have clearly seen some potential problem areas in this Congress in terms of the role being played by spouses and relatives," says Fred Wertheimer, head of the ethics watchdog group Democracy 21. "That really needs to be examined now to see what kind of rules are necessary to address it."

The USA TODAY/Gallup Poll, taken earlier this month, shows that 72% of respondents are concerned "a great deal" or "a fair amount" about such lobbyist contacts.

DOJ_NMG_0082915

An investigation by the newspaper found 53 cases last year in which members of the appropriations committees or their top aides had relatives in the lobbying business. Of the relatives who sought money in appropriations bills for their clients, 22 succeeded in getting specific language inserted in the bills that guaranteed money for the relatives' clients.

"We handle (potential conflicts of interest) by hiring good, professional, ethical people," says John Scofield, spokesman for the House Appropriations Committee.

"If there's any instance in which there's some sort of inappropriate action being taken at the behest of whoever, that (staffer) would be shown the door." he said. "Everyone around here knows we won't tolerate that."

Dems Using Hourly Wage Issue Against GOP Rivals (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democratic challengers in more than two dozen House and Senate races are attacking Republicans in Congress for taking pay raises while voting against a minimum wage increase.

The attacks are contained in television and radio ads running from Washington state to Virginia. In some races, such as House contests in Indiana and Connecticut, Democrats also link pay raises to Republican votes against combat bonuses for U.S. troops fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan.

While some of the ads may fudge the facts, political analysts say the message appeals to the pocketbook concerns of voters.

"It's a classic theme," says Michael Wolf, a political scientist at Indiana University-Purdue University in Fort Wayne, Ind. "It always plays well because of the perception that these are people sent to Washington, earning a lot of money and turning their backs" on voters.

Jonathan Collegio of the National Republican Congressional Committee says, "Throwing the pay raise into congressional campaigns is an election-year stunt."

Most members of Congress currently earn $165,200 a year; top leaders earn more. That's $31,600 more than in 1997, when the federal minimum wage was raised to the current $5.15 an hour. Unless legislators act during a lame-duck session after Election Day, lawmakers who will be part of the Congress that convenes in January will get an automatic 2% raise to $168,504.

Democrats, led by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, have vowed to oppose any pay increase until Congress raises the minimum wage.

Among Democratic ads:

·In Missouri, challenger Claire McCaskill says in a TV ad that Sen. Jim Talent is the kind of person who "votes 11 times against increasing the minimum wage, but takes six congressional pay raises."

Rich Chrismer, Talent's spokesman, says the senator has "consistently voted against" pay raises and gives "the ones that pass the Congress to charity." He added that Talent has supported minimum wage increases when they are coupled with assistance for small businesses, which cannot absorb the higher costs as easily as big companies.

·In New Mexico, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee attacked Rep. Heather Wilson for voting against a $1,500 bonus for U.S. troops but noted she "voted 'yes' to a congressional pay raise for herself — not once, but six times."

Wilson's spokesman, Enrique Carlos Knell, denies the congresswoman has ever voted for a pay raise. He says Democrats are "trying to rewrite the truth." The troop bonus is a "gimmick," he says, noting Wilson later supported a broader military compensation package.

Ever since lawmakers voted in 1789 to pay themselves $6 a day while in session, congressional pay has been a sticky campaign issue. Lawmakers such as Rep. Jim Matheson, D-Utah, and Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., donate their raises to charity to avoid voter backlash.

Congress thought it found a way to avoid direct votes on pay raises when it instituted annual cost-of- living increases in 1989. The change allows lawmakers to forgo a pay raise if they take several procedural moves to actively cancel it. Since then, Congress has blocked five increases, the last time in 1998.

Peter Sepp of the National Taxpayers Union, a group that opposes increases to both lawmakers' pay and the minimum wage, says some 30-second ads are deceptive because they say an incumbent "took" or "accepted" a pay raise, which implies that the member actively sought it.

"One or two words can be the difference between truth and fiction," he says. Sepp notes that Talent has a "clean record" with votes to block raises while Wilson voted against pay increases twice before voting for them six times.

Sarah Feinberg, spokeswoman for the Democratic campaign committee, disagrees. She says the ads are "about the clearest case you can make about the Republican incumbents not being on the side of middle class families and our troops."

DOJ_NMG_0082916

Collegio accuses Democrats of "political doublespeak at its worst." He notes that the 2003 vote on combat bonuses for troops came just weeks after Republicans voted to increase military pay and other benefits. Collegio notes that "by their own goofy standards," Pelosi and Minority Whip Steny Hoyer of Maryland are just as guilty of raising their own pay.

Matheson has tried for the last six years to force a direct vote on the pay raise so members are clearly on the record about the issue. Each time his attempt has failed.

Members are "hesitant … to take a true up-or-down vote on whether to increase their pay," says Matheson, whose ads link congressional salaries to the spiraling federal deficit. "I think $165,000 is a lot of money."

GOP Shifts Back To A Basic Issue: Taxes (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON

In an election season where the Republicans can't seem to buy a break, the party's highest-profile campaigners have gone back to a bedrock GOP issue: taxes.

In an address to Republican donors in Topeka, Kan., last week, Vice President Cheney cited taxes first - before Iraq, before the war on terror - calling them "one of the most important issues on November 7th."

After a month of speeches focused on terrorism, President Bush has also moved taxes to the fore, speaking ominously of how if "they," the Democrats, "were to get in charge of the House of Representatives, they would raise your taxes and figure out new ways to spend your money," as he did at a campaign event in Chicago last week.

While the president tends to keep his remarks general, Mr. Cheney and Republican National Committee chair Ken Mehlman get personal. They target in particular Rep. Charles Rangel (D) of New York, who would become chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee if the Democrats win control of the House. They assert as fact that Mr. Rangel favors "across-the-board tax increases," which Rangel and the Democrats vigorously deny. But the debate has been framed, and it is one that has resonated for decades in the back and forth of partisan politics.

"It plays to the basic party stereotypes, and of course most people, if you give them an unalloyed choice of paying more taxes or less taxes, they'll pick less taxes every time," says Larry Sabato, political scientist at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville. Voter concerns

The problem for Republicans is that taxes don't rank high on surveys of voter concerns, in an election dominated by talk of Iraq, scandals, and uneasiness about the economy in general.

The latest Gallup poll shows likely voters saying that congressional Democrats would do a better job of handling every issue - from healthcare to Iraq to moral standards in the country - than congressional Republicans. Democrats also beat Republicans on handling terrorism, for the first time in the five years Gallup has asked that question.

"I'm not sure that any polls are going to show the Republicans beating the Democrats on anything in this environment," says Republican pollster Whit Ayres.

But he argues that focusing on taxes - and on the prospect of a Chairman Rangel - is still good politics, even though most voters don't pay much attention to the details of the House, such as who runs the committees.

"That doesn't mean that it's not a very effective issue to use with activist voters, and to persuade Republicans that they'd better turn out to vote or else," says Mr. Ayres.

Says Mr. Sabato: "It's red meat for the base, but I think it does extend to a lot of independents.... You look at the issues here, and what do they [the Republicans] have? This is a very tough year for Republicans, so they have to go to golden oldies." What's at stake on tax issue

At issue is not a proposal for major new tax cuts, but what will happen when temporary tax relief provisions are about to expire. A reduction in the marriage tax is set to expire Jan. 1, 2011, as is a boost in the child tax credit. The estate tax, which affects the wealthiest 2 percent of Americans, now applies only to inheritances exceeding $2 million, but that higher ceiling expires in 2008.

Rangel presents Republicans with the perfect foil. He is an unabashed liberal who has represented a poor district in Harlem since 1970, and he does not shy away from a good fight. In recent media interviews, he has stated that as chair of Ways and Means, he would work across the aisle and end the intense partisanship of the Bush years. But he has also held open the idea of not renewing any of Bush's temporary tax cuts, and thus has prompted an untold number of GOP press releases and attacks.

In an interview with Bloomberg news service Sept. 20, he said he "cannot think of one" of Bush's first-term tax cuts that should be renewed. According to a Rangel aide, the comment needs to be taken in context: The tax cuts don't expire for several years, and it's too soon to say for sure what should happen to them.

DOJ_NMG_0082917

Meanwhile, Rangel noted in the interview, a priority for the new Congress should be reforming the alternative minimum tax, a system designed originally to make sure wealthy people cannot avoid paying taxes but which has increasingly affected middle-class taxpayers. That will be an expensive reform, and Rangel wants to reinstate the "pay-as-you-go" system that requires new spending to be covered by revenue increases. Party leaders battle over taxes

Howard Dean, the Democratic national chair, said on CNN Sunday that Republican warnings that the Democrats will raise taxes are "nonsense."

But RNC chair Mr. Mehlman, when asked on CNN about Mr. Dean's comment, said, "That's what he says. But the guy that writes the tax laws, a guy named Charlie Rangel, the week they got out of town, said across-the-board tax increases."

Given that taxes are not a top concern for voters in this election, Republicans will have to work hard to put the issue on their radar screen, says Sabato.

"That's where their money comes in, that's where their ads come in," he says. "They know the news media aren't going to cover that extensively, so they're going to pay for it."

Tax Questions Abound On Ballots Across Nation (WSJ)

By Rob Wells

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Voters from South Carolina to South Dakota might be surprised to find a significant tax question, such as a property-tax cap, on the November ballot.

Nationwide, there are some 40 measures to increase or decrease taxes or to restrict spending, according to a University of Southern California survey. But many are gaining little publicity in an election year dominated by the possible change of control in Congress. Unlike many state tax measures in past years, this year's measures have sparked little taxpayer outcry.

"There's not a bunch of anger out there about a particular tax," says John G. Matsusaka, president of USC's Initiative & Referendum Institute.

One reason: State governments have had consistently strong revenue growth in the past two years, growth that "some would even say is bordering on the remarkable," says Harley Duncan, executive director of the Federation of Tax Administrators. Lack of severe financial problems "does tend to keep down the number of these sorts of proposals," Mr. Duncan says.

South Carolina Tax Assessments

One of the more significant property tax measures is in South Carolina, where voters will decide whether to limit increases in property tax assessments to no more than 15% every five years. Blease Graham Jr., a political science professor at University of South Carolina, says the measure has received some unfavorable newspaper editorials. While the proposal would cap appraisals, local governments under state law will be required to adjust property-tax rates to raise the same amount of money. The result would cap taxes for valuable waterfront properties while shifting the tax burden to less-valuable properties, he says.

South Dakota voters also are being asked to cap property-tax assessments, but that measure is getting little attention amid an intense campaign over another ballot measure to repeal a state abortion ban.

"To say it is being overshadowed is an understatement," says William D. Richardson, chairman of the University of South Dakota political science department. "I expect this one will come as a bit of a surprise to voters as they work their way through the ballot."

Georgia has a measure to exempt senior citizens from the state portion of the property tax, but there's little talk about it. "It's not getting much attention but I think it will overwhelmingly pass," says Alan Essig, executive director of the Georgia Budget and Policy Institute, a local think tank. Mr. Essig says while exempting seniors from a small state-level property tax is "an election-year gimmick," the idea has drawn little opposition. "It's not controversial at all," he says. The plan would reduce state revenues by about $6.8 million in the 2008 fiscal year, Mr. Essig says.

Washington Estate Tax

Another significant state ballot issue is a Washington state measure to repeal a state-level estate tax. Such a repeal would reduce state revenues by $184.5 million over the next two fiscal years. The estate tax, enacted in 2005, is directed to reduce school class sizes and fund education.

The issue is significant in Washington because of the contested U.S. Senate re-election race for Democrat Maria Cantwell. She voted against estate-tax reductions in the Senate this year in the face of intense pressure from antitax advocates.

Support for the estate-tax repeal is lagging, however; a Sept. 21 poll by Washington pollster Stuart Elway showed it losing 38% to 45%. Opponents include William Gates Sr., father of Microsoft founder Bill Gates Jr.

"We haven't seen any kind of grassroots groundswell of support for repealing the state level estate tax," says Sandeep Kaushik, spokesman for the repeal opposition group.

DOJ_NMG_0082918

Sen. Cantwell's opponent, Republican Mike McGavick, former chief executive officer of insurance company Safeco, highlighted his opposition to the federal estate tax during a campaign event earlier this month.

Dennis Falk, head of the estate-tax repeal effort, argues that the estate-tax burdens working family businesses that invest capital to create jobs in Washington and that repeal won't hurt educational funding, which traditionally comes from the state's general fund.

State Taxes on Cigarettes

Increases in cigarette taxes are on the ballot in Arizona, South Dakota and California, where voters in that state will be asked to back a $2.60-a-pack cigarette tax, up from 87 cents a pack. Californians also will decide two other possible tax increases: a new tax on oil pumped from state wells and a $50 property parcel tax for public schools. The estimated $4 billion in funds from the oil tax would be dedicated to alternative-energy programs.

USC's Mr. Matsusaka isn't optimistic about the outlook for any of these, noting that a 1980 proposition to tax state-produced oil also failed. While cigarette tax increases generally win approval, he says, "There is a sense in California that people are hesitant to impose taxes on really narrow groups." * * *

BRIEFS: Happy Anniversary: The Internal Revenue Service is throwing a party to celebrate the 20th anniversary of the landmark 1986 tax overhaul. IRS Chief Counsel Don Korb said the event, featuring important behind-the-scenes players such as former Treasury officials John "Buck" Chapoton and Ronald Pearlman, will help "create a sense of history in our office." Is this a way to get the IRS troops fired up for another major tax-reform effort? "Not at all," Mr. Korb says. ... The IRS has a new associate chief counsel to oversee partnerships and "special industries," William P. O'Shea, a 28-year veteran of the agency. The office provides legal advice on issues ranging from estate taxation to energy taxes and tax shelters.

Alarm Bells For G.O.P. In A Battleground State (NYT)

By John M. Broder And Megan Thee

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

The bellwether state of Ohio appears to have become hostile terrain for Republicans this year, with voters there overwhelmingly saying Democrats are more likely to help create jobs and concluding by a wide margin that Republicans in the state are more prone to political corruption than are Democrats, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News poll.

Home this year to closely watched races for governor, United States Senate and a growing roster of competitive House seats, Ohio is one of the most contested battlegrounds of 2006, and one in which voters at this point are strongly favoring Democrats on many issues.

The Democratic candidates for governor and Senate hold commanding double-digit leads over their Republican opponents in the poll, and respondents said they intended to vote for the Democratic candidate for the House in their district by 50 percent to 32 percent.

The results contained alarm bells for President Bush and his party across the nation three weeks from Election Day.

The poll found a striking slippage in the president's standing among white evangelical Christians, a constituency that has provided a strong vote cushion for Republican candidates in recent elections. In November 2004, 76 percent of white evangelical Christians in Ohio voted for Mr. Bush. When asked in this poll whether they approved or disapproved of the job Mr. Bush was doing as president, 49 percent approved while 45 percent disapproved.

Ohio is a Republican-leaning but heavily contested state that twice voted to elect Mr. Bush and gave him his Electoral College margin of victory in 2004. But it is not a perfect microcosm of the country, and in particular has higher levels of economic anxiety, the poll found.

Sixty-five percent of those surveyed rated the state's economy as bad; only 34 percent said it was good. In Ohio, 49 percent of respondents described the nation's economy as good, and 50 percent said it was bad. In a Times/CBS News poll conducted nationally this month, 60 percent said the economy was good, and 39 percent said it was bad.

A plurality, 46 percent of voters, said the economy and jobs were the most important issues facing Ohio, while 17 percent cited health care, 15 percent said terrorism and 12 percent said the war in Iraq. Seventy percent said that both Ohio and the nation were on the wrong track, a number that often spells doom for the party in power.

More than three-quarters of Ohioans in the poll said they strongly favored a ballot measure to raise the state minimum wage to $6.85 an hour from $5.15 an hour. The ballot measure is backed by labor unions and other Democratic interests and is intended in part to draw Democratic voters to the polls on Election Day, just as measures to outlaw same-sex marriage propelled Republicans to vote in several states two years ago.

Only a third of Ohio voters approve of the job Mr. Bush is doing as president or the way he is handling the economy, and they seem poised to take their discontent out on Republican candidates up and down the ballot. Republican officials at the national level said this week they had all but written off the Senate and governor's races in Ohio and were diverting resources to other states where they believed they had a better chance of winning.

DOJ_NMG_0082919

"In Ohio we've seen nothing but our manufacturing jobs cease to exist," said one poll respondent, David Stuck, 59, of Miami Township, who said he had voted twice for Mr. Bush. Mr. Stuck, a Republican, blamed inaction at the federal level for the evaporation of jobs in Ohio and said he planned to vote for the Democratic candidate for United States Senate, Sherrod Brown, over the incumbent, Mike DeWine, a Republican.

"Call it a protest," Mr. Stuck said in a follow-up interview. "I haven't seen anything done in the last six years. To be honest, I'm truly thinking about voting Democratic across the board because I'm tired of Bush."

The statewide telephone poll was conducted Wednesday through Sunday with 1,164 adults, including 1,020 registered voters. The margin of sampling error for the entire group is plus or minus three percentage points, and it is the same for the registered voters.

More than half of the poll's respondents said they believed corruption was widespread in Ohio and said, by a three-to-one ratio, that the Republican Party had more corrupt politicians than the Democrats. Gov. Bob Taft, a Republican, pleaded no contest last year to ethics charges arising from dealings with a crooked investment manager. Representative Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican, pleaded guilty to corruption charges last week arising from his association with Jack Abramoff, the lobbyist at the center of the influence-selling scandal in Washington.

Doris Stucky, a 79-year-old retired nurse from New Philadelphia, said she thought all politicians were corrupt. "I think they're out to line their pocketbooks and get votes and they don't care what they do or say to get them," said Mrs. Stucky, a Republican, in a telephone interview after she participated in the poll.

"They came down on Bob Ney, and I don't think he's any more guilty than the rest of them," she said. "It's the same in Ohio. I think politicians are all the same. I wish we could find some good honest Christian politicians, but I don't think there are any." Mrs. Stucky said she was undecided about whom she would vote for.

By large margins, Ohio voters said they trusted Democrats over Republicans to handle government spending and create new jobs.

The sour mood in Ohio about the economy and the performance of incumbents at all levels appears to be a motivating factor for voters who identify themselves as Democrats. Fifty-five percent of Democrats said they were more enthusiastic about voting than in previous elections for Congress, while only 30 percent of Republicans said they were.

The tide of dissatisfaction appears ready to wash out Mr. DeWine, who is trailing Mr. Brown by 34 percent to 48 percent, the poll found. The Democratic candidate for governor, Representative Ted Strickland, is leading the Republican nominee, J. Kenneth Blackwell, the Ohio secretary of state, by 53 percent to 29 percent.

The omens in the poll were almost uniformly grim for the president and his party. Six out of 10 respondents disapprove of the way Mr. Bush is handling the economy and Iraq, and a plurality of Ohioans (by 40 percent to 36 percent) disapprove of the way he is managing the nuclear crisis on the Korean peninsula. The approval rating for the Republican-led Congress is a paltry 22 percent. Among adults nationwide, 27 percent approve of the way Congress is doing its job.

One bright spot for the president and Republicans was that while about 60 percent said they had made up their minds about this year's elections, 4 in 10 said it was too early to say how they would vote.

Many Democrats in Ohio still harbor resentment about the 2004 presidential contest between Mr. Bush and Senator John Kerry, which Mr. Bush officially won by about 120,000 votes out of 5.6 million cast in Ohio. Only 30 percent of Democratic poll respondents said they believed the 2004 vote count was fair and accurate, while 64 percent said it was not. (Many conspiracy-minded Democratic activists accused Mr. Blackwell, who serves as statewide supervisor of elections, of manipulating voting technology to help Mr. Bush win.) Republicans, by 89 percent to 8 percent, said the voting was fair and balanced.

Twenty-eight percent of those polled said an adult in their household had been out of work and looking for a job in the past 12 months, and 44 percent of them said they were worried that someone in their family would be out of work in the coming year.

James Reed, 50, a self-described independent voter from Ashtabula, said in a follow-up interview that Mr. Taft, who is not running for re-election, "has sold us down the road as far as jobs are concerned." Mr. Reed, a disabled chemical plant worker, said trade restrictions were needed to prevent American jobs from being shipped overseas, a view shared by 69 percent of Ohioans surveyed.

Republicans Put $700G In TV Ads In Ohio (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 18, 2006

The Republican Party placed $700,000 in television ads in Ohio Tuesday, a scaled-back ad campaign amid growing doubts by party officials that GOP Sen. Mike DeWine can win re-election in the battleground state.

DOJ_NMG_0082920

The ads by the party are smaller than recent million-dollar ad buys by the National Republican Senatorial Committee. But party officials touted the ads as evidence that they were not abandoning the state or giving up on DeWine.

Strategists from both parties were following the Republican steps closely because the GOP had chosen Ohio, Tennessee and Missouri as political fortifications against a Democratic takeover of the Senate. Democrats need a net gain of six seats to win control of the Senate.

Polls this week in Ohio show DeWine trailing his Democratic opponent, Rep. Sherrod Brown, by 7 to 12 percentage points.

Republican Party officials are turning their sights to Virginia to offer needed help to Sen. George Allen, who has been unable to stop a rapidly tightening race with Democrat Jim Webb. Virginia already is part of the party's aggressive voter turnout operation and party officials are said to be weighing a substantial ad campaign in the state as well. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee already is spending about $1.1 million on ads in Virginia against Allen.

Allen, once considered a likely candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, holds a financial advantage in the campaign but has lost ground to Webb after a series of campaign mishaps. A recent Washington Post poll had Allen and Webb virtually tied, with Allen's lead within the poll's margin of error.

Republicans, looking to pick up a potential Democratic Senate seat, spent $500,000 to air ads in New Jersey against Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez, who is being closely challenged by Republican Tom Kean Jr.

Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, the chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, conceded Tuesday that New Jersey is the only Democratic-held seat where Democrats do not hold comfortable double-digit leads, but said the party can withstand a last-minute expenditure against a Democratic senator.

"We believe we have the ability on defense should they put a lot of money in one state, particularly a blue state, to answer it," he said.

He would not say which state, but did not dispute a suggestion that Democrats may counter the money Republicans are spending in New Jersey.

Republicans were also taking a second look at some House races they once considered safe from Democrats.

The National Republican Congressional Committee is paying for polling in the Kentucky congressional district of Rep. Anne Northup and the Pennsylvania district of Rep. Melissa Hart. Such polls usually are commissioned to determine whether the party needs to put in resources to help a candidate in trouble.

In another new battleground, both parties signaled that they will begin airing television ads in GOP Rep. Gil Gutknecht's re-election race in Minnesota, a campaign not previously considered competitive.

Both parties have also stepped up their spending on other means of reaching voters, particularly direct mail and automated phone calls. Since Friday, the National Republican Congressional Committee has about $350,000 in mailings and phone banks, most critical of Democratic candidates. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee reported more than $550,000 spent on phone banks, mostly against Republican candidates.

The NRCC also reported airing about $2 million in television commercials in nine highly competitive congressional districts. Republicans have hope they can hold onto the seat of former Rep. Mark Foley, who resigned in the midst of a scandal over sexually explicit electronic messages to teenage male pages. The NRCC reported spending more than $270,000 on an ad opposing the Democratic candidate for the seat, Tim Mahoney.

Pro-Republican Ads Stretch The Truth On Iraq To Influence Elections (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - It's an easy claim to make, calling yourself a "political truth squad." But when a shadowy group pouring untraceable millions into this fall's campaign makes that claim, that bears a little truth-checking itself.

Television ads from the group, Progress for America, manage to grab the heart, but also stretch or twist the truth as they work to boost support for the Iraq war.

They feature David Beamer, whose son led a counterattack against the terrorists who hijacked United Flight 93 on Sept. 11, 2001. Todd Beamer was the one who said, "Let's roll," as he and others courageously stormed the cockpit. The plane crashed in a field in Pennsylvania, well short of either the Capitol or White House, its presumed target.

"Todd was one of the passengers and crew who fought back on 9/11 and saved our capital from being destroyed," the elder Beamer says in one ad, looking squarely into the camera as a picture of his smiling son flashes beside him.

"Al-Qaida killed 3,000 Americans on 9/11 and will do anything to destroy us and our way of life. Todd and United 93 fought back. We continue this fight in Iraq today. This enemy must be destroyed in Iraq and wherever we find them."

That makes it sound as though the war in Iraq is retaliation against al-Qaida.

DOJ_NMG_0082921

It's not. Iraq had nothing to do with al-Qaida's attack on us. In fact, a recent Senate Intelligence Committee report showed that not only did Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein not have anything to do with Sept. 11, he also wanted nothing to do with al-Qaida and shunned pleas for help from Osama bin Laden.

"Saddam Hussein was distrustful of al-Qaida and viewed Islamic extremists as a threat to his regime, refusing all requests from al-Qaida to provide material or operational support," the report said.

Asked to back up its ad, the group pointed to news articles about al-Qaida in Iraq now. But we didn't "find" al-Qaida in Iraq. They came in to fight us after we invaded.

Misleading assertions like those made by Progress for America feed a lingering misunderstanding of the Iraq war. As recently as March, 39 percent of Americans believed that Saddam was personally involved in the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks, according to the Gallup poll. That's down from 53 percent in 2002, but still surprisingly high.

Progress for America presumably hopes the ads will rebuild that false connection between Sept. 11 and Iraq - and thus make the Iraq war more justifiable to an increasingly skeptical public. The ads are being aired in Missouri and Ohio, two states where Republican senators are in danger of losing their seats, and on national cable TV.

Progress for America is a mysterious conservative group. It has aired ads supporting President Bush and his Supreme Court nominees, as well as the war in Iraq and the war on terrorism.

It was founded in 2001 as a "527" group, named for a section of the tax code, and raised an estimated $45 million for ads in the 2004 campaign.

It's now incorporated under section 501c(4) of the tax code, which prohibits it from directly supporting or opposing candidates, but also exempts it from having to disclose who finances it.

Nicole Philbin, a spokeswoman for the group, declined to say how much it's raised or spent, or who has financed its ads.

The group has another ad featuring Beamer, this one supporting the war on terrorism and ripping unnamed people who question U.S. tactics. It was aired in Missouri and on national cable channels.

In it, Beamer says: "Now, we have narrowly escaped another 9/11 . . . using prove surveillance that some would stop."

That's a reference to the breakup of a plot to blow up U.S.-bound planes from London - and an apparent suggestion that it was stopped using the kind of warrantless eavesdropping that the Bush administration uses here.

But there's no evidence that the London plot was stopped by warrantless eavesdropping. And there's no backup to the assertion that "some" want to stop U.S. surveillance.

To the contrary, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who would chair the Judiciary Committee in a Democrat-controlled Senate, told a recent congressional hearing that he supports eavesdropping, but wants it done with court oversight.

To back up the ad, the group noted news articles that refer to U.S. surveillance done at the time of the London investigation. But that surveillance was done with court approval - exactly the approach that has universal support here. There was no documentation of the charge that "some" want to stop that surveillance.

To see the Beamer ads, go to www.progressforamerica.org and click on "videos."

For more on the Senate Intelligence Committee report, http://intelligence.senate.gov/phaseiiaccuracy.pdf

Colo. Opens Probe On Beauprez Attack Ad (AP-Y)

By Steven K. Paulson

AP, October 18, 2006

Colorado authorities have opened a criminal investigation into whether an attack ad run by GOP Rep. Bob Beauprez against his opponent for governor illegally used confidential information from a federal law enforcement database.

Democrat Bill Ritter's campaign has suggested the information was taken from the computerized crime records.

But John Marshall, the congressman's spokesman, said Tuesday that the details came from an informant he refused to identify. He said the campaign is cooperating with investigators.

The investigation marks an ugly turn for what has so far been a relatively mild campaign to succeed Republican Gov. Bill Owens, who is prevented by term limits from running again. Recent polls show the two-term congressman trailing Ritter, a former Denver district attorney.

The governor has asked the Colorado Bureau of Investigation to expedite its investigation. Use of the federal criminal database for any purpose other than law enforcement is a crime punishable by fines and up to a year in prison.

The TV ad in question refers to Carlos Estrada Medina, a suspected illegal immigrant who was arrested in Denver in 2001 on suspicion of heroin trafficking. The ad says Ritter chose to seek a plea bargain in the case, Medina avoided deportation, and he was later arrested in California on suspicion of sexually assaulting a minor.

DOJ_NMG_0082922

Reporters found that the person arrested in Colorado was identified as Walter Noel Romo and had a different birthdate than Medina, according to the Ritter campaign. When questioned about the man's identity, the Beauprez campaign said Romo and Medina were the same man because federal criminal databases indicated the two men had the same FBI numbers.

Ritter spokesman Evan Dreyer said the campaign tried verifying that information through public records but could not — raising the possibility that the databases were illegally accessed.

"We could not connect the dots using information available to the public in a way that made any sense at all," Dreyer said. "If we couldn't do it, how was the congressman able to do it?"

Arrest records are the only public information in the database, CBI spokesman Lance Clem said.

Political Ad Draws A Criminal Inquiry (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

DENVER, Oct. 17 (AP) — Colorado authorities have opened a criminal investigation into whether an attack advertisement run by Representative Bob Beauprez against his opponent in the governor's race illegally used confidential information from a federal law enforcement database.

The television advertisement in question criticizes Mr. Beauprez's opponent, Bill Ritter, a Democratic former district attorney, for seeking a plea bargain in the case of a suspected illegal immigrant arrested on charges of heroin trafficking.

Mr. Ritter's campaign has suggested the information was taken from computerized crime records. Use of the federal criminal database for any purpose other than law enforcement is a crime.

But John Marshall, Mr. Beauprez's spokesman, said Tuesday that the details came from an informant he refused to identify. He said the campaign was cooperating with investigators.

The race is to succeed Gov. Bill Owens, a Republican who, because of term limits, cannot run again.

Virginia's Senate Race (WP)

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

THE U.S. SENATE race in Virginia pits a novice politician, Democrat James Webb , against a much more experienced one, incumbent Republican George Allen, who spent much of the early fall obliterating his reputation for amiable charm and political deftness. As Mr. Allen has partially admitted, his wounds in the close race have been mostly self-inflicted and have left a sour taste in the mouths of many Virginians. Still, there is an even better reason to vote against Mr. Allen: Quite simply, he is a mediocre senator whose six years of undistinguished service do not justify rehiring.

His opponent -- former Navy secretary, former assistant defense secretary, former Marine Corps officer and former Republican -- is admirably independent-minded. He was prescient in warning, back in 2002, that the war in Iraq risked stranding the United States in a long-term occupation without an exit strategy. An intelligent man with a record of integrity, he has resisted the packaging of political consultants, which can only be a good thing. Those assets, as well as his deep familiarity with military and national security affairs, offer the promise that he would make an able, if unorthodox, U.S. senator. And the fact that his youngest son is deployed as a marine in Iraq gives him a perspective that is rare in today's Congress.

Mr. Webb, a fine writer, remains in many ways a political work in progress. His impressionistic grasp of domestic policy generally and his passing acquaintance with Virginia issues in particular reflect his meager experience in electoral politics. His diagnosis of America's widening disparities in wealth and income is on the mark, but his fuzzy-headed attacks on free trade are the wrong prescription. As a candidate, Mr. Webb has had a steep learning curve; to his credit, he has acknowledged it.

Mr. Allen lacks any comparable independent-mindedness. He has spent his time in the Senate in lock step with the Bush administration, embracing tax cuts that have imperiled the nation's fiscal health; subsidies for oil and gas companies that hardly needed the help; prisoner detention policies that have undercut America's image abroad; and restrictions on embryonic stem cell research despite its medical potential.

At the same time, Mr. Allen has accomplished little for his state's most dynamic region, Northern Virginia. Other Republican members of Virginia's congressional delegation -- Sen. John W. Warner and Reps. Thomas M. Davis III and Frank R. Wolf -- have played vital roles in advancing transit and other priorities while Mr. Allen was busy grooming himself for a possible 2008 presidential race.

Many of the initiatives that Mr. Allen has undertaken in the Senate are the easy stuff -- relatively noncontroversial measures that lavish money and favors on his constituents. Nothing wrong with that, if it's part of a broader record of accomplishment. But while Mr. Allen has proposed some worthwhile bills -- for instance, to expand investment in nanotechnology and to help historically black colleges and universities upgrade their telecommunications infrastructure -- his legislative contributions have been marginal at best. He is no one's idea of a heavyweight in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0082923

Virginians deserve better and more enlightened representation. Mr. Webb offers that hope.

Don't Call Him Redneck (WP)

By Libby Copeland

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

About a year ago, before he was running for the Senate, James Webb took a colleague to the mountains of southwest Virginia to do some research for a movie they were working on.

Rob Reiner , meet my cousin Jewel and her husband, Buck. Jewel made a home-cooked meal for Webb and his producer-director friend. She pointed across the way to a nearby hollow and said:

"Ah wuz bawn rat ovah theyah." That's Reiner on the phone from Los Angeles, doing a mountain accent.

At night, Webb took Reiner to a rustic auditorium. There was bluegrass and flatfoot dancing.

"Incredible experience," Reiner says.

There may be few places in the country more foreign to Hollywood than Gate City, Va., and much of Webb's livelihood has been to translate one culture for another. His dad's family came out of these hollows, though Webb grew up on military bases all over the country. Over the course of his career, in books and more recently in screenplays, Webb, 60, has been writing about the dignity of his people -- the gun-loving, country-music-singing, working-class whites of Scotch-Irish descent who fight in wars, staff the nation's factories and shop its Wal-Marts.

"This people gave our country great things, including its most definitive culture," Webb writes in his most recent book.

He knows that some folks might call his people rednecks. We pity those folks if Jim Webb is around when they say that.

* * *

Webb has moved in and out of public life, but the near-constant over the years has been writing, ever since he read a short story by Hemingway at Georgetown Law School and thought to himself, "That looks easy."

It wasn't, of course.

He is best known for the novel he started shortly after that, "Fields of Fire," a book he sweated over and struggled with, writing and rewriting it "seven times, cover to cover," as he likes to say. Drawing on his experience as a Marine company commander in Vietnam, it was published to much acclaim in 1978, when Webb was already serving as counsel to the House Committee on Veterans Affairs.

He went on to become assistant secretary of defense under Ronald Reagan and then secretary of the Navy. When he quit that post in a protest over budget cuts, he added screenwriting and producing to his rÃ©sumÃ© and spent 2 1/2 years trying to bring American businesses into Vietnam. And he kept writing books. In all, he has written six novels and, most recently, a book of nonfiction about Scotch-Irish culture. (That's not counting an academic book he wrote in law school, about U.S. military strategy in the Pacific.)

Campaign officials for Webb's opponent, Republican Sen. George Allen, have repeatedly referenced Webb's careers in writing and in movies, hoping these labels might imply he is out of touch, untrustworthy or -- perhaps worst of all in Virginia -- liberal. In a debate, Allen said Webb was more aligned with the "values of Hollywood" than the "values of Virginia." "Hollywood," of course, is itself a dirty word in the popular political lexicon, a kind of shorthand for things that are lefty, elitist and vaguely debauched.

The funny thing is, Webb -- a Democrat who became a Republican in the '70s and a Democrat again in recent years -- has been a largely conservative force both in movies and on the printed page. At various times he has eviscerated liberals, feminists, elites, academics and those who protested the Vietnam War. He has criticized Hollywood for its treatment of his people. By all rights, he should have alienated someone like Rob Reiner. Instead, Reiner has been giving money to his Senate bid. ("I've maxed out," Reiner says.) Much of what they share is a deep opposition to the Iraq war.

The project that took Webb and Reiner to the hills of southwestern Virginia is a script they'd been working on for a movie about this very subject. "Whiskey River" centers on an Iraq war soldier who hails from a world much like Gate City, Va., and what Reiner calls the "culture of service" this soldier comes from. It is also, Reiner says, about the fundamental unfairness of a war in which "only certain people have to sacrifice."

The notion of his people's sacrifice in wartime is a theme Webb has returned to again and again in his writing. In his 2004 book, "Born Fighting: How the Scots-Irish Shaped America," Webb writes that the Scotch-Irish "have fed dedicated soldiers to this nation far beyond their numbers in every war." In interviews, he recalls starting law school in 1972 and discovering that others were in "ethnocentric retreat." Everyone else knew who they were and where they came from, everyone else had ethnic pride, but the identity of Webb's own culture had been lost. He says his peers labeled him a white man of privilege, a WASP.

In the decades since, Webb has studied the migrations of his people, exulting in their fighting history and puzzling over their entrenched poverty. He is himself the product of a long line of military men, and his son Jimmy is a Marine in Iraq. Webb's dad was an Air Force officer who used to make 4-year-old Webb hit him, fist to fist, to prove he was tough. Webb once told an interviewer he used to have to stand "at attention" when his dad inspected his room:

DOJ_NMG_0082924

"I'd say, 'Hey, Dad,' and he'd say, 'Shut up, you're a corporal.' "Everybody's Villains

Webb can be grim and stiff in public. In a recent appearance to generate support among Hispanic voters for his Virginia Senate run, Webb looked off into the distance as speakers took the podium, his body rigid, looking about as relaxed as, well, a corporal standing at attention. When the crowd whooped and clapped for him, he didn't even smile.

But one-on-one, Webb can really talk. He breaks into spontaneous, growling recitation of a manly poem called "Do You Fear the Wind?" that he learned from his father, and launches into a disquisition on country music. He critiques the prose of Winston Churchill ("marvelous") and Teddy Roosevelt ("a little over the top"). His manner is relaxed, bordering on incautious. Regarding his early drafts of a particular book, he says (unsenatorially) that "they all sucked."

He recalls a magazine article he wrote in 1984: "We had the second-highest volume of mail of anything that Parade's ever published."

He talks about his love of poetry. Yeats. Pound. Dylan Thomas. He talks about his books. "In a lot of my writing, the narrative is in meter," Webb says. "I don't know if you've ever noticed that."

We hadn't. He pulls out a copy of "Fields of Fire" and reads aloud to demonstrate.

"Fields of Fire" -- about Marines serving in Vietnam even as America has begun to turn its back on them -- is filled with the ugliness of combat, beautifully rendered. Tom Wolfe called it "the finest of the Vietnam novels," and it remains a strong seller to this day. Webb started it when he was surrounded by antiwar and anti-vet fervor. He was shocked that so many of his law school peers had avoided the draft; this seemed a gross inequity. He wanted those who hadn't served to experience the war as he had, to respect the soldiers who put their lives on the line no matter the cause.

In brutal language, peppered with obscenities and ethnic slurs, "Fields of Fire" demonstrates the horrors and murky morality of war. A man is blown open and his torso becomes "a dripping ooze." A Vietnamese translator who works for the Marines bribes a starving villager into having sex with him in exchange for food. Even when Webb's characters do gruesome things, he does not make it easy to condemn them.

As journalist Robert Timberg wrote, "Webb challenges the reader to engage in the actions of his characters, dusting each scene with ambiguity, offering no pat answers."

One of the main characters is a man much like Webb, a soldier of Scotch-Irish descent who comes from a tradition of fighters. Before going into combat, this character meets the battalion executive officer, who warns him about the ways the war will wreck his soul.

"You spend a month in the bush and you're not a Marine anymore. Hell. You're not even a goddamn person. There's no tents, no barbed wire, no hot food . . . You roll around in your own filth. You forget how bad you smell. Dead people, guts in the goddamn dirt, miserable civilians, it all gets sort of boring."

A paper trail is a dangerous thing for any politician to leave behind, and Webb's paper trail -- thousands of pages written over the course of 30 years -- is a very long one indeed. The Allen campaign's researchers have read all of Webb's books and compiled an exhaustive list of everything one might find offensive, with racial slurs in bold, along with such categories as "Women as Sex Objects (See also 'Sex Scenes')" and "Mutilation of the Dead."

"He makes his literary and movie works part of the debate in this campaign," says Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams. "It'll be up to Virginia to decide if that helps him or hurts him."

"I'm of the realist school of writing," Webb says. "You have a duty to portray things as they really are."

But there is less room for this sort of realism on the campaign trail than in fiction. Less room for ambiguity, too. These are lessons Webb appears still to be learning.

In a recent interview in the back of his campaign RV, Webb talks about how Hollywood has lampooned the Scotch-Irish. He says he is sick of this story line. For too long, he says, poor Southern whites have been one of the few groups it's still safe to make fun of.

"Every movie needs a villain," Webb says. He could let the statement end there, but instead, he does a strange thing. In the midst of a Senate race marked by accusations of racial insensitivity on both sides, he says this:

"Towel-heads and rednecks -- of which I am one. If you write that word, please say that. I mean, I don't use that pejoratively, I use it defensively. Towel-heads and rednecks became the easy villains in so many movies out there."

Later, Webb's press secretary learns of this quote, and the next day Webb is calling a reporter from a fundraiser in Atlanta:

"I used the words that are used to stereotype them," he says, adding that he was using both terms "defensively." "I'm really upset if this is going to end up being the guppy that eats the whale here."Speaking of Stereotypes . . .

Webb knows another Hollywood story line very well. It's the one in which his potential movies languish for years. His most visible success was writing the original story for the 2000 movie "Rules of Engagement," starring Samuel L. Jackson. He has also sold or optioned several of his books to studios, but none has been made into a movie. Yet. There are timing issues, says his literary manager, Pete Donaldson. Or there are competing projects. Or there's a problem with the studio.

DOJ_NMG_0082925

Most recently, "Whiskey River," optioned last year by Warner Bros. for $150,000, has moved into a holding pattern. Perhaps typical of Hollywood, Reiner, Webb and Donaldson each give different reasons why.

Webb has had other deals. In the early 1990s, he had a screenwriting contract with Universal that included working on other writers' screenplays. A few years back he wrote a pilot for a television series, but the show never made it to production. He's never lived in Hollywood, though he has visited the West Coast regularly for business.

Webb's books have continued to be popular. Webb says he receives "well into the six figures" on book advances, and according to a financial disclosure report filed in May in connection with his campaign, he is now worth between $2.2 million and $6.4 million. (The Senate disclosure form requires that candidates list their assets within broad ranges.) He lives in Falls Church with his third wife, Hong Le Webb, a lawyer who was born in Vietnam and escaped with her family after the fall of Saigon.

The novels are all military-themed and their titles pulse with warrior bravado -- "A Sense of Honor," "Something to Die For," "Lost Soldiers." Several have briefly made it onto major bestseller lists, and some have been translated into other languages. Critics have praised his scene-setting and far-ranging, action-packed plots. They've noted that, as one reviewer put it, he is "not just a writer of war thrillers; he is a genuine novelist of ideas," tackling such issues as when it's appropriate (or not) to put soldiers in harm's way.

When he falls down, it is because he fails to convey the moral ambiguity he achieved in "Fields of Fire." His portrayals can "border on caricatures," as a reviewer of Webb's 2001 novel "Lost Soldiers" put it. "Webb continues his literary M.O. of spicing his narrative with unsubtle conservative political gibes," another wrote. His bad men, his conniving politicians and a whole host of characters who might be lumped together as vaguely "liberal" garner flat, unsympathetic treatment.

In his 1983 book "A Country Such as This," Webb writes of a power-hungry feminist named Dorothy Dingenfelder who "had given up on trying to be pretty" and who enjoys a swanky hotel despite her "publicly egalitarian views." ("She ignored the paradox as irrelevant," Webb writes.) Dorothy organizes a protest against the Vietnam War in which the protesters begin to attack the soldiers.

"Dorothy watched it, uneasy with the ugliness. It was the soldiers, the Army that was supposed to be hateful and brutal."

And who are the soldiers? "The blue collar kids, the red-necks, " -- standing silently, misunderstood.

Familiar Themes Dominate Senate Radio Debate (CCT)

By Angela Delli Santi

The Contra Costa Times, October 18, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. - Less than two weeks after they butted heads in a debate at a New York television studio, the two candidates for U.S. Senate from New Jersey were at it again Tuesday, in a 90-minute radio encounter that opened with a lengthy exchange on the war in Iraq.

Republican Tom Kean Jr. repeatedly refused to say whether he would vote to authorize sending U.S. troops into Iraq, even if he had intelligence information that was not available when the war began. Democrat Robert Menendez voted against the resolution authorizing the start of the war and has called for a timely withdrawal of U.S. troops.

After the debate, which aired live on Millennium Radio Network stations, Kean was asked again and again to articulate his position on authorizing the war and each time refused to answer the question directly.

"At the time the case was made for the war in Iraq on national security grounds," Kean said when asked by debate moderator Eric Scott whether he would vote for the war "knowing what you know now."

Eventually, Scott moved on, but not before noting, "OK, you're not going to answer that question."

Menendez has throughout the caustic campaign for U.S. Senate tried to link Kean with the policies of the Bush administration. President Bush's popularity hovers at around 35 percent in New Jersey.

Kean, the son of former Gov. Tom Kean Sr., has made ethics a centerpiece of his candidacy and has tried to paint his opponent, who rose through the ranks of rough-and-tumble Hudson County politics, with a broad brush of political corruption.

That familiar line of attack was evident again Tuesday night. When Kean was asked to articulate his allegations against Menendez, he repeated an oft-used line that his opponent is "under federal criminal investigation" for leasing office space to a nonprofit that receives federal funding. The U.S. Attorney's Office reportedly has subpoenaed records from the nonprofit organization that rented a Union City house from Menendez.

"Tom throws out allegations like other people throw out their garbage," Menendez shot back. "I'm under no federal criminal investigation."

Since the U.S. Attorney's Office will neither confirm or deny in-progress investigations, Kean was asked afterward what evidence he had to support his claim.

DOJ_NMG_0082926

"Number one, he said he welcomed the investigation on national television," said Kean. He also cited as evidence the fact that Menendez accused the U.S. Attorney's Office of playing partisan politics and the fact that Menendez's political pals questioned the timing of the allegation.

The debate marked the fourth and last scheduled face-to-face confrontation between Menendez, the incumbent, and Kean, a state senator. The entire campaign has been characterized more by a lack of civility than a substantive debate on the issues.

Besides delving into their positions on various issues, this debate also explored the candidates' knowledge of southern New Jersey. After both Menendez and Kean insisted they'd spent a lot of time campaigning in the state's southern reaches, neither could correctly name the county in which six randomly selected South Jersey towns were located.

Tuesday's debate took place exactly three weeks before the Nov. 7 election. Recent polls show the race still virtually deadlocked, although Menendez has a slight edge outside the polls' error margin in a few surveys.

Voters can expect the candidates to unload the campaign cash they've raised so far on television and radio ads and get out the vote efforts in the remaining days. The latest figures filed with the Federal Election Commission show Menendez with $5.5 million to spend to Kean's $3.17 million to spend.

A spokeswoman on Tuesday said Kean loaned his campaign $400,000. On Monday, the National Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee said it would spend $500,000 to continue running one of Kean's television ads for an additional week in the New York area. It was the first such money sent to his campaign by the national party.

Menendez unveiled a new television ad Tuesday explaining how his 87-year-old mother's reliance on Medicare and Social Security encourages his fight against President Bush's effort to alter the programs, and how her Alzheimer's disease fuels his support for stem cell research.

Several celebrities have already campaigned for both candidates and more are expected. Kean will have Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger in for him, while Menendez will have New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, former Georgia Sen. Max Cleland and actor Michael J. Fox.

Different Approaches From Kean, Menendez (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, October 18, 2006

Trenton, N.J. — Republican State Sen. Tom Kean Jr. sat calmly in the lime-tinted hearing room, occasionally chatting to colleagues, during a close to three-hour hour meeting of the state Senate Health, Human Services and Senior Citizens Committee.

More than 60 miles to the Northeast, Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) was getting ready to greet potential voters getting off the commuter train in Montclair, a community in densely packed Essex county, his second campaign event of the day.

As the meeting in Trenton wore on, legislators filtered out of the room until Kean was only one of six left to vote unanimously on an adoption bill.

Earlier in the day, Menendez stood with local law enforcement officials at Rutgers law school in Newark to announce in front of several television cameras that he had just authored a new anti-gang crime bill that would be his top domestic security priority.

It was the second time in the past week that Kean took a day out of his campaign schedule to attend to the seemingly mundane tasks of committee work, while his opponent, with whom he is locked in a neck-and-neck race, stumped for votes.

While appearances this week suggest Kean is not as committed to the race as Menendez is, Kean has made it clear that he's in this battle to win.

Kean this week decided to spend at least $400,000 of his own money to defeat Menendez in a race that represents the GOP's best chance of capturing a Democratic Senate seat next month. The personal contribution will appear on fundraising reports to be made public today.

One GOP official estimated the $400,000 could help Kean's campaign increase his television presence by about 25 to 30 percent. It will also narrow Menendez's financial advantage. Newly filed finance reports show that Menendez had $5.5 million and Kean $3.2 million in their campaign accounts at the end of September.

This is the first time that Kean has dipped into his own pockets to assist his campaign.

The move comes as a surprise even to members of Kean's finance team, one of whom told The Hill yesterday that he did not know whether Kean could "invade" the family monies kept in trust.

Kean owns between $3million and $8million in stocks and $2million in family trusts and partnerships, according to news reports.

It comes after the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) announced yesterday that it would spend at least $500,000 in New Jersey, bringing the total amount of new Republican money in the race to close to $1 million.

DOJ_NMG_0082927

The decision of national GOP party strategists to curtail spending in Ohio, where Sen. Mike DeWine (R) trails in the polls, and shift resources to New Jersey, shows that New Jersey is among the four most competitive Senate races in the country. That is surprising because New Jersey has not elected a Republican senator in New Jersey since 1972. And a Republican presidential candidate has not carried it since 1988.

But the anti-incumbent sentiment that has bedeviled Republicans around the country seems to be helping them in New Jersey, where the Democrats control the governor's mansion and the state house and senate. A succession of local Democratic scandals have eroded the party's image among voters and have allowed Republicans to borrow the credo Democrats have used as a bludgeon in other states: it's time for a change.

"Public service is a tradition that I'm proud of," Kean states on camera in a television ad now running in the state. "That's why I'm fighting to help New Jersey escape the clutch of corruption."

"New Jersey has had a very checkered history with senior elected officials," said Roger Bodman, a longtime Kean family friend who managed Tom Kean Sr.'s successful run for governor in 1981.

In 2002, former Democratic Sen. Bob Torricelli (N.J.) resigned from office after the Senate ethics committee rebuked him for accepting improper gifts from a supporter. In 2004 Democratic Gov. Jim McGreevey resigned after it became known that he appointed a man with whom he was having an extramarital affair to be the state's homeland security adviser.

More recently, attorney general Zulima Farber resigned after she was found to have violated ethics rules and last month former Democratic state Sen. John Lynch pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

Having spent his career in the midst of New Jersey Democratic politics, Menendez has struggled to separate himself from the transgressions of his fellow Democrats, but not always successfully.

For example, last Thursday Menendez was surprised when Democratic state Sen. Wayne Bryant, who is under federal investigation, showed up at a campaign rally Menendez held with Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) at a church in Camden.

Menendez's campaign also received a blow last month when it was revealed that Donald Scarinci, one of Menendez's closest political advisers, was secretly taped seven years ago pressuring a local official to hire someone as a favor to Menendez. Kean aired a portion of the recorded conversation in a hard-hitting attack ad that the NRSC is now paying to keep on television.

Kean has also gone on the attack against Menendez by repeatedly claiming that his opponent is under federal investigation, a charge that Menendez denies vehemently. Kean is basing his claim on reports that the U.S. attorney for the state of New Jersey subpoenaed the records from a nonprofit agency which leased a building from Menendez for $320,000. Kane claims that the agency paid the money in return for federal grants Menendez helped to secure.

But Menendez is fighting back by throwing allegations of ethical impropriety back at Kean. Menendez's campaign yesterday announced a new television ad that criticizes Kean for holding a fundraiser with executives from United Health Group on the same day his father, Tom Kean Sr., a former governor of New Jersey and a member of the group's board, was scheduled to testify about whether the company improperly dispensed stock options. Menendez has labeled the fundraiser a shakedown.

Kean for his part, accuses Menendez of attacking his father. Kean Sr. and Kean Jr. will hold a joint press conference today where they are expected to respond to the allegations.

Whether Menendez's counterattack will work or whether the perception that New Jersey Democrats are corrupt will prevail is unclear. Various polls have shown both Menendez and Kean leading by a few points.

One New Jersey political expert postulated that voters may have become inured to ethics scandals and may ignore the mudslinging to focus on issues such as the war and Social Security. That's what Democrats are arguing will happen.

"There's almost a sense among New Jersey voters that it's very difficult to be involved in state politics without somehow being tainted or crossing paths with people who are less than scrupulous," said Ross K. Baker, a professor of political science at Rutgers University.

Other observers, including both Democrats and Republicans, agreed that voters in New Jersey have a higher tolerance for scandal than in other states.

Hoyer Remark 'Racist,' GOP's Steele Charges (WP)

By Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele accused a leading Democratic congressman yesterday of racial insensitivity for saying the Republican candidate has "slavishly" followed the GOP.

Steele, an African American running for the U.S. Senate, was reacting to remarks by House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, who characterized Steele this week as having had "a career of slavishly supporting the Republican Party."

After speaking to members of the Maryland Chamber of Commerce gathered in Ocean City, Steele called the description "the height of arrogance."

DOJ_NMG_0082928

"It goes to just the sheer craziness of some in the Democratic Party who think they can use racist terms and infer things about me just because I'm an African American Republican," he said.

Steele added that he expects his Democratic opponent, Benjamin L. Cardin, to "stand up and tell his team to sit down and shut up, stop the noise and apologize."

Hoyer's comments, first reported by MSNBC, came Sunday as he was introducing Cardin to a group of black business owners in Upper Marlboro, and his choice of words did not cause a visible reaction from the crowd.

"There was absolutely no offense taken or noticed," said event organizer Melvin Forbes, chief executive of Cool Wave Water. "It was obvious that Steny was simply talking about Steele's constant support for the Republican agenda."

The Rev. Anthony Evans, who heads a group called the National Black Church Initiative, released a statement last night calling Hoyer's comment "outrageous and destructive." "If I did not know Rep. Steny Hoyer, I would say that he is a racist," Evans said.

"I shouldn't have used those words," Hoyer said yesterday, through a spokesman. "If Mr. Steele did in fact take offense let me assure him that none was intended."

Cardin thanked Hoyer for addressing "this promptly, and we're glad that he did."

But he also said Steele was trying to change the subject. "He's looking for every excuse he can to avoid talking about the issues," Cardin said.

The two candidates spoke separately at the Ocean City forum on such topics as health care, Social Security and immigration.

Cardin asked the audience not to judge the candidates by "what you see on those 30-second ads."

His timing was no coincidence. The Steele campaign released a commercial yesterday -- paid for by the National Republican Senatorial Committee -- essentially calling Cardin a hypocrite for saying he can "change Washington" while taking campaign contributions from corporate interests.

Steele and Cardin have taken hundreds of thousands of dollars from corporate political action committees, records show.

Steele said the difference is he is raising money within the constraints of a campaign finance system that Cardin has done nothing to change. "Talk to me after I've cast a vote," Steele said.

Cardin responded that voters should "judge me by my record" and said that Steele was the one offering to help the corporate interests in the hotel ballroom.

Steele closed his remarks by acknowledging some of the companies there, naming Pepco and Washington Gas, among others.

"What are you prepared to do, and who is going to be there to help you do it? You can count on me."

Tyson Ready To Enter The Ring For Steele (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

Former heavyweight boxing champ Mike Tyson says he is so bullish on Republican Michael S. Steele's campaign for the U.S. Senate, he would return to the ring if Steele thought it might help him.

"I would do anything to help Michael," Tyson said in a telephone interview Monday night after holding a news conference in Ohio wearing a Steele T-shirt. "I would box an exhibition for him. I would even fight again to help Mike. I would do anything."

Iron Mike's little-known but long-standing devotion to Steele dates to the boxer's former marriage to Steele's half-sister, Monica Turner.

Tyson and Turner met in 1990 at a party at comedian Eddie Murphy's house and married in 1998, after the boxer's rape conviction. Turner flew to Indianapolis almost every two weeks to visit him in jail. Tyson and Steele remained close even after the couple's divorce.

"I always considered him a brother," Tyson, 40, said. "He's a remarkable human being."

The ringing endorsement, coming in a heated race between Steele and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D), arrived uninvited and wasn't exactly cherished.

Steele's campaign refused to make the candidate available to discuss his friendship with the boxer. Asked to comment yesterday, Steele spokesman Doug Heye responded by e-mail, "Mike Tyson is the father of the Lt. Gov's niece and nephew and therefore a member of his family."

A Tyson endorsement brings some of the heavy baggage from the boxer's checkered public life, including the rape conviction and that small matter of his biting off a chunk of Evander Holyfield's ear.

Not all of Tyson's controversies are in the past. Yesterday, while clad in the Steele shirt, he proclaimed his desire to fight women for money.

DOJ_NMG_0082929

"This is not an endorsement you'd put up on the Web site," University of Maryland politics professor James G. Gimpel said, laughing.

But Steele has said nothing to belittle his friend. In an interview with the New York Times, Steele said he would "welcome in a heartbeat" the boxer's help, although Tyson has not done anything official for the campaign.

"He may be divorced from my sister, but I can't cast him aside," Steele told the Times. "You embrace. You love. . . . I've never sat in judgment of him, and I never would."

Steele was ringside in June 2005 when Tyson -- once the most feared boxer in the world, winning his first 37 bouts -- left the MCI Center after losing the third of four fights in a comeback attempt.

Tyson was booed by many in the crowd of 15,732 for quitting, and one fan threw a cup of soda at him as he left the arena, published reports said. Tyson responded by using his middle finger to express an obscenity.

Although Steele has never talked much about his relationship with Tyson, the boxer's fame has ensured that the public record has plenty about it. Steele received some unwanted attention after trying to help his sister settle her divorce with Tyson without, in his words, having "the lawyers muddle everything."

While Steele was running for lieutenant governor four years ago, the state Democratic Party accused him of practicing law without a license, a matter that was eventually dropped.

And in 1998, when Steele was a candidate for state comptroller, he was on hand to lend support when Tyson pleaded no contest to assault charges. As Tyson was marched from a Montgomery County courtroom, he had only one thing to say to the waiting clutch of reporters: "Vote for Michael Steele."

Tyson said this week that he was "overwhelmed" by Steele's support for him at the time.

"I don't want him to jeopardize his career for me," he said. "He's just such a moral person. Boxing attracts scum. Being around him was a breath of fresh air."

Also this week, the lieutenant governor secured the support of another controversial boxing figure, promoter Don King, who offered this endorsement: "I must have an indictment list longer than his awards list."

Asked what to make of Steele's eclectic backers -- who include White House aide Karl Rove and hip-hop mogul Russell Simmons -- Matthew A. Crenson, a Johns Hopkins University political science professor, sighed deeply. "This guy has a very strange collection of friends," he replied.

Lieberman Urges Dems To Alter Their Ways (AP-Y)

By John Christoffersen

AP, October 18, 2006

Sen. Joe Lieberman, running as an independent after losing the Democratic primary, said Tuesday he hoped Democrats seize control of Congress — with one caveat: a Democratic-led Congress, he said, must change its ways.

"It won't represent progress that's real," Lieberman told reporters while stopping at a transportation forum in New Haven. "It's not going to be much of a step forward if there's a new Democratic leadership that doesn't change the tone in Washington."

As recently as Friday, Lieberman, a lifelong Democrat who was his party's nominee for vice president in 2000, would not say whether he thinks the nation would be better off with the Democrats in control of Congress.

Democrats must gain 15 House seats and six Senate seats to win control of Congress. Lieberman has said he would remain a member of the Democratic caucus if he wins on Nov. 7.

Lieberman has said he will not endorse Democratic candidates because he understands that his candidacy has put Democratic candidates in an awkward position, and has said he would stay out of their races.

Most leading state and national Democrats have endorsed Ned Lamont, a wealthy cable television company executive who has put some $10 million of his own money into the race, including $2 million this week. Republican Alan Schlesinger is also in the race, but trails in the polls.

Liz Dupont-Diehl, a spokeswoman for Lamont, said the three-term senator isn't taking responsibility for helping set the tone in Washington. Lieberman has called for an end to partisan politics, but Lamont has criticized him for siding too often with Republicans and President Bush.

"It's certainly hard to tell from Sen. Lieberman's comments that he's the incumbent," she said. "It seems that he's trying hard not to own up to the fact that he's been there for 18 years."

On Tuesday, Lamont faulted Lieberman for backing a 2005 energy bill that the Democratic candidate argues was a giveaway to big oil companies that sent gas prices soaring.

"That's the Washington of George Bush and Joe Lieberman," Lamont said in a speech at Eastern Connecticut State University. "That's the Washington they have defended together."

DOJ_NMG_0082930

Lamont offered a plan to promote energy efficiency, alternative fuels and other renewable sources. He called for tax credits to help companies buy new fuel-efficent equipment and set a goal for the United States to use one quarter of its energy from renewable sources by 2025.

Lamont, the anti-war challenger, framed energy independence as a national security issue, "so we don't have to fight and lose loved ones in a desert in Iraq thousands of miles away."

Obama Kicks Off Book Tour, Weighs Presidential Bid (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON -- While Sen. Barack Obama launches the most public of book tours, with appearances on "Oprah Winfrey," the "Today" show, "Larry King Live" and "Meet the Press," he also is more intensively examining whether to run for president in 2008, reaching out to Democratic operatives and trying to reconcile the demands of a national campaign on his family.

Obama (D-Ill.) has been having quiet conversations with colleagues and friends about a prospective White House run, but a key concern is whether his wife, Michelle, would support it and whether he could manage the time away from their two young daughters.

"He has gotten the presidential bug bite," said Donna Brazile, campaign manager for Al Gore in 2000. "Barack is constantly calling, he's constantly talking to people. He's not calling me to check on the weather. I'm not saying he's in, but he's checking the water. He's having lots of conversations." Brazile said she is scheduled to talk politics with Obama shortly after Election Day.

Sen. Dick Durbin, Illinois' senior Democratic senator and a strong proponent of an Obama presidential bid, said his colleague has learned more about international affairs and the workings of the federal government in his brief Senate career than most governors who run for president. Staying in the Senate, Durbin said, will only provide opponents with more targets as Obama continues to cast votes.

"I said to him, 'Do you really think sticking around the Senate for four more years and casting a thousand more votes will make you more qualified for president?'" Durbin said. "The critical element that remains that he has to face is whether he is willing to be separated from his family for longer periods of time and I think he is staring that right in the face."

'No one else of interest'

He's also drawing plenty of stares from fans who have rushed to have him sign a copy of his new book, "The Audacity of Hope." The signings kicked off Tuesday in Chicago. Applause greeted him as he entered the third floor of the Michigan Avenue Borders. Hundreds of people had formed a line starting at 6 a.m.

"For me, there's no one else of interest," said Cheryl Hammock, 60, a Gold Coast resident. "I hope he's the next president."

That is just the kind of talk that fans the speculation about him running.

But David Axelrod, Obama's political consultant, said people should not read too much into a publicity tour crafted by the senator's publisher.

"He is not initiating calls on this," Axelrod said. "People call him all the time and he gives them a respectful hearing. I really don't think he's going to focus on this question at all until after Nov. 7."

Other political professionals, however, expressed skepticism that Obama's treatise on how America can move beyond its divisions to find common ground could be considered anything but a campaign platform.

"There's a political connection between the book he's written and the campaign he will run," said Tom Rath, the Republican national committeeman in New Hampshire. "It's awfully hard to go into some of these places and do what he's doing and say it's all about the book."

Obama has drawn national attention since he delivered the keynote address at the Democratic National Convention in 2004, won his Senate seat and came to Washington. From the day of his arrival, there has been at least simmering speculation about a presidential run, and his appeal has only grown.

Just two years into a Senate career, but with a much higher and more positive profile than most senators, Obama also has been raising large amounts of money and earning other political capital by campaigning for fellow Democrats. In a 12-day period in October, he raised $2 million, aides said.

Yet the book puts the focus almost exclusively on him, providing him with millions of dollars' worth of free publicity, largely in non-confrontational, friendly forums. If the book is popular—and already it is No. 15 on the Amazon.com list—it could help him in ways that Sen. John McCain's best-selling memoir, "Faith of Our Fathers," fueled his presidential campaign in 2000.

"It takes it to the next level, it gives you a platform and it gives you a little cover for testing the presidential waters," said Dean Spiliotes, a political science professor at the New Hampshire Institute of Politics at St. Anselm College. "You can go to all the places but say, 'Hey, I'm just talking about my book right now.'"

DOJ_NMG_0082931

At political events too

While playing the role of senator-author one day, Obama is often headlining political events the next. On Monday, Obama flew to Indianapolis with Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) to raise money for three Democratic candidates in some of the nation's most competitive House races. Emanuel, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said they talked about races around the country and what needed to be done over the next three weeks—not about a presidential bid.

Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said Obama has done everything Democratic leaders have asked him to, traveling to 20 or 30 states this year.

"He's the star. He is in such demand," Schumer said. "He is in greater demand than any other person that we have to offer."

And in campaigning for others, Obama is also subtly campaigning for himself.

"He's got the book, Oprah, [Tim] Russert—his time intellectually and emotionally is about the elections and about the book," Emanuel said. "That doesn't mean he's not considering it. A lot of people are talking to him. You can't go to the airport without seeing it—it's on the cover of Time."

Indeed, Obama's face fills the cover of Time magazine, with bold letters asserting "Why Barack Obama Could be the Next President." On Sunday, he will appear on "Meet the Press" with Russert, following a week of book and media appearances, including Charlie Rose, "Hannity & Colmes" and "Countdown with Keith Olbermann."

Shifting statements on future

In between, Obama will campaign for Chicago native Deval Patrick, the Democratic nominee for governor in Massachusetts, help House candidates in Philadelphia and rally for Jim Pederson for Senate in Arizona, to name just a few stops.

Obama partisans insist that the senator is simply trying to help out, and the publicity just happens to be ginned up by his publisher. But it comes when his statements about his presidential ambitions appear to be shifting substantially.

Last January, on "Meet the Press," Obama told Russert, "I will serve out my full six-year term," adding that his thinking had not changed since he took office.

"So you will not run for president or vice president in 2008?" Russert asked.

"I will not," Obama said.

In May, he told the Tribune that "there are people who think I should make an announcement tomorrow that I'm running for the presidency.

"I tell them," he said, "that I'm focusing on my job as a senator from Illinois."

Now, however, he has told Time that he will revisit the question in November.

"When the election is over and my book tour is done, I will think about how I can be most useful to the country and how I can reconcile that with being a good dad and a good husband," Obama said. "I haven't completely decided or unraveled that puzzle yet."

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

GOP first-time candidate Dee Margo is running an uphill race against a longtime incumbent to represent heavily Democratic El Paso in the Texas Senate. So how'd he get the most popular Republican campaigner in the nation to stump for him?

Easy: Laura Bush is good pals with his wife.

Gallery owner Adair Wakefield Margo and the first lady first clicked years ago when Adair wrote a book about El Paso painter Tom Lea , whose "Rio Grande" now hangs in the Oval Office. Laura and Adair traveled to Mexico to scope out artists' studios. The Margos raised big bucks for Dubya 's campaigns, and Adair now serves as chair of the President's Committee on the Arts and Humanities. Tomorrow, the first lady visits El Paso to speak at a private campaign luncheon for Dee.

Adair says she finds herself thinking often of the Bushes now that she's on the trail for her husband, dropping by the little Segundo Barrio businesses that still have Laura's picture hanging up front. And she finds herself looking to Laura's example on how to be a political spouse.

"Recently, at the White House, she told me, 'You know, they're blaming George for Katrina now,' " Adair said, adding that the first lady let the criticism roll off her back: "She's always kept things in perspective." The Bushes also taught her to keep the faith: "They believe that all things are possible. We've never elected a Republican state senator in El Paso. Things can change for the better in the Middle East, and we can have a two-party system in El Paso."

Coming Not-So-Soon To HBO: Graham's Story

DOJ_NMG_0082932

The HBO biopic about former Washington Post publisher Katharine Graham is on hold once again.

There was plenty of buzz over the summer that the project was on the cable network's fast track, but it can't go forward without a finished script and an actress in the title role. HBO is looking for an A-lister-- the rumor mill includes Annette Bening, Helen Mirren and just about every top middle-aged star in Hollywood.

After Graham's Pulitzer Prize-winning autobiography, "Personal History," was published in 1997, she received dozens of offers to turn the dramatic story into a movie, and turned them all down -- as her family has done since her death in 2001. Acclaimed writer Joan Didion is attempting to write her version of Graham's life and is almost finished with the screenplay; Tom Hooper (who just won an Emmy for HBO's "Elizabeth I") is likely to direct. "HBO is still absolutely committed to the project," said a spokesman.

In the meantime, Hooper is busy with another high-profile HBO miniseries: In February, he's slated to start shooting "John Adams" in Virginia. Paul Giamatti will play the young Adams in the project, based on David McCullough's bestseller; Tom Hanks is the executive producer.

THIS JUST IN . . .

· Wesley Snipes was indicted in Tampa yesterday for not paying taxes and conspiracy to defraud the IRS. Federal officials said the action star failed to file income tax returns from 1999 to 2004; he and two other men are also charged for falsely claiming almost $12 million in refunds. As of press time, officials had not managed to find the 44-year-old actor; a warrant was issued for his arrest. He faces up to 16 years in jail if convicted.

· Rapper Fabolous was shot in the thigh early yesterday while leaving a Manhattan restaurant -- and ended up arrested hours later when police said they found unlicensed weapons in the car he used to leave the scene. No suspects have been apprehended in the shooting; the rapper was taken into custody after being treated at a hospital.

HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

· Annie Leibovitz , choosing the fatty tuna at Kaz Sushi Bistro on Monday night after her appearance at Politics and Prose. The celeb photographer (a 1967 graduate of Northwood High School in Silver Spring) was sporting her iconic look -- long hair, hiking boots, leggings -- and talking about her ongoing book tour.

In Vodka Non Veritas (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON

Hillary Clinton always reminded me of Sarah, the Mission Doll, in “Guys and Dolls.”

As first lady, she had that earnest, sometimes sanctimonious, air of certitude and do-gooding that earned her the nickname Saint Hillary. As a senator, she has gotten friendly with conservatives in her Congressional prayer group and has lately been spotted wearing crosses around her neck, a gold one and a diamond one.

“Is it, perhaps, a sign that her faith may be a bit more in the foreground as 2008 approaches?” Ben Smith mused in a New York Daily News blog.

And yet Hillary always struck me as the sort of buttoned-up and driven woman who would be really fun if you could get her out for a night of dulces de leche in Cuba, as Marlon Brando did Jean Simmons in “Guys and Dolls.”

My instinct about Hillary’s subterranean saucy side was confirmed when I read a front-page story in The Times about her unlikely friendship with her expected rival in the 2008 race, John McCain.

Anne Kornblut wrote that two summers ago, on a Congressional trip to Estonia with Lindsey Graham and Susan Collins, Senator Clinton “astonished her traveling companions by suggesting that the group do what one does in the Baltics: hold a vodka-drinking contest. Delighted, the leader of the delegation, Senator John McCain, quickly agreed. The after-dinner drinks went so well — memories are a bit hazy on who drank how much — that Mr. McCain, an Arizona Republican, later told people how unexpectedly engaging he found Mrs. Clinton to be.”

It seemed a refreshing breeze of bipartisanship in W.’s acrid era. But a few days after the anecdote appeared, Mr. McCain flatly denied it on Fox News as “Not true.”

“Didn’t happen?” Alan Colmes pressed.

“No,” Mr. McCain insisted.

“But you and she have a good working relationship, right?” Mr. Colmes asked.

DOJ_NMG_0082933

"I try to have a good working relationship with all senators, and I have a good working relationship with Senator Clinton, and I try to do that," Mr. McCain said.

Sean Hannity chimed in, "I'm glad to hear, Senator, you weren't drinking shots with Senator Clinton."

"I was not," Mr. McCain repeated, emphatically.

Then the senator went on Jay Leno's show and again denied the Night of Baltic Sea carousing. After joking that "we were trying to get Ted Kennedy to be the judge," he insisted again: "Didn't happen. Didn't happen."

"It was the front page of The New York Times!" Mr. Leno said, to which Mr. McCain riposted, "Don't believe everything you read."

Joshua Green, reporting the cover profile of Hillary for the latest issue of The Atlantic Monthly, was rebuffed when he asked for an interview with Mr. McCain about the night Hillary poured shots for fellow lawmakers. But Mr. Green ran into Mr. McCain walking through the Capitol and asked him about the Baltics escapade. "McCain lit up at the recollection," he wrote. " 'It's been 50 years since I'd been in a drinking game,' said McCain. ... He added, admiringly, 'She can really hold her liquor.' "

The Straight Talk Express was swerving again. Confused, I checked in with the McCain camp.

"They went out and had dinner," I was told. "After dinner, they had drinks. It was not a drinking contest, the way you and I think of a drinking contest. John had two drinks." Team McCain wanted it to be clear that Susan Collins and Hillary Clinton were more dedicated revelers, and that it was not an intimate party — "there were six senators and staff and Estonian hangers-on."

So the vodka vivacity happened, but Mr. McCain's staff, eager to see the senator pander to what Jon Stewart called the "crazy-base world," put a stop to their boss's inviting Mrs. Clinton on trips. The former fighter jock and "scamp," as his mom called him, has become so lifeless and base-whipped that he is scared to be seen knocking back Stolis with a nice Methodist girl from the Midwest who wears crosses around her neck.

"John was not intentionally misleading," his person said. "The image a drinking contest sets up is not very pretty, and we're in serious times. The best thing he's done is to be collegial. You can do that by drinking, but it's not a drinking contest. Is this splitting hairs?"

Actually, yeah. The once candid senator is starting to sound downright Clintonian with all this silly parsing and dissembling. I did not have drinks with that woman!

The Wal-Mart Posse (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Wal-Mart may be expanding in the People's Republic of China, but here in capitalist America the low-price retailer has become the Democratic Party's favorite pinata. The media like to portray this as a populist uprising against heartless big business. But what they don't bother to disclose is that this entire get-Wal-Mart campaign is a political operation led and funded by organized labor.

We've done a little digging into the two most prominent anti-Wal-Mart groups, and they might as well operate out of AFL-CIO headquarters. An outfit called Wal-Mart Watch was created by the Service Employees International Union (SEIU), probably the most powerful union in America after the National Education Association. Wal-Mart Watch is backed by Five Stones, a 501(c)3 organization that received $2,775,000 in 2005 from the SEIU, or 56% of its $5 million budget. According to financial records, SEIU also gave Five Stones $1 million in 2004 to launch the anti-Wal-Mart group, and SEIU president Andy Stern is the Wal-Mart Watch chairman.

A second group, Wake Up Wal-Mart, is more or less a subsidiary of the United Food and Commercial Workers Union (UFCW). Wake Up Wal-Mart refuses to divulge its funding sources, but here is what we do know: The group was founded by the UFCW, is housed at UFCW headquarters, and its campaign director's $135,000 salary is paid by the UFCW.

Wake Up Wal-Mart also has close ties to the Democratic Party. Its union-funded campaign director is Paul Blank, who was political director of Howard Dean's failed Presidential campaign. The group sponsored a 19 state, 35-day bus tour across the U.S. earlier this year, staging anti-Wal-Mart rallies. Nearly every major Democratic Presidential hopeful has joined in the Wal-Mart-bashing, including Senators Joe Biden and Evan Bayh, New Mexico Governor Bill Richardson, and trial lawyer-turned-man-of the-people John Edwards. They all seem to believe they have to take this line to pass union muster for 2008.

Even Hillary Rodham Clinton has joined in the political fun. Never mind that she served six years on the Wal-Mart board during her time in Beltway exile as an Arkansas lawyer and, according to the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, was paid $18,000 per year plus $1,500 for every meeting near the end of her tenure. Most recently, Mrs. Clinton returned a $5,000 campaign contribution from Wal-Mart to protest its allegedly inadequate health care benefits. Maybe someone should ask her if she's returned her director's pay, with interest. * * *

Most of the local protests against Wal-Mart are organized through the left-wing activist group ACORN, an acronym for the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now. ACORN is the group that put the squeeze on the Chicago City Council to pass an ordinance this summer to require Wal-Mart, Target and other big-box stores to pay a minimum $10 an hour wage and $3 an hour in benefits by 2010. (Democratic Mayor Richard Daley vetoed the bill.) ACORN also pretends it is a locally organized and funded voice of the downtrodden masses. But guess where ACORN gets much of its money? Last year the SEIU chipped in $2,125,229 and the UFCW $165,692.

DOJ_NMG_0082934

Then there are the anti-Wal-Mart "think tanks," if that's the right word for these political shops -- notably, the Economic Policy Institute (EPI) and the University of California at Berkeley Labor Center. The job of these two outfits is to publish papers backing the economic claims of Wal-Mart critics. The UC Berkeley group recently asserted that Wal-Mart "reduces total take-home pay for retail workers."

The UC Berkeley Labor Center has received at least $43,550 from SEIU. The Economic Policy Institute received $100,000 from the SEIU and $40,000 from the UFCW in 2005 and has published several anti-Wal-Mart studies, particularly on the benefits of the Chicago ordinance. By the way, Andy Stern also sits on the EPI board. He's a busy guy.

Now, we're not predisposed to be pro- or anti-Wal-Mart. We've criticized Wal-Mart lobbying on policy grounds -- for example, when the company supported a minimum wage increase to court some nice publicity while also knowing this would harm any lower-priced competitors. However, it is simply fallacious to argue that Wal-Mart has harmed low-income families.

More than one study has shown that the real "Wal-Mart effect" has been to increase the purchasing power of working families by lowering prices for groceries, prescription drugs, electronic equipment and many other products that have become modern household necessities. One study, by the economic consulting firm Global Insight, calculates that Wal-Mart saves American households an average of $2,300 a year through lower prices, or a $263 billion reduction in the cost of living. That compares with $33 billion savings for low-income families from the federal food stamp program. * * *

Alas, what's good for working families isn't always good news for unions and their bosses. They hate Wal-Mart because its blue-coated workforce is strictly non-union -- a policy that dates back to the day founder Sam Walton opened his first store. Today the company employs 1.3 million American workers, and its recent push into groceries has made life miserable for Safeway and other grocery chains organized by the service workers or the UFCW.

Wal-Mart pays an average of $10 an hour, which is more than many of its unionized competitors offer. And typically when a new Wal-Mart store opens in a poor area, it receives thousands of job applications for a few hundred openings. So Wal-Mart's retail jobs of $7 to $12 an hour, which the unions deride as "poverty wages," are actually in high demand.

But as we say, this campaign isn't about "working families," or any of the other rhapsody-for-the-common-man union slogans. If Wal-Mart were suddenly unionized, Big Labor's membership would double overnight and union leaders would collect an estimated $300 million in additional dues each year to sway more politicians. Short of that, their goal is to keep Wal-Mart out of cities so their union shops have less competition. That's what the war against Wal-Mart is truly about.

A Treat Worthy Of Cinderella (NYT)

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

With obesity rates soaring among the young, the Walt Disney Company has announced promising new guidelines for the way it promotes food to its impressionable clientele. Over the next two years, the company that brought you Buzz Lightyear and Goofy and the Lion King plans to make sure that its animated characters endorse healthier children's foods with less fat and sugar and fewer calories.

Disney has also begun revamping menus in its theme parks with the goal of abolishing trans fats and offering applesauce or other healthy side dishes to children. French fries — and sweets — will still be available on request. How can you enjoy Disneyland without a little ice cream? But Disney's kingdoms also promise pure juice, water, and real fruits and vegetables — unsugared, unreconstituted, undoctored.

Disney should work to take the next step by limiting the overload of junk food advertising on its television shows for Toon Disney and ABC Kids. But this first move is a good one, and it should send a strong signal to other corporations.

Childhood obesity has tripled in the last 25 years. There are many cures for this: more physical activity than television time, for example. But the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention has also warned that "current food and beverage marketing practices put children's long-term health at risk."

At this point, the Bush administration and Congress seem content to keep studying the problem. Some corporations have used that as an excuse to continue peddling ultra-sweet cereals and high-fructose drinks. Others have made a few feeble efforts to promote healthier eating to children. It's heartening that a few, mainly Kraft and now Disney, recognize that we can't wait forever for Congress to act, and are actually doing something now.

N. Korea Apparently Preparing Nuke Test (AP)

By Bo-mi Lim

DOJ_NMG_0082935

AP, October 18, 2006

Satellite images indicate North Korea appears to be getting ready for a second nuclear test, officials said Tuesday, as the defiant communist regime held huge rallies and proclaimed that U.N. sanctions amount to a declaration of war.

China, the North's longtime ally and biggest trading partner, warned Pyongyang not to aggravate tensions. The U.N. has condemned the Oct. 9 atomic blast, and U.S. nuclear envoy Christopher Hill told reporters in Seoul on Tuesday that another nuclear explosion would be "a very belligerent answer" to the world.

As the White House acknowledged that the isolated nation might try a second test, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice launched a diplomatic drive to persuade Asian allies and Russia to intensify North Korea's isolation by enforcing sanctions that the U.N. Security Council unanimously approved on Saturday.

Alexander Vershbow, the U.S. ambassador to South Korea, said Wednesday in Seoul that Rice plans to ask the South to expand its role in a U.S.-led international program to stop the spread of weapons of mass destruction.

Concern over a second test stems partly from new satellite imagery showing increased activity around at least two other North Korean sites, a senior U.S. defense official said.

The activity, started a number of days ago, included ground preparation at one site and construction of some buildings and other structures, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because it involved intelligence gathering. He said that although the purpose of the structures is unclear, officials are concerned because North Korea has left open the possibility of another test.

A senior South Korean official told foreign journalists that despite signs of a possible second test, it was unlikely to happen immediately.

"We have yet to confirm any imminent signs of a second nuclear test," the official said on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information.

In North Korea, the nation marked the 80th anniversary of the "Down-with-Imperialism Union" — a political platform on which the ruling party was built. North Koreans held parades across the country along with an enormous gathering at a central square in Pyongyang.

In the capital, hundreds of women in brightly colored costumes sang and held bunches of flowers, including some named for Kim Il Sung, the country's first leader and the late father of current leader Kim Jong Il.

The regime slammed the U.N. measures with a stream of bellicosity in a Foreign Ministry statement released on the official Korean Central News Agency.

"The resolution cannot be construed otherwise than a declaration of a war" against the North, the statement said.

The North also said it "wants peace but is not afraid of war," and that it would "deal merciless blows" against anyone who violates its sovereignty.

It said it wouldn't cave in to "the pressure and threat of someone at this time when it has become a nuclear weapons state."

South Korean nuclear envoy Chun Yung-woo said the North's reaction wasn't surprising, and was full of "the usual rhetoric."

China warned Pyongyang against aggravating tensions.

"We hope North Korea will adopt a responsible attitude ... and come back to resolving the issue through dialogue and consultation instead of taking any actions that may further escalate or worsen the situation," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said at a press briefing in Beijing.

But now that the U.S. has confirmed that last week's blast was indeed nuclear, North Korea can be expected to use its new position as a confirmed atomic state to press for direct talks and concessions with Washington — as it did in March 2005, a month after Pyongyang first asserted it had a nuclear weapon.

Hill, the U.S. envoy, said the North was falsely assuming it would win more respect with atomic explosions.

"The fact of the matter is that nuclear tests make us respect them less," he said, adding that the North's comments about sanctions were "not very helpful."

U.S. intelligence has concluded that the North Korean device likely used plutonium, as opposed to uranium, in the Oct. 9 test.

Under a 1994 deal with the U.S. during the Clinton administration, North Korea pledged to freeze its nuclear program, then believed to be based on producing weapons-grade plutonium. But the agreement broke down by 2002 under the Bush administration after revelations of a covert effort by the North to produce highly enriched uranium. Pyongyang soon removed 8,000 spent fuel rods that the International Atomic Energy Agency was monitoring and began to reprocess them into weapons-grade nuclear fuel.

The White House said Tuesday that it wouldn't be surprising if North Korea were to try another nuclear test "to be provocative."

DOJ_NMG_0082936

"It would not be a good thing for them, but it certainly would not be out of character," said White House press secretary Tony Snow. "We're not going to discuss any particular matters of intelligence, but if you take a look at the record, I think it is reasonable to expect that the government of North Korea will do what it can to test the will, the determination and the unity of the United Nations."

Asked why it would not be a good thing for North Korea, Snow said, "If they do believe that somehow people are going to give them a pass on this, they're going to find out that they're wrong."

While U.S. officials insist they aren't about to invade, they have taken other steps against North Korea — even before the U.N. resolution — including severing it from the international financial system. That move is believed to have angered the elites that keep Kim in power, and Kim may fear being ousted or possibly even killed.

The North has consistently pressed for direct talks with the U.S. on the financial sanctions and has refused to attend six-nation disarmament talks until the sanctions are lifted. Along with the U.S., the talks include China, Japan, Russia and South Korea.

Now, the North has a new arrow in its quiver: being a confirmed nuclear power recognized as such by the very country whose attention it so desperately craves.

The Bush administration, wary of rewarding the regime's behavior, has consistently refused to talk directly to the North, insisting the issue is a regional concern and seeking to enlist other countries.

On Tuesday, Rice left for Japan, first stop on a four-nation trip, amid clear signs of unease in China and South Korea about even the softened sanctions.

China contends that interdicting ships, although permitted in the U.N. resolution, might needlessly provoke the North and discourage it from returning to the six-nation talks. South Koreans worry about a conventional attack by their unpredictable neighbor.

"Sanctions against North Korea should be done in a way that draws North Korea to the dialogue table," South Korean Prime Minister Han Myung-sook said, according to Yonhap news agency. "There should never be a way that causes armed clashes."

Seoul Warns Of Another N Korea Test (FT)

By Anna Fifield , Richard Mcgregor And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, October 18, 2006

The South Korean government on Tuesday said it had detected activity suggesting that North Korea might be preparing to conduct a second nuclear test, as concerns mounted worldwide that Kim Jong-il's regime might again defy international pressure.

Amid a flurry of diplomatic meetings – and reports China had begun taking tough action against its errant neighbour – North Korea issued another statement condemning United Nations sanctions, imposed after last week's nuclear test, as a "declaration of war".

Pyongyang said: "The US would be well advised not to miscalculate the DPRK."

Even a few months ago such a threat would probably have been dismissed as mere sabre-rattling, but these statements are now being taken more seriously following the regime's decision to go ahead with missile and nuclear tests.

US television networks reported overnight that US spy satellites had detected "suspicious vehicle movements" in North Korea. It was thought that the movements could signal preparations for another test.

A senior official of the Seoul government confirmed that there were signs of unusual activity near the site of the first test in northern North Korea. "We are keeping a close eye on that place," he said.

Tony Snow, White House spokesman, said a second nuclear test would result in the further isolation of North Korea, including from China, which is seeing its already difficult relationship with the Stalinist state deteriorating. One person familiar with North Korean warnings to its neighbours said China had received only 20 minutes' notice of the first test, as opposed to the two hours Russia had received.

"What you've seen already in the case of the first test is that the US and the Chinese are working more closely together than even before," said Mr Snow. "I daresay they would become even closer as strategic partners in trying to guarantee safety in the Korean peninsula."

China said it was "resolutely opposed" to a second test. Liu Jianchao, the -foreign ministry spokesman, said Beijing hoped North Korea would adopt "a responsible attitude and come back to resolving the issue through dialogue and consultation".

Fears of a second test have been stoked by the arrival of Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary of state, in north-east Asia for discussions on how to deal with the North Korean nuclear crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0082937

Following its support for the UN sanctions, China appears to be taking some tough action against North Korea. “China will strictly act on this resolution. We will shoulder and fulfil our -obligation,” Mr Liu said -yesterday.

Although both say they support the sanctions, China and South Korea are considered unlikely to squeeze North Korea too hard for fear of causing a collapse on its borders.

But there have been reports that some branches of the Bank of China, including those in Dandong, the town through which most bilateral trade is conducted, have halted remittances to North Korea.

Hints Of Another N. Korea Test Seen (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, October 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — U.S. intelligence agencies have detected new activity near the site where North Korea detonated a nuclear device last week, suggesting possible preparations for a second test, a U.S. intelligence official said Tuesday.

The indications of a possible follow-up test, coinciding with similar reports from South Korea and Japan, prompted warnings from Washington and other capitals that a second nuclear explosion would heighten international tensions and deepen North Korea's isolation.

The White House did not rule out the possibility of a second test.

"Let me put it this way: The North Koreans have made no secret of their desire to be provocative," White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said.

North Korea's test Oct. 9 was considered by analysts to be at least a partial failure because of its low explosive yield, less than the equivalent of 1,000 tons of dynamite, which is much smaller than most nuclear blasts.

The U.S. intelligence official, speaking on condition of anonymity because intelligence findings were being discussed, said another try by the North Korean government in Pyongyang was possible.

"Nobody has discarded the possibility of another test," the official said.

At the same time, the official noted that activity is frequently seen at such sites, and that an imminent test is frequently indicated by relative calm as crews clear the test area.

The U.S. State Department said there was nothing to "indicate one way or the other" whether a second test was about to take place.

U.S., Allies Fear 2nd Nuke Test By Pyongyang (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

The United States and two allies voiced new worries yesterday that North Korea is set to conduct a second underground nuclear test, as Pyongyang said that new U.N. sanctions are tantamount to a declaration of war.

Asked about the possibility of another nuclear test, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld told reporters that there is "speculation," but no specific information.

"We've seen them do things in multiples rather than singles," Mr. Rumsfeld said, referring to North Korea's seven missile-flight tests in July.

"There's speculation that they may want to do something additional. There's also speculation they may not. So, only time will tell," he said after meeting with Singapore's former prime minister, Lee Kuan Yew.

In Tokyo, Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said, "We have received such information [about a test], but I cannot tell you the details."

A South Korean official told reporters in Seoul that "there are certain signs that prompted our authorities to cast a very sensitive eye on the matter."

U.S. intelligence agencies on Monday confirmed that a blast Oct. 9 northwest of Kilchu, North Korea, was a nuclear test, although it appeared to be smaller and less successful than anticipated.

The White House warned North Korea yesterday that another nuclear test would lead to greater isolation.

"The first test, while nuclear, did have a low yield, and perhaps it would not be unreasonable to expect that the North Koreans might want to try something once again to be provocative," White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters. "It would not be a good thing for them, but it certainly would not be out of character."

A U.S. official said yesterday that a second test is possible but that there are no signs one is imminent.

A defense official said that several North Korean nuclear-testing facilities are being watched closely and that some increased activity has been spotted. Normally, such tests are preceded by vehicle movement and increased communications.

DOJ_NMG_0082938

North Korea's government, meanwhile, harshly criticized sanctions passed Saturday by the United Nations in response to the nuclear test, issuing its first official statement on the matter.

The Foreign Ministry said North Korea's test was the result of "the U.S. nuclear threat, sanctions and pressure."

North Korea "was compelled to substantially prove its possession of nukes to protect its sovereignty and right to existence from the daily increasing danger of war from the U.S.," the ministry said.

Pyongyang, however, still wants to "de-nuclearize the peninsula through dialogue and negotiations," it stated.

North Korea "is ready for both dialogue and confrontation," the Foreign Ministry said. "If the U.S. increases pressure upon [North Korea], persistently doing harm to it, it will continue to take physical countermeasures, considering it as a declaration of a war."

In Seoul, Christopher R. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, told reporters that another nuclear test will be a further sign of North Korean bellicosity.

"We would all regard a second test as a belligerent answer on North Korea's part to the international community," he said. North Korea "really has to understand that the international community is not going to accept [it] as a nuclear state."

Mr. Hill said Pyongyang might view nuclear tests as a way to gain respectability but, in fact, the blasts "make us respect them less."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice left Washington yesterday for a diplomatic tour of the region. She will meet with Japanese officials today and South Korean ministers tomorrow on North Korea sanctions. She will also meet with Chinese officials later in the week.

South Korea's Yonhap news agency today quoted Alexander Vershbow, the U.S. ambassador in Seoul, as saying Miss Rice will ask South Korea to help inspect North Korea-bound ships for the components for weapons of mass destruction. Both China and South Korea have expressed reluctance to participate in such actions.

The governments of South Korea and Japan also are worried that a second test is coming.

Intelligence analysis of the likelihood of a second test appeared mixed. Some analysts said there is no evidence indicating that a second test will be conducted soon.

"This activity could represent prep for a second test, but it doesn't necessarily mean definitively that it is," the defense official said.

People and vehicle activity in North Korea is not a sure sign of an impending nuclear test.

"They may have had the same activity six months ago, but it wouldn't have raised any red flags at the time," one official said. "But now it is."

On the motive behind North Korean actions, Mr. Snow said he would not "do a psychological evaluation of the 'Dear Leader,' " as North Korea's Kim Jong-il is called.

"What we do is, we take a look at his actions, and we'll respond with actions, which we think are going to be louder than words or psychological profiles," he said.

"I think the consequences of a second North Korean nuclear test would be the further isolation of North Korea," Mr. Snow said.

N. Korea Condemns Sanctions, Threatens 2nd Nuke Test (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, October 18, 2006

ELMENDORF AIR FORCE BASE, Alaska -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plans to seek commitments from China and other North Korean neighbors for a sweeping inspections program to monitor almost all cargo shipped to or from the would-be nuclear power, a senior State Department official said during the first leg of Rice's four-nation trip to Asia.

Though couched in more diplomatic terms, the action described amounts to a virtual blockade--albeit one imposed at the ports, frontiers and airfields of North Korea's trading partners rather than on the seas surrounding the nation.

The official stressed that the U.S. would ask countries to use their ordinary customs authority to control shipments to and from their territory. Except in rare circumstances such as detecting that unconventional arms or missile technology are onboard, the U.S. does not contemplate the boarding of North Korean vessels in international waters, the official said.

With Rice scheduled to touch down in Tokyo about 3 p.m. there Wednesday, tensions continued mounting in the region Tuesday as North Korea condemned the United Nations sanctions as "a declaration of war" and analysts in the U.S. and Japan said there were indications the government of Kim Jong Il was preparing a second nuclear test. A first test earlier this month led to the unanimous UN Security Council vote to impose sanctions.

Concern over a second test stems partly from new satellite imagery showing increased activity around at least two other North Korean sites, a senior U.S. defense official said.

DOJ_NMG_0082939

The activity, which started a number of days ago, included ground preparation at one site and construction of some buildings and other structures, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because it involved intelligence gathering.

In North Korea, meanwhile, the nation marked the 80th anniversary of the ``Down-with-Imperialism Union"--a political platform on which the ruling party was built. North Koreans held parades across the country along with an enormous gathering at a central square in Pyongyang.

The regime slammed the UN measures with a stream of bellicosity in a Foreign Ministry statement.

``The resolution cannot be construed otherwise than a declaration of a war" against the North, the statement said.

The new UN measures ban North Korea from importing or exporting materials for weapons of mass destruction or missile technology. They also forbid the sale of luxury goods and call for a freeze on the assets of individuals and entities involved in the nuclear program.

China has a lengthy border with North Korea and is its largest trading partner, making its cooperation crucial to attempts to exert pressure. But China's interest in discouraging North Korea's nuclear program is balanced by fears of regional chaos if the regime collapsed.

Though there were reports the day after the resolution that Chinese authorities inspected cargo traversing its frontier with North Korea, it is unclear how long the efforts will last or how complete they will be. China's UN ambassador declared after passage of the sanctions that China would not interdict North Korean ships passing through its territorial waters.

Rice will make the case to China and other nations that the UN sanctions impose a legal requirement to prevent shipments of contraband.

"We believe it is now a legal obligation for states to give very close scrutiny on their territory, in their ports, in their territorial waters and even in their airspace to any North Korean cargo," said a senior State Department official.

Shipments over Chinese airspace are particularly significant because flights between North Korea and Iran, which the U.S. also fears is engaged nuclear weapons development, ordinarily would pass over China.

"We're not telling them they have to do 100 percent inspections. But we want effective enforcement," the official said.

Speaking to reporters on the first leg of her flight from Washington to Tokyo, Rice said the U.S. expected aggressive enforcement of the resolution.

"It changes the obligation of states to make sure they are using whatever authorities they can to make sure that this trafficking does not take place. It is a mandatory obligation," Rice said.

Rice also warned against a second test.

"Further action by the North Koreans is only going to deepen their isolation, which is pretty deep right now," she said.

Tribune news services contributed to this report.

Rice To Push U.S. Allies To Inspect N. Korean Cargo (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, October 18, 2006

ELMENDORF AIR FORCE BASE, Alaska — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday that she will push U.S. allies to conduct aggressive inspections of North Korean cargo for nuclear weapons materials.

The Bush administration's plan to argue for a strict interpretation of a United Nations resolution, which calls for inspections, could further raise tensions in the region. The sanctions resolution was passed Saturday to punish North Korea for its recent nuclear test.

In a statement, North Korea said Tuesday that the U.N. resolution “cannot be construed otherwise than a declaration of war.” The North also warned it “wants peace but is not afraid of war.”

The Bush administration and its key allies expressed concern that North Korea was preparing a second test.

The chief U.S. envoy on the North Korean nuclear issue, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, said in Seoul that the response from Pyongyang was “not very helpful.”

“We would all regard a second test as a belligerent answer on North Korea's part to the international community,” Hill said.

South Korea and China have balked at searching North Korean ships for fear of sparking a military confrontation. North Korea warned that it would respond violently to attempts to inspect its cargo.

“We will deliver merciless blows without hesitation to whoever tries to breach our sovereignty,” said a statement issued through the country's official news agency.

Rice, briefing reporters on the way to Asia, said a focus of her trip would be to discuss “defensive measures” to prevent North Korea from exporting nuclear materials. “The world needs to build a framework for this kind of work,” she said.

While Rice said the U.S. intention is not to inspect every North Korean ship, truck or plane, she made clear that she would use visits to Japan, South Korea, China and Russia to push for a vigorous implementation of the new resolution.

The resolution calls for inspections "as necessary" to prevent illegal trafficking by North Korea.

"There are obligations for sanctions on North Korea, also obligations to inspect certain cargos," Rice said.

The resolution calls for nations to prevent North Korea from buying or selling specified weapons or technology. The measure also bans some luxury goods from North Korea and freezes funds outside the country that are associated with weapons programs.

Rice's efforts could be complicated if North Korea is preparing a second nuclear test.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said the Bush administration would not be surprised by a second test, while warning against it.

"The North Koreans have made no secret of their desire to be provocative," Snow told reporters at the White House. "And perhaps it would not be unreasonable to expect that the North Koreans would like to try something again."

In Tokyo, Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said his government had received unspecified indications that North Korea might be preparing for a second test. "I cannot tell you the details," he said.

The Bush administration confirmed Monday for the first time that North Korea conducted an underground nuclear test last week.

Rice To Urge Radiation Inspections To Thwart North Korea (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

ELMENDORF AIR FORCE BASE, Alaska, Oct. 17 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will urge the countries of northeast Asia to create a strict system of radiation monitoring and inspections to prevent North Korea from smuggling nuclear materials into or out of the country, a senior State Department official said Tuesday.

But in what appears to be an effort to cajole China to enforce the new United Nations sanctions against North Korea aggressively, the United States will ask the countries to focus their efforts on conducting inspections in their own territories, including ports, and on suspicious ships, trucks and aircraft rather than every piece of cargo.

China has been concerned about taking too harsh a stance against North Korea, and its ambassador to the United Nations has said it will not interdict ships.

On Tuesday, a spokesman for the North Korean Foreign Ministry called the United Nations sanctions against his country a "declaration of war." The tone of the statement was not atypical for the North, which often releases bellicose public announcements.

The United Nations resolution, issued last weekend to punish the North for its Oct. 9 nuclear bomb test, bans trade with North Korea in materials linked with unconventional weapons, and authorizes countries to inspect cargo going into and out of the North. But this last measure was diluted by China's insistence that the resolution state that countries be asked, not required, to do so.

What Secretary Rice will be negotiating this week with Asian countries is how they will ensure that transfers of nuclear and other material do not happen. China, which voted for the United Nations sanctions, says it is committed to putting the resolution into effect.

The American idea for a new security framework for North Korea, as described Tuesday by the State Department official, was intended to try to ensure that the country's suspicious cargo would be inspected in Asia, but in ways that could not be construed as a blockade.

"We do not envision this regime as an embargo, as a quarantine or as a blockade," said the official, who was accompanying Ms. Rice as she flew from Washington to Asia, with a refueling stop here in Alaska. "It is much more selective in nature" and aimed specifically at materials for manufacturing unconventional weapons, or building missiles to carry them, the official said.

The United States will urge the northeast Asian countries to use radiation monitors to identify suspicious ships, trucks and aircraft and to also consider United States and Asian intelligence in figuring out which cargo to check.

Separately, in comments to correspondents at the start of her trip for talks in Tokyo, Seoul, Beijing and Moscow, Ms. Rice stressed that efforts to end North Korea's nuclear program should be carried out in ways that do not escalate the crisis.

Her comments could be heard as assurances to the leadership in Beijing. As worried as China may be about North Korea's decision to explode a nuclear bomb, it is equally worried that international sanctions, led by the United States, could cause its neighbor to implode, sending thousands of refugees streaming across its border.

Ms. Rice repeated the Bush administration's official formulation that the United States has no intention or desire "to attack or invade North Korea." But she also said that "the long-suffering people of North Korea should not be forgotten by the international system."

DOJ_NMG_0082941

She warned of dangers if other nations moved toward developing their own nuclear arsenals to counterbalance North Korea — one reason that she said she planned to reaffirm American security commitments to Japan and South Korea.

Officials aboard Ms. Rice's airplane gave the most detailed description to date of how the Bush administration hopes to enlist North Korea's neighbors to implement the Security Council sanctions. They described how a more stringent monitoring and inspection program might focus on the placement of radiation sensors at the land crossings along China's lengthy border with North Korea, and at airfields and ports across the region and around the world that are known to handle cargo to and from the North.

The number of border crossings, airports and maritime ports used in trade by North Korea's feeble economy is limited.

Officials who described details of these initial ideas did so on condition of anonymity, under traditional ground rules for speaking in advance of diplomatic talks.

Tuesday's statement by North Korea said the country would "deliver merciless blows without hesitation to whoever tries to breach our sovereignty and right to survive under the excuse of carrying out the U.N. Security Council resolution."

Referring to the North by the initials of its official name, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the statement also said: "The D.P.R.K. had remained unfazed in any storm and stress in the past when it had no nuclear weapons. It is quite nonsensical to expect the D.P.R.K. to yield to the pressure and threat of someone at this time when it has become a nuclear weapons state."

In Seoul, South Korea's top nuclear negotiator, Chun Yung-woo, said the statement contained "no surprises," and was just "the usual rhetoric that they have been using," according to Agence France-Presse.

U.S. Urges Vigilance On North Korea (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

ELMENDORF AIR FORCE BASE, Alaska -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice says she hopes to use her trip to Asia to convince South Korea, China and other countries they have a legal obligation, under a U.N. resolution passed Saturday, to inspect North Korean cargo.

The world-wide inspections envisioned by the Bush administration would go far beyond the 2003 Proliferation Security Initiative, or PSI, under which certain countries have moved to interdict ships or planes suspected of carrying long-range missiles or nuclear material. They would also exceed the measures that some other countries, notably China and South Korea, appear ready to undertake.

Ms. Rice was en route to Tokyo yesterday as part of a five-day trip to Asia to discuss how to enforce penalties against North Korea for testing a nuclear device. U.S. officials said satellite pictures of North Korea suggest that preparations for another test explosion could be under way.

Ms. Rice sought to allay concerns that the U.S. envisioned a sort of blockade, saying that ship interdictions would largely come about as the result of tips. "We are not looking at inspecting every ship," she said.

The Bush administration "does not envision this regime as an embargo, a quarantine, or a blockade," said a senior State Department official traveling with Ms. Rice. But the U.N. resolution does create "a legal obligation" for all states "to give close scrutiny" to all North Korean cargo entering their ports, crossing their borders or entering their air space, the official said.

"We do want an effective inspection regime established that looks at North Korean shipments no matter how those shipments are made," he said.

Both China and South Korea have expressed concern in recent days that the resolution not amount to a blockade or lead to provocations that might spark a military conflict with Pyongyang. North Korea called the U.N. resolution "a declaration of war."

Ms. Rice told reporters traveling with her that much of her discussions in South Korea and China will focus on measures those countries will take to inspect North Korean cargo. Under the U.S.-led PSI, searches were voluntary and initiated only when authorities suspected that there were illicit goods. Now, she said, "it's a mandatory obligation."

China and Russia fought successfully last week at the U.N. to tone down much stricter language on inspections that had been proposed by the U.S. The final resolution simply "calls upon" states to take "cooperative action" as allowed under their own laws to inspect North Korean cargo.

But the administration is now pushing for a tough interpretation of the measure, arguing that countries have a legal responsibility to inspect such cargo. U.S. officials applauded reports Monday that China had begun to inspect trucks at its border with North Korea. But both Beijing and Seoul appear reluctant to push inspections too far, especially when it comes to boarding North Korean ships.

In addition to urging strict inspections, Ms. Rice will also offer to help China and South Korea bulk up radiation-detection capabilities at key border crossings. She is scheduled to visit South Korea tomorrow, China on Friday and Russia on Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0082942

Sanctions Against North Korea Must Be Firmly Enforced, Rice Says (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel And Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, October 18, 2006

ELMENDORF AIR FORCE BASE, Alaska - The United States is pressing North Korea's neighbors to check virtually all North Korean cargo crossing their borders by air, land and sea to fully enforce new U.N. sanctions, a senior State Department official said Tuesday.

As part of the response to North Korea's nuclear test, plans also are under way to expand radiation detection programs in East Asia to prevent Pyongyang from importing or exporting nuclear weapons material, said the official, who was traveling to Asia with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Rice, speaking to reporters en route to a refueling stop in Alaska, said firm enforcement of the sanctions is the best hope for persuading North Korean leader Kim Jong Il to reverse his isolated country's new nuclear status.

Still, she said there was only "a fair chance" that will happen.

Rice was headed to Japan, South Korea, China and Russia to coordinate approaches to North Korea and reaffirm longtime military alliances with Tokyo and Seoul.

Following North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test, the U.N. Security Council on Saturday approved a resolution containing the strictest sanctions it has imposed in a half-century. They include a ban on export or import of nuclear- and missile-related materials, heavy conventional armaments and luxury goods.

North Korea, which may be preparing a second nuclear test, said it was "nonsensical" to try to restrain it now that it has a nuclear arsenal.

"The resolution cannot be construed otherwise than (as) a declaration of war," the North Korean foreign ministry said in a statement Tuesday. "We will deliver merciless blows without hesitation to whoever tries to breach our sovereignty and right to survive under the excuse of carrying out the Security Council resolution."

Satellites reportedly have picked up suspicious movement of trucks and people at a site in North Korea's northeast that indicate preparations for a possible second nuclear test.

Rice acknowledged concerns about a second North Korean test and warned Pyongyang against that step, saying it would only deepen the country's isolation.

The U.N. resolution calls on countries to inspect cargo to or from North Korea that crosses their borders to search for major weapons and material that could be used in missile and nuclear programs.

The Bush administration has interpreted that language as a new mandate on countries to conduct aggressive screenings.

"We believe it is now a legal obligation for states to give very close scrutiny on their territories, in their ports, in their territorial waters and even in their airspace to any North Korean cargo," said the senior official, who spoke on condition of anonymity under State Department ground rules.

China and South Korea have voiced concerns that Washington-led punitive action against North Korea could bring instability and possible armed confrontation.

"Things must be done in such a way that they don't bring about an escalation of the situation into something uncontrollable," Chinese President Hu Jintao told a group of Japanese lawmakers visiting Beijing, the Kyodo news service reported.

China shares an 880-mile land border with North Korea that is crossed daily by trains and hundreds of trucks.

South Korean Prime Minister Han Myung-Sook said sanctions "must not be implemented in any way that could spark an armed clash," but instead should be aimed at pushing North Korea back to long-stalled six-nation talks to dismantle its nuclear programs.

State Department officials acknowledge that the touchiest question involves intercepting North Korean vessels in international waters, where the legal authority is often less clear than it is in another country's territory.

Rice and her aides said the United States isn't advocating a blockade or quarantine, such as that imposed around Cuba during the 1962 missile crisis.

Inspections of ships won't be random but rather "information-driven," Rice said, referring to intelligence tips that a vessel is carrying banned material.

The senior State Department official said North Korea has only a few major ports and a relatively low level of shipping traffic. "The problem is quite manageable," he said.

Under an existing program known as the Proliferation Security Initiative, the United States and other countries have intercepted and seized ships with material that can be used in weapons of mass destruction research. That program, however, is voluntary. About 80 countries participate in the effort, but South Korea and China aren't among them.

DOJ_NMG_0082943

The Bush administration also hopes to expand the use of radiation detectors in a defensive ring around North Korea, the senior official said.

Such detectors are in use at some U.S. border crossings and in a program at U.S. ports called the Container Security Initiative, but they work only at close range.

Rice said that at her first two stops, she will strongly reaffirm the United States' commitment to the defense of Japan and South Korea.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the senior envoy on the nuclear crisis, said in Seoul that Washington was unhappy with Seoul's decision not to suspend one of its major projects with North Korea under its "sunshine policy" of long-term economic engagement. Hill said a South Korean tourism business at Mount Geumgang, a resort in the North visited mainly by South Koreans, "seems to be designed to give money to the North Korean authorities."

Strobel reported from Alaska, Johnson from Seoul, South Korea.

Rice Tries To Head Off Nuclear Arms Race (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, October 17, 2006

North Korea's nuclear test could set off an atomic arms race in Asia, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday as she sought to reaffirm U.S. obligations to defend two nations most at risk.

In addition to settling nerves among allies, Rice's Asia trip is meant to reinforce pressure on South Korea and especially China to enforce sanctions. Those include what the United States describes as an aggressive inspection and interdiction program that stops short of a full blockade of North Korean trade.

The United States is concerned that Japan and South Korea may want to develop their own nuclear weapons programs to counter the threat from North Korea, and part of Rice's assignment on this week's hastily arranged trip is to lessen that temptation.

"Obviously an event of this kind does carry with it the potential for instability in the relationships that now exist in the region," Rice said en route to Japan, her first stop on a tour devoted almost entirely to answering North Korea's nuclear threat.

"That's why it's extremely important to go out and to affirm, and affirm strongly, U.S. defense commitments to Japan and to South Korea," Rice said.

Her diplomatic language refers to the calculus of nuclear deterrents and to the long-standing U.S. pledge to use its own nuclear arsenal to defend its friends.

On her trip, Rice plans to ask South Korea to expand its role in a U.S.-led international program to stop the spread of weapons of mass destruction, Alexander Vershbow, the U.S. ambassador to South Korea, said in Seoul.

Rice would not comment in detail about worries by the U.S. and other governments that the North may be preparing for a second test explosion.

"We're concerned about further action by the North Koreans," Rice said, "but further action by the North Koreans will only deepen its isolation, which is pretty deep right now."

Concern over a second test stems partly from new satellite imagery showing increased activity around at least two other North Korean sites, a senior defense official said Tuesday.

The activity, started a number of days ago, included ground preparation at one site and construction of some buildings and other structures, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because it involved intelligence gathering. He said that although the purpose of the structures is unclear, officials are concerned because North Korea has left open the possibility of another test.

The White House said Tuesday that it wouldn't be surprising if North Korea were to try another nuclear test "to be provocative."

At the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said that while it was unclear what role the U.S. military might take in enforcing new U.N. sanctions, he did not expect the United States or any other nation to do so unilaterally.

"It takes cooperation among a great many countries to participate, and things move by land, sea and air, and it's complicated, and only time will tell," he told reporters.

Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe has ruled out developing nuclear weapons, but a ruling party policy director raised that possibility soon after the North's Oct. 9 test.

The measures passed by the U.N. Security Council over the weekend were watered down to suit China and Russia, but still impose harsh penalties. The measures ban trade with the North in major weapons and materials that could be used in its ballistic missile and weapons of mass destruction programs. They call for all countries to inspect cargo to and from North Korea to enforce the prohibition, although it is not clear how that will work in practice.

DOJ_NMG_0082944

The U.S. does not think of that as an embargo, said a senior official traveling with Rice, who spoke on condition of anonymity because Rice had not yet met with her Asian counterparts.

Earlier Tuesday, the communist North said U.N. sanctions aimed at punishing the country for its nuclear test amount to a declaration of war. The government said it would not cave under such pressure now that it is a nuclear power.

Japan and the United States have gone beyond the U.N. measures to impose or propose separate financial, trade and other restrictions on North Korea over what the U.S. claims is a pattern of lawbreaking by a rogue nation.

China has long been one of North Korea's few friends, but relations frayed in recent months when the North ignored China's warnings not to conduct missile tests or last week's nuclear test.

Although China's cooperation is key to making sanctions effective, Beijing fears that coming down too hard could topple the fragile government of Kim Jong Il or send hundreds of thousands of hungry refugees flooding across the border.

Even with full Chinese compliance, it isn't clear the sanctions can pressure North Korea to resume multi-country negotiations on dismantling its nuclear programs. The country has lived on the edge of famine for a decade and its trade with the West is severely limited by the bans the U.S. has already imposed.

South Korea has said it would fully comply with the sanctions but has also indicated it does not plan to halt key economic projects with the North, despite concerns they may help fund the North's nuclear and missile programs.

Kerry Blasts Bush Policy On North Korea (DMR)

Des Moines Register, October 18, 2006

Iowa City, Ia. — Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry said on another trip to Iowa today that the North Korean nuclear crisis is of the Bush administration's own making.

"The Bush policy is a disgrace," Kerry said in an interview before attending a campaign event for Democrat candidate for governor Chet Culver.

"If Ronald Reagan could talk to the evil empire and negotiate with the Soviets, surely George Bush could do the same with North Korea," he said. "But he's a prisoner of rigid ideology."

Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, has said the United States should negotiate directly with North Korea, the communist dictatorship that tested a nuclear weapon last week and appeared to be preparing another test today.

By asking North Korea's neighbors such as China and South Korea to participate in talks, U.S. clout is weakened, Kerry said.

"The Chinese can't do it," he said. "North Korea fears the potential of U.S. military action for regime change."

Iowa Republicans countered that Bush was engaged in diplomacy in the region by sending Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to northeast Asia today.

"Senator Kerry's irresponsible comments do nothing more than undermine President Bush's efforts to achieve peace and security in northeast Asia through diplomacy," Republican Party of Iowa spokeswoman Sarah Sauber said.

Kerry headlined a rally for Culver at a downtown Iowa City restaurant, where about 100 party activists turned out around midday.

Kerry, who later was headed to Cedar Rapids to campaign for legislative candidates, was not alone with plans to visit Iowa this week as a prospective presidential candidate. Fellow Senate Democrat Christopher Dodd of Connecticut was also planning to be in Iowa City and Cedar Rapids today.

Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona was scheduled to make appearances in central Iowa on Wednesday, including an appearance on MSNBC's "Hardball" from Ames.

Kerry, who won the 2004 Iowa caucuses en route to the presidential nomination, has said he is very serious about exploring a second White House bid.

He has maintained in the two years since losing to Bush that his criticisms of the Republican president are even more valid than they were during his campaign.

He has kept in close touch with Iowans and was making his fourth visit to the lead-off caucus state in the past month and planned a fifth in the three weeks remaining before Nov. 7.

Defector: Kim's Ouster Would Stop Nukes (AP)

By Kwang-tae Kim

AP, October 17, 2006

The man once considered the mentor of North Korean leader Kim Jong Il said Tuesday that the reclusive country's nuclear weapons program cannot be stopped unless the strongman is ousted.

DOJ_NMG_0082945

But Kim's total grip on the communist society makes that only a remote possibility, Hwang Jang Yop, the highest-ranking North Korean government official ever to defect to South Korea, told The Associated Press.

The 83-year-old Hwang, wearing a lapel badge in the shape of the South Korean national flag, is also skeptical that United Nations sanctions imposed on the North for a nuclear test explosion will hurt Kim's rule.

"I don't think his grip on power will be significantly weakened," Hwang said, adding that South Korea continues to give aid to North Korea, while other countries, most notably China and Russia, are opposed to the idea of pressuring the North.

Hwang, who seldom gives interviews, made his surprising defection in 1997 when he and an aide took refuge in the South Korean embassy in Beijing while on a visit to the Chinese capital. At the time, he was a longtime member of the North's elite, serving as secretary of the ruling Workers' Party.

He had been close to the country's founder, Kim Il Sung, the father of Kim Jong Il, and is often described as the younger Kim's former mentor. Hwang is also widely seen as the intellectual architect of the North's "juche" philosophy of self sufficiency.

After intense negotiations between China and South Korea, Hwang eventually left Beijing for the Philippines, where he stayed briefly before making his way to Seoul.

Now under police protection 24 hours a day to prevent any North Korean attempt on his life, Hwang said the six-nation talks aimed at ending the North's nuclear weapons program will not resolve the crisis.

He said South Korea, the U.S., China, Russia and Japan should not bargain with the North. They should instead isolate the regime, he said, calling it an "international criminal organization and the enemy of democracy."

The North's nuclear test last week was not Kim's last card and the North Korean leader could still test fire more missiles like he did in July and even mount nuclear warheads on them, Hwang said.

"It is nonsense to urge the North to abandon its nuclear weapons with Kim in place," he said.

Hwang said China is key to bringing an end to Kim's regime.

China is the last remaining ally and main aid donor to its impoverished neighbor, but their relations have been strained by Beijing's support of the U.N. resolution. Still, Beijing succeeded in blocking an even tougher one pushed by the U.S. and Japan.

"No Chinese officials like the North Korean leader, but they keep him in power," Hwang said, adding that Kim's regime serves Beijing's interests by helping keep U.S. influence in the region at bay.

Hwang said the best-case scenario would be if the North pursued economic openness and reform in trying to rebuild its dismal economy, which he said would likely lead eventually to Kim's overthrow and naturally resolve the nuclear dispute.

But Hwang doubts that will happen. "Kim Jong Il actually fears Chinese-style economic reform and openness coming to North Korea," he said.

U.S. Defector Ends Silence About Life In N. Korea (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

PUSAN, South Korea -- Unrepentant and professing support for communism, the last living American defector in North Korea has spoken out publicly for the first time about his life in the nation and his motivations for defecting -- on celluloid.

"I'm telling you a story I never told anyone," James "Comrade Joe" Dresnok says in the film "Crossing the Line," which had its world premiere Monday at South Korea's Pusan International Film Festival. "I have never regretted coming to [North Korea]. I feel at home."

Made by British filmmakers in North Korea, the documentary sheds light on a unique Cold War story: that of an underprivileged, despairing and desperate American who finds contentment in North Korea.

Mr. Dresnok, an Army private from Norfolk, also acknowledges difficulties he faced, and the film contrasts his testimony with that of U.S. veterans and of fellow defector Charles Jenkins, who declined to criticize the regime until he had escaped it.

Mr. Dresnok, born in 1941, was the product of a broken home. After his parents' divorce, he was sent to an orphanage that he describes as "a living hell." Enlisting at 17, he suffered a failed marriage before being posted to the tense inter-Korean border.

There, between dangerous patrols, he spent his pay on prostitutes. Facing disciplinary action after visiting a girlfriend against orders, he defected to the North through perilous minefields in 1962.

"I didn't care if I lived or died," he says.

Captured, he and three fellow U.S. defectors were feted as propaganda trophies and put to work creating propaganda material.

"We took great pride in it," Mr. Dresnok said. "He'd found la-la land," counters a former U.S. officer.

Life under Asian communism initially was hard for the uneducated Southerner. "I didn't want to stay," he said, citing racism. "I didn't think I could adapt."

DOJ_NMG_0082946

In 1966, he and his fellow defectors sought asylum at Pyongyang's Soviet Embassy. Rejected, they underwent intense re-education.

"I got to think like this, act like this," he said, adding that he learned North Korea's official Juche ideology and its "lofty virtues."

In 1972, the four received citizenship. In 1978, they achieved local fame acting out the parts of evil capitalists in a spy-film series, "Nameless Heroes." They also taught English.

The film contrasts the watery grays of Pyongyang with the rustic hues of Mr. Dresnok's native Virginia. He is seen fishing and drinking, visiting his tailor and celebrating his youngest son's birthday in his small apartment. He has married twice in the North, to a Romanian and to a Togolese.

"I take pride in having a son at college," he says. His blond son, James, who speaks English with a Russian accent, is at a foreign-language school. "In America, I don't believe I could afford it."

The most emotional moment is when he sobs, saying, "I swore that in my life I would never abandon my children."

His comment reflects one by Mr. Jenkins, a former Army sergeant who left the North with his Japanese wife and two children with the assistance of the Japanese government in 2004. Mr. Jenkins worried that the foreign-language schools his daughters attended were recruiting grounds for spies, and said that was his motivation for escaping.

Mr. Dresnok takes the opposite view. He angrily disputes the assertions of the former sergeant, and hints at an affair with Mr. Jenkins' Japanese wife. "I'd like to kill [him]," he snarls.

Today, Mr. Dresnok's life is, by North Korean standards, privileged.

During the deadly famines of the late 1990s, "Korean people starved to death, but I got rice rations," he says. "The government is going to take care of me until my dying day."

He appears cheerful, though he is missing his front teeth. It is not clear whether this is related to beatings Mr. Jenkins claimed U.S. defectors suffered. What is clear is Mr. Dresnok is seriously ill from heavy drinking and smoking. The two other U.S. defectors -- Pvt. Larry Allen Abshier and Cpl. Jerry Wayne Parish -- both died from natural causes, he says.

Mr. Dresnok received no financial benefit from being filmed, "apart from the odd bottle of hooch," said the film's co-producer, Nick Bonner, who runs Beijing-based Koryo Tours, which takes tourists to North Korea.

Mr. Bonner said the filmmakers interviewed Mr. Dresnok without government minders being present, and were not censored. At only one point in the film, in front of the American spy ship USS Pueblo, captured in 1968, does Mr. Dresnok refuse to be filmed.

Mr. Bonner also co-produced 2002's "The Game of Their Lives" about the North's 1966 World Cup soccer team, and 2004's "A State of Mind" about two gymnasts preparing for Pyongyang's mass games, a nationalistic spectacle of gymnastics.

The film's rights have been sold to Korea and Japan, said co-producer Paul Yi, who added that he hoped the film would play at the Sundance Film Festival in the United States.

A spokesman for U.S. Forces Korea said by telephone that he was unfamiliar with Mr. Dresnok's case, but expected that if he ever left the North, he would be treated like Mr. Jenkins was.

In 2004, Mr. Jenkins was court-martialed but set free after 30 days of confinement, on the basis that he had suffered enough.

Letters To The Editor (WT)

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

'Nuclear disarmament must be an urgent priority'

The government of the Islamic Republic of Iran strongly rejects any comparison of Iran's nuclear program with other countries'.Iran's nuclear program is legal, fully within the framework of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, peaceful and transparent ("North Korea and Iran," Editorial, Oct. 11).

After more than 2200 days of inspection of Iran's nuclear facilities, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) has concluded that there is no evidence of diversion of nuclear material to military objectives. The latest report by the IAEA's Director-General, Dr. Mohammad El Baradei, dated August 31, states: "Iran has been providing the Agency with access to nuclear material and facilities, and has provided the required reports."

Iran's leadership has repeatedly denounced the manufacturing, stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons on moral, religious and political grounds. Iran is convinced that the proliferation of nuclear weapons is harmful to the cause of world peace and stability.

Iran has called for a nuclear-weapons free zone in the Middle East and has also expressed concerns about the lack of commitment of certain state parties to the Non-Proliferation Treaty regarding their obligations to disarm.

DOJ_NMG_0082947

Iran believe that the absence of meaningful and global nuclear disarmament must be an urgent priority of the international community.

Unfortunately, these important facts about Iran are often ignored in the U.S. media and, instead, Iran has been subjected to a massive campaign of deliberate disinformation. We urge the respected members of the media to refrain from drawing unfounded comparisons between Iran and other countries and to keep the above-stated facts about Iran in consideration when reporting on Iran.

M.A. MOHAMMADI
Press secretary
Mission of the Islamic Republic of Iran to the United Nations
NewYork City

Bush Supports Croatia Membership In NATO (AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

President Bush gave a boost Tuesday to Croatia's aspirations to join NATO, saying it should be admitted to the Western alliance within two years.

Bush said he would recommend the 2008 timetable when he attends a NATO summit next month in Riga, Latvia. He also said he supports Croatia's membership in the European Union.

The president expressed his views during an Oval Office meeting with Croatian Prime Minister Ivo Sanader. "I consider the prime minister a friend; I consider Croatia a friend, as well," Bush said.

The president said he has heard Croatia is one of the most beautiful places on Earth and that he would like to visit sometime. "About the only question we disagreed was whether Croatia or the United States had the most beautiful coastline," Sanader said.

One problem facing Sanader is opposition at home to NATO membership, with opinion polls showing 30 percent of the population against it. Some Croatians claim being a part of NATO would make it a terror target.

While prospects that Croatia eventually will join NATO look good, its hopes of admission to the European Union are less promising.

Sanader said this month he wants EU membership to be fast-tracked and feels his country will be ready for membership by 2008.

European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso said there could be no more EU enlargements after Romania and Bulgaria join Jan. 1 until the union has resolved the future of its stalled constitution.

Abbas Threatens To Dismiss Hamas Government (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 17 — The president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, warned Tuesday that the current Palestinian political crisis was intolerable, and suggested he would dismiss the Hamas-led government if the rival factions could not agree soon on a national unity government.

“To maintain the status quo is impossible,” Mr. Abbas said in remarks broadcast on Palestinian television. “As the person in charge, I am obligated to consider all options that could get us out of this crisis.”

Mr. Abbas’s speech, delivered from the West Bank city of Ramallah, was the clearest signal yet that he was prepared to act against the Hamas government. With Israel and Western governments cutting off the flow of money to the Palestinian Authority, the Hamas government has barely functioned since coming to power more than six months ago.

Mr. Abbas said he still sought a national unity government that would include his secular Fatah movement and Hamas, the Islamic radical group. The two parties agreed on such an arrangement more than a month ago, but the talks broke down over issues that include the recognition of Israel, which Hamas rejects.

Mr. Abbas said that if no agreement was reached soon he might dismiss the government and replace it, at least temporarily, with technocrats.

“I have the right to dismiss the government,” he declared. He then went on to say that a “government of technocrats would be the simplest and most practical solution.”

But Hamas could resist such a move, and the Palestinian Basic Law, which effectively serves as a constitution, is somewhat vague on how to resolve political disputes.

There is also the fear that a political showdown between Mr. Abbas’s Fatah movement and Hamas would add to tensions among the heavily armed supporters of both groups, who have fought street battles in the Gaza Strip in recent weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0082948

"Civil war is the only taboo," Mr. Abbas said. "But we have other options, and I am studying them."

He set no deadlines for a decision. But there has been speculation that he may be prepared to act soon after the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which concludes next week.

Meanwhile, in violence on Tuesday, Israeli troops shot dead five Palestinians in three separate confrontations in the West Bank, according to the Palestinian security officials and the Israeli military.

Soldiers killed an Islamic Jihad militant, Muhammad Zakarneh, in the town of Qabatiya, according to the Israeli military and the Palestinians. Also in Qabatiya, two Palestinians throwing stones at army vehicles were shot dead, according to the Palestinians. The military said it was aware of only one Palestinian death, and the man was believed to be a militant.

In the nearby town of Nablus, soldiers fired on a wanted militant in a car, killing him and another person in the vehicle, according to the military and Palestinians.

Israeli Forces Conducting Raids Kill Four Palestinians In West Bank (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 17 -- Israeli military forces operating in the West Bank killed four Palestinians on Tuesday during arrest operations that turned violent in two volatile cities.

Among the dead were at least two Palestinian gunmen affiliated with the armed wing of Fatah, the secular nationalist movement, and the radical group Islamic Jihad. Palestinian security officials said the dead also included at least one civilian.

The northern West Bank has become a focal point of Israeli security concerns in recent months, emerging as a stronghold of Islamic Jihad, the most radical militia at war with the Jewish state. The operations marked a shift by the military, which has concentrated most offensive operations in the Gaza Strip since the June 25 capture of an Israeli army corporal by several armed groups including the military wing of the governing Hamas movement.

The operations came as Ghazi Hamad, a senior Hamas official, published his second critique of Palestinian society in two months. In a column for the daily newspaper al-Ayyam, Hamad, a senior adviser to Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, asked if violence had become "a Palestinian disease."

Hamad raised the question after sectarian clashes in Gaza and the West Bank that in recent weeks have killed more than 12 Palestinians and wounded scores. He asked whether violence had become "a culture implanted in our bodies and our flesh," adding that it "has taken away the language of brotherhood and replaced it with arms."

"Shouldn't we be ashamed of this ugly behavior, which scandalizes us before our people and before the world?" he wrote from Gaza.

The Israeli military reported Tuesday the discovery of a tunnel near Gaza's border with Egypt, through which Palestinian militias apparently smuggled guns into the strip. The military said it was the 13th tunnel uncovered in the past three months as armed groups attempt to build their arsenals during the Israeli offensive.

At 7 a.m., an Israeli military unit entered the West Bank town of Qabatiya on an arrest operation. Israeli military officials said soldiers fired on a group of Palestinian gunmen, killing one. The man was identified as Mohammed Zakarneh, 18, of Islamic Jihad.

A few hours later, military officials said, a riot broke out as Israeli soldiers attempted a second arrest in the town. The soldiers were pelted with stones and cinder blocks, military officials said, and responded by firing rubber bullets toward the crowd.

Palestinian officials said Hani Khalil Kmeil, 20, was killed. Israeli military officials said they were investigating the report.

The final incident occurred in Nablus when Israeli soldiers fired on a car carrying a member of the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, Fatah's military wing. Israeli military officials said the man, wanted for arrest, was killed, along with the driver, whose connection to the militia was unclear.

Blair Criticizes Veils As 'Mark Of Separation' (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 17 — Prime Minister Tony Blair joined a passionate and increasingly contentious debate on Tuesday over the full-face veils worn by some British Muslim women, calling it a "mark of separation."

It was the first time Mr. Blair had so explicitly backed Jack Straw, the leader of the House of Commons, who raised Muslim ire this month by saying he did not believe that women should wear the full-face veil, a headdress with only a narrow slit for the eyes. Mr. Straw had asked Muslim women meeting with him to remove their veils, arguing that it prevented communication and set the wearer apart.

DOJ_NMG_0082949

"It is a mark of separation, and that is why it makes other people from outside the community feel uncomfortable," Mr. Blair said at a regular news conference, echoing some of Mr. Straw's sentiments.

His remarks reflected a sense that British society is heading toward ever deeper fissures between Muslims and non-Muslims, evoking questions about the nation's readiness to embrace Muslims, and Muslims' willingness to adapt.

The discussion mirrors earlier public disputes in France, Turkey and elsewhere about head scarves, though in Britain it is largely limited to the use of the full-face veil, the niqab.

"No one wants to say that people don't have the right to do it," Mr. Blair said. "That is to take it too far. But I think we need to confront this issue about how we integrate people properly into our society."

There were signs that the dispute had spread farther across Europe. In an interview in Italy, Prime Minister Romano Prodi was quoted Tuesday as saying that women should not be hidden behind veils.

In Muslim societies, the full veil is sometimes worn to shield a woman from the view of men outside her immediate family. The debate about its use among a small number of British Muslims has crystallized around Aishah Azmi, a teaching assistant suspended by a local council for refusing to remove her full-face veil during class in the presence of male teachers.

Mr. Blair said he could "see the reason" for Mrs. Azmi to be suspended from her job at a Church of England school in Dewsbury, Yorkshire, where there is a substantial Muslim minority. Within hours, her lawyers issued a statement accusing Mr. Blair of interfering in a labor tribunal case and demanding a retraction.

"We have to deal with the debate," Mr. Blair said. "People want to know that the Muslim community in particular, but actually all minority communities, have got the balance right between integration and multi-culturalism."

The debate is characterized by Muslims as a symbol of the stigma they face among the non-Muslim majority.

Muhammad Abdul Bari, the secretary general of the Muslim Council of Britain, said in an open letter that some Muslims had been considering changing their names "to avoid anti-Muslim remarks."

"This is what happens when a community is singled out by those at the helm of affairs," he said.

Non-Muslims say the veil-wearing shows a reluctance among the estimated 1.6 million Muslims — 3 percent of the population — to compromise for the sake of social harmony. David Davis, the Conservative opposition spokesman on home affairs, said last weekend that British Muslims risked "voluntary apartheid" by displays of separateness like the full veil.

The gulf has been widening since the London bombings by four British Muslims on July 7, 2005, but the argument has sharpened in recent weeks. After Mr. Straw questioned the wearing of the niqab in early October, a government education minister, Phil Woolas, went further last weekend, calling for Mrs. Azmi, the teaching assistant, to be dismissed. Other government ministers, now including Mr. Blair, have joined the debate.

The discussion spills over into Britain's broader embroilment in the campaign against terrorism and the war in Iraq. Mr. Blair and others say Muslims must do more to police their own ranks, while some Muslims say Britain's deployment in Iraq and Afghanistan accelerates the radicalization of young Muslims like the London bombers.

Last week Britain's new army commander, Gen. Sir Richard Dannatt, said British troops should be pulled out from Iraq "some time soon."

But Mr. Blair said Tuesday: "If we walk away before the job is done from either of those two countries, we will leave a situation in which the very people we are fighting everywhere, including the extremism in our own country, are heartened and emboldened, and we can't afford that to happen. So we have got to see that job through."

Council Seat Still Undecided After 22 Ballots (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 17 — Venezuela's campaign to gain Latin America's open seat on the Security Council next year lagged Tuesday for a second straight day, but Guatemala, the persistent leader after 22 ballots, was unable to win enough votes to secure the position.

The General Assembly recessed Tuesday night for 24 hours to ponder a way out of the deadlock, with diplomats suggesting that it might be time for the Latin American group to switch to a compromise candidate.

But neither country was prepared to step aside.

"We still have a considerable lead over our competitor, and under normal circumstances our competitor would stand down graciously," said Gert Rosenthal, the foreign minister of Guatemala, "but for reasons well known, he's not willing to do that."

Francisco Arias Cárdenas, Venezuela's ambassador, said, "We have had to fight a very uneven battle, with constant false accusations made against us, and we have kept up the fight until now and we will continue the fight."

DOJ_NMG_0082950

The setback was particularly stinging for Venezuela, whose president, Hugo Chávez, has made the contest a centerpiece of his continuing campaign against Washington, financing it liberally with oil proceeds, promoting it with personal appearances around the world and frequently predicting that Venezuela would prevail.

In keeping with that, Mr. Arias Cárdenas has repeatedly said that this was not an argument between "brother" Latin nations, but an effort to liberate the United Nations from United States' "imposition."

Mr. Rosenthal complained: "Venezuela clearly is not doing well, but they want to bring us down with them as the proxy for the United States. It is very unfair to us. Washington did not run our campaign. We did all the work, and we have a majority of the votes."

Mr. Arias Cárdenas said his country was not being "stubborn" but was sacrificing itself to represent poor and weak countries against the "blackmail" of the United States.

He held up the front page of El País, the Spanish daily, which showed a picture of John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, leaning over and consulting with Mr. Rosenthal.

"This is the pressure we are fighting," he said. "Why doesn't Bolton come to this microphone and declare that the United States will remove the pressure, will withdraw the money, and then countries will have the liberty to vote their conscience."

In response, Mr. Bolton said: "Look, we have made our position clear in a very low key way. It is motivated by our concern for Venezuela's behavior, and that's another example of it."

Asked about the photo with Mr. Bolton, Mr. Rosenthal said: "I don't think there is anything conspiratorial about it. Yesterday, I must have been faced with 100 ambassadors, and he was one of them."

The two countries are competing for a two-year term in the seat being vacated by Argentina, and to win it, one of them must reach 125 votes, which is two-thirds of those voting. Guatemala had held to an average of 104 and Venezuela 77.

"It's true that the positions right now seem to be stuck in the same place," Mr. Rosenthal said. "The bottom line is that we still are not prepared to step down, given the lead we have, and Thursday we can have another go at it."

Mr. Bolton said the United States normally steered clear of contests at the United Nations involving regional groups but had become involved in this one out of concern that Venezuela might become a disruptive presence on the Security Council.

"You can draw one conclusion from the results," Mr. Bolton said with evident satisfaction, "that is, that Venezuela is not going to win."

Venezuela Stymied Again In U.N. Vote (WP)

By Colum Lynch, Juan Forero And Bill Brubaker

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 17 -- Venezuela was stymied for a second straight day in its bid to win a seat on the U.N. Security Council, a result that has shocked diplomats who expected President Hugo Chavez's leftist, oil-rich government to gain a platform on the international stage.

Guatemala led Venezuela in each of the 12 rounds of secret voting held by the General Assembly on Tuesday. On Monday, Guatemala won nine of the first 10 rounds. But neither country has secured the required two-thirds vote to succeed Argentina on Jan. 1 in the open Latin American seat on the 15-nation council.

The voting is scheduled to continue Thursday morning.

Delegates at the United Nations once predicted that Venezuela would easily receive enough support for the seat. But the opening ballot Monday showed Guatemala ahead 114 to 74 . Venezuela gained votes through the day but never did better than a 93 to 93 tie with Guatemala. Afterward, several envoys expressed surprise that Venezuela had fared so poorly.

On Tuesday, Venezuela could muster no more than 85 votes in any single round. Guatemala attracted as many as 112 votes but consistently fell a dozen or more votes short of the required total in each round.

Venezuela's showing has come as a relief to the United States, which has lobbied actively on behalf of Guatemala. Chavez's government, U.S. officials warned, would play a destructive role on the council, lending its support to those countries, including Iran, Sudan and North Korea, that have defied the United Nations.

It also represented a personal blow to Chavez, who had run a costly political campaign that involved millions of dollars in aid to poor countries as well as state visits to Russia, China and the Middle East.

Chavez may have undercut his country's chances with a provocative speech last month before the General Assembly, in which he described President Bush as "the devil." And once-solid support for Venezuela in South America, from countries including Chile and Paraguay, wavered after Chavez's government entered into a military pact with Bolivia, which has lost territory to both those countries.

DOJ_NMG_0082951

The United States, Britain, China, Russia and France enjoy permanent membership on the 15-member Security Council. The other 10 seats are distributed regionally for two-year terms; a vote by the General Assembly fills five seats each year. South Africa, Indonesia, Italy and Belgium were easily elected Monday for their regions.

But the deadlock over the Latin American seat raised the prospect of a long election and that a compromise candidate--possibly Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Uruguay or Chile--might enter the race. Mexico and Cuba received single votes on some ballots Monday.

Chavez has been hostile to Washington for years, but he has been particularly antagonistic since the White House offered tacit support for a 2002 coup that briefly removed him from power. Venezuela's U.N. ambassador, Francisco Javier Arias Cardenas, characterized the race as a challenge between a fearless champion of the developing world and the world's lone superpower.

"We are not competing with a brother country. We are competing with the biggest power on the planet," he said.

Some delegates said Chavez's Sept. 20 speech alienated moderate members who felt he had violated U.N. protocol.

For those who view the General Assembly chamber as "a very sacrosanct place," Chavez's performance exhibited "bad taste," said Tanzania's ambassador, Augustine P. Mahiga. "It can be a platform for the battle of ideas but not for the vilification of one country."

Mahiga said, however, that Washington's intensive promotion of Guatemala's bid may have helped its cause in some capitals and "swayed" others to vote against it.

"It's a double-edged sword," he said. The race was "perceived as a contest between the United States and Venezuela."

Alberto Garrido, an author and analyst in Caracas who has written several books on Chavez, said the vote is a serious setback for Chavez's campaign to project Venezuelan influence beyond Latin America.

Venezuela has bought foreign debt from Argentina, sold crude oil at cut-rate prices to smaller Caribbean islands and provided aid to Africa--all efforts designed, in part, to counter U.S. influence.

"This is a big setback in Chavez's strategy," said Garrido, whose latest book, "Chavez's Wars," deals with the president's conflicts with the Bush administration and other foes. "He had a plan to become the institutionalized voice of the south, if he had gotten that seat. This is a blow, perhaps the biggest blow in his geopolitical strategy."

In Venezuela, the government's failure to secure a seat was called "an embarrassing defeat" by Manuel Rosales, who is running against Chavez in December's presidential election. The president retains the support of a majority of Venezuelans, recent polls have shown, but opponents accuse him of ignoring spiraling crime, chronic unemployment and poverty while he focuses on making a name for himself abroad.

Chavez has spent much of his presidency outside Venezuela. But since July, as the Security Council campaign has built, his travel schedule has become feverish, with trips to Russia, China, Vietnam, Iran and Belarus.

The Venezuelan government's argument that it would be a voice for those countries suffering at the hands of U.S. imperialism did not strike a chord with enough nations, said Milos Alcalay, a former Venezuelan ambassador to the United Nations.

"To argue that Venezuela would go to the Security Council to be the counterweight against imperialism didn't mesh with the philosophy that this is a body that aims to find things in common," said Alcalay, who resigned his post because of opposition to Chavez's policies.

"This was firstly a rejection of combative language, but it was also a rejection of Venezuela's claim to be the voice of those who do not have a voice, of Africa, the nonaligned," he said. "And really, they do have a voice. Africa elected South Africa as its spokesman."

Forero reported from Quito, Ecuador. Brubaker reported from Washington.

Un Seats Continues To Elude Chávez (FT)

Financial Times, October 18, 2006

A second full day of voting at the United Nations General Assembly on Tuesday failed to decide whether anti-US Venezuela or pro-US Guatemala would win a seat on the Security Council.

Neither managed to get the two-thirds majority needed for victory, although Guatemala won the majority of votes by a significant margin. In a day that saw both sides' fortunes rise and fall, Guatemala won 102 votes against Venezuela's 77 in the 12th round. Diplomats said the situation was deadlocked.

The voting is a setback for Venezuela's President Hugo Chávez, who in recent months has travelled extensively and invested heavily in an attempt to win support for his country's bid.

"It is a tremendous blow to Venezuela," said Juan Tokatlian, a Buenos Aires-based international relations specialist. "Their votes have fallen well short of what they expected."

DOJ_NMG_0082952

The stalemate could continue for the next few days. Ecuador convened an informal discussion between Latin American countries for today but no formal meeting was scheduled. Voting resumes on Thursday. Guatemala said its bottom line was that it was still not prepared to step down.

On Monday, Guatemala started with a clear lead, then fell level with Venezuela, before recovering its majority. On Tuesday, it swung between 100 and 112 votes, against between 75 and 85 for Venezuela. Guatemala needed between 120 to 125 votes to win, depending on abstentions.

Venezuela indicated it could withdraw its candidacy if Guatemala also withdrew, and the US publicly advocated a fair vote without exerting pressure.

The impasse has prompted other Latin American countries to suggest regional talks on a way to avoid a recurrence of divisions that afflicted the region at the height of the cold war.

In 1979 it took four months and 155 rounds of votes to resolve protracted deadlock between Cuba and Colombia. That contest was eventually resolved only after the intervention of Kurt Waldheim, then secretary-general of the United Nations, and the nomination of Mexico as a compromise candidate.

Mr Tokatlian said he expected Brazil, Argentina and Chile to begin efforts to broker a solution.

In UN Political Drama, It's All About The US (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, October 18, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.

In the war of Hugo Chávez versus George W. Bush, Venezuela versus the United States, and anti- Americanism versus American leadership, the latest battle is ... a draw.

In marathon voting at the 192-country United Nations General Assembly that continued midday Tuesday, Venezuela had not won a coveted seat on the 15-member Security Council. Mr. Chávez's trash talk about Mr. Bush from the same General Assembly hall a month ago has not won him the support he needs to claim one of the Council's 10 rotating seats -a post from which he had hoped to goad "the imperial power," or "the master of the house," as he is wont to say.

But neither has the US been able to definitively squash Venezuela by assuring the election of Guatemala, its favored candidate, to the open two-year position. The writing on the wall was getting clearer: Neither country seems likely to win the rotating seat reserved for Latin America. Speculation intensified over possible replacement "consensus" candidates.

Yet the stalemate also has deeper roots and explanations, to listen to delegates as they filed out of the hall after each ballot, or to UN officials milling around to see how the vote was going.

For some, it is a result of the fault lines that still divide the world more than three years after debate about invading Iraq. Surveys show the US remains deeply unpopular in much of the world, and the General Assembly voting reflects that.

But for others, it is more a reflection of widespread ambivalence - and perhaps fatigue - toward both the camp that wants to make a point of standing up to the US, and the one that is seen to be too closely aligned with it.

"There is a whiff of the cold war to this, and people don't want to see the UN go back to that paralysis," said one UN official observing the vote, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "My guess is that a fair number of countries don't want either side to get the upper hand."

Many delegates expressed surprise that Venezuela, a major oil producer that worked hard for months to win votes, never overtook Guatemala in the first day of balloting. The common explanation offered was that Chávez's depiction of Bush as "the devil" in his speech to the General Assembly in September had cost him support - despite applause and titters at the time - because it raised concerns of a Security Council bogged down in polemics.

"When it comes down to it, a polarizer is not a vote-getter," said another UN official, who also spoke on condition of anonymity.

After 14 secret ballots by midday Tuesday, Guatemala stood at 108 votes - well short of the two-thirds majority (128 votes) needed. Venezuela had 76. Those numbers had fluctuated over the course of ballots, but they were basically the same as the original vote Monday.

In all, the General Assembly actually had to fill five rotating Security Council seats, although the other four slots were decided without controversy on the first ballot. South Africa, Indonesia, Belgium, and Italy are to fill the seats of their respective regions in January.

But the Latin American seat was a different story, with stakeholders from both sides indicating early on they were ready for a long fight.

"All I can say is that back in 2000, I spent 31 days in Florida," said John Bolton, the US ambassador to the UN, at one point on Monday, referring to his role in the legal wrangling that ultimately won the presidency for Bush. "This has just begun."

DOJ_NMG_0082953

Mr. Bolton's words suggest the importance the US is putting in the outcome.

By the seventh vote on Monday, talk had shifted to the goodies the candidates were passing out to secure any wavering votes: chocolates with "Venezuela" wrappers from one side, woven friendship bracelets from the other.

But others alluded to much more heavy-handed tactics than those quaint campaign tools. Venezuela's ambassador, Francisco Javier Arias Cárdenas, said the people of the world were "resisting with dignity the pressures of the imperial power." He claimed the US was seeking to sway the vote by issuing both promises of aid for supporting Guatemala and threats of financial retaliation against any developing country siding with Venezuela.

Yet other diplomats referred to Chávez's nearly two-year-long campaign to win a Council seat and noted that Chávez, as leader of a major oil- producing nation, had signed numerous bilateral trade pacts while pursuing his campaign. As one diplomat noted in a tongue-in-cheek explanation for the sudden spurt in support for Venezuela in one ballot: "They upped the ante - now it's a full tanker in every port!"

Yet kidding aside, some diplomats noted there is precedent to suggest that the balloting might not be nearing a quick denouement. UN officials did some digging and found that in 1979, another vote on a Security Council seat - again involving Latin America's slot - had taken 155 ballots stretching from October to January.

In that case, a battle pitting Cuba against Colombia was resolved when Mexico finally emerged as a compromise candidate.

While Venezuela's ambassador didn't want to hear any talk of a consensus candidate to break a deadlock, the names of nations like Uruguay, Costa Rica, and the Dominican Republic floated around the hall.

And Mexico's ambassador, Enrique Berruga, said that Mexico was pressing for a meeting of Latin American countries Tuesday, to find a solution to the deadlock.

At the same time, Guatemalan officials insisted they were in the fight to stay. But their delegation's leader suggested Monday afternoon that he understood a continuing stalemate could not be allowed to go on forever.

"We are not obstinate," said Guatemala's foreign minister, Gert Rosenthal, at the end of voting Monday. "If after two, three, four days, neither country has arrived at the two-thirds needed, logically we have to consider a third candidate."

And then he continued with words that, either by design or not, contrasted with the politicking that has dominated the voting. "This has never been a national crusade [for us] to be on the Security Council." Noting that the UN spearheaded the peace process that ended Guatemala's civil war in 1996, he added, "We are giving back to the UN what the UN gave to Guatemala."

Guatemala Leads But Can't Land U.N. Seat (AP-Y)

By Nick Wadhams

AP, October 18, 2006

Guatemala failed repeatedly to muster the necessary votes to beat out Venezuela for a Latin American seat on the U.N. Security Council, prompting diplomats on Tuesday to demand a compromise candidate.

Both have so far refused and the U.N. General Assembly scheduled yet more rounds of voting on Thursday by its 192 member nations. That left a day off for Latin American nations to try to find a solution.

In the 22nd round of voting, Guatemala garnered 102 votes to Venezuela's 77. That result, similar to that of many of the previous rounds during the last two days, was 23 votes short of the two-thirds needed to win, and it now appeared that neither would be able to bridge the gap.

"It's obvious that the General Assembly is sharply divided and we are facing a deadlock in this election," said the Arab League's U.N. representative Yahya Mahmassani. "We look forward to the group of Latin American and Caribbean states to find a solution to this impasse, with the acquiescence and acceptance of the two candidates."

Yet neither Venezuela nor Guatemala appeared willing to drop out of the election.

Venezuela's U.N. Ambassador Francisco Arias Cardenas complained that the United States pressed countries worldwide to prevent Venezuela from winning a seat on the 15-nation council.

"We are fighting against the first power of the world, the owners of the universe," Arias Cardenas said. "We're happy, we're strong and we will continue."

Roy Chaderton, the Venezuelan diplomat who played a key role in his country's campaign for the seat, said the results were only a minor setback in the long struggle against U.S. efforts to dominate international affairs.

"This battle will prepare us for another battle within the international community," Chaderton told Venezuelan state television Sunday.

The results were seen as a setback for Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who had lobbied hard in capitals around the world, offering millions of petrodollars in aid.

DOJ_NMG_0082954

Diplomats said his bombastic speech to the General Assembly last month, when Chavez railed against the United States and called President Bush "the devil," may have hurt Venezuela's chances.

The vote, however, also reflected the ambivalence toward Guatemala, Washington's preferred candidate. Even Guatemalan Foreign Minister Gert Rosenthal had earlier expressed discomfort about the highly public U.S. campaign against Venezuela and in support of Guatemala.

After Monday's balloting, Rosenthal said his nation was an "independent voice" that would vote according to its own policies.

The record number of ballots for a Security Council seat occurred in 1979, when the General Assembly held 154 unsuccessful votes to choose between Cuba and Colombia. Mexico was then put forward and won in the 155th round.

Possible other candidates include Uruguay, Costa Rica, Mexico and the Dominican Republic.

Venezuela has served four times on the Security Council. Guatemala has never had a seat but is a leading contributor of troops to U.N. peacekeeping missions.

The 10 non-permanent seats on the council are filled by the regional groups for two-year stretches. The other five are occupied by the veto-wielding permanent members: Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States.

Venezuela Trails In Early Voting For Seat On Security Council (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, October 18, 2006

UNITED NATIONS - U.S.-backed Guatemala got the upper hand in a seesaw tussle Monday to secure a seat on the U.N. Security Council, dealing a surprising blow to Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's ambitions to lead a worldwide anti-Washington front.

But in 10 rounds of voting Guatemala fell short of the two-thirds majority needed to win the seat, reserved for a Latin American nation, raising the specter of a lengthy battle that eventually could lead to a compromise candidacy.

Venezuelan officials blamed U.S. pressures for blocking their bid to secure a seat that brings international prestige and a voice on such key issues as the nuclear standoffs with Iran and North Korea.

Francisco Arias, Venezuela's U.N. ambassador, said Washington was exerting "grotesque, obscene" pressures on U.N. members to vote for Guatemala, and he vowed his country would fight on.

"Venezuela is staying; Venezuela is by no means pulling out," he said after the fourth round of voting, adding that Washington was campaigning against his country as if "we were inventing a nuclear bomb."

The leftist Chavez has been a steady and strident critic of the Bush administration, and a victory in the Security Council race would give him a strong voice in Latin American regional affairs.

Most analysts had expected Venezuela to outpoll Guatemala in the election, one of the most disputed in Security Council history. Chavez had traveled the globe in search of votes, touting himself as a strong voice opposed to Washington. U.S. officials have complained that Chavez has been using his oil wealth to expand his influence.

But diplomats privately said Chavez hurt Venezuela in a speech last month at the U.N. General Assembly, in which he called President Bush "a devil."

Guatemalan Foreign Minister Gert Rosenthal, who attended the session, told reporters after the 10th ballot that his country would maintain its candidacy for now but would be willing later to consider a compromise.

"We're going to see how things evolve in the next day or two," he said. More rounds of voting are expected Tuesday.

Although the vote was secret, many South American and Caribbean nations, as well as African and Arab nations, were known to be backing Venezuela, while Washington and most European and Central America nations were supporting Guatemala. Chile, Ecuador and Peru abstained in the first round but didn't say how they voted in the later ballots.

The winner will succeed Argentina in a two-year term on the Security Council that begins in January 2007.

Guatemala won the early rounds of balloting and by the third round secured 116 votes, just eight short of the two-thirds needed to win.

Venezuelan diplomats fanned out in the cavernous hall, with Arias methodically greeting each delegation several times. Former Venezuelan Foreign Minister Roy Chaderton, designated by Chavez as a special envoy for the U.N. campaign, also worked the aisles.

On occasion, the Venezuelan and U.S. diplomats would politely ignore each other as they bumped into one another during their lobbying runs. U.S. Ambassador John Bolton and the assistant secretary of state for western hemispheric affairs, Thomas Shannon, were seen chatting up other delegates.

"In the year 2000, I spent 31 days in Florida," Bolton told reporters at one point, referring to the long U.S. presidential election recount. "This has just begun."

DOJ_NMG_0082955

The delegates' tables soon became a clutter of pamphlets, with the Chavez delegation dominating the literature. One Venezuelan handout reminded diplomats that their vote was secret and that Venezuela represented "independence."

"Raise your voice against imposition," the brochure urged.

Delegates also received a small bag with sweets from Venezuela, while Guatemalan diplomats handed out an embroidered wristband.

On the sixth round, Venezuela and Guatemala tied at 93 votes, and the Venezuelan delegation erupted in a loud applause. But Guatemala reversed the tide and by the 10th round it obtained 110 votes against 77 for Venezuela.

Monday's election recalled the 154-round standoff between Cuba and Colombia in 1979, which finally ushered in Mexico as a consensus candidate.

In Caracas, Venezuelan Vice President Jose Vicente Rangel said his country had demonstrated the firmness of its foreign policy in the face of "pressure" and "bribes" from the U.S. delegation. "We are confronting the empire," he said.

But Chavez's main opponent in the Dec. 3 presidential election, Manuel Rosales, described Venezuela's failure to win the seat as a "democratic whipping for those who do not understand that the world is advancing towards freedom and democracy."

Special correspondent Phil Gunson in Caracas contributed to this report.

A Model Of Modern Vitality, France Devises A Baby Boom (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, October 18, 2006

JUMEAUVILLE, France -- When the municipal day-care center ran out of space because of a local baby boom, the town government gave Maylis Staub and her husband $200 a month to defray the cost of a "maternal assistant" to care for their two children.

When Staub delivered twins last December -- her third and fourth children -- the nation not only increased their tax deductions and child allowances, the government-owned French train system offered 40 percent discounts off tickets for the parents and the children until they reach their 18th birthdays.

"The government favors families a lot," said Staub, a 35-year-old project manager for a French cellphone company. "They understand that families are the future. It's great for us."

While falling birthrates threaten to undermine economies and social stability across much of an aging Europe, French fertility rates are increasing. France now has the second-highest fertility rate in Europe -- 1.94 children born per woman, exceeded slightly by Ireland's rate of 1.99. The U.S. fertility rate is 2.01 children.

In many European countries, park benches are filled with elderly residents. In France, parks overflow with boisterous children, making it an international model for countries struggling with the threat of zero population growth. In recent months, officials from Japan, Thailand and neighboring Germany have traveled to France to study its reproductive secrets.

But the propensity of women here to have more babies has little to do with notions of French romance or the population's formerly strong religious ties to the Roman Catholic Church.

France heavily subsidizes children and families from pregnancy to young adulthood with liberal maternity leaves and part-time work laws for women. The government also covers some child-care costs of toddlers up to 3 years old and offers free child-care centers from age 3 to kindergarten, in addition to tax breaks and discounts on transportation, cultural events and shopping.

This summer, the government -- concerned that French women still were not producing enough children to guarantee a full replacement generation -- very publicly urged French women to have even more babies. A new law provides more maternity leave and benefits, tax credits and other incentives for families who have a third child. During a year-long leave after the birth of the third child, mothers will receive $960 a month from the government, twice the allowance for the second child.

A century ago, France was one of the first European countries to face a declining population. Since then, almost every elected French government -- regardless of party -- has instituted laws that encourage bigger families and make it easier for women to keep their jobs while raising children.

"Politicians realized they had to encourage people to have more babies if they didn't want to live in a country of old people," said France Prioux, director of research for France's National Institute of Demographic Studies.

Most of the subsidies and allowances are income-based, giving low-income families the most help. But higher-income families also receive substantial benefits so that only a fraction of a working mother's salary goes to child-care costs.

In Jumeauville, a rural hamlet of picturesque stone houses and about 500 inhabitants a 45-minute drive west of Paris, the Staubs are part of a trend most European countries crave to emulate: expanding families fleeing the cities and suburbs in search of larger houses and gardens, helping to replenish the village's declining and aging population of farmers.

DOJ_NMG_0082956

When Staub became pregnant with twins last year, the family moved out of their cramped apartment in suburban Paris and into a renovated stone farmhouse with massive plate-glass windows and exposed wood beam ceilings in Jumeauville, which translates in English as Twin City.

Staub, a slender woman with an animated face framed by honey-colored hair that brushes her shoulders, took a year off from her job at SFR, a major cellphone company, collecting monthly maternity leave benefits and a guarantee that her job would be waiting for her when she returned.

Under French law, a woman can opt not to work or to work part time until her child is 3 years old -- and her full-time job will be guaranteed when she returns. "In other countries, maternity leaves are seen as a handicap for mothers who want to have a career," Staub said. "It's different in France."

A colleague at Staub's company, 35-year-old Axelle de Barbeyrac, also has four children, including twins. She works four days a week, a part-time schedule that she can continue, with government subsidies, until the twins are 3 next year.

She lives in the Paris suburb of Ville d'Avray, a 10-minute train ride west of the La Defense high-technology, high-rise corridor on the edge of the capital where both women work. Barbeyrac catches the 5:09 p.m. train home, walks to the government-subsidized day-care center where her 2 1/2 -year-old twins have spent the day ($670 a month for both), then picks up Ines, 8, and Feh, 6, at the after-school program that ends at 6 p.m. ($75 a month for the two).

As she arrives home to begin the four-child assembly line in the bathtub, the sidewalks around her cream-colored stucco house are crowded with schoolchildren on scooters and mothers pushing a stroller with one hand and gripping a toddler with the other.

"I don't know if the French system encourages women to have more children," said Barbeyrac, whose husband is a documentary filmmaker. "But people don't stop having children because of money concerns."

Maylis Staub agrees. Staub, who is married to a lawyer, returned to work in August. Instead of using the government-supported day-care centers, she hired a nanny -- subsidized by tax breaks on part of the nanny's salary -- to care for her 10-month-old twins, Quitterie and Hermine.

When both women's twins reach 3 years of age, they will qualify for the free government preschool programs that most French children attend until kindergarten.

"The child-care system in France is very well thought out," said Staub, sitting on a sofa on a recent Saturday afternoon with feverish 8-year-old Margaux on one side, fidgety 6-year-old Jules on the other, and one of the twins on her lap. "Everything is organized to make mothers' lives easier."

The French system also fosters different attitudes about working mothers. French working moms say they feel far less guilt than friends in the United States or Europe because French society recognizes children are well cared-for while mothers are at work.

As a result, French women are not only having more children than their European counterparts, but far more of them work outside the home than in most European countries. Three-fourths of all French mothers with at least two children are employed.

"In Mediterranean countries and Germany, it's work or children," said Marie-Therese Letablier, research director of the Center for Employment Studies. "In France, it's work and children."

"French society encourages mothers to work," Staub said. "The way work hours and vacation time are organized also help families a lot. I have 36 days of paid holidays per year -- it's great to spend time with your children."

In the summer, French families can send their children to generous summer camp programs. Government recreation centers in virtually every French village and urban neighborhood offer a full day of activities, including trips to museums, farms and swimming pools -- along with snacks and three-course lunch -- for fees ranging from about 65 cents to $12 a day, based on family income.

At the same time, private French firms and services also cater to big families with working parents.

Staub's pediatrician makes house calls when her children are sick or need checkups, a practice common in rural and urban areas.

"Society evolves quickly and also makes life easier for working mothers," Staub said.

"I refuse to go shopping on weekends, and waste our family time on that. I order everything on the Internet and have it delivered at home."

Researcher Corinne Gavard contributed to this report.

Monitoring A Little-Noticed War (NYT)

The New York Times, October 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082957

On Monday, 94 people died and 150 were injured when a truck loaded with explosives rammed into a military convoy in Sri Lanka. The government blames the Tamil Tiger guerrillas — the pioneers of the suicide bombing — for the attack. The rebels have not said anything.

For more than 20 years, the Tamil rebels have waged a brutal war of independence against the Sri Lankan government, which is dominated by ethnic Sinhalese. Their opponents in Colombo are no innocents, and have made little effort to protect Tamil civilians as they wage a brutal counterinsurgency. In April, government security forces stood by for two hours as mobs burned Tamil homes and shops, killing 14 people.

A Buddhist-led government battling a Hindu separatist group in a land with no oil draws little international interest — and no pressure on either side to end such horrors. Hoping to change that, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, Louise Arbour, called last month for international human rights monitors to be sent to Sri Lanka. All countries with influence, starting with the United States and Japan, should push the Sri Lankan government to agree.

Colombo is eager for international aid and support in its fight against the Tamil Tigers. With U.N. rights monitors bearing witness, the government may feel pressure to rein in army and police abuses. Monitors could also bolster the country's weak judicial system, which barely investigates crimes against Tamil civilians. The guerrillas, who count the forced recruitment of child soldiers among their crimes, are less vulnerable to international shame. But shining a spotlight might help persuade overseas Tamils to choke off funding.

Great China Bank Sale (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 18, 2006

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, meet ICBC. China's largest bank joins the ranks of publicly listed companies next week when it unveils what may be the world's largest-ever IPO in Hong Kong and Shanghai. But as with America's mortgage behemoths, investors are betting as much on implicit government support as on ICBC itself.

Headquartered in Beijing, the Industrial Commercial Bank of China Ltd. is China's largest commercial bank by total assets, loans and deposits. With more than 18,000 branches and $21.7 billion in 2005 operating income, it holds 15.4% of total loans in all Chinese banking institutions, according to its offering prospectus. For foreign investors hoping to profit from China's rapid economic growth, ICBC shares may seem just the ticket.

We hope this isn't lemmings jumping off a cliff. At around this time last year, China Construction Bank Corp., the nation's third-largest lender by assets, raised $9.2 billion. This year, Bank of China Ltd., the country's second-largest by assets, raised $11.2 billion in an IPO. Even mid-tier China Merchants Bank received so much demand for its shares that its underwriters exercised a 10% overallotment option.

Amid this excitement, it's easy to forget how and why the Great China Bank Sale started. In the mid-1990s, Beijing's policy makers realized that government-directed lending wasn't compatible with a rapidly expanding capitalist economy. So they created policy banks to lend on behalf of the public sector, leaving state-owned lenders free to dole out cash along commercial lines.

The problem was, the proper economic incentives weren't in place. Why lend on a commercial basis if your local provincial bureaucrat needs some cash? The money soon disappeared -- into pockets and bad projects -- and China's banks were back in the red. So China used its foreign-exchange reserves to recapitalize its banks, creating asset-management companies to take on tricky bad loans.

Since 1998, Beijing has injected $95 billion into the "big four banks," and carved out $305 billion of bad loans, according to Fitch Ratings. ICBC itself received a $15 billion state capital injection last year, plus a government-financed nonperforming-loan carveout of $85 billion. Foreign banks added an additional $20 billion; Goldman Sachs, Allianz Capital and American Express own 10% of ICBC's equity.

With all this money floating around, why worry? Well, bailing out banks -- or the implicit guarantee of doing so -- implants perverse economic incentives. Investors will be betting that public-company standards will help transform ICBC's lending practices, but there's no guarantee that the companies it is lending to have been transformed. Communist Party officials also still populate Chinese banks' boards of directors.

Like other state-owned banks, ICBC is still swimming in nonperforming loans -- which are classified according to Chinese, not international, standards. Fitch estimates a nonperforming to total loan ratio of 4.7%. If you kick in so-called "special mention" loans -- debts that haven't gone bad yet, but might -- the ratio jumps to 9.2%. ICBC also has heavy exposure to manufacturing, transportation and energy industries that are highly cyclical.

We're not here to give investment advice. But the comparison with the two U.S. "government-sponsored" mortgage giants is startling. Investors comforted by implicit American taxpayer support have had to endure several years of uncertainty and lower returns as fraud and false accounting have been uncovered at Fannie and Freddie. Perhaps that's a warning for ICBC investors.

DOJ_NMG_0082958

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Wednesday, October 18, 2006 12:00 PM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Battaglia, John T; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Beckner, Rick (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gunn, Currie (SMO); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McMahon, Linda M (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; O'Quinn, John C; Osborn, Tara (CIV); Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Shaw, Aloma A; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 10/18/06 Civil Division News

Appeals Court Upholds Terrorist Label for a Jewish Group

Arab-American group files suit against Homeland Security over alleged profiling

Arar committee recalls RCMP chief

Civil trial seeks triple damages from Pinegar

Nurse in Medicare Fraud Sentenced to 46 Months

Sealed Filings Increase at High Court

Commentary: Gonzales v. Carhart: The Supreme Court Once Again Considers "Partial-Birth Abortion"

New York Times

October 18, 2006

Appeals Court Upholds Terrorist Label for a Jewish Group

By NEIL A. LEWIS

WASHINGTON, Oct. 17 — A militant Jewish group and two of its affiliates were properly designated as terrorist organizations by the State Department, a federal appeals court here ruled Tuesday.

The group, Kahane Chai, is a spinoff of the radical Kach movement of Rabbi Meir Kahane, an Israeli politician who was assassinated in New York in 1990. Kahane Chai, which means Kahane Lives, advocates the restoration of the biblical state of Israel and the expulsion of Arabs from Israel.

The Israeli cabinet declared Kahane Chai a terrorist organization in 1994, and the United States State Department followed suit in 1997. In 2003, Secretary of State Colin L. Powell reaffirmed the designation and added that 20 entities were aliases of Kahane Chai, including a Web site, Kahane.org.

Mr. Powell found that the group had threatened to carry out assassinations, notably of Ariel Sharon when he was prime minister of Israel, used “explosives or firearms” to endanger people and property, and solicited money and members for terrorist organizations.

In a 2003 letter to the State Department, a lawyer for Kahane Chai, Samuel Abady, said it and its affiliates were “legitimate Jewish activist organizations,” none of which “practices, supports or advocates terrorism.” The group’s current lawyer, Kenneth Klein, did not respond to telephone and e-mail messages seeking comment on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0082960

The unanimous decision upholding the terrorist designation, from a three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, ruled that Mr. Powell's decision had "substantial support in the administrative record." That standard, from a 1996 antiterrorism law, is a relaxed one, said Chief Judge Douglas H. Ginsburg, who wrote the opinion. Judge Ginsburg said the courts might ask little more than whether the State Department had enough information to reach its conclusion.

Judge Ginsburg wrote that Mr. Powell "could reasonably conclude" from news reports that Kahane Chai "was known to approve of terrorist tactics, including the mass murder of Arab worshipers," was "possibly linked to a bombing of an Arab school" and was responsible for death threats against police officers investigating this second crime.

The State Department also acted properly, the court ruled, in deciding that a second group, Kach, was an alias of Kahane Chai.

The designation of the Web site, Kahane.org, was based on an analysis of its "content, design and hyperlinks" by the Foreign Broadcast Information Service, a unit of the Central Intelligence Agency.

The court rejected an argument that the State Department's designation of Kahane.org, a Jewish entity, was unconstitutional discrimination because it was the only Web site deemed a terrorist organization while other non-Jewish Web sites that disseminate hateful material had not been.

Judge Ginsburg said that using the idea that it was the only Web site put on the terrorist list was not as telling as the fact that numerous other non-Jewish groups had been deemed terrorist organizations.

A 1996 law authorizes the secretary of state to designate groups as foreign terrorist organizations if they, among other things, use conventional or unconventional weapons with the intent to endanger people or harm property or to engage in, among other activities, assassinations.

The law provides that the assets of groups designated as terrorist organizations can be frozen or seized; the groups' representatives may be barred from the United States; and providing money or other support to the groups can be a crime.

END

AP

Oct. 18, 2006

Arab-American group files suit against Homeland Security over alleged profiling

WASHINGTON An Arab-American civil rights group filed a lawsuit Tuesday against the federal government in a bid to obtain information about the nationalities of more than 230 people arrested for immigration violations.

The suit, filed by the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, names the U.S. Department of Homeland Security and its Immigration and Customs Enforcement unit as defendants.

It was filed under the Freedom of Information Act in U.S. District Court in the District of Columbia after two years of unsuccessful attempts to learn the nationalities of individuals arrested in 2004 under a law enforcement operation intended to disrupt potential terrorist threats before the presidential election.

The Washington-based group believes the operation improperly used the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System — a government database created after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorists attacks to track visitors, students and immigrants from 25 countries — to profile Arab and Muslim visitors to the United States. The domestic registration system required males from 24 Arab and predominantly Muslim countries and North Korea to register with immigration authorities. The registration requirement has since been phased out, but the database of information still exists.

The 2004 operation became known as the "October plan" after the FBI sent an e-mail advising its field offices and Homeland Security agencies of "extraordinary measures" from the first week of October 2004 through the presidential inauguration.

The FBI's internal e-mail, obtained by CBS News, called for "aggressive — even obvious — surveillance" intended to give the impression that the government was targeting immigration violators who might be a threat, even if they had not committed a crime.

Authorities arrested 237 people during the operation. And, "every single one had violated immigration laws, regardless of nationality," said Dean Boyd, a spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Boyd said race, ethnicity and religion played "absolutely no role" in the operation.

"It was simply an effort to target immigration violators who may have posed an elevated public safety threat in the weeks leading to the presidential election," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0082961

The Arab-American organization wants to find out if the 237 people were disproportionately Arab and Muslim, because the registration database was made up of mostly Arab and Muslim men.

But the federal agency points out that in addition to the registration database, two other databases were used, including one of student visa holders.

With the national elections approaching, the group fears the registration database is being used to target Arab and Muslim men for general law enforcement purposes.

"The biggest factor is that we know that they carried out the October plan during the presidential elections — the most recent national elections we had," said Kareem Shora, the Arab-American group's national executive director. "Our fear is that since it happened during the last national elections, is something like that going to happen again soon?"

In the complaint filed Tuesday, the group does not seek names of the people detained or how they were sought out; It only requests their nationalities. The civil rights group asked for the nationality information in two FOIA requests last year but was denied.

But the Arab-American group is concerned that the registration requirements and the October arrests were presented as counterterrorism operations but instead turned into a way to enforce immigration violations.

In a letter responding to the FOIA requests, the agency said the information is exempt from the Freedom of Information Act because it was collected for law enforcement purposes and is an ongoing investigation. The civil rights group argues that getting information on just the nationalities of those detained would not jeopardize any law enforcement operation.

END

Toronto Star

October 18, 2006

Arar committee recalls RCMP chief

TONDA MACCHARLES

OTTAWA BUREAU

OTTAWA—A Commons committee has called upon the Conservative government to formally apologize to Maher Arar and his family, and recalled RCMP Commissioner Giuliano Zaccardelli to testify Tuesday.

MPs want to question Zaccardelli further about inconsistencies between his recollection of briefings the RCMP gave to the former government about the Arar case, and contrary indications by former cabinet ministers in interviews published in the Toronto Star.

Zaccardelli told the committee on Sept. 28 that the government received full briefings about the Arar matter and the RCMP's actions in the case — actions that included the mistaken labelling of Arar to U.S. officials as an "Islamic extremist" with ties to Al Qaeda.

The O'Connor inquiry reported the RCMP's mistakes "very likely" led to Arar's September 2002 deportation by the U.S. to Syria, where he was tortured and jailed for a year.

But three consecutive cabinet ministers who oversaw the RCMP at the relevant time (Lawrence MacAulay, Wayne Easter, and Anne McLellan) say the government was never informed about the RCMP's errors, and the potential role they played.

The first they learned of it was in the report by Justice Dennis O'Connor into the Arar scandal.

Zaccardelli told the committee he was personally aware of the RCMP's mistakes as early as Oct. 21, 2002, when Syria confirmed it had Arar in jail, he said. But he said he did not personally inform government ministers because he wasn't "personally" called to a meeting to specifically discuss the issue.

The Star has found no one in the Privy Council office who was aware that inaccurate information had been shared or inappropriately labelled to the U.S.

Yesterday, the public safety committee voted to approve a motion by MP Irwin Cotler that "the government should now do the right and honourable thing and apologize" to Arar.

END

Alva, OK, Review Courier

Oct. 17, 2006

Civil trial seeks triple damages from Pinegar

By Helen Barrett

The guilty plea entered by Dr. Greg Pinegar October 10 on criminal charges of healthcare fraud does not mean an end to his legal problems in The United States District Court for the Western District of Oklahoma.

Pinegar faces a civil trial on the May 2007 docket before District Judge Joe Heaton at which time the government will seek triple damages for the Medicare over-billing of Remicade and Procrit.

“They’re two separate cases, handled by two separate judges,” Assistant U.S. Attorney Bob Troester said.

Troester explained that under the False Claims Act, the government is allowed to seek three times the amount of actual damages defrauded.

“As an example,” Troester said, “If someone defrauded the government of $100,000 we can seek $300,000.”

In addition to the triple damages, the government can seek up to $10,000 per false claim he said. In the civil case document, the government alleges Pinegar received . . . “federal funds to which he was not entitled in an amount of at least $400,000.00”

Triple damages of that amount would equal $1,200,000 plus the $10,000 per false claim costs, “each time there was a submission of a false invoice,” Troester explained.

The plea agreement on the criminal case lists a specific amount of restitution, Troester said.

“As for the specific drugs he pleaded to, what we charged him with are locked in,” he said.

However, if the government were to discover additional fraud involving other drugs during that time period which warranted further charges, it is not prevented from prosecution on those drugs, he said.

Troester said Pinegar’s business was not charged, just the doctor personally. That means the business itself can be sold to another physician even though Pinegar surrendered his license to practice in Oklahoma.

END

Los Angeles Times

Oct. 17, 2006

Nurse in Medicare Fraud Sentenced to 46 Months

Molly Selvin

A nurse convicted of defrauding Medicare of $40 million was sentenced to 46 months in prison by a Los Angeles federal judge.

Lourdes Perez, 53, a registered nurse who once owned two of the largest home healthcare agencies in California, pleaded guilty in 2004 to fraud and filing false tax returns and agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors.

Government lawyers said her companies paid illegal kickbacks to doctors and patients and billed Medicare for services that were not medically necessary or were not performed.

Perez has repaid about $34 million to the government. On Monday she was ordered to repay an additional $6 million to Medicare and nearly $900,000 to the Internal Revenue Service.

END

Legal Times
10-18-2006

Sealed Filings Increase at High Court

Tony Mauro

When the Supreme Court debates the constitutionality of the federal "partial birth abortion" law next month, it will have some sensitive information in its hands that no member of the public can see.

DOJ_NMG_0082963

Specifically, the justices will have the full transcript of a 2004 deposition by an Oregon doctor who apparently mentioned the names of colleagues in the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists who may have performed abortions.

It was part of the file in the case of Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, but when it made its way to the Supreme Court this summer, the organization and Planned Parenthood requested that the parts of the doctor's deposition that name doctors be filed with the Court under seal.

Solicitor General Paul Clement concurred and filed a motion, and on Oct. 2, the Court said yes -- one of six cases that day in which the Court granted motions to file petitions under seal. It was, according to a database search, the largest number of unrelated cases in which the Court granted such motions in a single day.

In the Planned Parenthood case, the Court's action means an extra measure of privacy for a handful of physicians. As Daniel Edelman, a lawyer for the physician who was deposed, put it, "The last thing we'd need is for some lunatic to get names from the deposition and go and attack one of the doctors."

But in some of the other cases, the justification for secrecy is less obvious. And to some, the day's actions symbolize a little-noticed trend over the past decade toward allowing secret filings at the Supreme Court. Whereas decades ago such motions were discouraged and often denied at the Supreme Court, now they are routinely granted. No motion to file under seal has been denied since 2003. The Court itself votes on the motions without any hearing at which opposition can be heard. Typically, when the Court grants a motion to seal, a redacted version is made part of the public record.

The number of filings under seal is still tiny -- only 12 in this calendar year out of more than 7,000 petitions filed. And Court insiders assert that the spike in motions granted is a fluke, not a reflection of any change in policy. "This may just be an outlier year," says Thomas Goldstein, a partner at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld who has studied the numbers. [Editor's note: Goldstein writes a column for Legal Times.]

But the number of cases filed under seal was significantly lower in the 1990s and 1980s, and sealing files was rarely done before then, reflecting the Court's historical preference for conducting its business in public.

Stephen Shapiro, co-author of "Supreme Court Practice," says that especially with the current mix of business and intellectual property cases, as well as post-9/11 disputes, the conservative Court, under both William Rehnquist and now John Roberts Jr., may be more sympathetic than it once was to sealing Court files. "Conservative justices might believe that a seal was proper to protect trade secrets and real government secrets, bearing on national security," says Shapiro, a partner at Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw.

But Shapiro sees the trend permeating all federal courts, not just the Supreme Court, and he is concerned. "Filings under seal are attempted in cases where the seal is not necessary or proper, and the Court should be watchful to prevent abuses of this kind," Shapiro says.

At the Supreme Court level, he says, it is often a matter of convenience for lawyers on both sides of a case to leave under seal a filing or opinion that was sealed by a judge at an earlier stage.

IN THE SHADOWS

That appears to be the explanation in at least one of the motions for filing under seal granted on Oct. 2. In Cooperativa de Seguros de Vida v. FAC, a dispute over Medicare reimbursement claims, the district judge sealed his own opinion to protect the terms of a settlement that was reached between the parties.

Alan Horowitz of D.C.-based Miller & Chevalier, who wrote the petition for COSVI, says, "Why the district court ordered it sealed is not clear to me." He adds that almost everything that was sealed in the district court opinion was detailed in the public opinion of the 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Horowitz asked the high court clerk's office if he could omit the district court opinion from his petition, hoping to avoid the need to seek permission to submit it under seal. But the answer was no, so the motion to file a sealed appendix was the only option.

The petition itself is public, with the appeals court decision attached. If the Court grants review in the case, Horowitz says, he'll likely ask the district court to unseal the original opinion. "This case is not really emblematic of anything," says Horowitz. "It's just an oddball situation."

But private petitioners are not the only ones that seek to file papers under seal. The state of Maine did so in Rowe v. New Hampshire Motor Transport Association, and the motion was granted Oct. 2. At issue is whether Maine's law prohibiting the sale by mail of tobacco products to minors is pre-empted by a federal law that bars states from regulating air and land delivery services.

United Parcel Service, one of the carriers affected by the case, requested that certain information in the record about how it tracks deliveries be kept confidential. Both parties tried to narrow the amount of text to be redacted, but some remained, according to Maine Deputy Attorney General Paul Stern.

"I sent it over to UPS, and there were only a couple of small things they wanted redacted, and we said fine," says Stern. "I didn't care. We didn't particularly want to ask for sealing."

DOJ_NMG_0082964

The brief as filed with the high court contains several blackened lines of type masking sentences that appear to refer to UPS procedures. Stern adds, "You can get an excellent understanding of the case without these facts."

Other cases in which the Court allowed redacted filings on Oct. 2 include Jane Doe v. United States, a Pennsylvania case in which the petitioner sought to protect "sensitive grand jury proceedings."

SEND IN THE CLOUDS

The Court's preference for keeping its files public goes back decades. One milestone was the landmark Pentagon Papers case of 1971, in which Solicitor General Erwin Griswold asked the Court to allow it to file secret briefs and even to hear the case in camera. Over the objection of three justices in New York Times v. United States, the Court rejected the proposal for a closed oral argument, but it did permit some filings under seal.

The Court even enshrined the public interest in open court records in a 1978 case, in which it said, "It is clear that the courts of this country recognize a general right to inspect and copy public records and documents, including judicial records and documents."

That case was invoked in the 2003 litigation over the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law. The Court still granted a dozen motions to seal different parts of the massive briefing in the case, including records of Federal Election Commission investigations in which witnesses had been promised confidentiality.

Most of the time, motions to seal records are made without objection, but in a post-9/11 case, M.K.B. v. United States, media organizations sought to intervene. At both the district court and 11th Circuit levels, the case and filings were secret. It was only through an error at the appeals court clerk's office that a reporter for the Miami Daily Business Review, a sister paper to Legal Times, was able to determine what the case was about: a habeas proceeding brought by Mohamed Kamel Bellahouel, an Algerian native who had been held in federal prison in part because as a waiter, he had served meals to two of the 9/11 hijackers.

When the petition reached the Supreme Court, several media organizations -- including ALM, which publishes Legal Times -- sought to intervene to open the record. The motion was denied.

END

FindLaw.com

Oct. 18, 2006

Commentary: Gonzales v. Carhart: The Supreme Court Once Again Considers "Partial-Birth Abortion"

By Sherry Colb

This November, the U.S. Supreme Court is scheduled to hear argument in Gonzales v. Carhart, a case that challenges the validity of the federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 (PABA). Among other potential problems, the statute lacks a health exception - the very gap that led the Supreme Court in 2000 to invalidate a similar statute passed in Nebraska.

Defenders of the PABA point to Congressional findings that a woman's health never requires the banned procedure - findings that many doctors dispute. More fundamentally, supporters of the PABA argue that the abortion procedures in question are morally equivalent to infanticide and should therefore fall outside the scope of women's reproductive rights. This column will take seriously this claim about moral equivalence and consider some of the implications of doing so.

Infanticide and Partial-Birth Abortion: The Definitions

Infanticide is, literally, the killing of an infant. Once a baby has been born, if a person - whether the mother, a health care professional, or some third party - kills the baby, this act constitutes infanticide. Absent extenuating circumstances, the person who deliberately commits infanticide is guilty of murder.

The statutory term "partial-birth abortion" refers to a procedure in which the abortion provider removes a significant portion of an intact, living fetus's body from inside its mother; uses scissors or some other sharp instrument to puncture the fetus's head; and then compresses the head for complete removal of the body. Referred to as "Intact Dilation and Evacuation" or "Intact D&E," the procedure is also called "Dilation and Extraction" (or "D&X") if the lower part of the fetus's body is removed from the birth canal first.

It is difficult to describe (and, indeed, to read about) such abortions without cringing. The procedures in question - though relatively rare - typically take place very late in pregnancy, beyond 16 weeks gestation, and the fetus therefore resembles a baby in many respects. Perhaps for this reason, large numbers of people polled - even those who consider themselves generally pro-choice - support bans on "partial-birth abortion."

What gives rise to the "infanticide" comparison is the fact that the abortion provider kills the fetus at a point when a significant portion of its body has already emerged from the woman. The PABA explains that "[a] child that is completely born is a full, legal person entitled to constitutional protections afforded a 'person' under the United States Constitution." It goes on to state, accordingly, that the procedure in question in the legislation "blurs the line between abortion and infanticide in the killing of a partially-born child just inches from birth."

DOJ_NMG_0082965

If one looks at the matter in this way, it may seem utterly arbitrary to allow a doctor to kill the fetus so long as some part of it, however small, remains inside the woman's body, but to consider the same act infanticide - murder - as soon as that body part is no longer inside the woman.

There is, however, another line-drawing problem that presents itself when an abortion takes place prior to fetal viability -- the developmental stage at which the fetus can survive outside the womb, and a crucial legal moment. Prior to this point in pregnancy, the PABA necessarily draws a distinction between delivering a live fetus (the "birth" from which the partially-born fetus is literally "just inches"), on the one hand, and killing the fetus through partial-birth abortion, on the other. It is a distinction that may not withstand critical analysis.

To remove a fetus from its mother's body prior to viability is - by definition - to end the fetus's life. As women who have endured undesired pre-viability labor can attest, "birth" leads inevitably to the baby's death. Like taking a fish out of water, removing a nonviable fetus - even one that is intact, alive, and healthy at the moment of "birth" - from inside its mother will inevitably and promptly result in its death.

Distinguishing between intact D&E, on the one hand, and the "birth" of a nonviable fetus, on the other, as though one is actually discussing the difference between life and death, is therefore misleading.

Implications of the "Partial-Birth Abortion"/Induction Distinction

Nonetheless, the distinction between leaving the fetus to die, and killing it, is already found in the Supreme Court's Due Process cases - the precedents that form the foundation of the substantive right of privacy that underlies the right to abortion announced in Roe v. Wade.

In 1997, in Washington v. Glucksberg, the Court ruled unanimously that the states may criminalize physician-assistance in dying for terminally-ill patients. This means that if a terminal patient is suffering excruciating pain and emotional anguish and wishes to hasten his own death, the doctor who intentionally provides him with access to a morphine overdose may - consistent with the U.S. Constitution - be criminally punished for doing so.

The Court has also said, however, -- in the 1990 case of Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Dept. of Health -- that a person has a constitutional right to refuse unwanted life-saving (or life-preserving) treatment and that such "treatment" includes the continued use of a respirator or the provision of nutrition and hydration through a feeding tube. If a doctor or nurse turns off a respirator or removes a feeding tube at the patient's request, then, the Constitution stands in the way of the law's punishing the doctor or nurse for her actions.

The upshot of these two decisions is that a person has the right to choose to have a respirator turned off and die of lack of oxygen (or have a feeding tube removed and starve to death or die of thirst), but he lacks the right to die of a morphine overdose. This is true even though anyone who removes a patient's respirator or injects the patient with an overdose of painkillers against her wishes and thereby causes the patient's death is guilty of murder.

Given these precedents, it makes some sense to say that it is one thing to allow a woman to terminate a pregnancy by delivering a live, nonviable fetus (thereby cutting off the fetus's living "respirator"), but quite another to kill the fetus affirmatively once it has begun to emerge from the woman's body (or indeed, even before it has begun to do so).

Like giving a patient a morphine overdose, the compression of a fetus's skull is a dramatic event that upsets and outrages many. And like the removal of a respirator, the delivery of a nonviable fetus may seem, at least aesthetically, more like letting death happen than positively inflicting it. Why drama, or the absence thereof, would drive policy - in the context of either abortion or the right to die with dignity - is, of course, not entirely clear.

With Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement and replacement by Justice Samuel Alito, the Court will likely uphold the federal PABA. In doing so, moreover, it will be acting in a manner consistent with the Glucksberg precedent approving laws prohibiting physician assistance in dying.

With this parallel in mind, those who support the right to terminate a pregnancy up until the point of fetal viability might take some heart. Though distinguishing between the removal of life support and killing strikes some as arbitrary, the Court is comfortable with the distinction. It can therefore be expected to stop short of overruling Roe v. Wade completely.

If and when the Court approves laws banning other actively violent forms of late-term abortion, then the right to a late-term abortion may ultimately require the removal of an intact, live fetus from the mother without any affirmative measures to end the fetus's life.

Ironically, this practice - in the name of avoiding infanticide - would most closely resemble the infanticide of old, in which unwanted babies were "exposed" or left to die after birth.

Sherry F. Colb, a FindLaw columnist, is Professor and Frederick B. Lacey Scholar at Rutgers Law School in Newark.

DOJ_NMG_0082966

END

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.23085-000001

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, October 19, 2006 8:06 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Thursday, October 19, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061019.pdf; dojclips061019.doc

This morning's Department of Justice News Clips is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, OCTOBER 19, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Palestinian Puzzle (WP) 4
Torture Victim Barred From Visiting U.S. (AP) 6
Detainee Files Motion For His Prosecution (DENP) 7
U.S. Army Colonel To Investigate Gitmo (AP-Y) 8
Congress To Courts: 'Get Out Of The War On Terror' (WSJ) ...9
A Dangerous New Order (NYT) 10
The Unlearned Lessons Of Abu Ghraib (WP) 11

Homeland Response:

Government Skeptical Of Threat Against NFL Stadiums (AP) 12
Government Skeptical Of Threat To Stadiums (WP) 12
Threat Made To 7 Stadiums; U.S. Is Skeptical (NYT) 13
Skeptical Authorities Pass Along NFL Stadium 'dirty Bomb' Threat (USAT) 13
Intelligence Plan Targets Training, Keeping Personnel (WP) 14
Privacy Group Sues FBI For Database Info (WP/AP) 15
2nd Circuit Upholds Verdicts In Multibillion-Dollar World Trade Center Insurance Dispute (LAW) 16
Flood Risk Doesn't Stop Rebuilders (USAT) 18
South Spent Millions On A Hurricane Season That Wasn't (WP) 18

War News:

Iraq Violence, 'No Child' Occupy Bush (WP) 19
Eyeing The Exits From Iraq (LAT) 20
Burns: Bush Has Plan To Win War In Iraq (AP-Y) 21
Burns' Remark Draws Comparison To Nixon (USAT) 22
McCain: More Troops Needed In Iraq (AP) 22
'Dramatic Change Of Direction' Coming For Iraq (WT) 23
Our Strategy Is Not Static (USAT) 25
U.S. Toll Soars As Fight For City Rages (USAT) 26
Provincial Intelligence Director Among Latest Iraqi Deaths (LAT) 27
Death Toll Mounts For US Forces In Iraq (FT) 28
One-Day Iraq Toll Is Highest For U.S. In Many Months (WP). 28
11 More U.S. Troops Reported Killed In Iraq (MCT) 30
11 U.S. Troops Killed In Combat As October Toll Hits 70 (WT/AP) 31
Marines Plan To Recall Some Battalions (AP-Y) 32
Militias Splintering Into Radicalized Cells (WP) 33
Ramadan Spent Behind Locked Doors (USAT) 35
The 655,000 Fraud (WSJ) 35
Rumsfeld: Terror Threat Not Exaggerated (AP-Y) 36
Rummy's Other Role (WP) 37
Iraq's Premier In Talks With Key Shiite (AP) 38
Iraqi Leader Meets With 2 Key Shiites (NYT) 39
Seeking To Shore Up Support, Maliki Meets With Iraqi Clerics (LAT) 40
Courts-martial Ordered In Iraqis' Deaths (USAT/AP) 41
8 To Face Courts-Martial (NYT/AP) 41
Ex-commander Talks At Abu Ghraib Hearing (AP-Y) 42
NATO Strikes Kill 9 Afghan Civilians (AP) 43
A Military Path To Citizenship (WP) 44

Corporate Scandals:

Enron: The Tale Of Two Sentencings (WSJ) 45
Stock Option Tremors Hit Md. Firm (BSUN) 47
SafeNet Officials Resign As Part Of Options Probe (WSJ) 48
SafeNet's Top 2 Executives Resign After Stock Options Inquiry (WP) 49
Senate Panel Seeks Details On McGuire's Exit Pay (WSJ) 50
McGuire's Deal Is Focus Of U.S. Senate Inquiry (MINNST) ..50
UnitedHealth Pressed Over Ex-CEO's Pay (FT) 51
Investing (BSWK) 52
Ex-Delphi Execs Face Civil Fraud Charges (DEN) 54

Criminal Law:

78 Charged In Bankruptcy Fraud Sting (AP-YBIZ) 56
Feds Charge 78 With Bankruptcy Fraud (CNN) 57
Nationwide Fraud Sweep Nets 3 In Pa. (PTR) 57
Feds Crack Down On Bankruptcy Fraud (UPI) 58

Ariz. Residents Indicted In Bankruptcy Fraud (AZREP) 58
Weldon Undecided On Letter (PHI)..... 59
7 Plead Guilty In Stolen Body Parts Case (FINDLAW/AP) 60
Funeral Home Directors Plead Guilty In Organ Smuggling Case (AFP-Y)..... 60
Death Penalty Out On A Technicality (WT) 61
Ex-clerk To Testify About Page Scandal (AP-Y) 61
Key Figures In Foley Scandal Testify Today To Ethics Panel (USAT)..... 62
Ethics To Hear Key Testimony (RC)..... 63
Louisiana Page Not Central To Inquiry, Lawmaker Says (NYT) 64
Foley Lawyers Tell Accused Abuser's Name (AP-Y)..... 65
109th Congress Just Can't Resist (USAT)..... 66
Congressman Faces Questions Over Who Paid For Pacific Trip (NYT)..... 67
Rep. Sweeney Didn't Report Marianas Trip With Abramoff Colleague (AP)..... 68
Bob Ney, Guilty But Still At Capitol (NYT)..... 69
Cunningham Offered To Testify From Jail (RC) 70
Ignoring Red Flags (WP) 71
Blago's Indicted Fundraiser Due In Court Again (CHIT) 71
Beauprez Ad Has Illegal Classified Info (STPPP)..... 72
FBI Asked To Join Beauprez Ad Investigation (CSG)..... 73
Prosecutors Want Postponement In Pellicano Trial (LAT)..... 74
Jail Guard In O.C. Held As Bribery Suspect (LAT)..... 74
Murder Trial Lies With Conspirator (WT) 75
Feds Net 125 Nationwide In Kid-Porn Case (AP) 76
Miami Man Sentenced For Being Teen's Pimp (MH)..... 76
Young, Cold And For Sale (NYT) 77
Council Alters, Then Extends Emergency Anti-crime Efforts (WT)..... 78

Civil Law:

North Slope Family Seeks $40 Million From BP (FAIRDNM) 79

Civil Rights:

US Club Owner Gets 10 Years For Forced Labor, Trafficking (AFP-Y) 80
Anti-Illegal Immigration Group Questioned About Letter (AP) 81
Barnes Calls Off Voter ID Action Contempt Order No Longer Sought (AJC) 81
Shift Change Blamed For Poor Service (TSSC)..... 82
Affirmative Action Debate In Michigan Could Influence Nation (CHIT)..... 82
Panel Suggests University Amend For Past Slavery Ties (NYT) 84
Controversial Ad Links MLK, GOP (WP) 86
New Laws And Machines May Spell Voting Woes (NYT).....87

Antitrust:

3 Indicted In Price-fixing Conspiracy (WT).....89
Samsung, Hynix Officials Charged With Price Fixing (Update5) (BLOOM) 90
2 Koreans, One American Charged In Chip Price-fixing Probe (AFP) 91
Three More Semiconductor Execs Indicted For Price-fixing (IDG).....92
Three More Execs Indicted In Computer Memory Price-fixing Scandal (AP).....92
Bayer Settles Price-Fixing Case (AP-YBIZ) 93
Chicago Deal Could Force Rivals' Hands (WSJ).....93
Antitrust Suit Says Avaya Maintenance Policy Is Anti-competitive (AP).....95
Critics Target Federal Circuit (LAW) 96

Environment:

As Climate Changes, Large Firms Look At Global-Warming Practice Areas (LAW).....100
Pollinators' Decline Called Threat To Crops (WP).....100
Evangelicals Rally Behind Environmental Cause (LAT).....101
Evangelicals Broaden Their Moral Agenda (WP).....103

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Agents Break Up Money - Laundering Ring (AP) 104
26 Arrested In Global Money Laundering Case (WT).....105
DEA Warns Of Soft Drink-cough Syrup Mix (USAT) 106
Former Soldier Admits To Role In Drug Smuggling (AP).....107
Chicago Police Raid Targets Bad Heroin (AP) 107
Major Drug Sweep On South Side (CHIT).....107
Harold Ickes Housing Project Targeted In Police Drug And Gangs Sweep (CD).....108
South Side CHA Drug Bust Produces Dozens Of Arrests (WBBM) 109
Spring Valley Drug Dealer Gets 11 Years In Federal Prison (JN).....109
Freedom For Sale, Part 1 (MNT).....110
Colo., Nev. To Vote On Easing Pot Laws (USAT).....111
Lions Confused By Rogers' Suspension (AP) 112
Lions' Rogers Is Suspended For Jets' Game And 3 More (NYT).....113
Runners Of Meth Superlab Get 15Yrs (AP).....113
Few States Allow Forms Spelling Out Patients' Wishes (USAT).....114
Gang Leaders Get Life Terms (VALLTH).....114

DOJ_NMG_0082971

Salem-area Pipe-bomb Case Leads To An Arrest (SALSJ) .115
Ad Aims To Instill Fear Of Yankton (SFAL).....116
Johnson Wants Justice Department Posters Pulled (AP).....117

Immigration:

Former Nazi Guard Freed To Uncertain Fate (FREEP).....117
Flow Of Immigrants' Money To Latin America Surges (NYT)118
Immigrants Sending $45 Billion Home (WP).....119
Suit: Arizona Targets Money Wired From Immigrant Communities (CHIT).....120
Crossing Guards In Training (LAT).....121

Tax:

IRS Aims To Limit A Deferral Strategy (WSJ).....125

Congress-Administration:

N.C. Testing Praised (WSJ).....126
Bush In N.C. (EDN).....127
Bush Goes On Base-building Trip To N.C. (AP-Y).....129
Bush Touts No Child Left Behind (UPI).....130
Bush Touts Education Program (LAT).....130
Social Security Benefits To Rise In 2007 (AP-Y).....131
Social Security Benefits To Increase 3.3% (NYT/AP).....132
Social Security Raise For Elderly And Disabled (LAT).....132
Social Security Checks To Rise 3.3% In 2007 (WSJ).....133
Government Retirement Benefits To Rise 3.3% (WP).....133
Cost Of Living, A Fickle Formula (WP).....135
Inside The Beltway (WT).....136
Congress's Dismal Grades (WP).....137
Catching Conflicts At The FDA (LAT).....138

Other News:

Dow Cracks 12,000, Sets Another Record (USAT).....139
GOP Tries To Shift Focus To Economy (WT).....139
Lower Energy Prices Help Consumer Price Index Decline 0.5% (NYT).....140
Consumer Prices Fall, But Core Measure Inches Higher (WSJ).....141
Consumer Prices, Construction Starts Supply Good News (USAT).....142
Falling US Fuel Prices Ease Fears Of Recession (CSM).....143
Demand For Gasoline Surges As Prices Take A Dive (USAT).....145
Has Diesel Grown On The United States? (WP).....145
Mr. Pombo's Map (NYT).....146
Oil-Price Drop Challenges OPEC Unity (WSJ).....147
Study Of Cancers At IBM Is Released (WSJ).....148
Universal Health Care: We Can't Afford Not To (USAT).....149
High Hopes, And Higher Home Prices, In Anacostia (WP).....150
3 Doctors Assail Lilly Study Of Sepsis Drug (NYT).....152
Eli Lilly's Role In Treatment Is Cited (WSJ/AP).....153
Debate Surrounds End-of-life Health Care Costs (USAT).....153
Bush Sidelined As Defeat Looms (FT).....156
Bush Limits Role On The Campaign Trail (FT).....156
Laura Bush, Unlike George, A Hit On Republican Campaign Trail (BLOOM).....157
First Real Test Of Rove's Game Plan (FT).....159
How Republicans Hope To Hold The Senate (Time).....159
Practically No One Thinks Republicans Can Hold The House (RC).....162
Fight For Congress Extends Into GOP Strongholds (LAT).....163
Uphill Hike For Republicans In Colorado (WSJ).....165
Democrats Set Sights On Wins In Ohio (WP/AP).....167
DNC To Borrow Money For Last-minute Tossups (WT).....168
Conservative Voters Likely To Stay Home (WT).....169
Moderates In Kansas Decide They're Not In GOP Anymore (WP).....170
Poll Signals More Republican Woes As Disapproval Of Congress Grows (WSJ).....172
Democrats Would Reverse Bush's Work (WT).....175
Judge Bars Notices At Polls On Votes For Foley's Substitute (NYT).....176
Upstart Leaves The Campaigning To The Congressman (WP).....177
Senate Could Dust Off 50-50 Deal (RC).....178
Allen, Webb Pull In Presidents As They Beef Up Push To Nov. 7 (WP).....180
Star Power To Fill War Chests (WT).....181
Allen Changes Direction On War In Iraq (DPHR).....182
Allen For Senate (WT).....183
Clinton Urges Dems To Question Criticism (AP-Y).....184
Clinton Reflects On His 2 Terms And Hits Hard At Republicans (NYT).....184
Clinton Lists Differences With GOP, Administration (WP).....185
Clinton Comeback (NSWK).....186
Fall TV Lineup Filled With Political Spots (USAT).....188
Tables Turned For The G.O.P. Over Iraq Issue (NYT).....190
Linking Iraq To The War On Terror Has Downside For GOP (RC).....192
Iraq Is Big Issue For Voters Seeing The Upside Of War (NYT).....194
McCaskill Calls For Rumsfeld's Firing; Talent Does Not (CCT).....195
Many Jabs In Missouri Senate Debate, But No KO (SLPD).....197

DOJ_NMG_0082972

Iraq War Key Point Of Dispute In Senate Race (BSUN) 198
Blacks Divided On Whether Hoyer's 'Slavish' Remark Was Racist (WT) 199
Lieberman Debates Rivals About Iraq War (AP-Y).....200
Lieberman's Iraq Stance Draws Fire In Debate (NYT).....200
Schlesinger Shines In Senate Debate (NLD).....201
Poll Finds Support For Tax Increase (WP).....203
Bloomberg's Car Is Stolen In New Jersey (NYT) 204
Run, Barack, Run (NYT).....205
The G.O.P.'s Bad Bet (NYT).....206
Common Sense-Impaired (WSJ).....207
Bush: U.S. Will Stop N. Korea Nuke Moves (AP).....208
Rice Seeks To Calm Asia Amid Fear Of A Second Test By North Korea (WSJ) 209
Japan Tells Rice It Will Not Seek Nuclear Weapons (NYT).209
Japan Has No Plans For Nukes; Watch On N. Korea Continues (MCT) 211
Japan, Acting To Calm U.S. Worries, Rules Out Building Nuclear Arms (WP) 212
Nuclear Arms Spread 'hard To Stop' (FT).....212
Pyongyang's Nukes: How Dangerous Are They? (CSM).....213
With Cash, Defectors Find North Korea's Cracks (NYT).....215
North Korea Heads Toward Hunger (CSM) 218
Kim's Seoul Brothers (WSJ) 220
Iran Warns Against U.N. Nuke Sanctions (AP).....221
Iran Seems Unmoved By Specter Of Sanctions Against North Korea (NYT).....222
Israel Expands Fight On Border In Gaza (WT/AP).....222
Israel Finds 9 Tunnels From Gaza Strip Into Egypt (LAT).....223
Evangelicals Lobby Bush On Sudan Crisis (AP-Y).....225
Evangelicals Urge Darfur Action (WT) 225
Suicide Boats Explode In Sri Lanka Port, Killing 16 (NYT) ...226
U.S. Objections Lead Spain To End Venezuela Deal (NYT)227
Nicaragua Wants To Construct Alternative To Panama Canal (USAT/AP).....227
Georgians Deported From Russia As 2-nation Diplomatic War Heats Up (USAT).....228
U.S. Stands By Decision On Kodori Gorge (WT).....229
Charities In Russia Stymied By New Law (WT) 230
U.K.'s Criticism Of Practices Of Muslims Raises Tensions (WSJ).....231
Behind The Veil (NYT) 232
Promoting Serbia, For A Price (WP) 232
Israel Sex Cases Defy Machismo Of The Warrior (NYT).....234
Mr. Erdogan's Turkey (WSJ).....235

TERRORISM NEWS:

Palestinian Puzzle (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

Through a picture window, the former Howard University professor was admiring the garden sanctuary he'd created behind his Northern Virginia home. There are fig and apple saplings, fragrant bushes of mint and oregano, morning glories tilting toward the warm October sun. Clumps of fat green tomatoes hug the fence.

"I'm under home incarceration," explained Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, who is accused of being a terrorist supporter. "I have to do something."

After two years of house arrest, the business professor is to go on trial in Chicago today, accused of being a part of a sprawling U.S. network that helped the Palestinian group Hamas. The Justice Department regarded the case so important that Attorney General John D. Ashcroft himself announced the indictment of Ashqar and two co-defendants in 2004.

"Today, terrorists have lost yet another source of financing and support for their bombs and bloodshed," Ashcroft said at the time.

Prosecutors say they have abundant evidence that Ashqar moved money for Hamas through his U.S. bank accounts and served as a go-between for some of the organization's leaders -- even passing on a request to kill a rogue Hamas operative.

Those acts allegedly occurred before the U.S. government first designated Hamas a terrorist group in 1995. The indictment charges that Hamas, nonetheless, was carrying out attacks aimed ultimately at destroying Israel -- and thus was a "criminal enterprise" under federal racketeering laws, which are more commonly applied to drug gangs and Mafia figures.

DOJ_NMG_0082973

Ashqar denies being a member of Hamas, which won a majority in the Palestinian parliament in January. But the soft-spoken professor clearly sees himself as a Palestinian fighter -- albeit one living in a suburban split-level with a basketball hoop. Twice, he has refused to testify before grand juries investigating Hamas's activities in the United States, launching hunger strikes that left him emaciated.

"If I am targeted by Israelis, I understand. They are my enemy," he said in an interview last week. "But to be targeted by Americans? I can't comprehend."

Ashqar is one of several Northern Virginia Muslims to be accused in recent years of aiding Hamas, the Islamic Resistance Movement. Like them, the professor offers a far different image than the chanting, AK-47-waving Hamas supporters who appear on the TV news.

A short, bespectacled man in black pinstriped slacks, Ashqar led a visitor across thick, Persian-style carpets into his home in Springfield. It is a slice of the Levant in Fairfax County: The bookshelf holds both the Koran and "A Passion for Excellence," by management guru Tom Peters. Beethoven trilled from a cellphone, the newest toy of Ashqar's 10-year-old nephew, who lives with him and his wife, Asma.

"He cannot stop placing phone calls and getting his friends to call him," Ashqar said, with typical parental exasperation.

But Ashqar's focus is 6,000 miles away. He devours Palestinian newspapers online. In 2005, he ran in absentia for Palestinian president, getting less than 3 percent of the vote. When Ashqar refers to "my town," he means the village of Seida, nestled amid plum orchards in the West Bank, where his journey to Palestinian activism began.Occupation as Slavery

Ashqar was 9 when Israel took control of the area from Jordan after the 1967 Middle East war. He still remembers his fear and anger.

"Before the Israeli occupation, there were no restrictions. We could go wherever we wanted to," Ashqar said, his hands fluttering. "We used to stay up late, to play, to stay with the relatives, the friends."

The Israelis installed checkpoints and a 7 p.m. curfew, he recalled, and his older brother was detained for six weeks without explanation. Ashqar himself would spend 16 days in a cramped jail cell in 1981, accused of participating in an anti-Israel demonstration, he said.

"I consider the occupation as a form of slavery," Ashqar declared.

In college, Ashqar became a leader in a growing student movement that fused political activism with conservative Islam. The movement was dominant at the Islamic University of Gaza, where Ashqar began teaching business administration in 1985. Several professors eventually became leaders of Hamas, a Palestinian nationalist movement which includes a broad social-service network as well as an armed wing.

After Israeli authorities closed the college, Ashqar headed to the University of Mississippi in 1989 to pursue his doctorate in business on a U.S. government scholarship.

Prosecutors in Chicago say that the quiet graduate student shifted tens of thousands of dollars through his Mississippi bank accounts to Hamas activists. Evidence of his support for the group is overwhelming, they say.

For example, in December 1993, FBI agents slipped into Ashqar's apartment and discovered "a treasure trove of Hamas-related documents," according to the prosecution's court filings. They included minutes of confidential Hamas meetings; details of recent Hamas attacks on Israeli soldiers; and a fax from Mousa Abu Marzook, a Falls Church businessman, asking Ashqar to arrange the transfer of $40,000 to another Palestinian activist, according to the court filings.

Marzook is also charged in the Chicago indictment. He was deported by U.S. authorities in 1997 and is a top official in Hamas's political bureau, believed to be living in Syria. The third defendant in the case is Muhammad Salah, an Illinois businessman.

Ashqar used his telephone as "a kind of switchboard," linking Hamas operatives in various countries who couldn't call each other directly, according to the prosecution's court documents. In December 1993, according to the documents, Ashqar passed on a message from one operative to a senior Hamas official in Syria, calling for the execution of a rogue Hamas member who had killed three men. Unbeknown to Ashqar, the FBI was listening in.

Ashqar and his attorney, William B. Moffitt, have declined to discuss the charges, saying they will argue their case in court.

DOJ_NMG_0082974

The indictment lists no pro-Hamas actions by Ashqar after March 1994, other than his refusal to testify before grand juries. The U.S. Treasury Department designated Hamas a terrorist organization in January 1995.

But the indictment mentions several deadly attacks by Hamas members on Israeli soldiers and civilians starting in 1992. And in April 1994, Hamas's military wing claimed responsibility for a car bombing against a bus in the Israeli farm town of Afula that killed seven. It was the start of a wave of suicide bombings by Palestinians over the next several years, part of an escalating conflict that would claim thousands of lives on the two sides.'What Can I Await?'

Ashqar pulled some 8-by-10 glossies out of a drawer in a carved wooden table in the living room.

"Let me show you some pictures," he said.

They show him standing in front of a friend's house in August 1998. Ashqar's pale, emaciated arms poke from a pale-blue hospital shirt. His face, normally a jowly oval, has collapsed into a triangle, his chin a bearded point.

Ashqar had just emerged from a New York prison hospital after a hunger strike that lasted six months, during which he was force-fed. He was detained for refusing to testify before a grand jury investigating Marzook and Hamas financing.

"I can't see myself as a collaborator against my people," he said softly.

Ashqar has pleaded innocent and says he rejects terrorism or suicide bombings. "Israel is a reality," he said, explaining that he favors a separate state for the Palestinians. He scoffed at al-Qaeda, "these crazy people of September 11."

But since 1991, Ashqar said, law-enforcement officials have been pressuring him to provide information, questioning his university professors and causing him to lose jobs. The Justice Department opened an investigation in 1996 into Palestinian immigrants, including Ashqar, who appeared to be moving around large sums of money, a former official said.

The Palestinians "really did use some of this money for charitable and religious purposes," said Mark Flessner, a former prosecutor involved in that investigation. But the probe appeared to show that "they would take a small percentage to support terrorism."

Flessner said the investigation was shut down in 2000 after numerous internal disputes, some over the use of classified information.

By 1997, Ashqar moved to Northern Virginia to be near friends in the Muslim community.

"People were very sympathetic with him. He became a well-known person" after his hunger strike, said Mohamad al-Hanooti, an imam who often preaches at Dar al-Hijrah in Falls Church, where Ashqar was elected to the governing board.

Ashqar was an assistant professor at Howard until 2003, when the university declined to renew his contract. That year, he was again jailed for refusing to testify before a grand jury in Chicago.

The current indictment came a year later. Ashqar has been out on a $2.6 million bond secured by the properties of friends in the Washington area. Local Muslims have raised tens of thousands of dollars for his legal defense.

If he is acquitted, he expects to be deported. If he is convicted of racketeering, Ashqar could face life in prison. It is a frightening prospect, he acknowledged. But he said he would survive because of his faith.

"That's very important in my thinking," he said, walking through his garden, an ankle bracelet monitoring his movements. "If I go to jail for the rest of my life, what can I await? Just a reward from God."

Staff writer Peter Slevin and staff researchers Meg Smith and Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Torture Victim Barred From Visiting U.S. (AP)

By WILLIAM C. MANN, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Syrian torturers could find nothing to implicate Canadian Maher Arar in al-Qaida or any other terrorist ties. An official Canadian government report agreed with that finding and recommended that Arar be compensated for his 10 months in a Syrian prison.

Still, Arar remains on the U.S. government terror watch list. And the United States has not admitted fault for holding him incommunicado for a week, then, five days after his first telephone call, putting him on a private jet and flying him to the Syrian prison.

DOJ_NMG_0082975

Arar and his American lawyer, Michael Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights, were invited to Washington on Wednesday to receive human rights awards from the rights advocates Institute for Policy Studies. Ratner came from his New York headquarters to accept for the center, a longtime campaigner against torture and other abuses.

Because the watch list will not let Arar enter the United States, he had to stay in Canada and participate by telephone in a discussion of his case and of the U.S. law signed Tuesday by President Bush on treatment and prosecution of detainees. At the awards presentation, he delivered a videotaped message of thanks in which he described his ordeal, which began on Sept. 26, 2002, at New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport and ended with his arrival in Canada in early October 2003.

The award "means that there are still Americans out there who value our struggle for justice," he said. "We now know that my story is not a unique one. Over the past two years we have heard from many other people who were, who have been kidnapped, unlawfully detained, tortured and eventually released without being charged with any crime in any country."

John Cavanagh, the institute's director, told Arar he had asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to clear Arar's name and let him come. Gonzales did not reply, Cavanagh said. At the Justice Department, a spokesman said he was unaware of the letter and could not comment.

Gonzales has said Arar was deported to the country where he was born. A representative of the Immigration and Naturalization Service was there when he was put on the plane, Arar said in his videotaped talk, and he said he told her the Syrians would torture him.

"She said something like: 'The INS is not the body or the agency that signed the Geneva Convention convention against torture.' For me what that really meant is, 'We will send you to torture, and we don't care.'"

Cavanagh told Arar over the telephone that he was selected for the Letelier-Moffitt Human Rights Award "partly for your courage in helping to catalyze the global movement against torture and this term of 'rendition': deportation for torture."

Last week, Canadian Justice Dennis O'Connor issued a three-volume report on the Arar case that made 23 recommendations for policy changes and reparations to Arar, a software engineer.

"I am able to say categorically that there is no evidence to indicate that Mr. Arar has committed any offense or that his activities constitute a threat to the security of Canada," O'Connor said. He said it was almost certain that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had sent erroneous information on Arar to the Americans.

The official U.S. line on Arar, as related Sept. 29 by State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, is "the people who made the decisions at the time ... determined a couple of things: One, that this individual posed a threat to the United States based on the information that they had; and two, that they were able to assure themselves, they had the reasonable expectation that this individual was not going to be maltreated."

Detainee Files Motion For His Prosecution (DENP)

By Bruce Finley, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, October 19, 2006

A man from the Pakistan-Afghanistan borderlands jailed for more than two years after the FBI targeted him as a possible Denver-based terrorist - but never charged him - has begun a last-ditch legal gambit to resume his life with his U.S.-citizen wife and four kids.

Still in prison in Colorado, Haroon Rashid has filed a motion in federal court to force the government to prosecute him.

It's an unusual effort to break out of the legal limbo that has derailed his life - and lives of others jailed since Sept. 11, 2001, in the government's war on terrorism.

After charging 441 detainees in terrorism and terrorism-related cases, federal authorities have won 261 convictions, a new Justice Department study found. Most of the convictions were for petty offenses, not terrorism.

An undetermined number of suspects including Rashid still are detained. Some 150 cases are pending.

U.S. officials say secret evidence supports a hardline approach. Prosecutors are trying "to prevent terrorist acts before they can occur," Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said.

But civil liberties leaders question basic fairness.

DOJ_NMG_0082976

"Yes, we want to be safe, but do we want to sacrifice our liberties in the process? ... If you want to always be safe, you could lock everybody up. But that's not what our system is based on," said Judy Rabinovitz, senior attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union. Rashid's case and others "amount to preventive detention," she said.

Rashid made his move, through his attorney Jeff Pagliuca, after U.S. Attorney Troy Eid filed a motion Oct. 2 to drop a lesser immigration charge the government pursued as the FBI's initial terrorism case evaporated, court records show.

By dropping the immigration charge, Eid had planned to clear the way for Rashid to be deported back to his native Pakistan for misdemeanor assault. In 2003, a jury found Rashid guilty of assaulting a street-gang member he said threatened his kids. He received a 401-day sentence that was mostly suspended.

Now Rashid's motion - to block federal prosecutors from dropping their case - aims to delay his deportation and further clear his record. He's been held in federal custody at his lawyer's request to avoid deportation until the federal case is resolved.

Rashid comes from Quetta, along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border, an unsettled hotbed of anti-U.S. sentiment where Taliban forces are on the rise. His wife and kids say they dread moving there if he is deported but would do so to be together.

"Mr. Rashid is a decent man . ... It doesn't do anybody in our country any good to have this man deported back to Pakistan on a misdemeanor," Pagliuca said.

"I'd rather have Mr. Rashid here taking care of his children, not back in Pakistan. ... This case shouldn't have been filed in the first place."

Chief U.S. District Judge Lewis Babcock must decide how to handle this jam - with feds asking to drop their charges and Rashid asking for a trial to exonerate himself and let his family stay a bit longer in the country.

Rashid already has served more time in prison than would be possible if prosecutors won a conviction on the lesser immigration charge they're now trying to drop.

He immigrated to the United States legally in November 1997. His wife, Saima Saima, and her father, Abdul Qayyum, are naturalized U.S. citizens. Rashid worked driving an airport shuttle as they raised their kids.

Federal agents began investigating him and his family in 2002 after President Bush and then- Attorney General John Ashcroft vowed to use every legal tool they could to detain and prosecute possible terrorists. Rashid had visited Pakistan that year.

Denver-based FBI Special Agent Mike Castro testified at a 2003 detention hearing that there was evidence Rashid bragged he fought against U.S. soldiers in Afghanistan and that he was in Colorado awaiting orders to carry out violent acts.

Said Pagliuca: "I don't believe it. Why didn't they charge him as a terrorist? There's no evidence of terrorism."

Castro and Immigration and Customs Enforcement Special Agent Ross Godwin, members of a Joint Terrorism Task Force, went to California and questioned Imran Khan, son of Rashid's father-in-law by a previous marriage, who had entered the United States in August 1997 with Rashid's wife.

The agents sought Kahn as a source on Rashid and others. Though they lacked a warrant, they arrested Khan and hauled him back to Colorado in shackles, court records show.

In a 2004 court order, Judge Babcock stated that "the terrorism implications of this case have since evaporated" and that "there was confusion about how and under what authority an FBI and (immigration) agent working in concert in a mixed civil and criminal investigation should conduct their investigation."

Federal officials recently have rebuffed repeated efforts to interview Rashid at a federal prison in Englewood. He was held previously at a federal immigration prison in Aurora.

Family members can visit, including a toddler born during Rashid's confinement.

The older children regularly ask about their father and beg to stay in their schools.

U.S. authorities "are breaking this family. We've been patient. ... This is very unfair," Rashid's wife said in a Denver mosque. "They still think he's a terrorist."

Staff writer Bruce Finley can be reached at 303-954-1700 or bfinley@denverpost.com.

U.S. Army Colonel To Investigate Gitmo (AP-Y)

By Mike Melia, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082977

A U.S. Army colonel arrived at Guantanamo Bay Wednesday to investigate allegations that guards at the prison abused detainees, a military spokesman said.

Col. Richard Basset, who is based at U.S. Southern Command headquarters in Miami, was appointed after Marine Sgt. Heather Cerveny said in a sworn statement that guards she met in a Guantanamo bar last month spoke of hitting detainees and denying them water. She said the guards described it as common practice in the prison where about 450 detainees are held on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

Cerveny is a paralegal for Marine Lt. Col. Colby Vokey, an attorney for a Guantanamo detainee. Vokey filed a complaint to the Pentagon's Inspector General's office alleging that detainee abuse was ongoing at the prison.

Basset will conduct interviews for up to a month on the isolated detention center in southeast Cuba, command spokesman Jose Ruiz said by telephone from Miami. He has authority to interview any member of the military Joint Task Force that runs the prison regardless of rank, Ruiz said.

"He's going to interview everyone he thinks he needs to talk to to be able to establish the facts," he said.

He will submit his findings to the commander of the U.S. Southern Command, which oversees the detention center.

Vokey and Cerveny have been ordered by the U.S. Marine Corps not to speak with the media about their allegations, the U.S. Marines public affairs department said.

Congress To Courts: 'Get Out Of The War On Terror' (WSJ)

By John Yoo

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

During the bitter controversy over the military commission bill, which President Bush signed into law on Tuesday, most of the press and the professional punditry missed the big story. In the struggle for power between the three branches of government, it is not the presidency that "won." Instead, it is the judiciary that lost.

The new law is, above all, a stinging rebuke to the Supreme Court. It strips the courts of jurisdiction to hear any habeas corpus claim filed by any alien enemy combatant anywhere in the world. It was passed in response to the effort by a five-justice majority in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld to take control over terrorism policy. That majority extended judicial review to Guantanamo Bay, threw the Bush military commissions into doubt, and tried to extend the protections of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions to al Qaeda and Taliban detainees, overturning the traditional understanding that Geneva does not cover terrorists, who are not signatories nor "combatants" in an internal civil war under Article 3.

Hamdan was an unprecedented attempt by the court to rewrite the law of war and intrude into war policy. The court must have thought its stunning power grab would go unchallenged. After all, it has gotten away with many broad assertions of judicial authority before. This has been because Congress is unwilling to take a clear position on controversial issues (like abortion, religion or race) and instead passes ambiguous laws which breed litigation and leave the power to decide to the federal courts.

Until the Supreme Court began trying to make war policy, the writ of habeas corpus had never been understood to benefit enemy prisoners in war. The U.S. held millions of POWs during World War II, with none permitted to use our civilian courts (except for a few cases of U.S. citizens captured fighting for the Axis). Even after hostilities ended, the justices turned away lawsuits by enemy prisoners seeking to challenge their detention. In Johnson v. Eisentrager, the court held that it would not hear habeas claims brought by alien enemy prisoners held outside the U.S., and refused to interpret the Geneva Conventions to give new rights in civilian court against the government. In the case of Gen. Tomoyuki Yamashita, the court refrained from reviewing the operations of military commissions.

In Hamdan, the court moved to sweep aside decades of law and practice so as to forge a grand new role for the courts to open their doors to enemy war prisoners. Led by John Paul Stevens and abetted by Anthony Kennedy, the majority ignored or creatively misread the court's World War II precedents. The approach catered to the legal academy, whose tastes run to swashbuckling assertions of judicial supremacy and radical innovations, rather than hewing to wise but boring precedents.

Thoughtful critics point out that because the enemy fights covertly, the risk of detaining the innocent is greater. But so is the risk of releasing the dangerous. That's why enemy combatants who fight out of uniform, such as wartime spies, have always been considered illegals under the law of war, not entitled to the same protections given to soldiers on the battlefield or ordinary POWs.

DOJ_NMG_0082978

Disguised suicide- bombers in an age of WMD proliferation and virulent America-hatred are more immediately dangerous than the furtive information-carriers of our Cold War past. We now know that more than a dozen detainees released from Guantanamo have rejoined the jihad. The real question is how much time, energy and money should be diverted from winning the fight toward establishing multiple layers of review for terrorists. Until Hamdan, nothing in the law of war ever suggested that enemy status was anything but a military judgment.

While there may be different ways to strike a balance, this is a decision for the president and Congress, not the courts. The Constitution gives Congress the authority to determine the jurisdiction of federal courts in peacetime, and also declares that habeas corpus can be suspended "in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion" when "the public Safety may require it." Congress's power is even greater when it is correcting the justices' errors. Courts are ill-equipped to decide whether vast resources should be devoted to reviewing military detentions. Or whether military personnel's time should be consumed traveling back to the U.S. for detainee hearings. Or whether we risk revealing information in these hearings that might compromise the intelligence sources and methods that may allow us to win the war.

This time, Congress and the president did not take the court's power grab lying down. They told the courts, in effect, to get out of the war on terror, stripped them of habeas jurisdiction over alien enemy combatants, and said there was nothing wrong with the military commissions. It is the first time since the New Deal that Congress had so completely divested the courts of power over a category of cases. It is also the first time since the Civil War that Congress saw fit to narrow the court's habeas powers in wartime because it disagreed with its decisions.

The law goes farther. It restores to the president command over the management of the war on terror. It directly reverses Hamdan by making clear that the courts cannot take up the Geneva Conventions. Except for some clearly defined war crimes, whose prosecution would also be up to executive discretion, it leaves interpretation and enforcement of the treaties up to the president. It even forbids courts from relying on foreign or international legal decisions in any decisions involving military commissions.

All this went overlooked during the fight over the bill by the media, which focused on Sens. McCain, Graham and Warner's opposition to the administration's proposals for the use of classified evidence at terrorist trials and permissible interrogation methods. In its eagerness to magnify an intra-GOP squabble, the media mostly ignored the substance of the bill, which gave current and future administrations, whether Democrat or Republican, the powers needed to win this war.

Mr. Yoo, professor of law at Berkeley and visiting scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, served in the Bush Justice Department from 2001-03. He is the author of "War By Other Means" (Grove/Atlantic 2006).

A Dangerous New Order (NYT)

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

Once President Bush signed the new law on military tribunals, administration officials and Republican leaders in Congress wasted no time giving Americans a taste of the new order created by this unconstitutional act.

Within hours, Justice Department lawyers notified the federal courts that they no longer had the authority to hear pending lawsuits filed by attorneys on behalf of inmates of the penal camp at Guantánamo Bay. They cited passages in the bill that suspend the fundamental principle of habeas corpus, making Mr. Bush the first president since the Civil War to take that undemocratic step.

Not satisfied with having won the vote, Dennis Hastert, the speaker of the House, quickly issued a statement accusing Democrats who opposed the Military Commissions Act of 2006 of putting “their liberal agenda ahead of the security of America.” He said the Democrats “would gingerly pamper the terrorists who plan to destroy innocent Americans’ lives” and create “new rights for terrorists.”

This nonsense is part of the Republicans’ scare-America-first strategy for the elections. No Democrat advocated pampering terrorists — gingerly or otherwise — or giving them new rights. Democratic amendments to the bill sought to protect everyone’s right to a fair trial while providing a legal way to convict terrorists.

Americans will hear more of this ahead of the election. They also will hear Mr. Bush say that he finally has the power to bring to justice a handful of men behind the 9/11 attacks. The truth is that Mr. Bush could have done that long ago, but chose to detain them illegally at hidden C.I.A. camps to extract information. He sent them to Guantánamo only to stampede Congress into passing the new law.

DOJ_NMG_0082979

The 60 or so men at Guantánamo who are now facing tribunals — out of about 450 inmates — also could have been tried years ago if Mr. Bush had not rebuffed efforts by Congress to create suitable courts. He imposed a system of kangaroo courts that was more about expanding his power than about combating terrorism.

While the Republicans pretend that this bill will make America safer, let's be clear about its real dangers. It sets up a separate system of justice for any foreigner whom Mr. Bush chooses to designate as an "illegal enemy combatant." It raises insurmountable obstacles for prisoners to challenge their detentions. It does not require the government to release prisoners who are not being charged, or a prisoner who is exonerated by the tribunals.

The law does not apply to American citizens, but it does apply to other legal United States residents. And it chips away at the foundations of the judicial system in ways that all Americans should find threatening. It further damages the nation's reputation and, by repudiating key protections of the Geneva Conventions, it needlessly increases the danger to any American soldier captured in battle.

In the short run, voters should see through the fog created by the Republican campaign machine. It will be up to the courts to repair the harm this law has done to the Constitution.

The Unlearned Lessons Of Abu Ghraib (WP)

By Christopher Graveline

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

President Bush has signed into law Congress's latest attempt to clarify our country's position on proper treatment of detainees and the boundaries of legitimate interrogation techniques. Unfortunately, this legislation demonstrates that both the administration and Congress have failed to learn important lessons from what Bush described as the "biggest mistake that's happened so far" in Iraq: the detainee abuses at Abu Ghraib.

By dissociating potential criminal responsibility from overly aggressive interrogation practices that could be classified as "minor" breaches of the Geneva Conventions, and setting up a situation in which different interrogation practices can be used by our military and the CIA, our national leadership has ensured more abuse scandals.

As part of the Army judge advocate general team investigating and prosecuting the Abu Ghraib soldiers, I crisscrossed the globe interviewing witnesses, collecting documents and studying our national policies, searching for went wrong at that prison. The evidence demonstrated that most of the photographed abuse had little or nothing to do with interrogation; it was done for sport by prison guards. But we also found disturbing conduct by military and civilian interrogators.

The interrogation abuses could be linked to three main areas of breakdown: confusion in the military ranks about what was acceptable behavior, given the conduct of civilian contractors and "other governmental agencies"; migration of certain techniques within the intelligence community without an understanding of how to implement them properly; and exploitation of the ambiguity in apparently innocuous interrogation tactics.

The new law does nothing to remedy these weaknesses.

First, our military and civilian intelligence agencies do not operate in mutually exclusive bubbles. A great deal of interaction occurs as military units capture suspected personnel, hand them over to interested agencies and, often, witness the interrogations. Our service members, especially Special Operations forces, will see the double standard -- the CIA's and the military's. This blurring was a main complaint of Abu Ghraib prison guards.

Army Maj. Gen. George Fay, who investigated Abu Ghraib, wrote in his report that "CIA detention and interrogation practices led to a loss of accountability, abuse, reduced interagency cooperation, and an unhealthy mystique that further poisoned the atmosphere." The power of the CIA's mystique to influence our soldiers should not be underestimated. Army guards reported seeing unknown men in civilian clothes dropping prisoners off and telling the guards not to give the detainees identification numbers, contrary to usual practices under the Geneva Conventions. The civilians exuded an air of confidence that suggested they knew exactly what they were doing and that this departure from the norm was allowed. Similar issues were unearthed in the interrogation booth, including one instance of a man dying during a CIA interrogation at Abu Ghraib.

DOJ_NMG_0082980

The CIA conducted its own internal abuse investigation but never reported the results to any military authority in Iraq, creating resentment, the impression of a double standard and confusion in the military ranks as to what were acceptable practices. Having strict controls over interrogations and the ability to hold individual interrogators responsible for their actions is another important lesson stemming from abuses seen in Iraq.

Chief Warrant Officer Lewis Welshofer, an Army interrogator, exploited the ambiguous language of the "harsh" interrogation approach to wrap an Iraqi general in a sleeping bag, tie electrical cords around the bag and sit on the man's chest in an attempt to scare him with suffocation. The general died. (This was not at Abu Ghraib.) Welshofer was convicted by the military of negligent homicide. But given the language of the new law, it is unclear whether a civilian interrogator performing the same actions would be prosecuted, since it would be impossible to prove that the interrogator "specifically intended" to torture or inflict "severe or serious physical or mental pain."

The new law grants too much latitude in an area where precision and oversight are critical. If confusion reigned in Washington during the past several weeks over whether waterboarding or other, "harsher" techniques would be permissible under the legislation, imagine the results when our agents and service members are faced with the same question halfway around the world and years removed from this debate -- especially if the threat of criminal responsibility is gone.

The better route would have been to authorize mirror-image interrogation techniques for both the CIA and the military and to maintain the possibility of criminal prosecution if an interrogator exceeds these authorized approaches. All interrogators would have more than enough flexibility to obtain necessary information simply by using the approaches recently rewritten into the new Army field manual that governs interrogation.

Now we must wait to see what interrogation rules the president will promulgate for the CIA. Given the administration's rhetoric, there seems little hope for a cure for the systemic problems exposed at Abu Ghraib.

The writer, who served as an active-duty Army JAG officer for more than seven years, participated in the prosecution of 10 soldiers for detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib prison.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Government Skeptical Of Threat Against NFL Stadiums (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

AP, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — A Web site is claiming that seven NFL football stadiums will be hit with radiological dirty bombs this weekend, but the government on Wednesday expressed doubts about the threat.

The warning, posted Oct. 12, was part of an ongoing Internet conversation titled “New Attack on America Be Afraid.” It mentioned NFL stadiums in New York, Miami, Atlanta, Seattle, Houston, Oakland and Cleveland, where games are scheduled for this weekend.

The Homeland Security Department alerted authorities and stadium owners in those cities, as well as the NFL, of the Web message but said the threat was being viewed “with strong skepticism.” Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said there was no intelligence that indicated such an attack was imminent, and that the alert was “out of an abundance of caution.”

“The department strongly encourages the public to continue to go about their plans, including attending events that involve large public gatherings such as football games,” Knocke said.

The FBI also expressed doubt about the threat.

The nation’s alert level remains at yellow, signaling an elevated risk of an attack. The threat level for airline flights is at orange, a higher level, where it has been since a foiled plot to bomb U.S.-bound commercial jets was revealed on Aug. 10.

Government Skeptical Of Threat To Stadiums (WP)

By Spencer Hsu And Mark Maske, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082981

The Department of Homeland Security has notified the NFL and law enforcement agencies of an Internet threat to detonate radiological "dirty" bombs outside seven stadiums hosting games Sunday, but immediately dismissed the threat as noncredible.

"We view this with the strongest of skepticism, and we strongly encourage the American public to go about their daily lives and to attend large gatherings, and to go to football games," DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said.

The department issued the notice "out of an abundance of caution," and routinely shares 1,200 reports a year with state, local and private sector officials, Knocke said. "In this case there is no credibility," he said.

The notice, which the NFL received Tuesday, cited games in New York, Miami, Atlanta, Seattle, Houston, Cleveland and Oakland, Calif.

"Our stadiums are very well protected through the comprehensive security procedures we have in place," NFL spokesman Greg Aiello said in a statement.Barber May Cut It Short

When he arrived in training camp this past summer, New York Giants tailback Tiki Barber talked at length about the possibility of retiring in the next few years to pursue his interests in broadcasting and other businesses.

Barber, the NFL's rushing leader, now says his departure could come sooner rather than later. He said during a conference call with reporters yesterday that he is leaning toward retiring after this season, echoing comments that he made in the New York Times.

Barber, 31, said it was "too early in the year to say it for sure," but added: "I've been considering it for a few years now. It comes to a point where your body just doesn't want to take it anymore [and] you see other opportunities out there. I'm excited about the rest of my life as well as I am about this football season, so we'll see what happens."Welbourn Set to Return

Retired offensive tackle John Welbourn reportedly is set to rejoin the Kansas City Chiefs. The Kansas City Star reported yesterday that Welbourn will join the team next week. Welbourn was the Chiefs' starter at right tackle last season but abruptly retired in the offseason. He was suspended by the NFL for six weeks for a reported violation of the league's steroid policy. He'd been suspended for the first four games of last season for a violation of the policy. . . .

The Dallas Cowboys re-signed veteran safety Marcus Coleman. They'd released him over the weekend, just after he'd returned from serving a four-game suspension for violating the league's substance abuse policy.

Threat Made To 7 Stadiums; U.S. Is Skeptical (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 18 — A threat of radiological bomb attacks at seven professional football stadiums was posted this week on an Internet site, but domestic security officials said Wednesday that they had no reason to place credibility in it.

The statement, which said the attacks would come Sunday, was specific enough to lead officials of the Homeland Security Department to notify the National Football League and the seven cities, a spokesman for the department, Russ Knocke, said.

The notification was made out of an “abundance of caution,” Mr. Knocke said, rather than because officials believed that the stadiums might actually be attacked.

“We strongly encourage the American public to continue to go about daily lives, including going to football games,” Mr. Knocke said. “At the same time, the public should continue to be vigilant and report any abnormal or suspicious activity to authorities.”

The Federal Bureau of Investigation said in a statement, “The credibility of the threat is questionable.”

The posting on an English-language Web site and under a title of “New Attack on America Be Afraid” appeared Monday. It said so-called dirty bombs would be detonated on Oct. 22 outside stadiums at professional football games in Atlanta; Cleveland; Houston; Miami; New York; Oakland, Calif.; and Seattle.

Skeptical Authorities Pass Along NFL Stadium ‘dirty Bomb' Threat (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0082982

WASHINGTON — The Homeland Security Department notified football stadium owners in seven cities Wednesday about a threat to set off radioactive bombs during upcoming games, but said it's highly likely that the claim is a hoax.

"We strongly encourage the public to go about their plans, including attending events that involve large public gatherings such as football games," department spokesman Russ Knocke said.

Homeland Security notified officials in New York, Miami, Atlanta, Seattle, Houston, Oakland and Cleveland that an English-language website called www.thefriendsociety.com had posted a warning on Oct. 12 about "dirty bombs," so-called because they contain radioactive charges. The site claimed that the bombs would be delivered by trucks to the mostly open-air stadiums and detonated Sunday.

Knocke said the department routinely distributes threat information so that state and local officials, companies and others "have the same information we do."

"The department views (the threat) with strong skepticism. … There is no credible intelligence to suggest such attacks."

Homeland Security did not change the threat level, now at yellow or "elevated" risk for terrorist attack, either nationally or for NFL football stadiums.

The threat level for airlines has been at orange, or "high" risk of attack, since Aug. 10, when London authorities exposed an alleged terrorist plot to blow up U.S.-bound planes.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko called the credibility of the threat "questionable" but said government officials passed it on because the information was public — in this case, posted on the Web.

NFL spokesman Greg Aiello noted that Homeland Security judged the threat "not credible." He said the league's stadiums are "very well-protected through the comprehensive security procedures we have in place, including pat-downs and bag searches."

In Miami, Dolphins spokesman George Torres said "safety is of paramount importance to us at every event."

Intelligence Plan Targets Training, Keeping Personnel (WP)

By Karen Deyoung And Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

U.S. intelligence efforts are hampered by inefficient methods for recruiting, training and assigning personnel, according to a new human resources plan that calls for a more "corporate" business model and increased cooperation within the 16-agency intelligence community.

Among the problems cited by the "Strategic Human Capital Plan" prepared for John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, is an inability to compete with the private sector for the "best and the brightest" workers in language, scientific and technological skills. Security-clearance restrictions have impeded hiring a diverse workforce, including noncitizens with critical expertise in other countries and cultures.

The plan is the latest step in Negroponte's effort to bring the disparate intelligence agencies under one umbrella. Investigations and inquiries have cited rivalry, differing standards and poor communication among agencies as a key factor in not preventing the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. The 2004 Intelligence Reform Act, which established Negroponte's office and addressed other recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission, calls for increased integration and an elimination of overlap.

Published internally in June as an unclassified document and released yesterday by the nongovernmental Federation of American Scientists' Secrecy News blog, the plan sets an outline for hiring, training and benefits policies and directs each agency to develop a plan to contribute to overall goals.

It calls for creating an "all source" workforce by setting overarching goals for numbers and quality and for "determining the optimum mix of military, civilian, contractor and other human resources," as well as creating a "cohesive" leadership culture.

Although intelligence agencies have been flooded with recruits the past five years -- the CIA received 140,000 rÃ©sumÃ©s in 2005 -- attracting and keeping people with "a deep understanding of other societies, their values, cultures, religions and languages" remains a priority, CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield said.

The plan cites a workforce imbalance created by the post-Sept. 11 influx of young recruits at a time when senior officials have been retiring and mid-level managers have been departing for better-paying or more interesting jobs. Nearly 40 percent of current CIA employees have been hired in the past five years, and up to 20 percent of the agency workforce will be eligible for retirement over the next five.

DOJ_NMG_0082983

Many new employees of intelligence agencies, particularly in critical areas of analysis and human intelligence, "are not seeking a 25-to-30-year career," the plan reports. Instead, like others at their age and experience level, "they see a future with multiple jobs and a variety of employers."

In addition, new employees "have far different styles of work, interaction, dress, leisure, even language" that portend "a potential 'culture clash' " with older supervisors and top level officials.

The plan recognizes the growing tendency of intelligence agencies to use contractors rather than their own personnel. This has been particularly true of the rapidly growing intelligence elements within the Defense Department, which spend up to 85 percent of the intelligence budget. More than two-thirds of the employees of the Pentagon's Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA), begun in 2002 to supervise force protection for Defense facilities at home and abroad, have been supplied under private contracts at costs considerably above government pay scales.

"Increasingly, the IC [intelligence community] finds itself in competition with its contractors for our own employees," the plan laments. For example, Lockheed Martin posted a job offer last month for an "Advanced Special Operations Officer" to provide administrative and operational support at Fort Bragg, N.C., on a part-time basis with a salary of $43,000 for a 90-day rotation.

The applicant must have current Department of Defense top-secret security clearance with "sensitive compartmented information" eligibility -- likely to be obtained only by working in a government intelligence agency.

Part of the reason for the turn to contractors, according to the plan, rests with budget ceilings that Congress or the White House Office of Management and Budget have placed on the agencies, as well as the past uncertainties of steady funding to support a permanent government workforce.

The study describes the irony that "those same contractors recruit our own employees, already cleared and trained at government expense and then 'lease' them back to us at considerably greater expense."

The situation has already led to an investigation by the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, and the plan discloses that the OMB has asked Negroponte's group to study contracting because it believes "inherently governmental" work is improperly being outsourced.

Negroponte's office is seeking to have its own level of staffing raised to allow more permanent hires, the plan says.

Personnel surveys disclosed in the plan indicated that intelligence workers are largely satisfied with the work they do but are unhappy with senior leaders and the manner in which promotions are handled.

Only 42 percent of those responding said their senior leaders generated high levels of motivation and commitment to the job. The lowest response came when 29 percent agreed with steps taken to deal with poor job performers and 54 percent believed creativity was rewarded.

Privacy Group Sues FBI For Database Info (WP/AP)

By Dan Caterinicchia, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A privacy-advocacy group has sued the U.S. government for information about an FBI database of more than 700 million personal records set up after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

The Electronic Frontier Foundation said it sued the Justice Department because the FBI failed to respond to Freedom of Information Act requests on its "Investigative Data Warehouse."

The lawsuit also charges the FBI has not posted a public notice describing the criteria on personal information included in the database, as required by the Privacy Act of 1974.

In its lawsuit, EFF cites the FBI's April 2004 report to the 9/11 Commission and subsequent remarks from agency executives that said the agency began developing the database after the terrorist attacks.

The 9/11 report said the database was first delivered in January 2004 and "contains all data that can legally be stored together... (providing) a single access point to several data sources that were previously available only through separate, stove-piped systems."

DOJ_NMG_0082984

The FBI has said the database provides FBI agents and analysts with "instant access to photographs, biographical information, physical location information, and financial data for thousands of known and suspected terrorists," according to a March 2005 speech by John E. Lewis, deputy assistant director of the counterterrorism division.

"Nearly 12,000 users can access it via the FBI's classified network from any FBI terminal throughout the globe," Mueller told the Senate Judiciary Committee earlier this year. "And, nearly 30 percent of the user accounts are provided to task force members from other local, state, and federal agencies."

In an op-ed piece in The New York Times last month, John Miller, assistant director of the FBI, wrote that IDW "can search more than 700 million records from more than a dozen agencies and match them against our own investigative records."

The San Francisco-based EFF, which recently opened a Washington office with two attorneys from the Electronic Privacy Information Center, filed the lawsuit Tuesday in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. The EFF said the FBI failed to meet deadlines for responding to the group's FOIA requests.

"On the one hand, the FBI has touted the creation of this database, but on the other hand, it hasn't complied with the legal requirements that apply to the creation of something like this," David Sobel, EFF's senior counsel in Washington, said Wednesday.

FBI spokesman Paul Bresson declined to comment on the lawsuit, but said IDW "simply unifies previously and lawfully acquired data from other established databases into one place."

"It should also be noted that even though the E-Government Act does not require IDW to undergo privacy impact analysis, FBI policy does require it," Bresson wrote in an e-mail. "As a result we have conducted several privacy impact assessments at different times as new data sets are added."

Earlier this month, EFF sued the Justice Department for records concerning electronic-surveillance tools including one that appeared to be a successor to the FBI's abandoned Carnivore program.

The FBI developed Carnivore to read e-mails and other online communications among suspected criminals, terrorists and spies, but privacy groups and lawmakers complained it could collect much more than allowed by a warrant.

2nd Circuit Upholds Verdicts In Multibillion-Dollar World Trade Center Insurance Dispute (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 19, 2006

World Trade Center leaseholder Larry Silverstein's attempt to win at least $2 billion more from insurers on the theory that the two airplane attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, were two separate occurrences was rebuffed Wednesday.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a Southern District of New York jury verdict that the bulk of insurance policies covering the Trade Center treated the terror attacks as a single occurrence.

However, the court also upheld a victory awarded Silverstein by the jury in the second phase of trial, agreeing that temporary insurance policies in effect when terrorists leveled the buildings required treatment of the attack as two occurrences. That ruling meant that nine insurance companies will have to pay double the roughly $1 billion in coverage under their policies.

Judges John M. Walker Jr., Jose Cabranes and Rosemary Pooler decided the appeals in SR International Business Insurance Co. v. World Trade Center Properties, lead docket 04-4500-cv. Walker wrote the opinion of the panel.

The ruling is likely the final resolution of a massive insurance dispute that began shortly after the terror attacks. Silverstein originally sought more than $7 billion. He has been awarded about $4.5 billion.

Silverstein had agreed on a 99-year lease for the World Trade Center buildings in the spring of 2001, and spent the summer negotiating a multilayer insurance program that provided for $3.54 billion in coverage on a "per occurrence" basis.

But for all but one of the insurers, final insurance contracts had not been signed when the hijackers steered two planes into the North and South towers at 8:48 and 9:03 on the morning of Sept. 11.

The litigation began when one insurance company filed suit seeking a declaratory judgment in the Southern District on its obligations under the still-to-be-completed insurance policies.

DOJ_NMG_0082985

Silverstein filed counterclaims seeking to double the $3.54 billion to over $7 billion, setting up one of the largest, and certainly the most emotional, insurance fights in history.

Southern District Judge John Martin held that three insurers were governed by the so-called "WilProp" form -- the form Silverstein's insurance broker used during negotiations. The form treated the destruction by two planes as one occurrence.

Judge Martin also denied summary judgment to Silverstein on his claim that the undefined term "occurrence" in the policy of Travelers Indemnity Co., one of the companies with the most at stake in the litigation, meant that, as a matter of law, the attacks were two occurrences.

The 2nd Circuit affirmed Judge Martin. Due to Martin's retirement from the bench, the case was reassigned to Chief Judge Michael Mukasey, who proceeded to hold a two-phase trial.

NO EVIDENTIARY ERRORS

In the first phase, a jury found that nine of 12 participating insurers and 20 Lloyd's of London syndicates were bound by the WilProp form -- leaving Silverstein with only a single-occurrence recovery.

But three insurers were found not to be governed by the form and they were joined in the second phase of the trial by six insurers who conceded the same. The jury in the second phase found that all nine insurers were subject to payments on a two-occurrence basis.

Wednesday, the circuit rejected Silverstein's arguments on phase one, and did the same for the losing insurers arguments in phase two. Both sides had argued that they should have prevailed as a matter of law and the issues never should have reached a jury.

The circuit also disagreed with both sides' claims that the verdicts were marred by evidentiary errors and flawed jury instructions.

"Not surprisingly, however, neither side admits that any errors contributed to the judgments in their favor," Walker wrote. "As a result, we are led to believe that the same type of error that would require us to set aside one set of judgments are unfounded when it comes to the other set of judgments -- and vice versa."

On Silverstein's claim that the issue never should have reached a jury, Judge Walker said, "The Silverstein parties ignore unfavorable evidence and rely on inferences that the jury was not required to make."

Of the nine insurers who lost the second phase of the trial, eight appealed. One settled with Silverstein.

The circuit rejected their claims that expert testimony as to custom and usage in the insurance industry should not have been allowed and that evidence of custom and usage in the industry was insufficient to send the matter to the jury.

"We conclude that the Silverstein Parties brought forth evidence sufficient to establish an industry custom that insurers utilize a narrow definition of 'occurrence' in their industry forms," Judge Walker said.

Similarly, the circuit found Silverstein had produced enough evidence of intent by the negotiating parties to show that the two plane attacks amounted to two occurrences.

Barry Ostrager of Simpson Thacher & Bartlett represented SR International Business Insurance in the first phase of the trial and acted as lead counsel in the litigation because the company had a lead role in the coverage, more than 25 percent. A Silverstein victory would have doubled the approximately $975 million SR was obligated to pay.

"Judge Musakey did a masterful job handling two hotly contested trials -- these were emotionally charged trials that took place just blocks from the World Trade Center," Ostrager said.

Ostrager said he did not believe there were any constitutional issues that would give rise to an appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"Honestly I don't think there is any enormous surprise here -- I don't think the Silverstein parties are going to be shocked that the jury verdict on behalf of Swiss Re was affirmed," he said.

Silverstein said in a statement Wednesday that he was "gratified" that the circuit upheld the jury's finding that the attacks "were two events for the purposes of determining how much the insurers have to pay."

He continued, "Over the past five years, the World Trade Center insurers have engaged in an all-out campaign to shirk their legal and moral obligation to honor their policies and help finance the rebuilding of the World Trade Center. All the money owed by the insurers is needed and has been committed to the rebuilding ... The court has spoken yet again, and the time has come for all of the insurers to finally pay what they owe."

DOJ_NMG_0082986

Silverstein was represented by Herbert M. Wachtell of Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz.

Flood Risk Doesn't Stop Rebuilders (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, October 19, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — Nearly three-fourths of New Orleans homeowners applying for federal grants say they'll rebuild their Katrina-damaged homes in flood areas even though city restrictions are unlikely to prevent their houses from being wiped out if the levees fail again.

The restrictions, which say that the city's homes must be raised at least 3 feet to avoid flooding, have come under fire from some local officials and government watchdog groups. They say 3 feet of elevation is not needed in areas that did not flood after Hurricane Katrina, and 3 feet is too low in areas that saw 20 feet of water.

Even the Federal Emergency Management Agency says thousands of houses could flood again if they are rebuilt under the new rules. “If there is another catastrophic event, flooding will occur,” says Doug Bellomo, a deputy director of risk analysis at FEMA.

The Louisiana Recovery Authority, which controls billions in federal relief money, expects about 53,000 New Orleans homeowners to apply for federal grants. The grants provide up to $150,000 for uninsured losses, and residents can use the money to rebuild or relocate.

So far, 14,534 New Orleanians have applied for grants; about 10,634 have said they want to rebuild where they were.

“The taxpayers are going to be subsidizing unwise construction,” says Robert Hunter, director of insurance for the Consumer Federation of America. About $7.5 billion is available to homeowners.

The New Orleans City Council adopted the 3-foot rule on Sept. 1 to avoid losing millions in federal grants. The recovery authority has said parishes that don't adopt the rules will be excluded from receiving some of the relief money.

St. Bernard Parish, where all but 50 homes flooded, is considering rejecting the rules. “Our goal is not to adopt them,” says St. Bernard Councilman Craig Taffaro. “We don't agree with the science.”

Paul Rainwater of the recovery authority says the rules are “not perfect,” but will help residents get much-needed flood insurance.

South Spent Millions On A Hurricane Season That Wasn't (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

MIAMI -- Anticipation of the 2006 hurricane season turned countless families here and in a vast swath of the Southeast into survivalists.

Households stockpiled ready-to-eat meals. They scarfed up emergency radios, propane stoves, satellite phones, shutters, candles, canned goods. Hordes plunked down $500 and up for home generators.

The predictions of another scary storm season and the memory of last year's record-setting disasters inspired fear and a spending spree of hundreds of millions of dollars.

"The main uncertainty in the outlook is not whether the season will be above normal, but how much above normal it will be," National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration forecasters announced in May. That forecast called for eight to 10 hurricanes and noted that the year might be "hyperactive."

Now comes a humbling moment for prognosticators: Those predictions were wrong.

Although the season doesn't end officially until Nov. 30, the peak time has passed, and meteorologists concede that its totals will almost certainly fall far short of the dire predictions issued as the summer began. In fact, the year's storm totals probably will not even reach the averages of the past 10 years.

"I think everyone agreed it was going to be an active season, but we were all wrong," said Philip Klotzbach, co-author of well-known predictions issued by a Colorado State University team.

DOJ_NMG_0082987

He began a recent presentation with a rueful quotation from 19th-century mathematician Francois Arago: "Never, no matter what may be the progress of science, will honest scientific men who have regard for their reputations venture to predict the weather."

"Anyone who makes forecasts about the weather gets picked on all the time," Klotzbach said. "There's an art to it."

The NOAA forecast at the beginning of the season called for eight to 10 hurricanes, but so far there have been five. It said there would be four to six "major" hurricanes -- that is, Category 3, 4, or 5 strength -- but so far there have been only two.

The forecast from the Colorado State team was in general agreement with NOAA's predictions. But it went further and offered that there was a 95 percent chance of a hurricane making landfall in the United States.

None did, however, making the year seem especially quiet in the portion of the country known as Hurricane Alley.

What has accounted for the mild season, according to forecasters, is the unexpected onset of El NiÃ±o, which stifled storm development, as it has in previous years. Also, the steering currents over the Atlantic tended to keep Atlantic storms from making landfall, curving them northward and back out to sea.

The relatively calm season stands in marked contrast to the nervousness it inspired at the outset, when concerns about the dangers of Atlantic hurricanes seemed to have reached a historic climax.

The 2005 season had been the busiest recorded, and some scientists had begun to regard heightened hurricane activity as a sign that Earth's climate is out of whack, a symptom of global warming.

Then, at the start of the season, forecasters issued the alarmingly specific predictions that more danger lay ahead. The seasonal forecasts are based on ocean temperatures and atmospheric conditions.

"If you think the 2006 hurricane season cannot be any worse than last year," National Hurricane Center Director Max Mayfield said at a hurricane conference, "I'm here to tell you otherwise."

As a result, many who had once scoffed at hurricane warnings and parodied the batten-down-the-hatches urgency of television forecasters now allowed that this season, they were preparing to hunker down if necessary.

Foil-wrapped ready-to-eat meals flew off the shelves at sporting goods stores. So did gas stoves and solar showers and battery-operated fans.

Help Jet, a West Palm Beach company, offered $500 memberships to Floridians who wanted to guarantee a seat on a private flight out of harm's way in the event of an approaching hurricane. As last year's troublesome evacuations showed, leaving is difficult when everyone else is on the road, too.

"It was something we'd never seen before," said Julie Abreu, a buyer for Jet's Florida Outdoors, a Miami sporting goods store, where purchases of hurricane-related items doubled. "It was busy the whole year."

During a 12-day period in May, when the state of Florida allowed hurricane preparation items to be bought tax-free, an estimated $550 million worth were purchased, according to state figures. The total hurricane spending in the state was probably much higher, however, because those estimates did not include items such as plywood, which were not part of the tax-free program.

"In this period of increased tropical activity, it is vital for all Floridians to prepare," Gov. Jeb Bush (R) advised constituents. Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour (R) likewise initiated an eight-week hurricane awareness program.

Among those swept up in the meteorological tension was a neighborhood in Hollywood, Fla., where more than a dozen households banded together to negotiate a discount on large generators costing $15,000 to $20,000.

Some, like Victor DeBianchi, spent more than $50,000 getting ready. In addition to his home generator, he bought hurricane shutters and impact-resistant glass for his home.

"What better way to ensure that nothing would happen?" DeBianchi, a probate lawyer, asked wryly. "I really did think there would be something this year. But I'm glad I did it. It's peace of mind."

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Violence, 'No Child' Occupy Bush (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher And Peter Baker

DOJ_NMG_0082988

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

GREENSBORO, N.C., Oct. 18 -- President Bush said Wednesday that the current surge of violence in Iraq "could be" comparable to the Tet Offensive during the Vietnam War, a succession of battles that became a milestone because it helped turn the American public against the conflict and its political leadership.

Bush has strongly resisted comparisons between Iraq and Vietnam, but with U.S. casualties continuing to mount, he agreed to an interviewer's analogy and said he detected a spike in attacks timed to the congressional elections in three weeks with the goal of forcing the United States to lose its will.

"My gut tells me that they have all along been trying to inflict enough damage that we'd leave," Bush said in an interview with George Stephanopoulos of ABC News. "And the leaders of al-Qaeda have made that very clear. They believe that if they can create enough chaos, the American people will grow sick and tired of the Iraqi effort and will cause [the] government to withdraw."

Stephanopoulos asked Bush whether he agreed with New York Times columnist Thomas L. Friedman, who wrote that the real "October surprise" of this campaign season is what "seems like the jihadist equivalent of the Tet offensive." Bush nodded. "He could be right," the president replied. "There's certainly a stepped-up level of violence, and we're heading into an election."

The Tet Offensive was a rolling series of operations by the Viet Cong against U.S. and South Vietnamese forces beginning at the Vietnamese new year in January 1968. Historians consider Tet a military defeat for the Viet Cong because it lost so many men and captured no significant objectives. But it was also a powerful propaganda victory for the Viet Cong, because it brought the bloody war home to many Americans watching television. With support for the war eroding, President Lyndon B. Johnson abandoned his reelection campaign two months later.

Bush's interview with ABC came as he visited North Carolina to highlight his education program. The president visited a fast-improving elementary school to make a pitch for expansion of the No Child Left Behind law when it comes before Congress for reauthorization next year.

Bush said the law should include vouchers for low-income students to attend private or parochial schools while offering salary incentives for teachers whose students show sharp improvement on standardized tests or who work in tough schools. He also wants the law's requirements for annual standardized testing, which currently apply to most elementary and middle school students, extended to high schools.

"The reauthorization of this important bill is going to be a top priority of mine," Bush said. "And it's not only just the reauthorization, it's the strengthening of the bill and not the weakening of the bill."

The changes sought by Bush are certain to face stiff opposition in Congress, where many Democrats contend that Bush has not provided enough funding to implement the measure. When the law was enacted in 2001, he was forced to drop his call for vouchers in the face of Democratic opposition.

In a speech at Waldo C. Falkener Elementary School, Bush said the law is spurring educational improvements here and elsewhere. The percentage of third-graders reading at grade level at Falkener has increased to 76 percent from 46 percent three years ago.

Bush said the law's requirement for annual testing of students in grades three through eight and its provisions for publicly funded tutoring for struggling students are helping to close the achievement gap separating many white and Asian students from many blacks and Hispanics.

"The gap is closing, and that's incredibly important for the United States of America to see that achievement gap close," Bush said. "How do we know? Because we're measuring."

After his speech, Bush visited the Victory Junction Gang Camp for children with life-threatening illnesses. NASCAR driver Kyle Petty and his wife, Pattie, founded the camp in memory of their son Adam. The day ended with a dinner at the Greensboro home of businessman Louis DeJoy, chairman of New Breed Logistics Inc. The event was expected to raise $900,000 for the Republican National Committee.

Baker reported from Washington.

Eyeing The Exits From Iraq (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0082989

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

AMERICAN PATIENCE WITH THE WAR in Iraq is wearing thin. It's no longer just liberal blue-staters fed up with the Bush administration's foreign policy, or Republican members of Congress annoyed at this albatross during campaign season. The administration itself seems to be growing impatient with the situation in Iraq — especially the unwillingness or inability of the government in Baghdad to put an end to sectarian violence.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki was worried enough to call the White House on Monday to check on his job security. According to presidential spokesman Tony Snow, the Iraqi leader wanted to know whether there was any truth to the rumor that he would be replaced soon if things didn't turn around. President Bush reportedly offered his support. A word of caution to Maliki: If Bush told you you're doing "a heck of a job," you should be worried.

Whatever was said, Bush's tone must have made an impression. On Tuesday, Maliki's government dismissed the two most senior police commanders from their posts. It's well known that members of the police forces moonlight as Shiite death squads fomenting much of the ethnic strife in Iraq. The purge of the leadership is a welcome step, but only one of many that must be taken by the Iraqis to prevent full-blown civil war.

Yet the situation is fraught because the United States is only one of Maliki's overseers. To survive politically, he also needs to keep Muqtada Sadr happy. This is no easy balancing act. Sadr is the anti-American cleric who controls a faction of Shiite parliamentarians that backs Maliki, as well as the Al Mahdi army. Civil war is all but inevitable if such private armies are allowed to flourish. Tensions between Baghdad and Washington over Sadr were on full display Wednesday, after U.S. forces grudgingly released one of his senior aides at the government's request.

The episode will only feed U.S. commanders' exasperation at getting involved in what looks increasingly like a civil war. The cost to Americans of getting caught in the middle is getting painfully higher, after troops were redeployed to become more directly involved in the effort to stem the flow of violence. On Wednesday, the Pentagon announced that 11 U.S. troops had been killed this week, bringing the month's toll so far to 70.

Historian and Times columnist Niall Ferguson, though no fan of the decision to invade Iraq, has observed that this country's most successful occupations have been its longest, in Germany and Japan. But Maliki is right to be worried. Unless things start changing, even the staunchest neocons in Washington are going to start looking for the exits.

Burns: Bush Has Plan To Win War In Iraq (AP-Y)

By Matt Gouras

AP, October 19, 2006

Sen. Conrad Burns says he believes President Bush has a plan to win the war in Iraq but is keeping it quiet, a statement Democrats pounced on Wednesday as reminiscent of comments made during another divisive war.

Burns, at a debate Tuesday night with Democratic challenger Jon Tester, said he believes Bush has a plan to win — but added: "we're not going to tell you what our plan is."

Burns, who has said repeatedly the country must stay in Iraq as long as it takes to win the war, also seemed to suggest a new path may be needed in Iraq. He pointed to fellow Republican Sen. John Warner of Virginia, who has recently called for a new strategy in Iraq.

"We have to change our tactics with the enemy and how it changes its tactics," said Burns, a member of the Senate Appropriations defense subcommittee. "And in some cases, we have not been able to do that. I agree with Senator Warner and his assessment. If we don't change, we will pay a heavier price. But we cannot lose it."

Democrats likened Burns' comments to statements by President Nixon that led to news reports that he had a "secret plan" to end or win the war in Vietnam. Like Nixon, Burns never used the word "secret" but made it clear it wasn't in the president's or the country's interest to discuss any plans he has for winning the war.

Matt McKenna, a Tester campaign spokesman, said Burns' comments were eerily similar to Nixon's.

"I think the comparison is two politicians who put their own ambitions above the safety and success of the troops," McKenna said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0082990

In a tense exchange with Tester, who is ahead in recent polls, Burns hammered the Democratic challenger for his call on the president to develop a plan for withdrawing troops from Iraq.

"He wants everyone to know our plan. That's not smart," Burns said.

"He said our president (doesn't) have a plan. I think he's got one, but he's not going to tell everybody in the world," Burns added. "If you want to go out and spar for a fight, are you going to tell your enemy what your plan is? I don't think so."

Burns later said: "There is a plan. We're not going to tell you, Jon."

McKenna said the comments were those of a senator behind in recent polls who wants to keep his job.

"Nobody actually believes that he (Burns) has a plan, or even a seat at the table where plans are made," McKenna said.

Burn's spokesman, Jason Klindt, said the senator is adamant that details of a plan to win should not be released, including any deadline for troop withdrawal.

He said he doesn't know if Burns knows any specifics of a Bush administration plan to win the war in Iraq.

"I think he knows the general strategy," Klindt said.

Burns' Remark Draws Comparison To Nixon (USAT)

By John Bacon And Sarah Elkins

USA Today, October 19, 2006

Montana Democrats on Wednesday blasted GOP Sen. Conrad Burns for saying in Tuesday's debate that he believes President Bush has a plan to win the war in Iraq but is keeping it quiet.

“We're not going to tell you what our plan is,” Burns told Democrat Jon Tester. Matt McKenna, a Tester spokesman, likened Burns' comments to statements by President Nixon that led to rumors of a “secret plan” to end or win the war in Vietnam. “The comparison is two politicians who put their own ambitions above the safety and success of the troops,” McKenna said.

Burns' spokesman Jason Klindt said Burns is adamant that details of a plan to win should not be released. Klindt said he doesn't know if Burns knows any specifics of a plan, but added, “I think he knows the general strategy.”

A recent Montana State University-Billings poll released Wednesday showed Tester leading Burns 46%-35%, with 14% undecided.

‘Affordability agenda' in Vt. draws fire

Vermont gubernatorial hopeful Scudder Parker dismissed Republican Gov. Jim Douglas' self-described “affordability agenda,” calling it “an agenda of electability.” Douglas has said he is dedicated to reducing the costs of higher education, health care, property taxes and housing.

Parker cited the Vermont Housing and Conservation Board, saying state residents have “the Legislature, not Jim Douglas, to thank for funding the program that makes housing more affordable for Vermonters.” Douglas' campaign said he supported the funding by signing the budgets that contained them.

Defeated Tenn. candidate backs GOP foe

All apparently is forgiven between two Republicans who battled it out for the Senate nomination in Tennessee. Former congressman Ed Bryant, whose campaign called Bob Corker the “king of lies” and a fraud, is featured in a new TV ad endorsing Corker, the nominee.

“Bob Corker and I had a bit of a spirited primary for the United States Senate, but you know, there wasn't a day I didn't respect Bob,” Bryant says in the ad airing statewide. Michael Powell, adviser to Rep. Harold Ford, the Democratic candidate, said, “The only thing we are left to ask is, when was Bob Corker's new spokesman lying about Bob Corker's character — in the primary ads he paid for, or the one Bob Corker is paying for?”

McCain: More Troops Needed In Iraq (AP)

By Mike Glover

AP, October 19, 2006

McCain says more troops needed to quell 'classic insurgency'

DES MOINES, Iowa - Arizona Sen. John McCain on Wednesday said more combat troops are needed in Iraq to quell a "classic insurgency," and he rejected calls to reduce U.S. troop levels in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0082991

"A lot of mistakes have been made in Iraq and they've been well documented," McCain told reporters. "That doesn't change the fact that, in my view, we cannot fail."

McCain spoke before a luncheon fundraiser at which he raised $40,000 for Republican congressional candidate Jeff Lamberti, who is challenging Democratic U.S. Rep. Leonard Boswell in central Iowa's 3rd District.

At his news conference, McCain conceded that his argument for sending more troops to Iraq runs counter to what many other politicians are saying.

"My view, which is clearly a minority view, has been for a long period of time that we need more troops on the ground," said McCain. "I don't think it's a civil war, but the level of sectarian violence is too high, it's way too high and it has to be reduced."

McCain argued that the only way to lower the level of violence is to boost the American military presence.

"We need to put down what is now a classic insurgency," he said. "If we set a date for withdrawal, it would have consequences that would mean the situation would quickly deteriorate into a chaotic one and chaos would spread to the region."

In addition to raising money, McCain also planned to tour an ethanol plant with Lamberti in the central portion of the state as he tested the waters for a run at the Republican presidential nomination.

His views on ethanol have shifted slightly as he begins to focus on Iowa's leadoff precinct caucuses, which launch the presidential nominating season.

"I think ethanol is a very important part of our effort to reduce our dependence on foreign oil," said McCain.

When the price of oil soared past $40 a barrel, ethanol began to make financial sense and McCain said he favored encouraging the industry _ within limits.

"I do not support subsidies for ethanol," said McCain. "I think they can stand on their own feet."

Democrats quickly seized on the issue, noting votes Lamberti had made opposing requirements that ethanol be added to gasoline.

"The McCain-Lamberti event is an election year stunt that does nothing but underscore Lamberti's checkered past when it comes to ethanol," said Boswell spokesman Mark Daley.

McCain sought the Republican nomination in the 2000 election cycle, but he skipped the Iowa caucuses to focus on New Hampshire's leadoff primary. That won't be the case should he decide to again seek the nomination, McCain said.

"When I ran last time I was the outsider and we had a very limited amount of funds and staff, and we had to focus our efforts on New Hampshire," said McCain. "The Iowa caucuses are a vital aspect of the election process."

McCain said he will make a decision about seeking the nomination early next year.

'Dramatic Change Of Direction' Coming For Iraq (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

The escalating violence raking Baghdad and other Iraqi cities is pushing that nation's leaders, neighboring Arab countries and U.S. advisers to consider a dramatic change of direction in the conduct of the war.

Leaks from a U.S. task force headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III are contributing to the widespread sense that the Bush administration is preparing for a "course correction" in the coming months.

The options cited most frequently in Washington include the partition of Iraq into three ethnic - or faith-based regions, and a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops, with some remaining in neighboring countries to deal with major threats.

Another scenario is being discussed -- and taken seriously in Iraq -- by many of Iraq's leading political players, under which the U.S.-trained army would overthrow struggling Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and replace him with a strongman who would restore order while Washington looks the other way.

Falah Hassan al-Naqib, a Sunni politician who served as minister of the interior in the interim government led by Iyad Allawi until last year, told The Washington Times he has met repeatedly with American and Iraqi generals to discuss alternative courses of action.

"All of them have a 'Plan B,' because if the situation continues as it is, they will have to defend themselves -- not just find bodies all over," Mr. al-Naqib said this summer at his house in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0082992

Mayhem has continued in Baghdad despite a U.S. decision to redeploy some 8,000 U.S. troops into the capital over the summer. Officials yesterday reported the deaths of 10 American troops across the country, putting October on track to be the deadliest month in almost two years.

On Monday, The Washington Times reported that Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, was "more sober" and "more concerned" about the ability of the Iraqi security forces when he privately briefed senior military and civilian leaders in Washington last week. Defense sources said he had appeared more upbeat over the winter about the Iraqi security force's progress.

The sources said, however, Gen. Casey was not pessimistic and still thinks the U.S. will win in Iraq. Gen. Casey's spokesman said the general thinks the Iraqi security forces have made great progress and are on track to take over more counterinsurgency missions.

Others in the Bush administration have contributed to the sense that the al-Maliki government has been put on a short leash, with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice saying on a trip to the region Oct. 6 that Iraqi leaders "don't have time for endless debates on these issues. ... They have really got to move forward."

Days before that, Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, said on CNN that the Iraqi government, "in the course of the next two months, has to make progress in terms of containing sectarian violence."

Similarly, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, told reporters after a trip to Baghdad this month that Congress will have to make "bold decisions" if the Iraqi government does not bring the sectarian killings under control.

Even Mr. Baker, whose bipartisan commission is expected to hand its recommendations to the Bush administration after the congressional elections, said on ABC's "This Week" that "I happen to think, and I think it's fair to say our commission believes, that there are alternatives between the stated alternatives ... of stay the course and cut and run."

President Bush reassured Mr. al-Maliki in a telephone call on Monday that there was no deadline hanging over his administration, but that has done little to quell the speculation.

The most talked-about scenarios for a "Plan B" include:

•Phased withdrawal: Under this plan, U.S. troops would be gradually withdrawn over a period of months and a reserve force would be redeployed elsewhere in the region.

"Our troops have become the primary target of the insurgency," argued Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, who laid out a plan for an immediate withdrawal in November. "They are united against U.S. forces and we have become a catalyst for violence. ... I believe with a U.S. troop redeployment, the Iraqi security forces will be incentivized to take control."

He proposed the creation of a "quick reaction force" and an "over-the-horizon presence" of Marines in the region to deal with urgent problems such as signs that al Qaeda was gaining control of an area.

Similar arguments have been made by Richard A. Clarke, who provided national security advice to the last four presidents, and Edward N. Luttwak, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

CBS reporter David Martin recently quoted a source in the Baker commission saying the group may recommend a scheme under which 5 percent of U.S. troops are withdrawn from Iraq every two months.

Opponents of the plan -- including most Iraqis -- argue that without a strong U.S. troop presence, the country would quickly fall into a vicious civil war and terrorists would be able to establish safe havens from which to harass neighboring U.S. allies.

•Partition: Under this plan, notably advocated by Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, Iraq would be divided into Sunni, Shi'ite and Kurdish regions, each enjoying a high degree of autonomy.

A viable central government would remain responsible for border defense, foreign policy, oil production and revenues under the scheme worked out by Mr. Biden and Leslie H. Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations.

While acknowledging that decentralization would not immediately end the problem of murderous militias affiliated with the various political parties, Mr. Biden argued in a May 1 speech in Philadelphia that this was the best way to begin rolling them back. "The regions can become magnets for the militia, integrating them into local forces, and eventually into the national force."

This solution would win quick acceptance from the Kurds, who already enjoy a high degree of autonomy in their oil-rich northern region and have little interest in what happens in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0082993

Many Shi'ites -- who control the southern oil fields -- would also welcome the arrangement, and this month pushed through a new law opening the door to the establishment of an autonomous region in the south.

The Sunnis, stuck in the middle of the country with no oil and few other resources, could be brought along with a constitutional amendment guaranteeing them 20 percent of all present and future oil revenues, argued Mr. Biden, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

"That's ... far more than they'd get otherwise, since the oil is in the north and south, not the Sunni center."

Mr. Baker, however, has already expressed skepticism about the idea, noting that there is no easy way to divide up Baghdad and other major population centers like Kirkuk, where ethnic and religious groupings are closely intermingled.

There are also fears that an autonomous Shi'ite region would quickly fall into the orbit of Iran, while the Sunni region would be ungovernable, offering a safe haven for al Qaeda and related terrorist groups to mount attacks on U.S. allies like Saudi Arabia and Jordan.

•Coup in Baghdad: While given little credence in Washington, this scenario is being widely talked about in Iraq and in neighboring countries, both on the streets and among senior political and military officials.

According to the scenario, the new U.S.-trained army, along with elements of Saddam Hussein's Ba'athist-led army, would stage a coup to oust the al-Maliki government and replace it with one led by a more effective figure -- by most accounts Mr. Allawi.

One Iraqi Sunni living in Dubai, who is in close contact with Sunni generals in exile in both the United Arab Emirates and Saudi Arabia, said those generals have been discussing such a "Plan B" with secular Shi'ites and U.S. officials for months.

These officers reportedly are convinced that Miss Rice has been discussing such ideas during a series of visits to Saudi Arabia over the past eight months.

Mr. Allawi, a secular Shi'ite who led the government before the 2005 legislative elections, is known as a strong man with backing from both secular Shi'ites and Sunnis tired of the sectarian killings. The politician also is liked by U.S. intelligence agencies, which were disappointed that his party was unable to win more seats in the parliamentary elections.

"The army scenario is not a bad scenario for the United States," said Robert Killebrew, a retired Army infantry colonel and national security analyst who predicted civil war in Iraq more than a year ago. "U.S. policy issues in the Middle East and Iraq do not require a democratic Iraq, it only requires a stable and friendly Iraq," he said.

Under this scenario, the Dubai-based Sunni source said, the army would gradually bring back elements of Saddam's former army, removing a major grievance that is driving the insurgency.

"The insurgency will come under control as most of them are concerned with keeping Iraq as one country. This is the most important for them and for the surrounding Arab countries," said the former officer.

According to most coup talk, the United States would publicly condemn the move but support the new government after a decent interval.

"My preference would be that there would be a certain amount of sanctimonious hand-wringing and saying that we don't agree with the overthrow of a democratically elected government," said Mr. Killebrew. "But we will continue to support the Iraqis in their fight against the insurgency, which would be de facto support."

Our Strategy Is Not Static (USAT)

By Mark Kimmitt

USA Today, October 19, 2006

Most militaries know that success in war argues against an inflexible approach to strategy and tactics. Militaries that remain foolishly consistent and unable to react to an evolving tactical environment are likely to fail. The enemy we face in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere in the war on terrorism is a thinking enemy, and a thinking enemy will always seek to find an operational advantage, a seam in our defenses, or a weakness in our plan and tactics.

That is not happening. Since the beginning of combat operations in Iraq in March 2003, coalition forces have continuously adapted to a changing environment, not only to respond and react to a thinking enemy, but to also develop better tactics to defeat the enemy's own seams, weaknesses and disadvantages.

DOJ_NMG_0082994

Some have gone so far as to suggest that our forces are simply reacting to the evolving tactics of the enemy. Quite the opposite; operations in Iraq are developed from a position of advantage and superiority and do not cede initiative, nor innovation, to the enemy.

We are empowering Iraqi security forces to take on more and more of the security responsibilities, and helping to strengthen Iraq's unity government. The permanent, democratically elected government has been in place for fewer than 150 days, while most of the Iraqi battalions in the field today have existed for fewer than two years.

The idea that coalition forces have pursued a static tactical policy in Iraq is a myth and a disservice to our innovative, creative and adaptable troops. Our troops know that the fight in 2006 is far different from the fight in 2003, and they know the importance of changing their tactics correspondingly. They know that victory in the field goes to the best trained, the best equipped and the smartest force, and the high price to be paid if they do not adapt and prevail. They know that, tactically, staying the course is the wrong way to defeat an enemy, but they also recognize that consistency in strategic guidance, combined with patience and persistence to see the job through, is the right way to win.

U.S. Toll Soars As Fight For City Rages (USAT)

By Rick Jervis And Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, October 19, 2006

CAMP TAJI, Iraq — A U.S. and Iraqi offensive to wrest control of Baghdad from insurgents and sectarian death squads is producing some of the most intense fighting of the war and a spike in American deaths.

The U.S. command reported Wednesday that 10 American troops had been killed the day before in Iraq, making it one of the deadliest days for U.S. forces this year. Another soldier was killed Wednesday, bringing the death toll this month to 70.

At least a third of the recent fatalities happened in Baghdad. At the current pace, October would be the deadliest month since November 2004 when 137 troops died.

Much of the violence in the capital is religious warfare, putting U.S. forces in a sensitive position between warring factions.

“It's been a tough month,” said Col. James Pasquarette, a brigade commander headquartered at this base about 12 miles north of Baghdad. “We haven't had this sectarian issue in the past. It's more intense than in past years.”

Sectarian death squads don't typically target U.S. convoys, said Maj. Brandon Newton, with the 7th Squadron, 10th Calvary Regiment near Baghdad.

But U.S. patrols are dispatched to intervene between warring sects, sometimes parking themselves at night between Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods and exposing their patrols to roadside bombs, he said.

“We're fighting some bad people,” he said.

After going five months without a death, the squadron lost eight soldiers this month, said Lt. Col. David Thompson, the squadron's commander.

Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, a spokesman for coalition troops in Baghdad, said U.S. and Iraqi forces are aggressively clearing areas of the city.

“We're very successful right now, and the enemy is pushing back,” Withington said.

About 15,000 coalition troops and 45,000 Iraqi police and soldiers are engaged in the Baghdad fight.

Some of the increased violence in Baghdad and other parts of Iraq is related to the holy month of Ramadan, when religious fervor is high.

The U.S. military said attacks this year have increased 20% during the holy month compared with the weeks leading up to Ramadan. Ramadan ends this weekend.

In a continuing effort to find a political solution to the religious warfare, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki consulted Wednesday with Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, an influential Shiite spiritual leader, and Muqtada al-Sadr, an anti-American Shiite cleric, the Associated Press reported.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said the spike in deaths would not make President Bush reconsider his options in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0082995

"His strategy is to win. The president understands not only the difficulty of it, but he grieves for the people who have served with valor," Snow said.

Soldiers at a forward operating base north of Baghdad said the deaths are a sobering reminder of the dangers that loom for them outside the razor-wire confines of their base.

"It hurts. It hurts deeply," said Staff Sgt. John Calhoun, 41.

"We're the only family we all have out here. And when we lose our brothers, it hurts."

Provincial Intelligence Director Among Latest Iraqi Deaths (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi And Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

BAGHDAD — At least 10 U.S. troops were killed in five combat episodes during a 24-hour period ending Tuesday, the U.S. military announced today.

The latest casualties bring to 69 the number of U.S. military personnel killed in October, according to icasualties.org, a website that tracks deaths in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

At least seven Iraqis were killed and 30 were injured today in attacks targeting U.S. and Iraqi security forces and sectarian gang killings targeting civilians.

A roadside bomb killed the director of intelligence for the Amara province in southern Iraq. Four of his guards were also killed.

Tribal elders and political leaders also attempted to cool tempers at a summit in the Salahuddin province, near the city of Balad, the site in recent days of one of the country's worst outbreaks of sectarian violence.

The latest deaths put October on track to be the deadliest for U.S. troops in Iraq since November 2004, when Marines stormed the insurgent-controlled city of Fallouja in a weeks-long ground offensive. The current month coincides with the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which has been a time of sharp increases in attacks in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003.

"We expected the attacks to rise during Ramadan," said Lt.. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a spokesman for the U.S. military.

Six of the U.S. soldiers died in three separate roadside bomb and small-arms attacks around Baghdad. Another three, attached to the 3rd Brigade of the Army's 4th Infantry Division, were killed as a result of unspecified enemy action in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad. A fourth soldier was wounded in the incident.

A Marine assigned to Regimental Combat Team 7 died in a hostile fire incident in Al Anbar province, the Sunni Arab insurgent stronghold west of the capital.

The trial of Saddam Hussein and his co-defendants on charges of committing genocide against Iraq's Kurdish population in the late 1980s resumed today despite the continued absence of defense attorneys boycotting the trial. An unidentified Kurdish victim recounted a tale of his escape from the firing squad.

Trapped on a truck, listening to the gunshots and screams of other victims, the witness and others plotted to overtake the guards, with the strongest leading the charge.

"Maybe three or four of us will be killed but the others will survive," the witness recounted.

As the guards opened the door to the bus, one of the victims lashed out but was shot and killed. After a scuffle, the guards opened fire on the truck, killing several people.

The witness said he fainted. The next thing he realized was that bodies fell on top of him, he said, describing what he at first thought was the sound of water.

"It was a scary sound," he said, quickly realizing it was the sound of gurgling blood.

He was tossed into a ditch full of bodies. "I fell on a body," he said. "He was still alive. It was his last breath."

The guards continued shooting as he ran away. The witness said he took off clothes as he ran because "the skin has the same color as the sand" and he didn't want the guards to detect him.

It was a full moon and as the man made his way through the desert, he saw it was full of mounds that he believes were mass graves.

"I ran and ran," he said. "I saw light in the distance and ran toward the light."

DOJ_NMG_0082996

At 4 a.m., the witness reached a house where he asked for help and food, which he was given. Eventually, he made his way to the Kurdish city of Irbil, where he hid until 1991, when Hussein lost authority over northern Iraq after the Persian Gulf War.

Death Toll Mounts For US Forces In Iraq (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, October 19, 2006

American forces are coming under increased attack in Iraq as October shapes up to be one of the worst months for US casualties during the war.

The deaths of nine soldiers and one marine on Tuesday raised the US death toll for October to 71, putting the month on course to be the third worst for military fatalities since the 2003 invasion. According to Pentagon figures, the military lost 137 troops in November 2004 – the worst month so far in the war – and 135 in April 2004.

US military commanders have attributed the latest rise in military deaths to increased violence during Ramadan in addition to US forces more actively engaging insurgent groups and sectarian death squads, particularly in Baghdad.

The rise in US deaths comes as Republicans come under mounting pressure over the war, which has claimed the lives of almost 2,800 troops. Increased anxiety about Iraq has placed the Grand Old Party in jeopardy of losing control of one, or possibly both, houses of Congress.

Aside from deaths, the US has suffered more than 21,077 casualties in Iraq, with more than 9,500 of those troops injured so badly that they did not return to action.

President George W. Bush has repeatedly argued that Iraq is making political progress and that the US will stay the course.

But his administration is becoming increasingly frustrated at the apparent inability of the Iraqi government to stem the rise in bloodshed, particularly in Baghdad where up to 10,000 US troops are working with 44,000 Iraqi forces. Senior Republicans have recently been more vocal in questioning the administration's strategy.

General John Abizaid, the top US commander in the Middle East, in July told Congress that reducing violence in Baghdad was key to avoiding civil war. But since his testimony, the number of military deaths in Iraq has greatly accelerated.

General Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs, last week said sectarian violence was now the biggest problem in Iraq. He said coalition forces had reduced violence by about 50 per cent in the 50 sectors of Baghdad that they have "cleared" with Iraqi forces. But in a sign of the difficulty in curbing the violence in the Iraqi capital, he acknowledged that sectarian death squads remained active at night even in those areas.

Donald Rumsfeld, the US defence secretary who famously described the initial insurgency as a bunch of "dead-enders" and is coming under heavier criticism for his handling of the war, on Tuesday repeated his mantra that the war cannot be lost "militarily".

The US public is losing patience with Mr Bush over the rising violence, which has prevented the Pentagon from reducing troop numbers from the current level of about 140,000 to 100,000 by the end of this year.

A recent CNN poll found that 64 per cent of respondents disapproved of the way Mr Bush is handling the war, with 64 per cent also opposing the war. Fifty-one per cent said Democrats would do a better job of handling the war.

• President George W. Bush compared Iraq and the Vietnam war for the first time when he said Thomas Friedman, a New York Times writer, "could be right" in saying the violence in Iraq was the "jihadist equivalent of the Tet offensive".

"There is certainly a stepped-up level of violence and we're heading into an election," Mr Bush told ABC News. The Tet offensive helped turn US public opinion against the war, and led to President Lyndon Johnson deciding to abandon his re-election bid. A White House spokeswoman said Mr Bush was only trying to make the point that "the enemy is trying to affect the psyche of Americans".

One-Day Iraq Toll Is Highest For U.S. In Many Months (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 18 -- A roadside bombing and other attacks killed 10 American troops across Iraq on Tuesday, the U.S. military reported Wednesday, making it the deadliest day of combat for U.S. forces in 10 months.

DOJ_NMG_0082997

The one-day toll, part of what the U.S. military has said is a 43 percent increase in attacks on U.S. and Iraqi forces in the capital since midsummer, occurred as casualties among Iraqi troops and civilians are soaring far higher than at any previous time in the war, according to U.S. and Iraqi tallies.

The deaths underscore the surging nature of sectarian violence and the increasing lethality of roadside bombs, which claim the most American lives in Iraq despite efforts to bolster armor and use high-technology devices to disable bombs.

Five of the American troop deaths Tuesday were caused by bombs. Four soldiers were killed in Baghdad about 6:50 a.m. when a planted bomb exploded under their vehicle, the U.S. military said in a statement. Another bomb killed a single soldier north of the capital.

Three soldiers died in combat east of Baghdad, in Diyala province, the military said. One soldier was killed in north Baghdad when armed men attacked his patrol, and a Marine died in combat in the predominantly Sunni province of Anbar, in western Iraq. Since the summer, Baghdad has surpassed Anbar as the most hostile place in the country for U.S. and Iraqi forces.

Tuesday's deaths, along with the death of an American soldier in Baghdad by small-arms fire on Wednesday, brought the number of total U.S. troop fatalities for October to 70, including 67 killed in action.

One hundred and twenty-five American troops were killed in action in November 2004, and 126 were killed in action in April 2004, during U.S. offensives in Najaf and Fallujah.

The Iraqi victims of violence on Wednesday included 30 men whose bodies were found dumped around Baghdad after they had been blindfolded, cuffed and shot, the Interior Ministry said. Ministry officials said most had also been tortured, which often involves puncturing victims' skulls, torsos and limbs with electric drills. The victims were all under 30, the ministry said.

The deaths reported by officials and published in the news media represent only a fraction of the thousands of mutilated bodies winding up in Baghdad's overcrowded morgue each month. U.S. and morgue officials say 90 percent of the killings are now carried out execution-style, with repeated shots to the head and body, usually after the victim had been kidnapped and tortured.

Most bodies are found dumped on Baghdad's streets each morning after a night of curfew, when only government security forces are supposed to be out.

Bodies are increasingly being dumped in and around Baghdad in fields staked out by individual Shiite militias and Sunni insurgent groups. Iraqi security forces often refuse to go to the dumping grounds, leaving the precise number of bodies in those sites unknown.

Civilian deaths, unlike those of American troops, often go unrecorded. No count exists of all the civilians killed in the spiraling violence since U.S.-led forces entered Iraq. President Bush earlier this year put the number at 30,000 but gave no sources. Indices drawing only on the deaths reported by news organizations put the figure closer to 50,000.

A study published last week in the Lancet medical journal in Britain estimated the true toll was 655,000. Researchers derived their figure from surveys of Iraqis, who were asked to show death certificates to verify deaths in their families caused by the war. The methodology of that survey has been challenged.

U.S. Defense Department statistics show average daily Iraqi troop casualties jumped to 120 in the three months ending September, up from 80 in the previous quarter.

In September, 2,667 Iraqis were killed in Baghdad alone; the government has yet to release last month's figures for all of Iraq.

U.S. officials sought Wednesday to bolster support for the war.

"It will be long, and it will be hard. I wish it were otherwise," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said in a speech at Maxwell-Gunter Air Force Base in Montgomery, Ala. "Certainly, seeing the violence on television is a temptation for people to wonder: How will it end?"

"There are those who say, Well, it is somebody else's problem," he said. But he voiced confidence that "the wave of violence" in Iraq will ultimately be defeated, saying Iraqi security forces are growing more capable.

Rumsfeld described a recent meeting at Bethesda Navy hospital with a wounded Marine who had served in Iraq as an embedded trainer with the Iraqi military. "If the American people will just give us time," he quoted the Marine as saying.

DOJ_NMG_0082998

Asked whether the 10 deaths Tuesday would make Bush reconsider his plans for Iraq, White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "No, his plan is to win."

"The president understands not only the difficulty of it, but he grieves for the people who have served with valor," Snow said in Washington. "But as everybody says correctly, we've got to win. And that comes at a cost."

Some U.S. military leaders in Iraq have said they are puzzled by the rise in violence since midsummer. Military spokesmen attribute the most recent climb to a typical increase in attacks during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan and say they expect the toll to drop when Ramadan ends in coming days.

"It's a dangerous place, and we're trying to mitigate the risk," Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad, said Wednesday.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who heads a government led by Shiite religious parties, traveled to Najaf on Wednesday to seek consensus with two of the country's most influential Shiite leaders about quelling the skyrocketing sectarian violence.

"I came so that the security and political situation can be stabilized, allowing the government to turn its attention to reconstruction," Maliki told reporters between meetings with Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who commands one of the country's most powerful political blocs and militias.

At Maliki's request, the U.S. military freed a Sadr official in Baghdad whom it had held overnight, U.S. and Iraqi officials said. Ali al-Dabbagh, a spokesman for Maliki, said the official was innocent. Aides said the official was a Sadr office manager in the heavily Shiite Baghdad neighborhood of Shoula.

Maliki has blocked U.S. military moves toward a crackdown on Sadr's militia as a whole. "The issue of militias should be solved politically," Dabbagh said in a telephone interview Wednesday.

Staff writer Ann Scott Tyson in Washington and special correspondents Saad al-Izzi in Baghdad and Saad Sarhan in Najaf contributed to this report.

11 More U.S. Troops Reported Killed In Iraq (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, October 19, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - The U.S. military announced Wednesday that 11 American troops had been killed in Iraq since Tuesday, mostly in Baghdad, the apparent result of the United States' latest attempt to quell intensifying violence in the capital.

So far, 70 American troops have been killed in Iraq this month. If the death toll continues at this rate, the monthly tally will be the highest since November 2004, when the U.S. military staged an offensive on the Iraqi city of Fallujah and the number of Americans killed during the month was 137.

U.S. troops increasingly have been patrolling the streets and conducting house-to-house sweeps in the capital in an attempt to stop the sectarian violence, which in some places has divided neighborhoods street by street. The troops have helped clean up streets littered with garbage and in some places the remnants of car bombings, and they've encouraged shop owners to reopen their businesses.

But the security plan, in place since the summer, hasn't produced evidence of significant improvements. Securing Baghdad is the linchpin of sustaining the Iraqi government and allowing American forces to leave, many experts say.

The plan also has exposed some of the weaknesses of handing over operations to Iraqi security forces. So far they haven't appeared prepared to tackle the burgeoning sectarian violence.

On Wednesday, at least another 29 Iraqis' bodies were found throughout the capital, including three in the southern Baghdad neighborhood of Dora and two in Shaab, in eastern Baghdad, two of the areas that U.S forces targeted in the security sweeps.

Police think residents often are killed in one neighborhood and their bodies dumped in another. Although statistics in Iraq are no longer reliable, police reports collected from the top provinces show that nearly 800 Iraqis have been killed so far this month.

DOJ_NMG_0082999

In a recent military operation in Baghdad, Iraqi forces, who were supposed to take the lead, leaned heavily on U.S. troops for guidance. Many Sunni Muslim residents said they allowed the mostly Shiite Muslim Iraqi security forces to search their homes only because American troops accompanied them.

The early stages of the operation yielded few arrests or weapons, prompting many to think that the insurgency had left the targeted communities. Wednesday's announcement suggested that they were moving back in.

The latest attacks on American troops began just before 7 a.m. Tuesday when four soldiers died west of Baghdad in a roadside bomb attack. Two hours later, a soldier was killed when his convoy was attacked in northern Baghdad. Another soldier died Tuesday afternoon north of the capital in a roadside bomb attack.

Three soldiers from the 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team, 4th Infantry Division, were killed Tuesday during combat in the northeastern province of Diyala, which is nearly evenly split between Sunnis and Shiites and where violence is high.

In the Sunni province of Anbar, a Marine from Regimental Combat Team 7 was killed during fighting.

A soldier died Wednesday afternoon in southern Baghdad during small-arms fighting.

"We work to mitigate risks to our forces every day while aggressively conducting operations in support of the government of Iraq to bring security to the people of Iraq," U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Christopher Garver said Wednesday in a statement.

11 U.S. Troops Killed In Combat As October Toll Hits 70 (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Eleven more U.S. troops were slain in combat, the military said yesterday, putting this month on track to be the deadliest for U.S. forces since the siege of Fallujah nearly two years ago.

The military says the sharp increase in U.S. casualties -- 70 this month -- is tied to Ramadan and a security crackdown that has left American forces more vulnerable to attack in Baghdad and its suburbs. Muslim tenets hold that fighting a foreign occupation force during Islam's holy month puts a believer especially close to God.

As the death toll climbed for both U.S. forces and Iraqi civilians, who are being killed at a rate of 43 a day, the country's Shi'ite-dominated government remained under intense U.S. pressure to shut down Shi'ite militias.

Some members of the armed groups have fractured into uncontrolled, roaming death squads out for revenge against Sunni Arabs, the Muslim minority in Iraq, who were politically and socially dominant until the fall of Saddam Hussein in 2003.

There have been signs in recent days of mounting strain between Washington and the wobbly government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who felt compelled during a conversation with President Bush this week to seek his assurances that the Americans were not going to dump him.

Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari yesterday blamed American officials who had overseen Iraq before its own government took nominal control for bringing the country to the present state of chaos.

"Had our friends listened to us, we would not be where we are today," Mr. Zebari said in an interview.

Asked which friends he was referring to, he said: "The Americans, the Coalition [Provisional Authority], the British. OK? Because they didn't listen to us. They did exactly what they wanted to do. ... Had they listened to us, we would have been someplace else [by now], really."

Despite the climbing death toll, the U.S. military says it is making progress in taming runaway violence in the capital as it engages insurgents, militias and sectarian death squads, rounds up suspects, and uncovers weapons caches and masses of stockpiled explosives.

The latest American death occurred yesterday, when a soldier was killed after his patrol was attacked by small-arms fire south of Baghdad. Ten Americans were killed Tuesday -- nine soldiers and a Marine -- the highest single-day combat death toll for U.S. forces since Jan. 5, when 11 service members were killed across Iraq. There have been days with a higher number of U.S. deaths, but not solely from combat.

October is on track to be the deadliest month for U.S. forces in Iraq since November 2004, when military offenses primarily in the then-insurgent stronghold of Fallujah, 40 miles west of Baghdad, left 137 troops dead, 126 of them in combat.

DOJ_NMG_0083000

"It breaks my heart because behind every casualty is somebody with tears in their eyes," Mr. Bush told ABC News. "I think the hardest part of the presidency is to meet with families who've lost their loved one."

With Iraq becoming a major issue in the Nov. 7 midterm elections in the United States, White House spokesman Tony Snow was asked whether the rising toll would cause Mr. Bush to alter course.

"No, his strategy is to win," Mr. Snow said. "The president understands not only the difficulty of it, but he grieves for the people who have served with valor."

Marines Plan To Recall Some Battalions (AP-Y)

By Robert Burns, Ap Military Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

The Marines are drawing up plans to send back to Iraq at least some reserve combat battalions that have already served one tour there, officials said Wednesday — the first time such units would be returned to the war.

The plan to remobilize those reserve forces is designed to relieve some of the growing strain on active-duty Marines.

A Marine Corps spokesman, Lt. Col. Scott Fazekas, said Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld gave the Marines the go-ahead to conduct detailed planning on how the battalion reactivations would be done. Initially, Fazekas said Rumsfeld had approved the plan itself. Later he said the approval was for detailed planning.

Eric Ruff, a spokesman for Rumsfeld, said Wednesday evening that no specific proposals have been presented to Rumsfeld. "The Marines are reviewing a range of options and concepts for future consideration by the secretary and, to date, nothing has been approved," Ruff said.

The Army, which is organized differently than the Marine Corps, has not sent any of its National Guard combat brigades back to Iraq for a second tour, although it is considering making more use of the Guard. Both the Marines and Army have sent reserve support units and active-duty forces to Iraq multiple times.

The return of Marine Reserve combat battalions to Iraq would begin in 2008, according to a senior Marine officer who discussed the subject on condition he not be identified because no official announcement has been made. Thus, the first picked to go back probably would be remobilized next year to train for the mission.

The plan, put forward by Gen. Michael Hagee, the Marine commandant, could be modified as the situation in Iraq changes, officials said. For planning purposes, the Marines are working out future force rotations that would include at least one Reserve combat battalion starting in 2008.

The Marines have decided to take this unusual step in order to alleviate a problem that both the Marines and the Army are wrestling with as the Iraq war rages on unabated: wear-and-tear on the active-duty troops, who are getting far less time at home to recuperate and retrain than military leaders would like.

The short respites between combat tours are not only a morale issue but also an obstacle to providing soldiers and Marines with sufficiently varied training and adequate time to attend professional development schools.

The Marines, for example, are not doing as much training for large-scale, high-intensity combat — combining their air, land and sea forces — as they normally would do, officials said. They do, however, have the time to do high-intensity combat training on a smaller scale, in addition to counterinsurgency training for Iraq missions.

The Marines have 24 active-duty combat battalions. At any given time, nine of them are in Iraq.

To increase the amount of time between deployments, the Marines have decided to make more use of their reserve combat battalions, of which there are nine. The main restriction the Marine Corps faces is a 24-month limit on the amount of time a reservist can be mobilized, so those who were on active duty for more than 12 months the first time will not be remobilized, since the planned mobilizations would be for 12 months, Fazekas said.

The Marine plan does not represent a change in the 24-month policy, which is set by the partial mobilization order signed by President Bush in 2001. It pertains to deployments for Iraq, Afghanistan and other places deemed part of the global war on terrorism.

Marine battalions typically serve seven-month tours in Iraq. Marine Reserve units are mobilized for 12 months, to include pre-deployment training, seven months in Iraq and then a period of demobilization.

DOJ_NMG_0083001

The Marines have not yet decided which of the nine Marine Reserve battalions would be the first to be recalled for another tour in Iraq, Fazekas said.

He said officials would examine which battalion is best prepared for a second combat tour, based on the number of Marine reserves in its ranks who are still eligible for mobilization, the condition of the unit's equipment, the state of its training and other factors.

The last of the nine Marine Reserve combat battalions to serve in Iraq is the 1st Battalion, 24th Marines, based in Michigan and Ohio. The battalion is operating in the Fallujah area in western Anbar province.

Militias Splintering Into Radicalized Cells (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The young Shiite men, some wearing black masks, glided from house to house in search of Sunni Muslim men. They arrived at the two-story dwelling of Mohammed Hussein clutching a bomb, neighbors said. As his mother stood at the front gate, they detonated it. Shrapnel and glass flew, sending her to the hospital. A wall fell on a neighbor, sending him to his grave.

Hussein, who is Sunni, arrived home an hour later and immediately blamed a man called Aziz Dinar. Residents in this western Baghdad neighborhood of Hurriyah -- in Arabic, it means freedom -- said Dinar heads the local office of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr and elements of his militia, the Mahdi Army.

"We know he is behind all the incidents taking place in Hurriyah," Hussein, 29, a civil servant, said with confidence. "He is the one who destroyed our house."

But in an interview, a leader in Sadr's movement in western Baghdad denied knowing Dinar. "This Aziz Dinar does not represent us in Hurriyah. There are other representatives," said Abdul Hadi al-Mohammadawi. "I have never heard of him."

In the void forged by the sectarian tensions gripping Baghdad, militias are further splintering into smaller, more radicalized cells, signifying a new and potentially more volatile phase in the struggle for the capital.

Iraqis and U.S. officials blame militias for mass kidnappings and slayings, for setting up unauthorized checkpoints and for causing much of the recent carnage.

Senior U.S. military and intelligence officials say they have identified at least 23 militias -- some are Sunni, but most are Shiite. Some are paramilitary offshoots of the Mahdi Army or have broken away entirely from Sadr's command structure. Others seem inspired by Lebanon's Shiite Hezbollah guerrilla movement.

"In some ways it makes it easier for me because I have digestible doses I can deal with that might not be reinforcing one another," a senior U.S. military official said at a recent briefing with reporters, speaking on condition of anonymity. "But at the same time, it creates problems for me because it is harder to find them when they are splintered, to identify who they are."

The new breed of militias embody the changed texture of violence in the fourth year of war -- from attacks against Baathists and loyalists of former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein, to attacks on average Iraqis purely because of their sect or their wealth. They appear more localized and more ruthless than their predecessors. They deploy death squads and explode bombs to destroy houses. They have carved neighborhoods into fiefdoms, governing through fear and intimidation.

The fragmentation poses new obstacles to U.S. and Iraqi forces trying to quell the sectarian strife that U.S. commanders fear could plunge the nation into civil war. Militias have already replaced the Sunni Arab insurgency as the biggest challenge to U.S. efforts to bring stability to Iraq. Senior U.S. military officials privately acknowledge they do not have the manpower to conduct urban sweeps in every neighborhood or prevent areas they have cleared from again becoming havens of lawlessness and killing.

Nowadays, in some parts of Baghdad, it is not uncommon to hear residents blame small militias, criminal gangs, rogue death squads or assassins for their woes -- instead of Iraq's two major militias, the Mahdi Army and the Badr Brigades, an arm of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a powerful Shiite religious party.

In the mostly Shiite neighborhood of al-Amil, the Haider Hamida gang rules. It has about 50 Shiite members, mostly young, jobless men from poor sections of the neighborhood, residents said. They orbit around shops, street corners and checkpoints. Many have ties to the Mahdi Army or are still members, residents said.

DOJ_NMG_0083002

The gang is named after the pseudonym of its chief executioner, a short, skinny man in his early 20s with black hair and a thin moustache. Some residents said he was a member of a police commando unit. Both U.S. and Iraqi officials have expressed concern over the infiltration of Iraqi police units by militias and death squads. Hamida is said to have killed at least 100 people in recent months.

"We started hearing about his gang after Samarra. They became active after this incident," said Majid Abu Sara, 43, a Sunni resident of al-Amil, who asked that his full name not be used because he feared for his safety. He was referring to the February bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, about 65 miles north of Baghdad, that triggered cycles of sect-based revenge killings. Most of the other splinter groups also emerged after the attack.

The Haider Hamida gang arrived at Abu Sara's parents' doorstep three months ago, he recalled. They placed an improvised bomb at the front door, near their car. Within seconds, the house and the car were engulfed in flames. Abu Sara's 90-year-old father, his 70-year-old mother and 10 other relatives fled out the back.

"They displaced them just because they are Sunni," said Abu Sara, describing the motive for the attack. "My parents have not gone back."

At a recent briefing with reporters, another senior U.S. military official carried a list of the 23 militias. He began to rattle off names -- "Iraqiya Hezbollah, Khadimiya Brigades" -- but an aide stopped him, noting that he was revealing vital intelligence.

In August, U.S. and Iraqi troops conducted house-to-house sweeps in the western neighborhood of Ghazaliya, part of its Operation Together Forward to bring security to the capital. At the time, U.S. officials asserted that there was progress in pushing out militias and insurgents, and bringing down violence.

But by September, after the sweeps, "we saw death squads at least come in," a senior coalition intelligence official said at a recent briefing with reporters, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity. The death squads had links to groups inside Iraqi government ministries, he said.

One reason for the militia splintering is that differences have emerged within Sadr's movement over his decision to join Iraq's political process. The senior coalition intelligence official said he knew of at least "six major players" who have left Sadr's movement because they no longer find him radical enough and see him as "too accommodating to the coalition."

Yet many of the new groups, described as rogue elements, continue to link themselves with the Mahdi Army.

"They will execute operations and obtain funding under the guise of Jaish al-Mahdi," said the senior coalition intelligence official, using the Arabic name for the Mahdi Army. "But they are effectively beyond his control," he said, referring to Sadr.

These groups represent a threat to Sadr's image and political aspirations at a time when he controls four government ministries and 30 seats in the Iraqi parliament.

"There are definitely lots of terrorists who have used the Sadr office to achieve their goals to ruin the reputation of this army which has struggled for the service of the people," said Mohammadawi. "The Sadr office is trying very hard to capture any terrorist elements which could harm the security of society and Iraq in general."

When gunmen in police cars and police uniforms raided the offices of an Iraqi satellite television channel, killing at least eight people, suspicion immediately fell on the Mahdi Army. Hours after the slayings, Sadr released a strongly worded statement warning that he would release the names and excommunicate any Mahdi Army militiamen who were conducting attacks against Iraqis.

The senior coalition intelligence official said he believed that Sadr was honestly trying to take control of his forces.

In neighborhoods such as al-Amil, the attacks have become bolder. Haider Hamida walks the streets without wearing a mask, said residents. Two months ago, he and some members of his gang stopped a car at a checkpoint and targeted a man who sold milk in the neighborhood, recalled Ahmed Abu Abdallah, another resident.

"Haider pulled him out of the car and they started hitting him with pistols on his head," said Abu Abdallah. "They put him in their truck and drove off." Later that day, the man's relatives found his body dumped less than a mile from the checkpoint.

U.S. officials are concerned that the Shiite splinter groups could reach out to the Shiite rulers in neighboring Iran for support. They share the same ideology, and Iran is eager to provide funding, said the senior coalition intelligence official.

"As time goes on, you're going to continue to see elements break off the organization and become sort of these semi-independent or independent players, but none of them remain independent for long," said the official. "They all find a sponsor."

DOJ_NMG_0083003

In Hurriyah, Aziz Dinar acts as if he has strong backers. Residents said he has become wealthy through kidnapping for ransom and looting local stores. Poor youths from the neighborhood continue to sign up for his militia.

"He killed a couple of his own neighbors from his own street," said Hussein. "The whole area was surrounded by his men. They carried rocket-propelled grenades. The Iraqi army was in the neighborhood, but they did nothing.

"That day, he told people, 'I do whatever I like.' "

Ramadan Spent Behind Locked Doors (USAT)

By Zaid Sabah

USA Today, October 19, 2006

BAGHDAD — In better times, the faithful would be jammed shoulder-to-shoulder into the Al-Bakri Mosque in Baghdad's Khadra district for prayers during Ramadan. Streams of chanting worshipers, sometimes numbering as many as 500, would spill into the mosque's courtyard and the street outside.

On a recent Friday evening, the most important day for Ramadan prayers, 17 men stood in the mostly empty mosque. Seven of them were guards.

"This is the worst Ramadan ever," said Ammar Ahmad, 22, one of the attendees. "We used to go out after breaking the fast and chat with friends, playing dominos and chess in the teahouses. All that's gone."

Ramadan, which began this year in late September and ends this weekend, is one of the holiest periods on the Muslim religious calendar. It is a time of daily fasting, prayers and peaceful introspection. The evenings are traditionally spent breaking the fast, visiting friends and strolling along neighborhood streets.

For the past several years in Iraq, violence has spiked during Ramadan, making it difficult for many people to go out as freely as they would like. This year, however, has been even worse. The religion-based nature of much of the violence, new curfews and random militia checkpoints have most people staying home behind locked doors, according to many people in Baghdad.

"Our major concern is the death squads and the dead bodies found daily tortured and executed," said Jehan Hashim, 60, a homemaker. "Even last year's Ramadan was better. We would go out by car, and there were no death-squad checkpoints."

The U.S. military warned that violence would spike. "Historical trends tell us that the attacks will generally increase by 20%" during Ramadan, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the top military spokesman in Iraq, said last week. "We assume it will still get worse before it gets better."

The sectarian nature of the violence has brought danger closer to home. Violence between Sunni and Shiite Muslims escalated after a Shiite shrine in Samarra was bombed in February.

Death-squad killings in Baghdad rose to 1,450 in September from 450 in February, according to U.S. military statistics.

The Iraqi government has imposed curfews. Car travel is barred in Baghdad from 9 p.m. to 6 a.m. Pedestrians have to stay off the streets from 11 p.m. to 6 a.m.

Sheik Abdel Karim al-Samarae, a leading cleric of the Sunni Islamic Party, said many mosques have been closed or occupied by Shiite militias. They've also had to stop handing out meals to the poor to break the daily fast, he said. Free distribution of the meals — called iftar — is a tradition.

"Ramadan this year has been hard on Iraqis," he said. "People's lives during Ramadan revolve around the mosque, and the militias have deprived us from them."

Ali Satar al-Zubeidi, a 20-year-old Shiite student, has good memories from past Ramadans: long evening strolls through parks with friends, talks with neighbors, relatives crowding into his parents' home for iftar.

"Now, no one visits because of the security situation," he said. "Now, you break your fast and you're stuck in front of the TV. It's our only entertainment. This Ramadan has no flavor at all."

Mohammed Khalil, who runs a pharmacy in Baghdad, said he took his family out last year after iftar to pick up pastries.

This year, they lock themselves inside their home after dark, he said. "Our traditions are vanishing day by day," Khalil said.

The 655,000 Fraud (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083004

"Ateam of American and Iraqi epidemiologists estimates that 655,000 more people have died in Iraq since coalition forces arrived in March 2003 than would have died if the invasion had not occurred."

So read a story in last week's Washington Post on the new John Hopkins-led study -- published in the British medical journal Lancet -- purporting to document "excess deaths" in Iraq. "We have no reason to question the findings," the Post quoted a Human Rights Watch official as saying. The article was fairly typical of reporting on the Lancet study, which has also been all over television and radio, as well as Internet sites such as Google and Yahoo! news.

All of which leaves us wondering if reporters and editors have enough sense anymore to ask basic questions about such enormous numbers, or whether they are simply too biased against the Bush Administration and its Iraq policy to do so. The 655,000 figure is more than 10 times higher than previous estimates of violent deaths in Iraq since the U.S. invasion, and it is larger than the number of Germans killed by allied bombing during all of World War II and larger than the number of Americans who died during our own Civil War.

While it's obvious that Iraq has a terrible problem with sectarian violence at the moment, we find it hard to believe killing on the scale of Antietam or Gettysburg has been going on without anybody having noticed until the statistical wizards from Johns Hopkins showed up.

The 655,000 figure turns out to be an extrapolation based on a very inadequate sampling process. Pollster Steven E. Moore, who has worked extensively in Iraq, pointed out in an op-ed on this page yesterday that the Lancet study is based on information from a mere 47 "cluster points" around Iraq and 1,849 total interviews.

By contrast, a 2004 U.N. survey of Iraq used 2,200 cluster points for more than 21,000 interviews. The Johns Hopkins researchers also appear to have collected no demographic data on their subjects, so the group cannot be compared to census data to check if it is representative. "I wouldn't survey a junior high school, no less an entire country, using only 47 cluster points," Mr. Moore wrote.

Iraq Body Count -- a nonpartisan outfit that keeps track of Iraqi mortality figures -- has also issued a devastating critique of the Lancet/Johns Hopkins survey. It points out that the study implies that a thousand Iraqis died violently every day in the first half of 2006, with fewer than a tenth of them being noticed by "public surveillance mechanisms" and the press, as well as "incompetence and/or fraud on a truly massive scale by Iraqi officials in hospitals and ministries." It adds that death totals of the Lancet magnitude "are unnecessary to brand the invasion and occupation of Iraq a human and strategic tragedy."

Of course, the latter is precisely the agenda of the majority of those trumpeting the Lancet findings. Their goal isn't merely to nail the Bush Administration for incompetence in failing to achieve a sustainable victory in Iraq. They also, and perversely, want to discredit the war as a moral enterprise by suggesting there's no difference between Saddam Hussein's now well documented mass murders and the violence taking place today.

Omar Fadil, who with his brother writes from troubled Baghdad at IraqTheModel.com, has no doubt that the Lancet figure is a gross exaggeration. "All they want is to prove that our struggle for freedom was the wrong thing to do," he writes. "This fake research is an insult to every man, woman and child who lost their lives."

Rumsfeld: Terror Threat Not Exaggerated (AP-Y)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, October 19, 2006

Americans must take a lesson from history and not believe the terrorist threat has been exaggerated or will go away, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Wednesday.

He described a new, more ruthless and lethal terrorist enemy, "with no territory to defend, no treaties to honor, that measures progress in terms of decades, not days."

"With this sort of enemy, we cannot afford — and indeed could not survive — another holiday from history," Rumsfeld said.

Contending there are those who say terrorism is "somebody else's problem, or it will go away," Rumsfeld countered that America has no choice but to go on the offensive. And he urged patience with the Iraqi and Afghan governments as they struggle to build their democracies.

DOJ_NMG_0083005

Rumsfeld's call for perseverance comes three weeks before the November elections, as members of Congress face a public growing increasingly unhappy and impatient with the war in Iraq.

In remarks to students at the Air Force's war college at Maxwell-Gunter Air Force Base in Montgomery, Ala., Rumsfeld also acknowledged that the Iraq war, like other battles, "has not been a steady, smooth glide path."

And he offered no firm prediction on when U.S. troops levels will be substantially reduced there.

"There's going to be violence in that country, I suspect, for some time," he said. "But if we do our job well, and if we are doing a good job in training and equipping the Iraqi forces, we ought to be able to reduce down our forces in the months ahead, as we pass off more and more responsibility."

He said the enemy is unpredictable and frequently adapts to changing conditions, such as when insurgents began to use roadside bombs and other explosive devices after convoys became better protected against traditional attacks. He has made similar concessions before.

In Iraq, meanwhile, sectarian violence continues to rage in Balad, north of Baghdad, prompting the U.S. military to send troops there to back up the Iraqi Army.

The ongoing attacks in and around the capitol city have pushed the death toll of American troops to nearly 70 this month, putting October on track to be the deadliest month for coalition forces since January 2005.

Rumsfeld's speech echoed statements he made in August, when he warned an American Legion convention in Salt Lake City that the U.S. must not repeat the World War II-era mistake of trying to appease the enemy, even as fascism took hold.

While Rumsfeld did not specifically cite Bush critics in the speech, irate Democrats took issue with any suggestion that opponents of the Iraq war could be likened to those who wanted to appease Adolf Hitler before World War II.

While at the base Wednesday, Rumsfeld also met with Howard and Carol Payne, whose son Brad, a marine from Pike Road, Ala., was killed in Iraq by a roadside bomb on October 6.

___

Associated Press staff writer Phillip Rawls contributed to this report from Montgomery, Ala.

On the Net:

Defense Department: http://www.defenselink.mil

Rummy's Other Role (WP)

By Sally Quinn

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

Don Rumsfeld is the shrewdest person in Washington. He understands better than anyone that somebody has to be in line to take the blame when things go wrong. So far he has been willing to do so. But not much longer.

The drumbeat to get him out of the Pentagon has reached deafening proportions. Republicans and Democrats, the generals, the media, Colin Powell, Condi Rice, Andy Card, the first President Bush, and even Laura Bush all want him gone. Until now George W. Bush has resisted all of the pressure to get rid of his defense secretary. But those in the know say that the president may have reached the point where he realizes that Rumsfeld has outlived his usefulness.

Still, the president must be aware on some level that once the pugnacious, outspoken and flak-attracting Rumsfeld leaves the stage, the focus will be on the president. Whether Bush realizes it or not, this is about a scapegoat.

In the Bible, the high priest would transfer the sins of the people onto a goat, and, as it was written, "the goat shall carry all the sins of the people into a land where no one lives, and the man shall let it loose in the wilderness."

(The word for scapegoat in Hebrew means, literally, "into hell.")

Rumsfeld has seen others take on the role of scapegoat. Look what happened to Nancy Reagan. When she was first lady, she rightly realized that Donald Regan, the chief of staff, was causing her husband enormous damage. What she hadn't realized was that Regan was filling the role of scapegoat for the president. When Don Regan was finally fired, Nancy herself was made the scapegoat. She then took the brunt of criticism for the errors of her husband's administration.

DOJ_NMG_0083006

It is hard for the American people to turn completely against the president. It seems tantamount to patricide. We're much more comfortable being able to blame someone else for the president's mistakes. Laura Bush will never be the scapegoat. For now, it's Rumsfeld.

Vice President Cheney is not eager to replace him. And he would never fire Rumsfeld, who was his mentor and who hired him for three government jobs during the Ford administration, including as his deputy when Rumsfeld was chief of staff. (In fact, Cheney's Secret Service code name was "Back Seat.") In any event, Cheney is low-profile, secretive, nonconfrontational -- and presumably too experienced to allow himself to be easily made the scapegoat. But if Rumsfeld goes, the attention and criticism can be directed only to Cheney, or to Bush.

And it's improbable that Rumsfeld can last. He may not have an exit strategy for Iraq, but, old Washington hand that he is, he undoubtedly has one for himself.

I suspect that he has already told the president and Cheney that he will leave after the midterm elections, saying that the country needs new leadership to wind down the war. And he will resign to take a job in some sort of humanitarian venture, thereby creating the perception that he is a caring person who left of his own accord to devote the rest of his life to good works.

Bush and Cheney, who don't want him gone, will then have to contend with the reality of the new situation: One goat must be sent off into the wilderness. Who will it be?

Iraq's Premier In Talks With Key Shiite (AP)

By Abdul-Hussein Ridha, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki consulted with Iraq's Shiite spiritual leader and a radical, anti-U.S. cleric Wednesday in a bid to enlist support for efforts to build political consensus and tackle widening sectarian violence.

Al-Maliki's call on Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and Muqtada al-Sadr came as the Shiite prime minister faces growing U.S. pressure to show more resolve in dealing with the daily carnage of sectarian bombings and attacks.

"I came (to see al-Sistani) so that the security and political situation can be stabilized, allowing the government to turn its attention to reconstruction," al-Maliki told reporters after his meeting with al-Sistani in the holy city of Najaf.

Al-Maliki, whose more than four months in office have seen a marked deterioration in security, also sought to project the independence of his government from perceived U.S. influence.

"The Iraqi government is a government of national unity that came to power through the will of the Iraqi people," he said. "The Iraqi people are the only authorized party that can remove this government or allow it to continue."

Al-Sistani, who usually shuns the media, had no immediate comment, but the visit underscored the influence wielded by Iraq's top Shiite cleric on the government.

Following a meeting between the two men in July, the Iranian-born al-Sistani issued a strongly worded statement that upbraided al-Maliki's government for its failure to provide security and services and fight corruption.

President Bush assured al-Maliki in a telephone conversation Monday that he has no plans to pull troops out of Iraq and told him to ignore rumors the United States intended to enforce a deadline for Baghdad to rein in sectarian violence.

Al-Maliki told Bush he was concerned because he had been hearing that the United States was giving him just two months to establishment a government capable of operating without U.S. help, according to White House spokesman Tony Snow

Snow said it was not clear where the two-month deadline rumor had come from, although it appeared to reflect growing frustration in Congress and across the country about Al-Maliki's lack of progress.

Al-Maliki also called on al-Sadr, whose support was crucial to the prime minister's election to his job earlier this year.

Al-Sadr is the founder and leader of Iraq's most feared militia, the Mahdi Army, which is blamed for much of the sectarian violence in Iraq. His supporters, however, have 30 of parliament's 275 seats and are part of the Shiite alliance that won last December's general elections.

"We are in a very difficult security situation," al-Maliki said after his talks with al-Sadr. "It is constantly the concern that we carry to every meeting with the political and religious centers of power."

DOJ_NMG_0083007

In comments to reporters, al-Sadr appeared to soften his opposition to plans by the Shiite bloc in parliament to introduce a federal system in Iraq that would allow provinces to join together in autonomous regions similar to the one established by the Kurds in northern Iraq in 1991.

Al-Sadr, like Sunni Arab politicians, had maintained that federalism could lead to the eventual breakup of Iraq.

But on Wednesday he said the decision should be left to the Iraqi people to make.

"Federalism, like anything else, is left up to the Iraqi people. If they approve it, then there should be no problem," he said after meeting al-Maliki in Najaf.

Al-Maliki's talks with al-Sistani and al-Sadr in Najaf coincided with the announcement in Baghdad earlier Wednesday that a much-anticipated national reconciliation conference would be start in the Iraqi capital Nov. 4.

The conference, which was originally scheduled to start this Friday, is designed to try and build a political consensus to deal with the country's deepening economic and security woes.

Iraqi Leader Meets With 2 Key Shiites (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 18 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, in a bid to shore up his government in the face of American doubts and unrelenting sectarian violence, met separately today with two of Iraq's most powerful Shiite leaders, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American cleric.

The meetings, which occurred separately and in private in the Shiite holy city of Najaf, came at a critical time for the government of Mr. Maliki, who has been under intense pressure from American officials and some Iraqi leaders impatient with his failure to take aggressive steps to end the country's sectarian strife, including the dismantling of militias tied to the country's most powerful Shiite political parties.

Also today, the American military announced that 11 American troops had died in Iraq on Tuesday, making it one of the deadliest days for Americans since the beginning of the conflict.

Though details of the conversations with Ayatollah Sistani and Mr. Sadr were sparse, it seemed clear, in light of the pressures Mr. Maliki is under, that the prime minister's principal focus with both men would have been how to handle the militias.

At the crux of Mr. Maliki's problem lies Mr. Sadr, who controls one of the largest blocs in Parliament as well as a volatile militia, the Mahdi Army, that has been blamed for helping to drive the deadly cycle of sectarian revenge.

American commanders have been pressing Iraqi officials to launch an all-out assault against the Mahdi Army's strongholds, but Mr. Maliki, who relies on Mr. Sadr for political backing, has resisted.

These tensions played out today when the Maliki government demanded that the American military command release a senior aide to Mr. Sadr who had been captured on Tuesday on suspicion of attacking American forces and of directing kidnappings, killings and torture of Sunni Arabs and Shiites.

The American military command provided no explanation for the release of the aide, Sheik Mazin al-Saedi, except to say it was in response to a request by the Iraqi government. "It's a government of Iraq issue," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a military spokesman in Baghdad.

The urgency for American commanders trying to quell the violence has been accentuated by the sudden rise in the death toll among American troops in Iraq.

The deaths of 10 of the 11 troops on Tuesday were caused by enemy attacks, including bombings and firefights, and the 11th died of "nonhostile" causes, military officials said, using a term that often refers to accidents or illness.

At least 70 American troops have died so far this month, putting October on pace to be third deadliest month of the conflict.

The total, after only 18 days, already exceeds that of most other months since the start of the invasion in March 2003.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said the sudden surge in troop deaths would not force President Bush to alter his war plans.

"No, his strategy is to win," Mr. Snow said in Washington. "The president understands not only the difficulty of it, but he grieves for the people who have served with valor. But as everybody says correctly, we've got to win. And that comes at a cost."

DOJ_NMG_0083008

Six of the deaths on Tuesday occurred in or near Baghdad, where American and Iraqi have been concentrating their focus since August in an effort to stem the spiraling violence and stop the capital from slipping out of the government's control.

One of those soldiers was shot while on patrol in northern Baghdad; another died when a bomb exploded next to his vehicle just north of Baghdad; and four soldiers were killed when a bomb was detonated near their vehicle just west of Baghdad, the military said.

Three soldiers were killed and one was wounded while on a combat mission in Diyala Province, north of Baghdad, the military said, and a Marine died Tuesday from wounds sustained during combat in Anbar Province.

The two deadliest months for American troops since the beginning of the war have been associated with major offensives.

Some 137 American troops died in November 2004, the same month as the second siege of Falluja, where the Americans battled Sunni Arab rebels. In April 2004, a bloody month that saw the first siege of Falluja and pitched battles between the Americans and Mr. Sadr's militia in Najaf, 135 American troops died.

In contrast, the military has not conducted any major operations this month.

Mr. Maliki took office in May, and since then senior American officials have repeatedly said that the first six months of his administration would be crucial.

During a telephone call with President Bush on Monday, the Iraqi premier disclosed that this timeline was weighing on his mind and asked about rumors that the Americans would replace him soon if they were unsatisfied with his progress. Mr. Bush reassured Mr. Maliki that he had American support.

At a news conference in Najaf, following his meeting with Ayatollah Sistani, Mr. Maliki behaved like a man vindicated. The Iraqi people, he said, "are the only ones who can vote yes to continue or no to stop this government." He added that his government would be subjected to its own review, not an American one.

Mr. Sadr, whose militia twice battled the American military in protracted uprisings in 2004, criticized American policy toward Iraq. "The Iraqi government has the right to act and no one has the right to intervene, not the Americans or any other country," he said.

But in recent days, top officials in Mr. Maliki's government have been taking steps that seem to be responses to demands for changes at the highest levels of government.

On Tuesday, the Maliki government, which has been under pressure to purge Iraq's security forces of militia and sectarian influence, announced that it had removed the two most senior police commanders from their posts the day before.

And in recent days, the government formed a special committee with a mandate to study and overhaul its security agencies.

Mr. Maliki's visit to Ayatollah Sistani underscored the influence of the spiritual leader. During a news conference following their meeting, the prime minister said he had paid the ayatollah a visit "so that that the security and political situation can be stabilized, allowing the government to turn its attention to reconstruction."

Seeking To Shore Up Support, Maliki Meets With Iraqi Clerics (LAT)

By Saad Fakhrildeen And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

NAJAF, Iraq — Prime Minister Nouri Maliki met with influential Shiite Muslim clerics in this city of seminaries and shrines Wednesday, seeking support for his beleaguered government.

Maliki conferred with Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, Iraqi Shiites' most revered cleric, and Moqtada Sadr, the radical leader of a political movement and militia considered a cause of Iraq's security woes. Both are key backers of Maliki's Shiite-dominated administration.

The visit came as Maliki faces rumors that the United States is seeking to replace him because of dissatisfaction with his attempts to pacify sectarian strife.

But Maliki, who received fresh assurances of support from President Bush on Monday, dismissed speculation that he was in any danger of being pushed aside. "The Iraqi government … did not show up with the tanks," he told reporters. "It came by the will of the Iraqi people through the stations of democracy, elections and the constitution."

DOJ_NMG_0083009

Maliki's handling of security, especially his seeming inability to rein in Shiite militias, has drawn suspicion from the country's Sunni Arab minority and has frustrated U.S. officials. The American military this week complied with Maliki's request to release a detained cleric who served in Sadr's anti-U.S. movement and is suspected of being a militia leader.

Maliki defended the release, saying the country was moving to find "political solutions" for the militia issue and to make certain "nobody is arrested unless he committed a real crime against Iraq and Iraqis."

With Sadr at his side during a second news appearance, Maliki also hinted that he was seeking ways to lessen the influence of militias such as Sadr's Al Mahdi army, which often polices Shiite neighborhoods in Baghdad and southern cities. "We found a rejection of killing and holding weapons and support for the concept that the state provides security and protection for the citizens," he said.

Sadr called on Iraqis to avoid a sectarian "bloodbath," and warned the U.S. to stay out of Iraq's domestic affairs.

"Many of the Americans' interventions inside and outside Iraq have worsened the situation, whether in Lebanon, North Korea or other countries where security is worsening," he told reporters.

Courts-martial Ordered In Iraqis' Deaths (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 19, 2006

EVANSVILLE, Ind. — Eight soldiers from the 101st Airborne Division and three Marines were ordered Wednesday to be court-martialed on murder charges.

Four of the soldiers are accused of raping a 14-year-old girl and killing her, her parents and her younger sister. Two of them could get the death penalty if convicted.

Four other soldiers from the 101st are charged with murdering three Iraqi men during a raid.

The soldiers facing the prospect of a death sentence are Sgt. Paul Cortez and Pfc. Jesse Spielman. Both are accused of raping Abeer Qassim al-Janabi in March at her family's home in Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad.

Spc. James Barker and Pfc. Bryan Howard are also charged in the case, but the military is not seeking the death penalty.

Former private Steven Green, who was discharged from the Army for a “personality disorder” in May before the allegations became known, will face murder charges in federal court in Kentucky.

Military prosecutors have said the five — all from the 502nd Infantry Regiment — planned the attack after seeing the girl at their checkpoint near the family's home.

Defense lawyers argued in previous hearings that the soldiers were emotionally ragged. Their unit had suffered months of attacks that felled dozens of comrades.

In statements given to military investigators, Spielman was described as a “look-out.” His lawyers said they were shocked that he could get the death penalty.

“According to the government's evidence … Jesse isn't even a principal in murder and rape,” said Craig Carlson, Spielman's lawyer.

Four soldiers from the division's 3rd Brigade also will be tried in a separate court-martial on charges of murdering three Iraqi detainees during a raid on a village north of Baghdad. Those soldiers are Pfc. Corey Clagett, Spc. William Hunsaker, Staff Sgt. Raymond Girouard and Spc. Juston Graber.

Also, three Marines from Camp Pendleton in California will face courts-martial on murder and kidnapping charges in the death of an Iraqi man in the town of Hamdania, the Marine Corps said. Lance Cpl. Tyler Jackson, Lance Cpl. Robert Pennington and Cpl. Trent Thomas would not face the death penalty.

8 To Face Courts-Martial (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

EVANSVILLE, Ind., Oct. 18 (AP) — Eight soldiers from the 101st Airborne Division at Fort Campbell, Ky., were ordered Wednesday to face courts-martial in killings connected to their service in Iraq.

Two of the soldiers, Sgt. Paul E. Cortez and Pfc. Jesse V. Spielman, could face the death penalty in the rape of a 14-year-old Iraqi girl and killing of her family in March.

The military said it would not seek the death penalty for two other soldiers, Specialist James P. Barker and Pfc. Bryan L. Howard, who are also accused in the rape and killings.

Four other soldiers, Pfc. Corey R. Clagett, Specialist William B. Hunsaker, Staff Sgt. Raymond L. Girouard and Specialist Juston R. Graber, will face a separate court-martial in the killing of three Iraqi detainees during a raid in May.

Ex-commander Talks At Abu Ghraib Hearing (AP-Y)

By David Dishneau

AP, October 19, 2006

An Army Reserve officer accused of ignoring abuses of Iraqi detainees at Abu Ghraib prison was a daily visitor to the "hard site," where some detainees were stripped naked as an interrogation technique, a former military police commander testified Wednesday.

Capt. Donald Reese's testimony supported government allegations that Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, as director of the prison's interrogation center, knew about the abuse and lied about it.

Reese testified on the third day of Jordan's Article 32 investigation, the military equivalent of a grand jury hearing. The hearing to determine whether Jordan, the highest-ranking soldier charged in the scandal, should be court-martialed for any of the 12 charges he faces. He could face up to 42 years in prison if convicted.

Reese was commander of the 372nd Military Police Company, which guarded the hard site at Abu Ghraib in the autumn of 2003, when most of the abuses documented in photographs seen around the world occurred.

Prosecutor Lt. Col. Jon Pavlovcak asked him Wednesday how often he had seen Jordan inside the hard site, a building that housed prisoners held for interrogation.

"Every day, sir," Reese replied.

Reese testified that he couldn't remember whether Jordan had ever told him directly why some prisoners were naked. But Reese acknowledged having told Maj. Gen. Antonio M. Taguba during Taguba's 2004 investigation of the Abu Ghraib scandal that he had had a conversation with Jordan about it.

Taguba's report quotes Reese as saying, "He just said it's an interrogation method that we use."

Reese testified Wednesday that he remembered being told, although not necessarily by Jordan, that some prisoners were naked due to lack of clothing, refusal to wear clothes and for disciplinary reasons.

A defense witness, Civilian interrogator Steven Pescatore, testified that Jordan didn't seem to be in charge of interrogations when Pescatore was at Abu Ghraib from late September to mid-November 2003, despite Jordan's title as director of the Joint Interrogation and Debriefing Center.

"He seemed to have some kind of support role, but he was never anyone I went to or through regarding interrogations," Pescatore said.

Pescatore said he worked through a chain of command that included Capt. Carolyn Wood, who ran a unit called the Interrogation Control Element, and Col. Thomas Pappas, who commanded the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade and took over direct supervision of the interrogation center.

Pescatore likened Jordan's role at Abu Ghraib to that of a city mayor, responsible for troop support.

The timing of Jordan's responsibilities at Abu Ghraib is important because four of the alleged offenses are said to have occurred between Sept. 17 and Dec. 24, 2003.

Jordan, a civil affairs officer with military intelligence training, had been sent to Abu Ghraib to run the center as Pappas' deputy, according to Pappas' testimony Tuesday.

Pappas hasn't been criminally charged. He was reprimanded and fined $8,000 for once approving the use of dogs during an interrogation without higher approval.

Eleven lower-ranking soldiers have been convicted of crimes at Abu Ghraib and several officers also have been reprimanded for their roles in the scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0083011

Jordan, 50, is now assigned to the Intelligence and Security Command at Fort Belvoir, Va. The charges against him include cruelty and maltreatment for allegedly subjecting detainees to forced nudity and intimidation by dogs, dereliction of duty, making false official statements and willfully disobeying orders.

NATO Strikes Kill 9 Afghan Civilians (AP)

By Kathy Gannon, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

Airstrikes by NATO helicopters hunting Taliban fighters ripped through three dried mud homes in southern Afghanistan as villagers slept early Wednesday. At least nine civilians were killed, including women and children, said residents and the provincial governor.

Shellshocked, angry villagers in Ashogho condemned the attack, which set back NATO's hopes of winning local support for their tough counterinsurgency campaign. The airstrikes came at about the same time a rocket struck a house in a village to the west, reportedly killing 13 people.

"I am not Taliban! We are not Taliban!" Gulab Shah shouted by the rubble of the ruined houses in Ashogho.

Kandahar provincial Gov. Asadullah Khalid said it appeared that no Taliban fighters were in the village at the time of the airstrikes, which left giant pieces of mud packed with straw scattered along Ashogho's narrow lane.

Bibi Farida, a 6-year-old whose red hair was matted with dirt, fidgeted and bit down on her scarf as she remembered the assault. Her voice was barely a whisper. "I cried. I just cried."

The 2 a.m. raid in the Zhari district of Kandahar province was only half a mile from the scene of September's Operation Medusa, one of the most ferocious battles between Western forces and insurgents since the ouster of the Taliban regime in 2001.

NATO's International Security Assistance Force said in a statement that Wednesday's operation in Kandahar was believed to have caused several civilian casualties. The alliance said the operation was meant to detain people involved in roadside bomb attacks in Panjwayi district, which borders Zhari.

NATO said it regretted any civilian casualties and that it makes every effort to minimize the risk of collateral damage.

Khalid, who traveled Wednesday to Ashogho, about 15 miles west of Kandahar city, said nine people were killed, including women and children, and 11 wounded. Residents said 13 were killed, including four women, and 15 wounded. The governor stuck with his figures when contacted late Wednesday by The Associated Press.

Since late 2001, there have been numerous incidents of civilians killed in military operations against Taliban and al-Qaida fighters, although U.S.-led coalition and NATO forces say they go to extreme lengths to avoid civilian casualties. The international troops accuse insurgents of blending in with local populations while attacking foreign and Afghan soldiers. Many other civilians have been killed in Taliban attacks, including scores in recent suicide bombings.

President Hamid Karzai has repeatedly demanded that NATO and U.S.-led coalition forces take more care when conducting military operations in residential areas to avoid civilian casualties, which undermine his government's already weak standing in parts of the country.

Khalid said Karzai expressed his sympathy after he called the president on his cell phone from the village. "He told them how he hurt for them and how sad he was for their loss," Khalid said.

One of the homes that was attacked had only one wall standing, and looked ready to topple over. A blast ripped a hole through the middle of another.

Shah, whose dirty green baggy pants were hiked up past his ankles, the sign of a deeply conservative man, gestured toward the destroyed homes:

"If the foreign soldiers were so smart that they knew there were Taliban here, why didn't they see the women and children who were sleeping? Why do they want to kill us? How can they help us rebuild if they want to kill us? Maybe they should leave," he shouted.

Khalid said it seemed clear from the villagers that no Taliban fighters were in their village when the bombing occurred.

"It is hard to know when the Taliban are moving around from one place to another, but it seems they weren't here," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0083012

He has promised to rebuild the homes.

As he walked away from the angry villagers and climbed into his car, Khalid whispered to himself: "And how are we supposed to bring security to the country with this kind of thing happening?"

Elsewhere Wednesday, a rocket hit a house during a nighttime clash between suspected Taliban insurgents and NATO and Afghan security forces in the farming village of Tajikai in Helmand province's Grishk district, 135 miles west of Kandahar city, police said.

Abdul Rehman, a resident contacted by phone, said the rocket was fired from an aircraft and that the attack killed 13 villagers inside the home. He said relatives of the dead told him all those inside the dried mud house — five women, five children, three men — were killed, including the house's owner, Nabi Khel.

The rocket attack came after Afghan police called in NATO air support during the clash, which began late Tuesday and left one Taliban militant killed and three police wounded, said provincial police chief Ghulam Nabi Malakhel.

"A civilian home was hit by a rocket, but it's unsure which side fired it," Malakhel said. "There were some civilian casualties."

Squadron Leader Jason Chalk, a NATO spokesman, said alliance jets and helicopters fired rockets and dropped bombs on Taliban positions in the area after 2 a.m. Wednesday but could not confirm that they hit a civilian house.

"For the moment, it's impossible to substantiate that claim," Chalk said, adding that the Taliban had been using mortars in the area of the clash. About 100 families live in Tajikai.

Southern Afghanistan this year has faced the deadliest spate in violence in the country since the ouster of the Taliban regime by U.S.-led forces five years ago, as newly deployed NATO troops have battled resurgent militants. In Operation Medusa, NATO reported it had killed more than 500 suspected Taliban fighters.

The tough military action has brought with it a risk of civilian deaths. In May, 17 villagers were killed when coalition warplanes attacked Taliban forces in Kandahar province. The U.S. military, which said dozens of militants also died in the fighting, expressed regret over the deaths.

The worst reported incident of civilian deaths from foreign military action in Afghanistan came in July 2002, when a U.S. airstrike in Uruzgan province killed 46 civilians and wounded 117, many of them celebrating at a wedding party.

A Military Path To Citizenship (WP)

By Max Boot And Michael O'Hanlon

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

America is a land of immigrants. Their spirit of resolve, adventure, hard work and devotion to an idea bigger than themselves has made this country great. Whatever one thinks of the immigration debate today, particularly the problem of illegal immigrants, foreigners have played a central role in the building of America. Many have done so as soldiers, among them Baron von Steuben and the Marquis de Lafayette in the War of Independence.

Now is the time to consider a new chapter in the annals of American immigration. By inviting foreigners to join the U.S. armed forces in exchange for a promise of citizenship after a four-year tour of duty, we could continue to attract some of the world's most enterprising, selfless and talented individuals. We could provide a new path toward assimilation for undocumented immigrants who are already here but lack the prerequisite for enlistment -- a green card. And we could solve the No. 1 problem facing the Army and Marine Corps: the fact that these services need to grow to meet current commitments yet cannot easily do so (absent a draft) given the current recruiting environment.

Not only would immigrants provide a valuable influx of highly motivated soldiers, they would also address one of America's key deficiencies in the battle against Islamist extremists: our lack of knowledge of the languages and mores in the lands where terrorists reside. Newly arrived Americans can help us avoid trampling on local sensitivities and thereby creating more enemies than we eliminate.

Skeptics might point out that in the just-concluded fiscal year, the military met most of its recruiting and retention goals. But this was done only by relaxing age and aptitude restrictions, allowing in more individuals with criminal records, and greatly increasing the number of recruiters and advertising dollars. Although we generally support what has been done to date, the logic of these measures cannot be pushed much further.

DOJ_NMG_0083013

The Army chief of staff, Gen. Peter Schoomaker, has just forecast that U.S. commitments in Iraq may remain at their current level until 2010. With most soldiers and Marines already on a third or even fourth deployment since Sept. 11, 2001, it's doubtful that the all-volunteer force can withstand such a commitment at its current size. Even if it could, it's unfair to ask so much of so few for so long.

Some might object to our proposal on moral grounds, arguing that it is wrong to rely on "mercenaries" and to use such incentives to get prospective immigrants to fight. We disagree. For one thing, we already rely on tens of thousands of real mercenaries: the security contractors the U.S. government employs from Colombia to Iraq to make up for lack of troops. Immigrants who enrolled in our armed forces would be more valuable because they would be under military discipline and motivated by more than just a paycheck.

As for the risks they would run in Iraq or Afghanistan, these would be no greater than the risks run by previous generations of newcomers who built railroads and skyscrapers and toiled in factories and mines. No one would be forced to serve. No existing immigration quotas would be reduced. The military avenue to citizenship would be a new option, not an obligation.

Nativists need not fear that this would lead to a flood of foreigners. Say we decide to recruit 50,000 foreigners a year for the next three years. That sounds like a lot, but it represent less than 10 percent of the total number coming to the United States anyway -- and less than 10 percent of our active-duty armed forces. This would not radically change the demographics of our society or our military, but it would make a big difference in the size of the rotation base for our ongoing missions.

Despite growing anti-Americanism, U.S. citizenship is still one of the world's most precious commodities, so there should be no shortage of volunteers. Since proficiency in English would presumably be important for those joining the armed forces, we might focus on South Asia, anglophone Africa, and parts of Latin America, Europe and East Asia (the Philippines would be a natural recruiting ground) where English is common as a second language. These regions have more than 2 billion people, tens of millions of whom reach military age each year.

The problem would not be the size of the likely applicant pool so much as our ability to vet individuals for their abilities, their dependability and their commitment. Screening would have to be done to ensure that would-be terrorists did not gain access to the armed forces through this program. That might complicate the process of recruiting from certain countries, especially in the Middle East, but it would hardly put a huge dent in the likely applicant pool.

Unlike most issues in the immigration debate, the idea of offering citizenship to foreigners who first join the armed forces should be a winner for everyone. It is good for immigrants who wish to pursue U.S. citizenship, which they could not otherwise attain. It is good for a beleaguered American military that is simply too small for the tasks it has been handed. And it is good for the country, bringing more hardworking patriots to our shores. Before the all-volunteer force breaks, it is high time to consider the idea of such a latter-day foreign legion.

Max Boot is a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations and author of "War Made New: Technology, Warfare, and the Course of History, 1500 to Today." Michael O'Hanlon is a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and co-author of "Hard Power: The New Politics of National Security."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron: The Tale Of Two Sentencings (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

The surprisingly lenient prison sentence given recently to Enron Corp. former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow highlights the benefits of cooperating with federal criminal authorities. The coming sentencing of former Enron President Jeffrey Skilling is likely to demonstrate the dangers of fighting them.

DOJ_NMG_0083014

Mr. Fastow's six-year prison sentence came after the disgraced executive helped federal prosecutors nab others at Enron, including Mr. Skilling -- who was convicted, along with former company chairman Kenneth Lay, on conspiracy and fraud charges this year. Mr. Fastow was one of the government's main witnesses in that four-month trial.

Mr. Skilling, by contrast, fought the government with a defense effort that cost tens of millions of dollars. He has vowed to appeal his conviction on 19 counts and has asked the court to let him remain free pending his appeal. The 52-year-old Mr. Skilling is scheduled to be sentenced Monday by Judge Sim Lake and observers believe that he could get in the range of 20 years imprisonment. (Mr. Lay died several weeks after the trial of heart-related problems; this week his conviction was vacated, under established law that wipes away convictions for defendants who die before appeal.)

The likely discrepancy in prison terms for Messrs. Fastow and Skilling, widely considered to be two of the central figures of the Enron scandal, illustrates that there has never been a better time in the white-collar-crime world to rat on your colleagues.

Over the past half-decade, prison terms for financial crimes have ratcheted up. Where a convicted corporate executive could once expect probation or a few years in prison, a first-time offender now faces as long as life behind bars.

The surest way to avoid such a fate is to admit wrongdoing, cut a deal with prosecutors and help them nab others. The sentencing system "has developed a huge gulf between those who go to trial and those who cooperate," says Kirby Behre, a former federal prosecutor and co-author of a treatise on federal sentencing practices. While Mr. Skilling faces "an astronomical sentence," cooperators such as Mr. Fastow "are still getting sweet deals," says Mr. Behre, a partner in the Washington law office of Paul, Hastings, Janofsky & Walker.

One of the other giant corporate scandals of the past half-decade, WorldCom Inc., saw a discrepancy in the sentences given to its two main figures. Former WorldCom Chief Financial Officer Scott Sullivan cut a deal and testified against his onetime boss, former Chief Executive Bernard Ebbers, who was convicted of conspiracy and securities fraud. Mr. Sullivan received a five-year sentence. Mr. Ebbers received a 25-year sentence. Both are in prison. (WorldCom emerged from bankruptcy as MCI Inc., which was later acquired by Verizon Communications Inc.)

As a wave of possible corporate crime prosecutions looms -- this one involving the backdating of stock options -- the chasm between government cooperators and the people they testify against looms large.

The outbreak of corporate scandals that began with Enron's December 2001 collapse into bankruptcy helped fuel an existing trend toward ever-longer prison sentences for white-collar crime. Little of the rise in prison time has to do with protecting society from an Ebbers or a Skilling, observers say. Neither of those men is likely to be connected to a public company ever again. Rather, a long white-collar sentence is done for punishment and "the message it sends to others about the consequences of serious fraud," says Samuel Buell, a former prosecutor in the Justice Department's specially created Enron Task Force and now a law professor at Washington University in St. Louis, who acknowledges that he would have difficulty determining a proper sentence for Mr. Skilling.

Coming up with an appropriate sentence for the 44-year-old Mr. Fastow also proved complicated. His six-year sentence appears particularly sweet, given that he had agreed to accept a 10-year sentence when he made his plea deal with prosecutors in early 2004. The deal resolved a pending 98-count indictment that could have sent him to prison for 20 years.

However, the sentence still had to be reviewed by a judge. Last year, a Supreme Court decision gave federal judges more leeway in setting sentences. Previously, prison terms had largely been determined by a formula that took into account such factors as a defendant's role in the crime, his acceptance of responsibility, and, in cases of fraud, the dollar loss.

At Mr. Fastow's recent sentencing hearing, prosecutor John Hueston said the former finance chief's help had been "critical" in unraveling the Enron fraud. He added that without Mr. Fastow "we would not have convicted Mr. Lay." The prosecutor also said the defendant "appeared truly repentant," and he didn't object when a Fastow lawyer recommended a five-year prison term. In taking four years off the agreed-upon sentence, Judge Kenneth Hoyt said he was showing "mercy."

Given the severity of Mr. Fastow's crimes, any reduction from 10 years was "overly generous," said Leslie Caldwell, the original director of the Enron Task Force and now a partner at the Morgan, Lewis & Bockius law firm in New York. A Justice Department spokesman said the government is looking at an appeal.

Nobody expects prosecutors to say nice things about Mr. Skilling at his sentencing hearing in Houston. The government and Mr. Skilling's attorneys are battling over a host of issues that could affect the former Enron president's sentence.

One battle involves which set of sentencing guidelines to use, since amendments over the past half-decade have made corporate-fraud penalties steadily stiffer. The government is arguing for guideline amendments that went into effect Nov. 1, 2001, claiming that the criminal conspiracy continued until Enron's bankruptcy filing a month later. Defense attorneys argue for using the previous set of guidelines, since Mr. Skilling resigned from Enron in August 2001. The choice of guidelines could make a difference of several years or more in his sentence calculation, sentencing experts say. Estimates of the prison term Judge Lake will give to Mr. Skilling range from about 15 years to about 30 years.

Such numbers are a far cry from two decades ago when the federal sentencing guidelines first went into effect. (Before that, sentencing was left pretty much up to individual judges.) If Mr. Skilling were being sentenced under the original guidelines from the 1980s, says one sentencing expert, he would be facing about six to seven years in prison.

Stock Option Tremors Hit Md. Firm (BSUN)

By Jamie Smith Hopkins, Stacey Hirsh And Tricia Bishop

The Baltimore Sun, October 19, 2006

A stock options scandal has claimed the top two executives of Harford County technology company SafeNet Inc., part of an accelerating trend of resignations in corporate America stemming from investigations into whether option awards were rigged to maximize their value.

SafeNet announced Wednesday that Anthony A. Caputo, its chairman and chief executive, and Carole Argo, its president, chief operating officer and acting chief financial officer, voluntarily resigned Tuesday, effective immediately.

Their departure was the result of the company's continuing probe of stock option grants, SafeNet said.

"The issues related to stock options occurred under my leadership and I do not want my continued presence to be a distraction to the important work we perform for our customers every day," Caputo said in a statement Wednesday.

The information encryption and security company, which has contracts with numerous government agencies, tapped independent director Walter W. Straub as its new chairman and interim CEO.

Chris Fedde, senior vice president and general manager of SafeNet's enterprise security division, was named president and chief operating officer. John W. Frederick, SafeNet's vice president and worldwide controller, stepped up as chief accounting officer and interim chief financial officer.

The company, which employs 1,200 globally and about 200 in Harford County, is hiring an executive search firm to find a permanent chief executive and chief financial officer.

Caputo and Argo are the latest in a string of executives who have left their posts amid inquiries into whether options were back- dated to coincide with lows in the stock price rather than at a higher price on the date they were actually granted, ensuring a larger profit. Businesses are allowed to backdate options if they are properly taxed, accounted for and disclosed -- but if the options aren't, the practice is illegal. An option is a right granted by a company to buy its stock at a specified price.

Dozens of companies are under federal or internal scrutiny for stock option practices. Companies ranging from Apple Computer Inc. to McAfee Inc. have in recent weeks announced the resignations or firings of key officials. On Sunday, UnitedHealth Group said its chief executive had resigned.

From 2000 through 2005, SafeNet issued 5.2 million options to all employees, of which Caputo got 691,600 and Argo 295,000, documents filed with the SEC show. In the same period, Caputo exercised 150,000 options worth $6.4 million and Argo exercised 58,500 options worth $1.2 million, according to the documents.

In mid-May, when SafeNet disclosed it had received options-related inquiries from the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission, an analysis by The Sun found a multi-year pattern of grants priced at or near the bottom of short-term dips in the company's stock.

Some options grants to Caputo and other executives bore strike prices -- the amount the executive pays for the shares -- that were identical to the stock's lowest price for a full year. On Feb. 27, 2003, for instance, Caputo received 100,000 options when the stock was $16.47 -- the lowest price of the year. Eight months later, the stock was nearly $43 a share.

SafeNet's stock, which fell sharply after the probes were disclosed, dropped 79 cents Wednesday, to close at $21.20.

SafeNet formed a board committee in June to investigate the option grants. Last month the Belcamp company said it would have to revise financial statements from 2000 through March 31 because some grants made between 2000 and 2005 were accounted for "using incorrect measurement dates under applicable accounting rules in effect at the time." The additional expense it will have to record could total as much as $20 million, it said.

It was not clear Wednesday how much Caputo and Argo will receive as part of a severance package. Their contracts specify that they are entitled to accrued vacation and six months' severance pay if they voluntarily resign. But Straub, former CEO of a company acquired by SafeNet in 2004, said the board will decide what they will get and whether they will keep their stock options.

As of the end of last year, Caputo held 541,600 options worth $8 million -- all vested, meaning they can be cashed in. Argo held 276,500 options worth $3 million, of which two-thirds were vested.

Straub said the two executives were not asked to resign. He insisted there were no new developments in the investigation to prompt their same-day decisions.

"They both have been major contributors to the company, and they felt it was in the best interest so the management here could focus on the business, which is doing well," said Straub, who added that he is not planning major changes. "I'm sure they mutually agreed that it's time."

Straub would not comment on the internal investigation, other than to say it is continuing and he is aware of no new subpoenas.

At other companies under the shadow of backdating, the trend is for the boards to force the executives out, said Todd C. Weller, an analyst for Stifel Nicolaus & Co. in Baltimore.

"That would imply that either the executive benefited from some of the option backdating or they're taking the fall because it occurred under their watch," he said. Companies also take such action "to mitigate some of the risk from a company liability perspective," Weller said.

Several shareholder lawsuits alleging option manipulation have been filed against the company. Salvatore J. Graziano, a New York lawyer for some of the plaintiffs, said the resignations were "further evidence that wrongdoing occurred."

Daniel Ives, a vice president and analyst for Friedman Billings Ramsey, said Caputo's resignation helps divorce the company from its option troubles but also removes a leader who has been "a key ingredient in the success of the company."

But investors think it could work out for the best, said Weller, who reiterated his "buy" recommendation Wednesday. Jeffrey W. Englander, an independent analyst following the information security industry, said Wall Street "has gotten somewhat frustrated" with the executives' emphasis on acquisitions to drive growth.

None of the analysts owns SafeNet shares.

Caputo has been involved in SafeNet since 1986, first as an investor and soon after as CEO. Argo joined the company as chief financial officer in 1999. They "built a very strong organization," said Straub, the interim CEO.

"Our initial plan is basically to continue to execute our strategy, the strategy that has been developed by the company and the board," Staub said. "Things are progressing well, and our customer engagement is great ... so there's no real change in our vision or what we're doing."

SafeNet Officials Resign As Part Of Options Probe (WSJ)

By Zachary M. Seward

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

SafeNet Inc., a midsize information-security firm, cleared out the top of its executive suite as part of its probe into backdating of stock options.

Anthony A. Caputo, 65 years old, resigned as chairman and chief executive. Carole Argo, 45, president, chief operating officer and acting chief financial officer, also left the company. Neither could be reached to comment.

MORE ON OPTIONS

• Graphic: KLA's options grants1

• KLA Chairman, Sapient CEO Quit2

• Options Scorecard: Companies under scrutiny3

• Perfect Payday: Complete coverage4

The resignations at SafeNet follow similar departures earlier this week at UnitedHealth Group Inc., KLA-Tencor Corp. and Sapient Corp., also in connection to alleged options irregularities. The timing of the departures coincides with the need to file quarterly earnings reports. With a harsh spotlight shining on compensation practices, companies have been scrambling to wrap up internal options probes and make related adjustments to their books before they file their reports with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

SafeNet, of Belcamp, Md., previously said some options grants between 2000 and 2005 "were accounted for using incorrect measurement dates." The company has said it expects to record additional charges, less than $20 million, because of the grants, suggesting they were backdated or otherwise manipulated.

Options give a recipient the right to purchase stock at a set price. Backdating, or saying the options were granted earlier than they were, can create an instant increase in value, reducing an executive's incentive for stock growth. Backdating can also lead to accounting problems. SafeNet has received subpoenas from the U.S. attorney in New York and document requests from the SEC.

SafeNet named Walter W. Straub, 63, chairman and interim chief executive. Mr. Straub has served as an independent director since 2004. The company also promoted two vice presidents. Chris Fedde, 55, was named president and chief operating officer. John W. Frederick, 42, was named chief accounting and interim chief financial officer.

SafeNet garnered some attention this year after netting a contract to provide security for Swift, the international banking cooperative recently disclosed to have permitted U.S.-government monitoring of its transactions.

In 4 p.m. composite trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market, SafeNet's shares fell 79 cents, or 3.6%, to $21.20.

SafeNet's Top 2 Executives Resign After Stock Options Inquiry (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

SafeNet Inc., an information security firm in Maryland, said yesterday that its top two executives resigned after an inquiry into how stock options were issued.

Chairman and chief executive Anthony A. Caputo and President and Chief Operating Officer Carole D. Argo left their jobs immediately. Caputo had been with the company for 20 years, and Argo since 1999.

The two SafeNet executives join about 30 others nationwide who have stepped aside during stock-option inquiries. More than 100 companies have been investigated for the practice of backdating stock options, in which options are dated back to a time when the stock price is lower so the profit is higher after the options are exercised.

SafeNet said earlier that it received a subpoena from the U.S. attorney's office in New York related to the stock options issue. The Securities and Exchange Commission has also sent the firm a letter of informal inquiry requesting information.

An internal investigation at SafeNet continues, but the company has already said that certain options over the past six years were accounted for using incorrect dates. The company plans to restate its results between 2000 and this year.

SafeNet of Belcamp, which is north of Baltimore, specializes in developing encryption technology to protect data for commercial clients such as Bank of America and Nokia, as well as government customers including the Defense and Homeland Security departments. The company had $263 million in revenue last year and $3 million in profit.

Caputo said in a statement that he resigned because he thought it was in the company's "best interests."

"The issues related to stock options occurred under my leadership and I do not want my continued presence to be a distraction to the important work we perform for our customers every day," he said.

The company's board appointed Walter W. Straub, one of the directors, to be chairman and interim chief executive while a search firm tries to find a permanent replacement.

Argo was succeeded by Chris Fedde, who had been senior vice president and general manager of enterprise security.

The company also announced that John W. Frederick, the firm's vice president and worldwide controller, became chief accounting officer and interim chief financial officer.

DOJ_NMG_0083018

Straub has been on the company's board since 2004. He previously was president and chief executive of Rainbow Technologies Inc., which merged with SafeNet two years ago.

The stock option inquiry is not the only obstacle the company faces. SafeNet faces possible default on $250 million in debt because it did not file its second-quarter results on time.

Straub said yesterday that the resignations would not affect SafeNet's business.

"Tony and Carole have built a very strong global management team. So from an operations standpoint, our business is in great shape," Straub said.

SafeNet shares fell 79 cents yesterday, to $21.20.

Senate Panel Seeks Details On McGuire's Exit Pay (WSJ)

By Robert Tomsho

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

The Senate Finance Committee, wading once again into the stock-options scandal, asked UnitedHealth Group Inc. for an array of documents related to the $1.1 billion in compensation that William McGuire, its departing chief executive, could receive when he leaves the company.

"The UnitedHealth situation is the most disturbing yet," said Sen. Chuck Grassley, the committee chairman and an Iowa Republican. "The news reports make it sound like the CEO had the board of directors over a barrel and helped himself to whatever he could get, even with the taint of stock-options backdating allegations against him."

Dr. McGuire's attorney, David Brodsky, didn't return a call seeking comment. Mark Lindsay, a UnitedHealth spokesman, said the company "will certainly cooperate fully with the Senate and any other parties looking into this matter."

Dr. McGuire agreed to leave the big health insurer, based in Minnetonka, Minn., on Sunday, after an internal investigation found that millions of stock options, including many to himself, were improperly backdated at the company during his tenure.

On Tuesday, The Wall Street Journal reported that, under the terms of his employment contract, Dr. McGuire could leave with as much as $1.1 billion in stock options, retirement payouts and other benefits. Dr. McGuire and the company are currently negotiating the terms of his departure.

Documents requested by the Senate committee, which held a hearing on the stock-options issue in September, include copies of Dr. McGuire's employment contract, along with related legal opinions and lists of consultants and other outside-compensation advisers.

UnitedHealth is also being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission, federal prosecutors in New York and the Minnesota attorney general.

McGuire's Deal Is Focus Of U.S. Senate Inquiry (MINNST)

By David Phelps And Chris Serres, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 19, 2006

The Finance Committee has requested data about McGuire's employment and severance agreements.

Some of the U.S. Senate's most influential members are taking aim at the multimillion-dollar severance package of outgoing UnitedHealth Group Inc. CEO William McGuire.

Leaders of the Senate Finance Committee on Wednesday asked the Minnetonka company to provide specific information about McGuire's severance package, as well as his employment contract.

"I want to know how a top executive can lose his job for allegedly defrauding his own company's investors, but still get rewarded with a billion dollars for doing it," committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said in a prepared statement.

"Congress has a duty to the taxpayers to find out what happened at UnitedHealth and figure out what to do to stop this flood of backdating scandals."

Grassley, along with ranking minority member Max Baucus, D-Mont., made the request to UnitedHealth Chairman Richard Burke, soon-to-be Chief Executive Stephen Hemsley and James Johnson, chairman of the board's compensation committee.

Baucus accused McGuire and other executives tainted by backdated stock options of "gaming the law to avoid paying their fair share of taxes on stock options and other benefits."

On Sunday, McGuire resigned as chairman and agreed to step down as CEO by Dec. 1. His decision came after an independent review of the company's stock-option program for senior executives found that the options were likely backdated to a low point in the stock's value to maximize profit when the options were exercised at a higher price.

McGuire has more than $1 billion worth of unexercised options. His employment agreement also provides for a lump-sum payout of $6.4 million when he leaves the company and an annual pension of $5.09 million, according to the 2006 proxy statement.

UnitedHealth said Sunday that it is "engaged in discussions" with McGuire over terms of his departure, including his financial benefits, raising the prospect that the CEO could be leaving under different terms than those called for by his contract.

Among the records sought by the Finance Committee are McGuire's employment contract and supporting documentation, any benefits McGuire will receive after he leaves the company, the names of advisers and consultants who helped draft the employment agreement, the amount of federal tax deductions claimed by UnitedHealth with respect to McGuire's compensation since 1994 and steps being taken "to remedy the various failures" cited in the independent review regarding executive compensation.

The committee set a Nov. 9 deadline for UnitedHealth to respond to the requests.

In a separate development Wednesday, UnitedHealth said it arranged a $7.5 billion line of credit for "working capital purposes," as well as to deal with any litigation related to the company's debt.

On Aug. 28, the company received a notice of default from a group claiming to hold UnitedHealth debt securities. The company has said it believes it is not in default and "intends to defend itself vigorously," according to a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Sheryl Skolnick, a stock analyst at CRT Capital Group in Stamford, Conn., said the 364-day revolving credit facility is "insurance" in case the company loses its legal battle with owners of its debt and loses access to capital.

"What they have essentially just done is to arrange exactly enough money on demand to pay off all the debt in case any or all of it is in default," she said.

"It's a huge vote of confidence in the company," she added. "That they could arrange $7.5 billion, virtually overnight, is remarkable."

David Phelps • dphelps@startribune.com • 612-673-7269 Chris Serres • cserres@startribune.com • 612-673-4308

UnitedHealth Pressed Over Ex-CEO's Pay (FT)

By Jeremy Grant In Washington

Financial Times, October 19, 2006

The unfolding stock options backdating scandal at United Healthgroup on Tuesday prompted an outcry from top US lawmakers when Chuck Grassley, chair of the senate's finance committee, demanded details of the departing CEO's severance package.

William McGuire this week resigned from the health insurer when an external probe implicated him in manipulating stock options.

The Wall Street Journal reported on Wednesday that he was likely to walk away with $1.1bn in stock options and other benefits.

When questionable use of stock option compensation hit the headlines, it emerged that scores of companies - either by failing to do the proper accounting or make the necessary disclosures to shareholders - appeared to have improperly awarded options with a lower exercise price than on the day that the award was made.

A probe by law firm Wilmer Hale found Mr McGuire was central to the company's options granting process and that the "full extent and nature" of financial relationships between him and the then-chairman of the company's compensation committee that had created a conflict of interest in 1999 "likely were not disclosed" to the board at the time.

Mr Grassley and the committee's ranking member, Max Baucus, wrote to United Healthgroup, saying: "The news reports make it sound like the CEO had the board of directors over a barrel and helped himself to whatever he could get, even with the taint of stock options backdating allegations against him."

DOJ_NMG_0083020

Mr McGuire accumulated $1.6bn in stock options between his appointment in 1991 and the end of 2005.

During the same period, the group's share price rose by 2,500 per cent. Mr McGuire was regarded by Wall Street as one of the most effective CEOs in the US.

But the senators said: "[We] want to know how a top executive can lose his job for allegedly defrauding his company's own investors, but still get rewarded with a billion dollars for doing it."

Among other things, the senators asked United Healthgroup to "provide the amount of federal tax deductions claimed by UnitedHealth with respect to compensation paid to Mr McGuire since 1994; and provide the amount of such deductible compensation that has been "performance-based" and what criteria or metrics were used to determine if compensation was deemed "performance-based."

In September, the committee convened a hearing to hear from the Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the Internal Revenue Service about how they are responding to stock options backdating and what congress can do to help their efforts.

Investing (BSWK)

By Jane Sasseen

BusinessWeek, October 19, 2006

The Ties UnitedHealth Failed to Disclose For years, the health insurer didn't tell investors about personal and financial links between its former CEO and the "independent" director in charge of compensation

In its 1999 proxy statement, UnitedHealth Group made sure investors knew of a few small relationships between its directors and the company. While reassuring shareholders that all the directors on its compensation committee were independent of management, it pointed out that the insurer paid immaterial amounts for insurance policies bought from the company headed by one director, while the law firm of Walter Mondale, another board member, was also the company's corporate counsel.

Following the New York Stock Exchange's 2004 imposition of stricter standards for director independence, UnitedHealth (UNH) had eliminated even those minor ties by the time the 2005 proxy was filed. This time, it told investors that all the members of its comp committee met the NYSE's independence test, and that no relationships or ties existed between directors and the company.

How nice of them to share. Of course, what the proxy neglected to mention were significant personal and financial ties between ousted CEO William McGuire, and William Spears, a New York investment adviser and long-time head of UnitedHealth's compensation committee.

Controversial Agreement Those ties were outlined in a report, released Monday, prepared for the UnitedHealth board by William McLucas, a former head of the SEC's enforcement division and now with the Washington, D.C., law firm of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr. According to the report, Spears has served as a trustee since 1992 for two trusts set up for McGuire's children. And from 1994 to mid-2006, he also acted as an investment manager for McGuire, overseeing assets ranging from $15 million to $55 million in 2006.

In June, 1999, the CEO even invested $500,000 in Spears's money-management firm when he bought it back from the larger conglomerate that then owned it. Several months before, Spears was the company's point person in negotiating what proved to be a highly lucrative, highly controversial employment agreement for McGuire.

Nor is McGuire the only company executive with a financial relationship with Spears. Stephen Hemsley, who was named Oct. 16 to succeed McGuire as UnitedHealth's chief executive, also hired Spears to manage his money. Starting with a $12 million account in 2001, by 2006, Spears was managing $52 million of Hemsley's money as well. As a result of the probe, Spears has agreed to leave UnitedHealth's board (see BusinessWeek.com, 10/16/06, "Hard Times for UnitedHealth").

Declaration of Independence All of which has raised an obvious question: Just how could a director with those substantial—and presumably remunerative—ties to key officers be considered independent? And why weren't those ties made clear to shareholders? "It's a real stretch to say this guy is independent," says Jacob Frenkel, a securities lawyer and former SEC enforcement official. "The company and its principals will be hard pressed to justify a rationale for not disclosing that relationship."

DOJ_NMG_0083021

The answer appears to lie in how independence is defined. Before 2004, when the disputed grants occurred, the standards in place were vague. Legal experts say it's unclear whether Spears would have met them. But in the wake of Enron, WorldCom, and other corporate scandals, both the NYSE and Nasdaq strengthened the rules concerning independent directors for the companies listed on their exchanges. The SEC vetted those rules but has no separate requirements for independence of its own.

At the NYSE, where UnitedHealth's stock is listed, all directors on a compensation committee must be independent, meaning they should have no material relationship with the company. A director or an immediate family member can't have been an employee of the company within the last three years, for example, or have been an executive officer of any other firm that has either made payments to, or received payments from, the company in excess of $1 million.

The Element of Surprise But while the rules are explicit in forbidding certain links between the directors and the company, they never specifically address relationships that might exist between directors themselves. Indeed, they're strangely silent on the potential problems that could arise from outside ties between directors. Instead, boards are asked generally to consider the other "persons or organizations with which the director has an affiliation" when assessing the materiality of a director's relationship with the company.

That lack of specificity may have led McGuire, Hemsley, and Spears to conclude that their financial relationships didn't have to be disclosed to investors. But experts say they may have strayed perilously close to the legal edge—and indeed may well have crossed over it. "The question is what was said [to shareholders] about the relationships they had, and whether that would be rendered false and misleading by the new facts," says Donald Langevoort, a professor of securities law at Georgetown University.

"Post-Sarbanes Oxley, there's so much emphasis on director independence that any fact that would come as a surprise to shareholders should be disclosed, so that they won't be surprised." Through a company spokesman, McGuire and Hemsley declined to comment on Oct. 17. Spears also declined to comment.

Close to the Edge If nothing else, those ties should have been reported to the rest of the board, which, under current NYSE rules, would then have been required to assess whether Spears truly qualified as independent. While the board would still have had the right to conclude that Spears' judgment wasn't influenced by those ties, it would have been required to let shareholders know how they reached that conclusion.

"The whole purpose of these regulations is to say that if something is close to the line, it should be disclosed, and a board waiver secured," says John Coffee, a professor at Columbia Law School.

But none of this appears to have happened at UnitedHealth. According to McLucas' report, McGuire and Spears said they believed that the board was aware of the money management relationship in 1999. In October of that year, UnitedHealth's general counsel, David Lubben, sent an e-mail to the company's outside counsel outlining McGuire's financial relationship with Spears, and indicated that some disclosure of a "conflict" had been made to the full board.

Claiming No Knowledge However, McLucas found no documentation or board minutes to back this up and says no other directors recalled being aware of the relationship when Spears was negotiating McGuire's 1999 employment contract. It's unclear when they later learned of those links—or that Hemsley, too, had hired Spears.

And all of the directors said they were unaware that McGuire's investment in Spears's firm, which ended in 2003, had taken place until the recent probes into options began. A source close to the probe says no evidence exists that the directors knew of Spears's role as a trustee for McGuire's children either.

Moreover, there's no evidence that the board reconsidered whether Spears still qualified as an independent director or discussed the need to disclose those financial ties to shareholders after the NYSE tightened up its disclosure rules.

No Job Too Small Governance experts say that the lack of public disclosure appears particularly egregious, in light of the potential sums involved. Directors now are routinely forced to disclose links that appear to offer far less potential for personal gain than may have occurred at United.

DOJ_NMG_0083022

If a director works for another firm that does business with the company, or has a relative working for the firm, those links must be disclosed no matter how small the sum or how minor the job. "If the amounts involved are de minimus, that's not going to affect independence," says Robert McCormick, head of proxy research for financial advisers Glass Lewis. But given the amounts of money involved at UnitedHealth, "this deal raises lots of concerns."

While the exact terms of Spears's deal with McGuire and Hemsley aren't known, the relationship appears to have given him plenty of potential for gain. Money managers typically pocket fees starting at 0.5% of assets under management for accounts of around $50 million. For complex investment strategies, the fees could run higher.

How Widespread a Problem? But even at that rate, Spears could have made roughly $250,000 a year from both McGuire and Hemsley for overseeing their accounts. Moreover, in negotiating McGuire's 1999 contract, Spears potentially had a direct interest in increasing McGuire's pay: As a money manager, the more money your client makes and has available to invest, the more you typically earn.

For shareholders, the UnitedHealth disclosures raise a further question: Do directors at other boards have personal ties that have gone unreported as well? For now, there's no way of knowing, because of the lack of clarity in the rules governing such ties.

But that could change. Securities experts say the NYSE will be forced to look closely at the language in the current regulations to see if UnitedHealth or its executives have clearly breached them. Ultimately, the flagrancy of UnitedHealth's weak disclosures could lead the exchanges to beef up their regulations to more explicitly deal with relationships between directors.

Barred for Life The questionable disclosure also raises the legal stakes for all involved. Questions about Spears's independence could bolster attempts by shareholders suing over the alleged backdating of options and McGuire's compensation to win money back from McGuire and even the directors themselves. With the SEC and federal prosecutors still weighing whether to bring civil or criminal charges over the alleged backdating against UnitedHealth and its execs, further charges related to the poor disclosure could also be added.

Columbia professor Coffee also believes that the new revelations could put Spears more squarely in the SEC's sights. If they conclude he misrepresented his independence, they could seek to have him barred for life from serving as a director of a public company. Moreover, Coffee says that if McGuire, Hemsley, or Spears were found to have misled other directors about their relationships, that would increase the chances of criminal charges being filed.

All of that, as much as any change in the NYSE's rulebook, would make clear the fact that such relationships don't pass the smell test. "We would essentially see the regulations strengthened through enforcement," says Frenkel.

Sasseen is a national correspondent for BusinessWeek

Ex-Delphi Execs Face Civil Fraud Charges (DEN)

By David Shepardson

Detroit News, October 19, 2006

SEC says top financial officers used accounting schemes to hide supplier's troubled finances.

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission is expected to file civil fraud charges this month against up to a dozen former Delphi Corp. executives following a 27-month investigation into accounting fraud at the bankrupt Troy auto supplier, people familiar with the situation said.

Among those expected to face civil charges are John Blahnik, the former Delphi vice president of treasury, mergers and acquisitions; Laura Marion, who had served as director of financial accounting and reporting; and Paul R. Free, former chief accounting officer, the people said.

The SEC also is expected to file civil charges against several officials at other companies involved in improper transactions with Delphi, The Detroit News has learned.

Those charged, if they are found liable, could face hefty fines and be barred from serving as a board member or corporate officer at publicly traded companies. Delphi spokeswoman Claudia Piccinin declined to comment Wednesday, except to say that the company continues to cooperate with the SEC.

Last year, Delphi acknowledged several instances of improper accounting and restated several years of earnings.

DOJ_NMG_0083023

The SEC's investigation has found that Delphi used varied improper methods to inflate earnings, cash flow and revenue, which hid the declining health of the company, according to people familiar with the matter.

Several large transactions weren't accounted for properly, including a $237 million payment Delphi made to its former parent, General Motors Corp.

The SEC has concluded that Delphi also called some loans from suppliers "rebates" and engaged in false transactions by claiming it had sold precious metals or scrap materials to boost cash flow.

Delphi also failed to notify its board or credit rating agencies about $300 million in European lines of credit it held between 1999 and the end of 2004.

Thanks in part to the now-discredited transactions, Delphi met or exceeded Wall Street earnings expectations in every quarter between 1999 and 2003.

"It's clear they were trying to make that last penny of earnings," said Peter Henning, a Wayne State law professor and former SEC and Justice Department lawyer.

As a result of the accounting errors, Delphi lowered its 2001 earnings by $265 million, cut 2002 net income by $24 million and adjusted its 2003 net loss by $46 million. It said its cash flow was improperly boosted by $200 million in 2000.

Lawyers for many of the former Delphi executives under scrutiny have argued to the SEC that there is no evidence they personally profited from the improper accounting. They also contend that before the Enron debacle and the 2002 corporate reforms, some of the accounting practices in question were commonplace.

It was biggest supplier in '99

After its spinoff from GM in 1999, Delphi was the world's largest auto supplier with revenue of $29 billion.

Last October, Delphi filed for bankruptcy protection and announced plans to close 21 of its 29 U.S. factories, including several in Michigan.

The company is in talks with GM, the UAW and several large investors to finalize a settlement of claims and to allow Delphi to emerge from bankruptcy protection in the second quarter of 2007.

Most of those now restated transactions took place in 2000 and 2001 when Delphi said it was selling off hundreds of millions of dollars in scrap materials and precious metals -- generating income and cash flow -- when in reality the supplier had agreed to buy back the same assets in the future.

Delphi has acknowledged that these were financing transactions and not sales. In another case, Delphi allegedly booked sales of scrap material destined for landfills as expensive electronic inventory as a way to boost its cash flow.

In December 2000, Delphi recorded a $200 million sale of precious metals to Bank One, which improperly boosted its income by $100 million. Delphi didn't disclose that the precious metals never left the factory floors or that it had a contract to repurchase the materials at a fixed price.

In March 2005, following a 10-month internal investigation led by an outside law firm, Delphi ousted Free and its chief financial officer, Alan Dawes, and said many of the company's financial statements were inaccurate.

Most of the former executives under investigation by the SEC agreed to waive the statute of limitations until Oct 31. Several lawyers close to the case have been told to expect SEC charges by then. The commission is scheduled to meet next week in Washington to approve the filing of the complaints in U.S. District Court in Detroit.

It's not clear if Dawes or ex-Chairman and CEO J.T. Battenberg III -- who both have been subjects of the SEC investigation -- will be among those named in the civil complaints. Battenberg was questioned by the SEC earlier this year.

FBI: Criminal investigation

The criminal investigation by the FBI and U.S. Postal Inspection Service continues, led by Justice's fraud section in Washington.

In June, The News reported that at least seven ex-Delphi executives had received "Wells" notices from the SEC, which notify targets of an investigation of the substance of the staff's charges and probable recommendations.

Since then, several other former executives have received notices in a widening probe that includes roughly a dozen former executives. Some former lower-level Delphi employees, who testified before the SEC more than a year ago, recently were notified they were likely to face civil charges.

DOJ_NMG_0083024

Many of the targets have been in settlement talks with the SEC. The SEC has sought to impose stiff fines against former executives -- in some cases nearly $1 million -- in the Delphi investigation. It isn't clear if any settlements have been reached or if Delphi will have to pay a corporate penalty.

Early this month, the five-member SEC received a detailed memo from the staff attorneys investigating Delphi outlining the proposed charges. The commission must approve the filing of any charges.

The SEC's investigation has been led by three attorneys in the enforcement section: Jonathan P. Scott, Kenneth R. Lynch and Anthony Sporkin. All declined comment. The SEC has also scrutinized Delphi transactions with Bank One, GM, Tennessee-based Setech, and BBK Ltd., a Southfield-based turnaround firm. The commission also looked at the role of Delphi's former independent auditor, Deloitte & Touche. All of those companies turned over records to the SEC.

Last November, GM said it had overstated income for 2001 by approximately $300 million to $400 million -- or about 25 to 35 percent -- in connection with supplier credits. GM has said it received an SEC subpoena into "our transactions in precious metal raw materials used in our automotive manufacturing operations, and a federal grand jury recently issued a subpoena in connection with supplier credits."

The investigation into Delphi began after EDS -- another former GM subsidiary -- told the SEC in June 2004 about a $20 million loan in 2001 that Delphi booked as income. The SEC upgraded its probe into a formal investigation in August 2004.

One hurdle to settling SEC claims is the still active criminal investigation into the accounting fraud led by the Justice Department's fraud section. Jack Patrick, the lead Justice Department prosecutor, has been in Detroit in recent weeks working on the case. Patrick declined comment. Lawyers for shareholders who have sued Delphi and its former officers say the suit and the company's October 2005 bankruptcy are "the result of a massive accounting fraud."

"By any measure, the fraud at Delphi -- which hid Delphi's slide into bankruptcy -- is among the most egregious schemes to defraud investors in recent history," the plaintiffs said in a 147-page court filing in Detroit signed by Southfield lawyer Debra Pevos.

The filing suggested there were $440 million in sham transactions.

All of those suits have been consolidated in front of U.S. District Judge Gerald E. Rosen in Detroit, who hasn't ruled on whether they can go forward.

You can reach David Shepardson at (202) 662-8735 or dshepardson@detnews.com.

CRIMINAL LAW:

78 Charged In Bankruptcy Fraud Sting (AP-YBIZ)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, October 19, 2006

78 People Charged in the Past Two Months in National Bankruptcy Fraud Sting

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Nine lawyers, an ex-police officer and an electrician who bribed a former governor were among 78 people charged with bankruptcy fraud in the past two months, the Justice Department said Wednesday.

Eighteen of the arrests came this week alone, said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, who outlined the nationwide crackdown on people trying to conceal more than $3 million in assets.

"In the end, we all wind up paying for fraud, in the form of higher interest rates and fees from companies that offer credit and loans," McNulty told reporters.

Bankruptcy fraud often follows false claims on mortgages, banks and the mail, McNulty said.

The arrests are on track to outpace last year's estimated total of 100 bankruptcy fraud cases, the FBI said.

The names of those charged were not released in Washington, although a department investigator said a former Denver police officer was snared in the two-month sting, dubbed "Operation Truth or Consequences."

Among those charged was Kurt Claywell, an electrical contractor who admitted giving former Connecticut Gov. John G. Rowland expensive champagne and Cuban cigars for access to state contracts. Authorities in New Haven, Conn., said the assets Claywell tried to hide included a boat, a rare book collection, 35 acres of land, $35,000 worth of wine and a gun collection.

A dozen of the arrests came in the Chicago area, where federal prosecutor David Glockner described swindlers who used bankruptcy fraud in home-rescue schemes marketed to people desperate to hang onto their homes.

Under these schemes, homeowners facing foreclosure sell their homes to "investors," prosecutors said. They said the former homeowners then pay rent to the investors with the promise that they can get back both the homes and built-up equity when their finances are healthier.

Prosecutors said crooked attorneys then declare bankruptcy on behalf of the former homeowners, illegally hiding the sale from the bankruptcy court, paying off the mortgage and pocketing the equity.

The former homeowners then are allowed to buy back the property at full price if they can afford to do so.

"This is the new face of bankruptcy fraud," Glockner said.

Associated Press writers Mike Robinson in Chicago and John Christoffersen in New Haven, Conn., contributed to this report.

Feds Charge 78 With Bankruptcy Fraud (CNN)

By Terry Frieden, Justice Producer

CNN.com, October 19, 2006

Sweep nets 9 lawyers, 1 ex-police officer for concealed assets, fake IDs, docs.

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Bankruptcy fraud charges have been filed against 78 people in a federal operation aimed at protecting the integrity of the nation's bankruptcy system, the Justice Department and FBI announced Wednesday.

Authorities said the nationwide sweep culminated Wednesday with arrests stemming from 18 cases of bankruptcy fraud and related counts.

Those charged include nine lawyers, two bankruptcy petition preparers and a former police officer. The cases involved concealment of more than $3 million in assets, use of false identities and forged documents, and fraudulent receipt of government loans and benefits, officials said.

"Bankruptcy fraud is often the tip of the criminal iceberg, and that makes these prosecutions so important," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty.

Bankruptcy filings often are the last step of a series of criminal acts that include mortgage fraud, bank fraud, mail fraud, money laundering and defrauding of government programs, he said.

The culmination of "Operation Truth or Consequences" coincided with the anniversary of new bankruptcy laws aimed at combating fraud.

Bankruptcy law not as bad as predicted

Authorities said the 78 people charged were named in 69 prosecutions in 36 judicial districts.

FBI Assistant Director Chip Burrus issued a statement staying the nationwide sweep "highlights the scope of bankruptcy fraud and negative impact on the economy."

Top law enforcement officials planned to announce details of the operation at an afternoon news conference at the Justice Department in Washington.

Nationwide Fraud Sweep Nets 3 In Pa. (PTR)

By Karen Roebuck

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, October 19, 2006

A Sewickley attorney and two other Western Pennsylvania residents were indicted this week as part of a nationwide crackdown on bankruptcy fraud and related crimes.

Attorney Robin L. Grassel, 42, faces two counts of embezzlement from bankruptcy estates. She is among 78 people nationwide -- including nine attorneys -- charged as part of what the U.S. Department of Justice dubbed "Operation Truth or Consequences."

The allegations leveled nationwide include concealing more than $3 million in assets, using fake identities and Social Security numbers, forging documents and defrauding people whose homes were in foreclosure.

The Justice Department announced Wednesday it has set up an e-mail hotline for the public to report suspected bankruptcy fraud. Reports can be sent to USTP.Bankruptcy.Fraud@usdog.gov.

Grassel, also known as Robin Musher, was representing clients in bankruptcy proceedings and administering their funds when she embezzled or misappropriated the funds, the indictment charges.

She embezzled $104,832.94 from the bankruptcy estate of clients identified only as MW and PW and $47,420.28 from Jimmie and Joyce B., according to the indictment.

Bankruptcy trustee Ronda J. Winnecour previously said that Michael and Patti Weber, who filed for Chapter 13 bankruptcy in 2002, sold their Crafton house in 2004 for $104,832.94. A check issued in Winnecour's name for the home's sale was given to Grassel, their attorney, but ended up in Grassel's business account instead of the Webers' trustee account, according to court records.

Catherine Jeter, of Ambridge, Beaver County, was charged with forging U.S. Bankruptcy Court Judge Judith K. Fitzgerald's signature in June on a court order to discharge her bankruptcy case, according to the indictment.

George Davitch Jr., 62, of Jerome, Somerset County, was charged with making a false statement under penalty of perjury in his 2001 bankruptcy case by failing to report income he continued to receive from an inheritance, according to the indictment.

If convicted, Grassel, Jeter and Davitch, none of whom could be reached for comment, face up to five years in prison and a fine up to $250,000 on each count.

The U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of Pennsylvania is asking that a summons be issued for each of the defendants instead of arrest warrants and suggested unsecured, $10,000 bonds be set for each.

Karen Roebuck can be reached at kroebuck@tribweb.com or (412) 320-7939.

Feds Crack Down On Bankruptcy Fraud (UPI)

UPI, October 19, 2006

U.S. prosecutors have filed criminal charges against 78 people for alleged bankruptcy fraud and related offenses.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said Wednesday federal prosecutors charged individuals in 69 separate prosecutions in 36 judicial districts in a national project called "Operation Truth or Consequences."

The project includes charges filed against nine lawyers, two bankruptcy petition preparers and one former law enforcement officer. Charges include alleged concealment of more than $3 million in assets and the alleged use of false Social Security numbers and false identities.

"Today we send a clear message to those who abuse, for their own criminal financial gain, the bankruptcy system's promise of a fresh start to honest Americans," said McNulty. "A bankruptcy filing is often the last step of a series of criminal acts, including mortgage fraud, bank fraud, mail fraud, money laundering and government program fraud. Bankruptcy fraud is often the tip of the criminal iceberg, and that makes these prosecutions so important."

McNulty also announced the creation of a new Internet hotline for reporting suspected bankruptcy fraud to the Justice Department's U.S. Trustee Program.

Ariz. Residents Indicted In Bankruptcy Fraud (AZREP)

By Dennis Wagner, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, October 19, 2006

Two federal fraud prosecutions under way in Arizona are part of a nationwide campaign to thwart abuse of U.S. bankruptcy courts, according to the Justice Department.

One of the cases was filed in August against attorney James Joseph Everett, 51, who is accused of concealing about $500,000 in assets and income. The other indictment names three family members from southern Arizona accused of seeking bankruptcy protection as part of a larger swindle of government funds.

Those cases are among 69 filed nationally under Operation Truth or Consequences, launched to protect the integrity of the bankruptcy system, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said in a news release.

advertisement

Federal prosecutors also announced the creation of an Internet hotline for reporting suspected bankruptcy fraud at USTP.Bankruptcy.Fraud@usdoj.gov.

McNulty said 18 of the cases were filed Wednesday to deliver "a clear message to those who abuse, for their own financial gain, the bankruptcy system's promise of a fresh start to honest Americans. . . . Bankruptcy is often the tip of the criminal iceberg, and that makes these prosecutions so important."

In Phoenix, Everett was indicted on 34 counts, including money laundering, false declarations and bankruptcy fraud. The U.S. Attorney's Office said he used $300,000 in concealed funds to purchase a house in Paradise Valley. Everett faces a maximum 20-year prison sentence for money laundering, the most serious offense.

The other Arizona case involves Sergio and Sandra Renteria of Willcox and their daughter, Kayla Taylor. They were indicted in August on charges of conspiracy and fraud in connection with an $800,000 loan from the Farm Service Agency. They are accused of failing to repay the loan while selling crops and equipment pledged as collateral. The indictment says Taylor also used loan money to buy a pair of Mercedes Benz cars. Finally, the Renterias are charged with filing for bankruptcy while hiding assets from the court. They face up to 30 years in prison.

Weldon Undecided On Letter (PHI)

By Todd Mason And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 19, 2006

U.S. Rep. Curt Weldon (R., Pa.) said he hasn't decided whether to release a letter from the House Ethics Committee that he says "closed the case" on whether he used his influence to help his daughter.

The FBI is probing whether Weldon helped his daughter Karen and friend Charles P. Sexton Jr. land $1 million in contracts from a Russian energy firm and a Serbian family with ties to Slobodan Milosevic.

"My kids do their own work," the 10-term congressman told a media scrum yesterday in the Ridley Township Municipal Building after a hearing on flight-path changes at Philadelphia International Airport.

Weldon is in a neck-and-neck race against retired Adm. Joe Sestak, a 31-year Navy veteran who was raised in Springfield, Delaware County. Because of the disclosure of the FBI investigation last week, political observers say the race is now leaning in the Democrat's favor.

Yesterday, Weldon repeated his claim that he presented documents to the Ethics Committee in 2004 when the Los Angeles Times broke the story, and the committee didn't pursue the matter.

Weldon and his attorney, William J. Winning, said they hadn't decided yet whether to release the committee's letter.

A source close to the Weldon campaign said the four-page document, dated Sept. 29, discusses the allegations about Weldon's daughter and dismisses them without issuing a warning or reprimand.

In an e-mail advertisement Monday, headlined "Left-Wing Smears Have Sunk to New Low," the Weldon campaign said the House panel closed the case in 2004, and blamed Democrats for trying to derail Weldon's reelection.

Sources said the FBI had planned to implement the search warrants after the election and, in fact, had been wiretapping some people involved in the case.

The wiretaps and search warrants were approved by federal judges based on a sealed and detailed affidavit from an FBI agent establishing "probable cause" that crimes had been committed. The searches were carried out Monday because agents feared that once suspects in the case knew they were under investigation, evidence might be destroyed, sources said.

Russ Caso, Weldon's chief of staff, told The Inquirer that the Ethics Committee letter was not issued until last month because of the committee's disarray in recent years.

Weldon escalated the attack on Sestak yesterday, saying that a retired FBI agent, Gregory J. Auld, told him that Sestak's campaign had prior knowledge of six FBI raids Monday in Philadelphia and Jacksonville, Fla.

Weldon said Auld "has confirmed to me that a person who works on my opponent's campaign was bragging that the campaign knew three weeks ago" of a major negative development in October.

Ryan Rudominer, a spokesman for Sestak, said: "Curt Weldon's bizarre conspiracy theories are absurd and, of course, false. The idea that our campaign has any influence over the FBI or the Republican-led Justice Department is laughable."

DOJ_NMG_0083028

Auld, who worked 32 years for the bureau, operates a private security company in Newtown Square that has performed background checks on behalf of the Weldon campaign.

In an interview last night, Auld said a friend approached him Tuesday at a gym to tell about what the Sestak supporter had allegedly said three weeks ago. Auld would not identify the friend.

Auld said: "My friend told me that a guy wearing a Sestak T-shirt had said, 'Something big is going to be coming down on Curt Weldon in three weeks.' "

Hearing this, Auld said, he approached the unidentified Sestak supporter at the gym and said: "You guys must be happy about what happened over the weekend."

He said the Sestak supporter shrugged and replied: "We sniffed this out two weeks ago."

David Landau, a Sestak adviser, said: "That somehow all of this is being manufactured by Democrats is ludicrous... . This is the Republican National Committee playbook: Blame the Democrats."

Weldon shrugged off observations yesterday by reporters that the probe reportedly began in May, before Sestak had emerged as serious candidate, and that the FBI and the Justice Department answer to a Republican administration.

The investigation "is what it is," Weldon said. "The bureaucracy doesn't change with the presidential leadership." Weldon said he was telling Republicans that "I have to rely on their support for me in the past."

7 Plead Guilty In Stolen Body Parts Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-Seven funeral home directors linked to a scheme to plunder corpses and sell the body parts for transplants have secretly pleaded guilty to undisclosed charges, prosecutors announced Wednesday.

The unidentified directors all agreed to cooperate in an ongoing investigation into what investigators describe as an enterprise to steal bone and tissue from cadavers and sell the material to biomedical supply companies for profit, Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes said.

The seven entered their pleas in closed courtrooms and their names were withheld, but defense attorneys said that among those cooperating was the director of a funeral home that took parts from the body of "Masterpiece Theatre" host Alistair Cooke.

Funeral Home Directors Plead Guilty In Organ Smuggling Case (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 19, 2006

Seven US funeral home directors have pleaded guilty to trafficking bones and organs taken from hundreds of cadavers, authorities said.

The guilty pleas in New York came eight months after four other people were charged with illegally harvesting bones and organs from more than 1,000 corpses, including the bones of the late veteran BBC broadcaster Alistair Cooke.

The Justice Department announced Wednesday that it had expanded its indictment against the four, Michael Mastromarino, Joseph Nicelli, Lee Cruceta, and Christopher Aldorasi.

"These ghoulish thieves thought they could pull off the crime of the century, stealing bones from the dead, without any thoughts to their victims' families or the transplant recipients who would receive possibly tainted bone and tissue grafts," Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes said in a statement.

Funeral homes in Rochester, Manhattan, Brooklyn and the Bronx have been accused of providing corpses for the organ smuggling scheme.

In announcing the indictment in February, authorities alleged that the four men made millions of dollars selling body tissue to transplant companies.

In many cases, the bones were replaced by PVC pipes so that their theft would not be noticed at a funeral, authorities said.

At the same time, the accused would regularly toss gloves, aprons, and other evidence of their criminal handiwork into the bodies before sewing them back up, prosecutors said.

The bones, tendons, heart valves and other tissue were harvested in a funeral home owned by Nicelli, authorities said.

DOJ_NMG_0083029

Cooke -- a nationally recognized broadcaster in Britain -- was best known for his "Letter From America" program which aired weekly on BBC domestic and World Service radio for over 50 years.

He died in New York in March 2004 from lung cancer. He was 95.

Death Penalty Out On A Technicality (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

A federal judge has ruled that prosecutors cannot seek the death penalty against two D.C. men accused of running a violent street gang in Southeast because the government missed a key deadline.

U.S. District Judge Richard W. Roberts ruled that the Justice Department failed to file a timely notice of intent to seek the death penalty against Antwuan Ball and David Wilson. The judge's opinion was issued late Tuesday and made public yesterday.

Mr. Ball and Mr. Wilson are awaiting trial on charges of murder, racketeering and drug trafficking after a joint investigation by the Metropolitan Police Department and the FBI of the so-called Congress Park Crew in Southeast.

In his ruling, Judge Roberts said the "government showed no cause, much less any good cause" for failing to file a notice of intent to seek the death penalty by a court-ordered Sept. 15 deadline.

Prosecutors filed a notice of intent to seek the death penalty Sept. 25. Citing the missed deadline, the judge barred capital punishment in the case Sept. 18.

One week later, prosecutors filed notice to seek the death penalty with a separate motion asking the judge to reconsider his Sept. 18 ruling.

The government attorneys blamed the delay on a misunderstanding about the deadline, the need for more deliberations and the fifth anniversary of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

But Judge Roberts remained unconvinced.

"The government still has offered no explanation for how the anniversary of the September 11 attacks delayed this decision or anything else," the judge wrote in Tuesday's ruling. "It still has offered no reason why the Justice Department could not complete its assessment in the suggested five months I agreed to."

It's not clear whether prosecutors plan to appeal the ruling.

"We are currently reviewing our options but have no further comment at this time," said Channing Phillips, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office.

In federal cases, the U.S. Attorney's Office must seek approval to appeal a decision from the Solicitor General's Office.

Attorneys for Mr. Ball declined to comment yesterday. Mr. Wilson's attorneys said they were planning to travel to the D.C. Jail yesterday to give their client a copy of the judge's ruling.

"We expected this. We're not surprised the judge was going to uphold his previous ruling," attorney Cynthia Katkish said. "We're all very happy."

The judge's ruling marks the second setback for prosecutors involving a capital case in the District in recent months.

In August, U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Huvelle threw out key statements by three men charged in the killing of U.S. tourists in Uganda in 1999. The judge said that the government couldn't prove the defendants were not tortured during their capture in Rwanda.

The only other capital-murder defendant awaiting trial in the District is Larry Gooch, whom authorities have called an enforcer for the M Street drug gang in Northeast.

Mr. Gooch, who is charged in five killings, has pleaded not guilty.

Only two capital-murder cases have gone to trial in the District, and each resulted in the defendants' receiving life in prison.

Capital punishment is banned in the District, although it can be sought in federal cases.

Ex-clerk To Testify About Page Scandal (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083030

The former clerk of the House will face ethics investigators Thursday in what could be the most important testimony yet on how GOP leaders handled complaints about Rep. Mark Foley's behavior toward pages — including the early concerns of a Louisiana congressman who testified Wednesday.

The questioning of former Clerk Jeff Trandahl comes after Louisiana GOP Rep. Rodney Alexander spoke with investigators for three hours about how his office handled a complaint last fall from a former page about too-friendly e-mails from Foley.

GOP leaders are facing scrutiny over whether they or their aides did too little to stop Foley's inappropriate behavior toward pages when problems surfaced years ago. The revelations have been followed by weakening poll numbers for Republicans, who insist that no one in their party knew of the sexually graphic e-mails that have scandalized the public.

Trandahl's testimony is critical in determining how many people knew about Foley's behavior with pages and whether there are even more incidents than those reported so far.

Alexander discussed the matter last spring with two top House GOP lawmakers, Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio and campaign chair Tom Reynolds of New York, both of whom say they spoke with House Speaker Dennis Hastert about it. Hastert, R-Ill., has said he does not recall the conversations.

Trandahl confronted Foley, a Florida Republican, last fall over his e-mails to the Louisiana boy and was alerted about inappropriate e-mails Foley sent in 2001 or 2002 to a former page sponsored by Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz.

As the House officer with direct responsibility for the page program, Trandahl is virtually certain to know whether there have been other complaints about Foley, including an alleged incident in which the Florida Republican tried to enter the page dorm while drunk.

The panel is trying to determine whether lawmakers and staff aides acted properly when alerted about Foley's behavior. Trandahl's testimony is crucial to knowing how many people knew about the page issue — and how problems with Foley were handled — before the scandal exploded last month.

Foley resigned from the House on Sept. 29 after being confronted with sexually explicit messages sent in 2003 to a former Oklahoma page.

Trandahl is in position to support testimony by Kirk Fordham, a former top aide to Foley, who has told the ethics panel that he informed top House GOP aides of Foley's inappropriate behavior toward pages years ago. Fordham has testified he told senior House staff aides about the page dorm incident when it happened several years ago.

A key issue is whether staff aides to Hastert knew about Foley's improper behavior before the 2005 episode and whether they told Hastert — who says he knew nothing about Foley and pages prior to the day Foley resigned.

On Wednesday, Foley's most recent chief of staff, Elizabeth Nicolson, testified before the ethics panel.

Alexander sponsored a page who complained of receiving overly friendly e-mails from Foley, including one that asked for a photograph and mentioned a different teen who was in "great shape."

An Alexander aide last fall told an aide to Hastert about the e-mails, setting off a chain of events that led Trandahl and Page Board Chairman John Shimkus, R-Ill., to tell Foley to stop contacting the boy.

Boehner, whom Alexander subsequently alerted about the e-mails last spring, also testifies Thursday. Boehner's public statements are at odds with Hastert. He told a Cincinnati radio station earlier this month that when he approached Hastert about Foley last spring Hastert told him "it had been taken care of."

Hastert and his aides, including powerful chief of staff and confidant Scott Palmer, have yet to testify before the ethics panel.

Key Figures In Foley Scandal Testify Today To Ethics Panel (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — Two key witnesses will testify before the House ethics committee today on what they knew about former congressman Mark Foley's contacts with teenage boys.

House Majority Leader John Boehner and former House clerk Jeff Trandahl are scheduled to appear before the panel, which is investigating whether lawmakers or congressional staffers ignored or suppressed complaints about Foley's communications with congressional pages.

Their appearances before the committee come less than three weeks before an election that will determine control of Congress. Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned Sept. 29 after being confronted by ABC News with lewd Internet messages that he allegedly sent pages.

At issue is whether congressional leaders should have investigated more aggressively after Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., complained about e-mails that Foley sent to a page Alexander had sponsored. The e-mails were not sexually explicit but the boy's parents asked Alexander to stop Foley from sending them.

Alexander, who testified for three hours before the panel Wednesday, told top staffers in Speaker Dennis Hastert's office last year about the e-mails. At that point, Trandahl, who supervised the page program, and Rep. John Shimkus, an Illinois Republican who runs the page board, confronted Foley and extracted a promise that he would stop contacting the Louisiana boy.

Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., accused the GOP of covering up complaints about Foley because of the upcoming election.

"The Republican leadership in Congress decided to put their political fortunes above the safety of the youngsters," he said at a National Press Club lunch on the elections.

Hastert, R-Ill., has said he knew nothing about the sexually-explicit Internet messages that came to light last month until Foley resigned. Two members of his leadership team, Boehner and Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., said they talked to the speaker about separate non-sexual messages to the Louisiana boy last spring.

In Florida, lawyers for Foley said they revealed to state prosecutors Wednesday the name of a clergyman Foley said abused him as a teen. A joint statement from attorneys David Roth and Gerald Richman said they agreed with the Archdiocese of Miami that the clergy member's name should first be disclosed to the state attorney's office.

Also, a Florida judge ruled that the GOP can't post signs at polling places explaining that votes for Foley, whose name remains on the ballot, will go to a replacement candidate, state Rep. Joe Negron. Reynolds, who heads the House GOP congressional campaign committee, said at the Press Club event he thinks the party can hold onto the Foley seat because voters in the district are "very educated."

Ethics To Hear Key Testimony (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, October 19, 2006

In what could prove to be the turning point in the investigation of former Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) interaction with House pages — and what Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his staff did or did not know about it — the House ethics committee will take testimony today on the Foley case from former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) will also appear before the panel today — voluntarily and unaccompanied by counsel — but Trandahl is expected to be the star attraction.

Trandahl has retained defense attorney Cono Namorato, and has made no public statements since Foley resigned Sept. 29. Through his attorney, Trandahl has said he will "cooperate fully" with both the FBI's probe and the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct.

Trandahl could provide key testimony as to when senior aides to Hastert were first informed of Foley's alleged inappropriate behavior with male pages. Trandahl also could confirm or dispute the veracity of the timeline of events released by the Speaker's office on Sept. 30.

In that timeline, Trandahl was first contacted by Hastert's deputy chief of staff, Mike Stokke, in the fall of 2005 regarding an e-mail exchange between Foley and a former page. Trandahl discussed the e-mails with a top aide to Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) because his office had sponsored the former page but, according to the timeline, Trandahl was never shown the e-mail exchange, which was later characterized as "over-friendly."

DOJ_NMG_0083032

Trandahl then met with Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the House Page Board, and advised Hastert's staff counsel, Ted Van Der Meid, of the meeting. Trandahl and Shimkus questioned Foley on the e-mail exchange and advised him to cease all contact with the former page.

"The Clerk recalls that later that day he encountered Van Der Meid on the House floor and reported to him that he and Shimkus personally had spoken to Foley and had taken corrective action," the timeline states.

Trandahl's testimony also will be central to corroborating the testimony of Kirk Fordham, Rep. Tom Reynolds' (R-N.Y.) former chief of staff who resigned amid the Foley scandal. Fordham, who worked as a top aide to Foley for 10 years, testified before the ethics committee last week.

Fordham has alleged that he alerted Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, to Foley's inappropriate behavior with pages as early as 2003. Palmer has publicly denied that account. Though his actual testimony is secret, Fordham also reportedly planned to tell the ethics panel that Trandahl was aware of Foley's behavior toward pages and attempted to take corrective action as early as 2000.

Trandahl left the House Clerk post in late 2005 to become the executive director of the National Fish and Wildlife Foundation. He began work in Congress in 1983 and was appointed House Clerk in December 1998 — the same month Hastert was tapped to become Speaker.

When Hastert appointed Trandahl, he was not considered part of Hastert's inner circle. In contrast, the current House Clerk, Karen Haas, worked as a floor aide to the Speaker before succeeding Trandahl.

Also testifying today is Boehner, the first member of the leadership to appear before the investigative panel on this matter.

Boehner has played a more peripheral role in the Foley investigation, as he was not in leadership in the fall of 2005 when the Speaker's office first was notified. Boehner was approached by Alexander about the Foley matter earlier this year, and he has said he recalls subsequently asking Hastert about it. Hastert has said he does not recall that conversation, nor a similar one with Reynolds, the National Republican Congressional Committee chairman, which Reynolds says happened.

Boehner's chief of staff, Paula Nowakowski, appeared before the ethics committee on Tuesday. Alexander met with the committee to give his version of events Wednesday.

Among the Members and aides that still are expected to appear are Palmer, Stokke, Van Der Meid and Reynolds. Spokesmen for Reynolds and Hastert said Wednesday that their bosses had not been contacted by the ethics panel about testifying.

Louisiana Page Not Central To Inquiry, Lawmaker Says (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 18 — The former Congressional page from Louisiana whose e-mail exchanges with Representative Mark Foley set off a Capitol Hill scandal was neither exposed to nor aware of the sexually explicit instant messages that ultimately led to Mr. Foley's resignation, the lawmaker who sponsored the page said.

Representative Rodney Alexander, Republican of Louisiana, said Wednesday that the page, who lives in his district, was not familiar with Mr. Foley's pattern of conduct and should not be a focal point of the investigation.

Mr. Alexander added that even though the former page had received only e-mail messages described as overly friendly, he still had been "exposed to a lot of trauma" since giving copies of his e-mail exchanges with Mr. Foley last year to Mr. Alexander's office.

After news reports about the messages, other former pages came forward with information about instant-message exchanges with Mr. Foley.

"His parents have been almost physically sick about the attention that he's gotten," said Mr. Alexander, speaking to reporters after testifying for three hours before the House ethics committee. "We just look forward to the committee continuing their investigation, and hopefully this will come to a conclusion."

The former page, who told a Congressional aide that Mr. Foley's request for his photograph was "sick, sick, sick, sick," has not been identified and has not spoken publicly about the case. Neither he nor other pages have appeared before the committee, which is investigating whether the House Republican leadership properly handled concerns over Mr. Foley's behavior.

As Mr. Alexander left the closed-door session of the ethics committee on Wednesday, he declined to reveal details of his testimony, the same position taken by other witnesses. He said the questions in the case would be resolved only through interviews with other lawmakers.

"We told them what we know, when we knew it, and what we did about it," Mr. Alexander said. "There are many people who know what we know, and have known it for a lot longer period of time than we've known."

The committee also spent more than three hours questioning Elizabeth Nicolson, who was the chief of staff to Mr. Foley when he resigned on Sept. 29. Ms. Nicolson declined to comment as she left the hearing room early Wednesday evening.

The committee also intends to examine the conduct of Representative Jim Kolbe of Arizona, the only openly gay Republican in Congress, after a request from members of the Congressional page board to include Mr. Kolbe in the inquiry because of complaints the board had received.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Kolbe, Korenna Cline, said Wednesday that her office had not been contacted by the ethics committee, but that Mr. Kolbe would cooperate with any requests for information.

On Thursday, the House ethics committee is scheduled to hear from the majority leader, John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio, and the former clerk of the House, Jeff Trandahl. Investigators say they believe Mr. Trandahl can help answer questions about how long Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office knew about Mr. Foley's conduct.

Meanwhile, law enforcement officials said that Federal Bureau of Investigation interviews with a number of former pages had found no evidence that Mr. Foley violated federal sex crime statutes. Federal law generally requires proof that an adult engaged in an overtly sexual solicitation of someone under the age of consent, which varies by state.

Nevertheless, the officials said, there is no sign that the Justice Department's preliminary inquiry is close to an end. Prosecutors have 90 days to conduct such investigations before deciding whether to go forward or shut the inquiry down.

Foley Lawyers Tell Accused Abuser's Name (AP-Y)

By Brian Skoloff

AP, October 19, 2006

Lawyers for disgraced former Congressman Mark Foley said they revealed to state prosecutors Wednesday the name of a clergyman he said abused him as a teen.

The announcement came two weeks after Foley's criminal defense lawyer, David Roth, first said Foley had been abused by a clergyman. The claim came as he responded to accusations that Foley sent sexually explicit Internet communications to teenage boys who worked on Capitol Hill.

Foley, 52, a Florida Republican, resigned last month after being confronted with the Internet exchanges and has since entered a 30-day rehabilitation program for alcoholism, according to his attorneys.

Mike Edmondson, a spokesman for the state attorney's office in West Palm Beach, said Wednesday evening his office had not yet seen the name.

"I'm sure they faxed it over. It could very well just be sitting on the fax machine," Edmondson said.

A joint statement from Roth and Foley's civil attorney, Gerald Richman, said they agreed with the Archdiocese of Miami that the clergy member's name should first be disclosed to the state attorney's office. Edmondson said prosecutors would share the name of the clergyman with the Archdiocese Thursday, as long as it was received by the office before it opened for business.

"To the best of our knowledge, the clergyman no longer resides in the United States," the statement said.

Earlier in the day, Archdiocese spokeswoman Mary Ross Agosta said the church was growing frustrated with the drip of information coming from Foley's attorneys.

"However he wants to tell us, fine, but tell us," Agosta said. "It's very frustrating at this point."

On Tuesday, Richman said that would only say that the priest who allegedly abused Foley is still alive and that the statute of limitations for criminal charges against the man has expired.

DOJ_NMG_0083034

Edmondson said Wednesday that to claim outright that the statute of limitations has expired is somewhat misleading because the alleged abuser may have committed similar crimes more recently on other victims.

"There's still a pool of potential victims out there," he said.

Richman did not return a telephone message seeking comment. Roth has declined to discuss the case.

109th Congress Just Can't Resist (USAT)

By Jonathan Turley

USA Today, October 19, 2006

In its waning months, the 109th Congress has finally achieved a status in politics that the 1919 Black Sox achieved in sports: It is a symbol of utter corruption. Over the past two years, the congressional scandals have traversed the universe from the gross to the grandiose to the grotesque: visits from call girls, gifts of Rolls Royces and fancy commodes, sweetheart deals for contractors, high-paying lobbyist jobs for underachieving children, free vacations for members and their families.

Yet, if the young boy saying "say it ain't so, Joe" to Shoeless Joe Jackson perfectly summed up the betrayal of the 1919 World Series, the young male pages pursued by former GOP congressman Mark Foley of Florida perfectly summed up the betrayal of the 109th Congress. The public clearly suspects that, in dealing with Foley, House leaders were more concerned with protecting a House seat than a House page. In a CNN poll, 75% of Americans say the Republicans failed to act responsibly, and 52% believe a coverup was attempted.

If the page scandal captures the raw depravity that is the 109th Congress, the proposed solution captures its raw audacity. Faced with the abuse of children, some lawmakers have called for the removal of the children. First voiced by Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Ill., some members have indicated that they would terminate the page service after almost 200 years of tradition. As LaHood explained, "We should not subject young men and women to this kind of activity, this kind of vulnerability." When asked whether he was suggesting that his colleagues cannot be trusted with children, he responded, "Well, that's pretty obvious."

Though this might seem like preventing bank robbery by getting rid of banks, it makes sense in the parallel moral universe of the 109th Congress. Indeed, these lawmakers appear to have adopted Oscar Wilde's rule that the only way to be rid of temptation is to yield to it.

Hence, the LaHood proposal: If one cannot deliver one's colleagues from temptation, you must remove the temptation from one's colleagues. Presumably, only then could pedophilic members be able to fully focus on the public good.

Under this logic, pages are the problem — lurking in the halls like sirens of destruction for lawmakers. Apostle Peter warned of such temptation with the devil "as a roaring lion walketh about, seeking whom he may devour." Only the faithful would survive, he cautioned, and "your brethren" would be brought low by "the same afflictions."

Fortunately, LaHood's solution has little support. Yet he and his colleagues may be on to something. While they accept that some members cannot be relied upon to exercise self-restraint with children, they do not address other temptations that have brought their brethren low. For example, why not bar lobbyists? If lawmakers have difficulty showing restraint around children, they've shown even less restraint around lobbyists.

The scandals are too numerous to detail, but various members are under criminal investigation, indictment, or federal custody. Former majority leader Tom DeLay is under indictment in Texas; Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., is still trying to explain $90,000 wrapped in foil in his freezer; GOP congressman Bob Ney of Ohio will likely face prison time after pleading guilty to conspiracy and making false statements while former colleague Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California is already in prison for taking more than $2.4 million in bribes.

In addition to various lawmakers still under investigation in the scandal involving lobbyist Jack Abramoff, members such as Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., Rep. Alan Mollohan, D-W.Va., and others have been accused of self-dealing in steering hundreds of millions of federal funds for personal benefit. Dozens of lawmakers have been criticized for having children or spouses working for lobbyists or accepting exorbitant vacations from outside groups. Just this week, the FBI searched homes in an investigation of whether Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., used his position to steer lobbying jobs to his daughter.

LaHood himself has been accused of questionable deals with lobbyists, including his earmarking of millions of dollars to benefit projects and firms. Some of these earmarks involved lobbyists who once sat on LaHood's fundraising committee. (After the Abramoff scandal, LaHood suddenly announced that he would get rid of his lobbyist-laden committee.) Likewise, LaHood and his wife have also been criticized for their free trips abroad, including one to China paid by the not-for-profit Aspen Institute.

DOJ_NMG_0083035

Applying LaHood's logic, the solution is simple: no lobbyists, no lobbying scandals. Indeed, it is possible to remove every historic temptation from the halls of Congress so members can walk to the floor without a distracting thought. We could ban call girls (common in past scandals) and even order both genders to cover themselves with burqas while visiting congressional offices. The result would be a hermetically sealed, temptation-free environment for our morally challenged leaders.

Yet, it is sometimes more efficient to fence in a risk rather than to force everyone else to fence it out. It follows that it would be far better to fence in our lawmakers rather than fence out temptations such as children, pets or suggestively arranged plants.

Neither efficiency nor morality, however, have been particularly great influences on the 109th Congress. And it is a measure of how out of touch LaHood and company have become that they would address the lack of restraint of some lawmakers by eliminating all pages.

I am no biblical scholar, but when Peter promised that "the Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations," I don't think this is what he had in mind.

Jonathan Turley is the Shapiro Professor of Public Interest Law and a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors. He served as a House leadership page in 1977 and 1978.

Congressman Faces Questions Over Who Paid For Pacific Trip (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 18 — Representative John E. Sweeney, an upstate Republican who is in a fierce fight to keep his seat, is facing questions about a trip he took to a western Pacific island with an associate of Jack Abramoff, the powerful Washington lobbyist at the center of an extensive corruption scandal.

The Times Union of Albany reported yesterday that Mr. Sweeney might have violated House ethics rules when he failed to disclose who paid for a trip that he made in January 2001 to one of the Northern Mariana Islands with Tony Rudy, who worked for Mr. Abramoff.

Mr. Sweeney made the trip to deliver a speech to the Saipan Chamber of Commerce in the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, a territory of the United States. Mr. Rudy was lobbying on behalf of the commonwealth.

The newspaper reported that the Chamber of Commerce says it paid for Mr. Sweeney's visit. But Mr. Sweeney failed to report that the chamber paid for the trip, despite Congressional rules requiring full disclosure of privately financed travel, according to the newspaper. The same rules prohibit lobbyists or lobbying groups from sponsoring Congressional travel.

Responding to the report, Mr. Sweeney's office released a statement saying that he believed the government of the Marianas had paid for the trip. House rules do not require the disclosure of any travel sponsored by the government, including United States territories.

"Congressman Sweeney has always endeavored to comply with every disclosure obligation, including this trip," said Melissa Carlson, his spokeswoman. "If the information the congressman was given proved to be inaccurate, he would immediately take action to self-report and fully comply with all requirements."

Apparently in an effort to head off any more potentially damaging news from the episode, Mr. Sweeney's office released a copy of a letter he sent to the House ethics committee indicating that the Chamber of Commerce might have paid for his trip, and not the government as he initially thought.

"I submit this information to the committee along with a request for guidance as to whether I am in compliance with all House rules or disclosure requirements," he wrote in his letter.

The questions being raised about the trip are an unwelcome development for Mr. Sweeney, who was already confronting a tough re-election fight with a little less than three weeks before Election Day. Throughout the campaign, he has made a series of questionable decisions that his Democratic rival, Kirsten Gillibrand, has used in an effort to portray him as ethically compromised.

DOJ_NMG_0083036

Ms. Gillibrand quickly seized on the latest disclosures to go on the offensive again on Wednesday. Without citing evidence, Ms. Gillibrand and her advisers said that the trip might have been paid for by Mr. Rudy, who pleaded guilty in April to charges that he accepted thousands of dollars in illegal gifts in return for influencing legislation on behalf of Mr. Abramoff.

"Sadly, it is no surprise that John Sweeney is in trouble again," Ms. Gillibrand said.

Rep. Sweeney Didn't Report Marianas Trip With Abramoff Colleague (AP)

By Devlin Barrett, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. -- Rep. John Sweeney may have failed to properly report a 2001 trip with a lobbyist now cooperating in a federal investigation of congressional corruption, but he insisted Wednesday he did not knowingly violate any rules.

Sweeney, R-Clifton Park, asked the House Ethics Committee to tell him if he should submit new paperwork about his reimbursed travel five years ago.

"I don't believe that I'm not in compliance," said Sweeney.

The Times Union of Albany reported Wednesday that the Northern Marianas government denied paying for the congressman's travel. Instead, the executive director of the Saipan Chamber of Commerce said her group financed the trip, the newspaper reported.

Abramoff was lobbying at the time on behalf of the Northern Marianas government, which opposed labor reforms proposed for the U.S. commonwealth.

His colleague, Tony Rudy, who had just left the staff of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay to work for Abramoff, accompanied Sweeney. Rudy is now cooperating in a federal investigation into congressional corruption involving Abramoff.

Sweeney, who has not been linked to the Abramoff corruption case, said Wednesday, "I don't know Jack Abramoff and I've never even met Jack Abramoff."

The congressman's financial forms were reviewed last year by the Department of Justice at the same time records of Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, were reviewed. Ney pleaded guilty Friday to conspiracy and making false statements as part of the Abramoff influence-peddling scandal.

Sweeney sent a letter to the head of the House Ethics Committee on Wednesday asking whether he should amend his disclosure forms, seeking "guidance as to whether I am in compliance with all House Rules or disclosure requirements."

The congressman is in the midst of his most challenging re-election campaign, against Democrat Kirsten Gillibrand.

She has repeatedly accused Sweeney of ethical lapses, and said of the 2001 trip: "Its not clear what's worse: his failure to disclose that a criminal paid for his trip abroad or that he was willing to sing the praises of an island of sweatshops and child prostitution."

Sweeney spokeswoman Melissa Carlson said the congressman had been told the trip was paid for by the Marianas government, which is a U.S. territory. Lawmakers are not required to report travel paid for by the government.

"If the information the congressman was given proved to be inaccurate, he would immediately take action to self-report and fully comply with all requirements," Carlson told the Associated Press. "The congressman has always acted in good faith with respect to official travel."

Sweeney spoke at the Saipan Chamber of Commerce during the trip, in part because Northern Mariana Islands officials wanted Sweeney to advise them on potential reforms of local businesses that Democrats brand sweatshops.

Sweeney, a former state labor commissioner, said Wednesday that during the trip, "what I saw was very above-board."

Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., an outspoken critic of the Marianas garment industry, said the problems there are obvious.

"The only way you could avoid seeing the abuses in the Marianas is if you were deliberately looking the other way," said Miller. "It is the responsibility of members of Congress to do their own research before going on a trip or entering into a relationship with a lobbyist. By 2001 there was ample documentation of serious abuses in the Marianas."

Chamber of Commerce Executive Director Christine Parke told the Times Union in an e-mail that the chamber "did pay for Mr. Sweeney's expenses out of the proceeds of the dinner." She said she had no supporting documents and could not provide a total cost.

Charles Reyes, spokesman for Marianas Gov. Benigno R. Fitial, wrote to the newspaper: "Our finance office confirms that, based on available financial records, the CNMI government did not make any payment to or for Congressman John Sweeney for any expenses in connection with the congressman's travel to the commonwealth on or about January 2001."

Bob Ney, Guilty But Still At Capitol (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 18 — Representative Bob Ney is headed to prison early next year after pleading guilty to charges of accepting tens of thousands of dollars in illegal gifts from lobbyists. Until then, Mr. Ney, a six-term Republican from Ohio, has a comfortable place to bide his time.

His Congressional office — the one that he has effectively acknowledged selling to the highest bidder — is open for business.

"The office of Congressman Bob Ney," his telephone receptionist said in a cheery voice Tuesday morning, as if nothing had happened to her boss, the first member of Congress to confess to crimes involving the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Mr. Ney's brass nameplate still hangs on the wall next to the heavy wooden doors of Room 2438 in the Rayburn House office building, just across the street from the Capitol, and it is likely to remain there for at least a few more weeks.

On Wednesday, much of his staff in Washington apparently worked a half-day, typical for Congressional offices during the pre-election recess. Mr. Ney's lawyers said the locked doors this afternoon did not mean the office was closed permanently.

The day before, the lawmaker's aides could be seen wandering in and out of his offices with regularity, all barred from commenting on Mr. Ney's whereabouts or how he is spending his time. "We're not allowed to talk with you," said a young female staff member, clutching a stack of what appeared to be constituent mail.

In his guilty plea last week, Mr. Ney admitted to taking many gifts from Mr. Abramoff, including a 2002 golfing trip to Scotland by private jet, and then lying about them in his financial disclosure forms.

To the dismay of House colleagues eager to remove him as a symbol of the corruption scandals that are tarring several Republican candidates in next month's Congressional elections, Mr. Ney, defying House leaders, has refused to step down for now, insisting that he owes his staff and his constituents a few more weeks of his time.

Until the House reconvenes after the elections, there is no way under Congressional rules to force him out. Republican House leaders have vowed to make Mr. Ney's expulsion their first order of business when they return to Washington next month.

The last House member who faced expulsion, James Traficant Jr., a Democrat and a fellow Ohioan, was ousted from his seat in July 2002, four months after his conviction on bribery charges. But unlike Mr. Traficant, who continues to proclaim his innocence from prison, Mr. Ney is holding on to his job even after confessing to crimes.

One of Mr. Ney's lawyers, William E. Lawler III, said in an interview that the lawmaker wanted to deal with the "odds and ends" of ending an 11-year career in Congress.

"There's a lot of mechanical stuff that needs to be done — storage, archiving," Mr. Lawler said.

In entering a guilty plea last week, Mr. Ney said in a statement that he would resign within a "few weeks" but wanted to remain in Congress for now "to make sure my staff members are O.K. and that any open constituent matters and obligations" are dealt with.

Mr. Lawler was critical of skeptics who question whether Mr. Ney, whose most recent disclosure forms suggest that his only major asset is a second home in Greece worth $100,000 to $250,000, is holding on in Congress mostly because he wants to cash his final paychecks.

"I don't know why people don't accept his explanation at face value," the lawyer said.

The refusal to resign means that Mr. Ney can continue to draw on his $165,200-a-year salary, equivalent to $3,176 for each week he remains in the House, and his Congressional expense account, and to make use of a suite of offices on Capitol Hill, as well as four offices in his district in southeastern Ohio.

DOJ_NMG_0083038

His Congressional staff — 16 people, according to the latest House staff directories — is still in place, with salaries totaling more than $70,000 a month. There appears to be a vacancy in the job of press secretary, however; reporters seeking comment from Mr. Ney are routinely referred to his chief of staff, David Popp, who has not returned several calls in recent weeks.

Mr. Ney's official House Web site is still on line, although his Web master has fallen far behind in updating the site. There is no mention of Mr. Ney's legal problems or his guilty plea, and the most recent online news release dates from August. Mr. Ney also retains an open invitation to the House gym.

One of his Congressional perks, free travel, has been curtailed, but not by his House colleagues. The federal judge who accepted Mr. Ney's guilty plea, Ellen Segal Huvelle, ordered him to turn over his passport and barred him from traveling outside the United States until his sentencing hearing, now scheduled for Jan. 19. Under the plea agreement, Mr. Ney could face up to 10 years in prison, but prosecutors are recommending 27 months.

Mr. Ney, despite a criminal record, will be able to begin collecting a Congressional pension of about $30,000 a year in a decade, when he turns 62.

Mr. Lawler, Mr. Ney's lawyer, said he was unsure if the lawmaker was working out of his Capitol Hill offices this week or if he was back in Ohio. Staff members working for other House members in the Rayburn building say they have not seen Mr. Ney for weeks.

"He's in and out," Mr. Lawler said. "I just don't have a lot of information for you."

Cunningham Offered To Testify From Jail (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, October 19, 2006

Former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) has offered to testify about his activities as a member of the House Intelligence Committee to the panel's chairman, Rep. Pete Hoekstra (R-Mich.), but only if Hoekstra personally travels to the North Carolina federal prison where Cunningham is now serving a sentence for bribery-related charges.

Hoekstra turned down the offer to meet with his former colleague, which was outlined in a recent letter from Cunningham to the Michigan Republican. Hoekstra told Cunningham that he wanted a special counsel appointed by the committee, Michael Stern, to conduct any interview with the imprisoned ex-lawmaker.

Cunningham's lawyer, Lee Blalack, was unaware of the letter that Cunningham sent to Hoekstra until informed by the committee. Blalack has stated repeatedly that Cunningham will refuse to testify before the committee even if subpoenaed by the panel.

"I didn't know [Cunningham] was going to send it or had sent it," Blalack said.

Blalack declined to comment further on the letter, but both he and Justice Department officials do not want Cunningham to provide evidence to Congressional investigators until the criminal probe of the bribery scandal that brought down the former lawmaker is completed, which is likely to be in 2007 at the earliest.

Sources close to the case say Cunningham's offer to testify may be rescinded soon.

Disclosure of Cunningham's letter to Hoekstra comes after the Michigan Republican and Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), the ranking member of the Intelligence Committee, have publicly clashed over Harman's decision to release a summary of Stern's investigation, and over the need to subpoena Cunningham.

Harman was aware of Cunningham's letter to Hoekstra, and in a statement released by her office on Tuesday, she said it was "totally inappropriate for the Chairman to be in contact with Cunningham, which he has been."

Hoekstra, for his part, claimed Cunningham's willingness to testify was reason enough to delay the release of Stern's report, the original, classified version of which was completed in May. In July, Stern finished an unclassified version of his report, but Hoekstra has declined to publicly release that document.

"Cunningham has reached out to the committee and offered his testimony, a possibility the independent counsel is still reviewing," Hoekstra said in a statement released Tuesday. "Until a final determination has been reached on securing Cunningham's testimony and [until] the full committee can review the independent counsel's final report, this inquiry cannot be considered complete."

DOJ_NMG_0083039

Hoekstra added that "consistent with the opinion of the D.C. [B]ar that it is unethical to subpoena a witness before Congress who intends to plead the Fifth, I will not issue a subpoena solely for the theatrics of having Cunningham appear and take the Fifth."

Stern concluded that Cunningham, who is serving a 100-month prison sentence for bribery, fraud and tax evasion, used his seat on the House Intelligence Committee, as well as his position on the powerful Appropriations subcommittee on Defense, to steer $70 million to $80 million in government contracts to two men alleged to have paid him more than $2.4 million in bribes.

One of those men, Mitchell Wade, former CEO of defense contractor MZM Inc., pleaded guilty in February to bribery and election fraud. Wade has not been sentenced yet.

Brent Wilkes, CEO of ADCS Inc., a California-based defense contractor, has been implicated in the case as well but has not been charged.

Ignoring Red Flags (WP)

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

RANDY "DUKE" Cunningham couldn't have done it on his own. The California Republican, now serving time for taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors, was enabled in his criminality by a system that empowers members of key congressional committees to earmark funds for favored entities, by the secrecy surrounding intelligence spending, and by the compliance of congressional staff members and others who acceded to Mr. Cunningham's spending demands despite their misgivings.

A devastating report -- actually, the devastating executive summary of a still-secret report -- by a special counsel to the House intelligence committee found that the corrupt congressman steered between $70 million and $80 million in government spending to defense contractors Mitchell J. Wade and Brent R. Wilkes. The public deserves to see the full 23-page unclassified version of the report, which has been ready since July. Even more, it deserves to know whether any of those complicit in Mr. Cunningham's misdeeds will be disciplined and how such abuses will be prevented in the future.

The most troubling portion of the report concerns how Mr. Cunningham bullied committee staff members into going along with his funding demands despite their concerns about whether tax dollars were being spent wisely. Mr. Cunningham wasn't only a member of the intelligence panel, the report notes, but also sat on the House Appropriations subcommittee in charge of defense spending. As the summary concludes, Mr. Cunningham's membership on a committee "with the power to impact [the House intelligence committee's] key priorities and his willingness to pressure and intimidate [intelligence committee] staff members were key to the success of the Wilkes/Wade funding requests." In particular, Mr. Cunningham used his clout to get Mr. Wade's company, MZM Inc., funding for a project at the Counterintelligence Field Activity agency, the Pentagon's newest intelligence arm.

"Because of Cunningham's insistence, [committee] staff agreed to support this project, despite staff's concerns that it was a 'pork barrel' project and a waste of taxpayer money," the summary said. Bad enough, but even worse is this: "Over time, [committee] staff learned of numerous 'red flags' associated with the counterintelligence project, including frequently expressed questions about the ethics and integrity of Wade, doubts about the value of the project and MZM's performance, and grave concerns about the propriety of the Cunningham-Wade relationship. Despite these red flags, the responsible . . . staff members continued to accept and support Cunningham's growing requests for this project" from 2003 through 2006.

This is an outrageous dereliction of duty. So what is the response of Chairman Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.)? Mr. Hoekstra has made a useful change in requiring that committee members' earmarks be approved by the chairman and the ranking Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.). But he sounds more unhappy with the move by Ms. Harman to unilaterally release the report than about the findings themselves. Indeed, Mr. Hoekstra said in a news release that "it is reassuring that the committee's independent counsel has found no instances of wrongdoing on the part of other committee members or the committee's staff." If Mr. Hoekstra considers this report reassuring, you have to wonder: What is it that might raise a red flag for him?

Blago's Indicted Fundraiser Due In Court Again (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen And Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, October 19, 2006

After missing his first two federal court hearings last week because of his international travel, Antoin "Tony" Rezko is expected in court Thursday to be arraigned in at least one of the fraud cases against him.

Sources said there was some indication Wednesday that Rezko, a businessman and top fundraiser for Gov. Rod Blagojevich, would arrive as scheduled at the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse, but they declined to elaborate.

Rezko is scheduled to be arraigned at 10:30 a.m. before U.S. District Judge James B. Zagel.

Personnel in Zagel's courtroom had been notified to expect Rezko.

"It's still on the schedule. We anticipate he will be here," a clerk for Zagel said.

There is a possibility the hearing would have to be delayed until the afternoon to allow Rezko to make it there, sources said.

Rezko's attorney, Joseph J. Duffy, could not be reached Wednesday for comment.

An indictment was unsealed against Rezko last week, charging him with trying to extort millions of dollars from investment firms seeking to do business with the state by leveraging his relationships with high-ranking officials. A second indictment charged Rezko of fraudulently obtaining a $10 million loan for the sale of his pizza business through a straw buyer and retaining ownership. He is scheduled to be arraigned on that charge Thursday.

An arrest warrant has been issued for Rezko, 51, but the FBI has promised not to impede his promised return to the United States. Rezko, a native of Syria who has a home in Wilmette, has not officially been declared a fugitive by law enforcement.

Rezko's attorney, Joseph J. Duffy, said Rezko could not make his initially scheduled arraignment on Friday because he was on a business trip to the Middle East. There was nothing unusual about the travel, and Rezko would return to Chicago to face the charges, Duffy told Zagel and U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve, who is hearing the other case against Rezko. He wants to return to the country, because he is innocent and wants to defend himself, Duffy said at the time.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Christopher Niewoehner did not accuse Rezko of fleeing to avoid prosecution but said blaming his absence on travel "suggests Mr. Rezko has other priorities than attending this case."

Randall Samborn, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, declined to comment Wednesday.

Rezko is scheduled to be arraigned before St. Eve on Friday in the second case, in which he is accused of directing investment firms to make illegal payments to get business from the state's Teachers' Retirement System.

St. Eve has said she could move the hearing to Thursday if Rezko appeared.

jcoen@tribune.com

mo'connor@tribune.com

Beauprez Ad Has Illegal Classified Info (STPPP)

By Steven K. Paulson

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, October 19, 2006

DENVER - Information in an attack ad run by Rep. Bob Beauprez against his Democratic opponent for governor used illegal confidential information from a federal law enforcement database, Colorado authorities said Wednesday.

The Colorado Bureau of Investigation launched a criminal investigation into the ad after gubernatorial candidate Bill Ritter's campaign raised the possibility that the databases were illegally accessed because the information could not be verified through public records.

Director Robert Cantwell said the information came from the National Crime Information Center, a federal database available only to law-enforcement officials.

"Because this is a federally controlled and regulated system, CBI has requested the assistance of the FBI to further pursue the investigation," Cantwell said. "The FBI and CBI will be working jointly to complete the investigation."

Use of the federal criminal database for any purpose other than law enforcement is a crime punishable by fines and up to a year in prison.

The TV ad refers to a suspected illegal immigrant who was arrested in Denver in 2001 on suspicion of heroin trafficking. The ad says that when Ritter was the district attorney for Denver, he chose to seek a plea bargain in the case, the man avoided deportation, and he was later arrested in California on suspicion of sexually assaulting a minor.

The Beauprez campaign has said the information came from an informant and has refused to identify the source.

In a radio debate in Denver earlier Wednesday, Ritter demanded that Beauprez disclose how he got the information, saying the Republican has promised to be accountable for his actions.

"If you're going to talk about accountability ... but you're utilizing information that can only be obtained illegally, we need to know what your source is," Ritter said.

Beauprez responded that Ritter was trying to dodge questions about why he plea-bargained with the defendant mentioned in the ad.

"I think, in fact I know, that the information we've got is absolutely, indisputably true," Beauprez said.

The FBI's involvement "doesn't change anything for us," Beauprez spokesman John Marshall said. "We're going to fully cooperate with whomever we need to cooperate with."

The investigation is an ugly twist in the relatively mild campaign to succeed Republican Gov. Bill Owens, who is prevented by term limits from running again. Recent polls show Beauprez, a two-term congressman, trailing Ritter.

FBI Asked To Join Beauprez Ad Investigation (CSG)

By Kyle Henley, The Gazette

Colorado Springs Gazette, October 19, 2006

DENVER - A criminal investigation of Bob Beauprez's gubernatorial campaign snowballed Wednesday when state investigators asked the FBI to join a probe of how confidential information was obtained from a federal database.

The Colorado Bureau of Investigation determined Wednesday that Beauprez's campaign had used information in a campaign ad that had to have come from the National Crime Information Center. Under federal law, the only people who can legally access NCIC data are the criminals whose records are there, or members of Congress.

Beauprez, whose campaign has refused to disclose the identity of a person it has referred to as an "informant," is a Republican congressman from Colorado's 7th District.

CBI opened a file against Beauprez late last week, looking into allegations that his campaign illegally used a federal criminal database that is only supposed to be used for law enforcement purposes. It's conceivable the investigation could result in a felony charge.

Information from the database was the foundation for an ad attacking the record of Beauprez's Democratic rival, Bill Ritter, a former Denver district attorney.

"Because this is a federally controlled and regulated system, CBI has requested the assistance of the FBI to further pursue the investigation," CBI Director Karl Wilmes said. "The FBI and CBI will be working jointly to complete the investigation."

Beauprez has denied any wrongdoing, and campaign spokesman John Marshall reiterated that Wednesday.

"We are going to cooperate in every way with law enforcement on this, because we've done nothing wrong," Marshall said.

At a debate last week, Beauprez said the information was obtained from an informant. He said the campaign would demonstrate that the information was obtained legally.

Marshall, however, would not reveal the name of the informant, saying he is protecting a confidential source.

Ritter's campaign asked for the investigation, which has derailed Beauprez's damaging political attacks less than three weeks before the Nov. 7 election.

"The congressman is now on day six of refusing to disclose his source, and, with each passing day, he digs himself a deeper and deeper hole," said Evan Dreyer, Ritter's spokesman. "He has asked voters to hold them accountable. Well, he can rest assured the FBI will hold him accountable."

The Beauprez ads highlighted 152 cases in which Ritter's office offered plea agreements to immigrants — both legal and illegal — to help them avoid deportation.

Last week, the campaign ran a potentially damaging television ad featuring Carlos Estrada Medina, who was arrested in Denver on drug charges but only received probation under a plea agreement. The ad claims Medina was later arrested in California for a sexual abuse of a child.

Several media outlets investigated the ad and could not find any information about a California case involving Medina. Checks under his aliases also turned up nothing.

But over the weekend, Marshall told 9NEWS, a Denver television station, that "in federal criminal databases, the guy's information matches up."

The NCIC contains confidential law enforcement records about criminal histories, fugitives, stolen property, missing persons and other details. The records in the NCIC are only available for law enforcement purposes; it is a crime to access those records for almost any other reason.

The law does, however, allow a member of Congress to access the database if a constituent requests his or her own record.

Marshall insists that no one on the campaign accessed the NCIC and that all the information was obtained through the public domain.

"If anyone had done that on our campaign they would have been fired," he said. "We received information we believed to be credible and lawful and verified it through means we believed to be lawful."

But, according to the CBI, the NCIC was the source of the information.

"The CBI thoroughly reviewed and researched the law enforcement databases and determined that the information regarding ... Medina ... was obtained by accessing the federal crime information system known as NCIC," Wilmes said.

Wilmes would not say who accessed the system, something he said is part of the investigation, which he said will take time to complete.

That's bad news for Beauprez's campaign.

Colorado College political science professor Bob Loevy says he thinks that even if Beauprez is exonerated and found to have done nothing wrong, the damage may already be done.

"It may get cleared up before the election gets here, but even then ... all that many voters hear is FBI investigation and Bob Beauprez," Loevy said. "It is just a losing event for the Beauprez campaign. It also mutes what looks like their strongest issue against Ritter."

Prosecutors Want Postponement In Pellicano Trial (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

Federal prosecutors today urged a judge to reject Anthony Pellicano's request that his wiretapping trial begin as scheduled in February, arguing that the complexity of the case, the number of defendants and other factors justify postponement until next fall.

At the same time, prosecutors told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer that if she agrees with Pellicano's request, the government wants to proceed with a February trial for the former private eye and all of his six co-defendants, all but one of whom have agreed to a delay.

On Monday, the U.S. Attorney's Office and lawyers for five of Pellicano's co-defendants filed a stipulation with the judge saying that a delay in the trial was necessary for defense attorneys to review the vast amount of evidence, including 150,000 pages of documents and 443 recorded conversations.

Pellicano and his attorney opposed the move, arguing that he was ready for trial and was eager to resolve the case because he has been behind bars without bail since his indictment in February.

Jail Guard In O.C. Held As Bribery Suspect (LAT)

By Christine Hanley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

He allegedly took money from one or more inmates to supply them with contraband such as cellphones and bodybuilding substances.

A guard at a federal detention center in Orange County was arrested this week on suspicion of taking bribes in exchange for smuggling contraband to at least one inmate, including cellphones, a small computer, protein powders and other bodybuilding substances, a federal official said.

Jose Abel Flores is a correctional officer at the Santa Ana City Jail, which has a contract to house federal prisoners awaiting trial. Flores, 36, of Corona was taken into custody Monday at the jail.

He is scheduled to appear at a bail hearing today.

Flores' attorney, federal Public Defender Dan McCurrie, could not be reached for comment.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Kenneth B. Julian, the lead prosecutor, said he would probably ask that Flores be held without bail.

According to an arrest affidavit prepared by FBI agent Philip J. Carson, the investigation was carried out with the help of an unnamed inmate who is awaiting sentencing on weapons and drug charges, and who is cooperating with the government in hopes of leniency.

The inmate told Carson that Flores began supplying him with illegal goods in November 2005. Under their arrangement, Flores supplied a Sidekick III cellphone, a hand-held computer commonly used for playing video games, liquid creatine and Hydroxycut pills and food, whenever the inmate asked, according to authorities and the affidavit.

Julian said it was not immediately clear whether Flores was delivering goods to other inmates, though prosecutors "strongly suspect there's other people he supplied."

For his services, Flores was paid several thousand dollars, the affidavit says. On many occasions, Flores collected the money from an associate of the inmate by meeting him at a designated pickup point in Puente Hills, the affidavit says.

Based on this information, investigators mounted a sting operation in which Flores was audiotaped and photographed at the meeting spot carrying out the deals, once in August and again in September, according to the affidavit. Each time, the inmate asked for a cellphone and gave Flores the name and number of an undercover agent posing as the bagman.

During the first sting, Flores told the inmate it would cost him $3,000, and Flores arranged over the phone to meet the undercover agent at a McDonald's in Seal Beach, the affidavit says. A month later, the inmate told Flores he had to flush the phone down the toilet to keep it from being discovered and needed a new one. Initially, Flores said he would charge $2,000. But the next day, he raised the price to $3,000, the affidavit says.

The phone conversations between Flores and the undercover bagman were also recorded, the affidavit says.

After Carson arrested Flores and read him his rights, the guard admitted accepting $6,000 for bringing two cellphones into the jail, it says.

christine.hanley@latimes.com

Murder Trial Lies With Conspirator (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

The trial of a man charged with killing New York Times journalist David Rosenbaum opened yesterday with attorneys on both sides saying that the case hinges on the testimony of the defendant's cousin and admitted co-conspirator.

Michael Hamlin "will confess to you that he and his cousin did this terrible thing," Assistant U.S. Attorney Amanda Haines told jurors during opening statements in the trial of Percey Jordan Jr. "You will find out that the evidence in this case 100 percent corroborates what he is telling you."

Mr. Jordan, 42, is charged with felony murder, aggravated assault and credit-card fraud.

Mr. Rosenbaum, 63, was out for a walk late Jan. 6 when he was beaten and robbed on Gramercy Street near his Northwest home. He died two days later at Howard University Hospital.

Hamlin, 24, pleaded guilty to second-degree murder, robbery and conspiracy and is expected to testify against Mr. Jordan.

He has admitted stealing Mr. Rosenbaum's wallet but said Mr. Jordan hit the journalist on the head with a pipe.

Miss Haines said yesterday that Mr. Jordan shoved the pipe up his sleeve and hid behind a tree before ambushing Mr. Rosenbaum.

"He raised that lead pipe and brought it down, down, down onto Mr. Rosenbaum's head," Miss Haines told the jury. "As Mr. Rosenbaum fell into a crumpled heap, this man sitting right across from you hit him again and again and again."

The D.C. Superior Court jury, which consists of 12 jurors and four alternates, comprises 15 women and one man.

Defense attorney Michael Starr sought to discredit Hamlin in his opening statements.

He said that Hamlin, who surrendered to police after seeing his face broadcast on television, has changed his story repeatedly to cooperate with police and keep himself out of trouble.

"The government has manufactured a case about a completely unbelievable, untrustworthy story they have been fed by Michael Hamlin," said Mr. Starr, who noted a lack of forensic evidence in the case. "That story, the evidence will show you, is false [and] untrue."

Hamlin did not testify yesterday, although jurors heard from several other prosecution witnesses.

Rosemary Tornillo, a resident in the Rosenbaums' neighborhood, testified to passing Mr. Rosenbaum the night he was attacked.

Mrs. Tornillo said she saw two black men get into a car and drive in Mr. Rosenbaum's direction shortly after he had passed her. The men were in a car that Miss Haines said the car belonged to Hamlin.

"It's going to come in as little pieces like a puzzle, and we're going to put it together," Miss Haines said.

Jurors also heard testimony from Mr. Rosenbaum's daughter, Dorothy, and Marian Dirda, a woman whose purse was stolen Jan. 6 and whose credit cards were used along with Mr. Rosenbaum's by Mr. Jordan, prosecutors said.

Prosecutors also played the recording of a 911 call from a resident on Gramercy Street reporting Mr. Rosenbaum lying on the sidewalk outside her home.

Feds Net 125 Nationwide In Kid-Porn Case (AP)

By Wayne Parry

The Associated Press, October 18, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) -- A Bible camp counselor and a Boy Scout leader were among 125 people arrested nationwide in an Internet child pornography case in which subscribers purchased photos and videos of children engaged in sex acts with adults, federal authorities said Wednesday.

The case originated in New Jersey, but quickly spread to 22 states. The defendants were charged with either possession or receipt of child pornography. Additional arrests are expected.

Prosecutors said the Web site alerted subscribers that its content was illegal and urged them to be discreet about their purchases.

"When I say `hard-core' pornography, I am talking about child pornography that includes images of children as young as six months involved in bondage and sodomy," U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie said. "This type of depraved conduct is something a civilized society cannot tolerate."

Christie said none of the defendants appeared in any of the images they obtained from the Web site. He would not identify the Web site or say whether it is still in operation.

Among those arrested were a Bible camp counselor from Vancouver, Wash.; a Boy Scout leader from Mission, Texas; and a pharmaceutical researcher in New Jersey.

Several of those arrested nationwide have prior records for molesting or sexually assaulting children, officials said.

One defendant from San Diego told agents at his arrest that he had molested at least eight children over a 30-year period, and boasted of being able to identify particularly vulnerable children, said Christie.

Miami Man Sentenced For Being Teen's Pimp (MH)

By Evan S. Benn

The Miami Herald, October 19, 2006

A Miami man will spend 10 years in prison for planning to drive a 14-year-old girl to Georgia and prostitute her.

A federal judge on Monday sentenced Michael Miller, 29, who pleaded guilty in August to attempting to transport a minor for prostitution.

The girl, whose street name was China Doll, told investigators Miller was her pimp, driving her to truck stops and other places throughout Florida to have sex for money.

She spoke to police after undercover officers arrested her during a Miami prostitution sting in April. When officers realized she was 14, they quickly moved to find Miller.

During the teen's police interrogation, her cellphone rang several times from a caller ID that read ``Daddy."

Miller made the teen call him Daddy, and he took all of her prostitution earnings, up to $1,000 a day, investigators said.

A MEETING

The teen told detectives Miller "beat her on several occasions if she did not follow his rules, acted defiantly or looked at other men," according to court documents.

Miller was planning to take the teen to Georgia to prostitute, investigators said.

Police set up a meeting between the girl and Miller at Southwest 44th Avenue and Eighth Street on April 6, the same day as the girl's arrest.

Miller showed up in a 1998 Cadillac Deville and was arrested by FBI agents.

Inside the car, agents found high-heeled shoes, skimpy dresses, nude photos of the 14-year-old girl and DVDs titled Pimps Up, Ho's Down and American Pimp, court documents show.

CHARGE REDUCED

Miller had faced a charge of attempting to induce a minor into prostitution, which carried a maximum 30-year sentence. But prosecutors reduced the charge when Miller took a plea agreement.

Attempts to reach a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office were unsuccessful.

Prosecutors wrote in court documents that Miller's plea showed ``affirmative and timely acceptance of personal responsibility."

In pleading guilty, Miller spared the government the expense of a trial, and he eliminated his right to appeal, according to the agreement.

Miller's criminal history includes a jail term in 2003 for a robbery conviction and marijuana arrests in 2005 and this year, records show.

Young, Cold And For Sale (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

Atlanta

The girl approached me on a desolate stretch of Metropolitan Parkway, about halfway between the airport and the clustered lights of the downtown skyline. The night was unusually cold and she was shivering a little. She told me she was 15, but she didn't look more than 12.

It was bad enough that the child was outside at all at midnight. The fact that she was turning tricks was heartbreaking. I explained that I was a reporter for The New York Times and asked if she would wait while I went to get someone to help her. She looked surprised. "I don't need any help," she said.

I had already spent a night traveling with undercover vice cops, and they had pointed out the different neighborhoods in which under-age prostitutes, some as young as 10, roamed the streets.

"The girls are exploited in every sense of the word," said Lt. Keith Meadows, who heads Atlanta's vice unit. "The men are all over them — the pimps, the johns. The girls get beaten. That's common. They're introduced to drugs. And the pimps take all the money. It's sad.

"I would say that in most cases, the girls never knew their fathers. A lot of them were abused at home and they end up in the clutches of these pimps, putting their trust in someone they shouldn't have."

Atlanta, for a variety of reasons, has become a hub of child prostitution and other forms of commercial sexual exploitation of children. The overall market for sex with kids is booming in many parts of the U.S. In Atlanta — a thriving hotel and convention center with a sophisticated airport and ground transportation network — pimps and other lowlifes have tapped into that market bigtime.

"These guys are even going into rural Georgia and getting these girls and bringing them into Atlanta," said Alesia Adams, a longtime advocate who has worked with the courts and social service agencies to assist young girls who are lured into the sex trade.

DOJ_NMG_0083046

Kaffie McCullough, the project director of a federally sponsored intervention program, said Atlanta's juvenile prostitution problem "is a lot bigger than anybody would really like to know." The sex trade in Atlanta is "a huge, huge, huge industry," she said, and the involvement of kids under 17, which is the age of consent in Georgia, is a substantial part of it.

Stephanie Davis, the policy adviser on women's issues for Mayor Shirley Franklin, agreed. "Sex tourism is coming south," she told me. "There is advertising that I've seen on the Internet and other places that actually targets the New York market, urging men to come to Atlanta for the day and fly back home that night."

The risks for pimps and other exploiters of children are low, and the payoff is often enormous. Demand is increasing for younger and younger prostitutes, in part because of the cultural emphasis on the sexual appeal of very young women and girls, and in part because of the widely held belief among johns that there is less risk of contracting a disease from younger prostitutes.

For the girls, life on the street can be hellish. A study released last fall by the Atlanta Women's Agenda, an initiative of the mayor's office, noted that the girls are always highly vulnerable to rape, assault, robbery and murder, not to mention arrest and incarceration. Added to that are the psychological risks, which are profound.

The girl who approached me on Metropolitan Parkway had walked alone across an empty, rundown parking lot. The usual practice, I had been told, was for johns in cars to pick up the girls and then drive behind an abandoned commercial building, of which there were plenty in the area.

The girl said she had a "boyfriend," which is the word the girls use for their pimps. When I asked if her boyfriend knew what she was doing, she said, "He told me to do it."

She lifted her chin and proudly showed me a cheap necklace she was wearing. "He gave me this," she said. "He loves me."

I tried to think of a way to bring the girl to the attention of some social service agency, or even the police. But taking her into my rented car, even if she had been willing to go with me, was out of the question. I looked around, hoping to spot a passing patrol car.

The girl's bangs fluttered as the wind picked up. She looked cold. "I gotta go," she said.

Council Alters, Then Extends Emergency Anti-crime Efforts (WT)

By Amy Doolittle, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

The D.C. Council agreed unanimously yesterday on legislation to continue the enforcement of some of the emergency crime measures passed this summer.

The bill renews for 90 days three of the provisions passed by the council in early July, after an increase in violent crime.

The provisions authorize the continued use of neighborhood-surveillance cameras, some offenders being held until trial and police still having access to juvenile criminal records.

The bill was written and introduced by council member Phil Mendelson, at-large Democrat, and is a compromise between the council and Mayor Anthony A. Williams, a Democrat.

The bill does not have a provision Mr. Williams included Tuesday in similar legislation, which gave the mayor the power to set the time for the city's juvenile curfew.

Though the bill still allows police to see juvenile records, it limits their access to the offender's name, address, date of birth and condition of release. Unlike the July emergency bill, it does not allow them full access to case files.

"There was a broad class of juveniles for whom the information can be shared," Mr. Mendelson said. "We've narrowed that ... . We substantially moved to finding a balance."

Mr. Mendelson said he removed the curfew provision and limited the access so the bill could meet the requirements of a statute barring passage of the same bill more than once on an emergency basis.

Charlotte Brookins-Hudson, the council's attorney, told The Washington Times last month the bill would require a "very substantial modification" to be permitted under the statute, which is designed to prevent city officials from circumventing the congressional review period to which D.C. laws are subject.

Mrs. Brookins-Hudson said the bill met the requirement in part because of Mr. Mendelson's changes.

DOJ_NMG_0083047

Council member Adrian M. Fenty, Ward 4 Democrat and the Democratic nominee for mayor, was the only council member to vote against the legislation in July. He said yesterday he supports Mr. Mendelson's changes to the bill.

"I'm behind what Mendelson did with it," Mr. Fenty said. "That's better than what we had before."

The bill includes $12.7 million for youth-violence prevention, the purchase and operation of additional neighborhood-surveillance cameras, additional police overtime pay and extended hours and staffing at city recreation facilities.

CIVIL LAW:

North Slope Family Seeks $40 Million From BP (FAIRDNM)

By Sam Bishop

Fairbanks (AK) Daily News-Miner, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — A family that owns land under a BP oil drilling pad on the northeast shore of Prudhoe Bay wants the company to pay at least $40 million in back rent, and it is suing the federal government and going to the media to push the point.

The U.S. Department of Justice, in a recent response to the lawsuit, says the lease was made properly and the family has been paid what it is owed — about $670,000 from 1994 to 2001.

A BP spokesman said Tuesday that the family's dispute is properly with the federal government, not the company.

Joseph Inu-quruq Delia, who lives in Anchorage but grew up in Fairbanks, said the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs failed to negotiate a fair lease on behalf of his grandfather, Andrew Oenga.

Oenga, an Inupiat who didn't read or speak English, died in 1990, a year after signing the original lease.

"We're just seeking justice for the wrong they've done," Delia said in an interview Tuesday. "The government failed him."

Delia is one of eight family members, known as the "Oenga heirs," who sued the government in June. They live in Anchorage, Barrow and Fairbanks.

Their lawsuit targets the government for the money. However, a summary distributed by Levick Strategic Communications, a Washington firm hired to spread the story to the media, also pointed to BP.

"BP is an intervener in this lawsuit and will probably be responsible for all monetary damages awarded by the court," the summary claims. The company "knowingly" took advantage of BIA's errors, it says.

Daren Beaudo, BP spokesman in Alaska, said Tuesday that the company paid all the money it owed under the government's appraisal of the Oenga property. Appraisals must be updated every four or five years. That lagged at one point, Beaudo said, so BP even prodded the agency to conduct a new appraisal. The company has paid the resulting increase in rent, he said.

The Oenga heirs have no rights to the oil under the land, he noted. "The money they receive is strictly for the use of the surface," he said.

BP has asked to intervene in the lawsuit just to "be a part of the process," Beaudo said.

Oenga, who lived across the North Slope in his youth, obtained the Prudhoe Bay land as a Native allotment. Delia, his grandson, said the family had a traditional sod house at the site, located on the long narrow spit called Heald Point. Delia's mother was born there.

Congress ended the allotment program in 1971 when it passed the broad settlement of indigenous land claims in Alaska. Nevertheless, business arrangements on allotments are subject to approval by the federal government, part of its "trust" responsibility to Native people.

Title to the land, as with all Native allotments, gave Oenga surface rights only — the oil and gas underneath is owned by the state.

In 1989, Oenga and the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs approved a lease of his property's surface to Standard Alaska Production Co., which subsequently became BP Exploration (Alaska) Inc. BP initially wanted to use the property for a road and pipeline.

BP secured an amendment to the lease in the summer of 1993 so it could use the land as a drilling pad to reach the Niakuk oil field, according to the family's lawsuit.

DOJ_NMG_0083048

The BIA's superintendent in Fairbanks, Sam Demientieff, approved the amendment a few days later, according to the lawsuit. The lease also was amended twice in the next two years, they claim.

The lawsuit, filed in the U.S. Court of Federal Claims in Washington, D.C., by Idaho attorney Ray Givens, asserts that the BIA and BP then undervalued the use of the land as a drilling pad.

That's in part, the suit claims, because the BIA used the wrong leasing method in the amendments, sticking with a road-pipeline lease instead of an oil and gas mineral development lease.

The bureau thus "did not appraise the property in its highest and best use as a multiple well-head long reach directional drilling oil production facility and did not use similar oil production facilities as comparables," according to the lawsuit.

"The plaintiffs on several occasions have requested the United States to appraise their land as an oil production property," the lawsuit states. "The United States has failed to have the property so appraised …"

A BIA representative in Washington could not be reached late Tuesday afternoon. However, the Department of Justice filed a brief answer to the lawsuit Oct. 5 on behalf of the government.

The Justice department's answer says BP's lease was never "amended," in 1993 or in subsequent years. When BP wanted to begin using the land for a drilling pad, it merely wrote a letter notifying BIA that it would exercise an option to which it had every right under the original lease, the government argues.

The lease "speaks for itself," the Justice department says. The lease "establishes unambiguously" that BP's rights were not "in any way limited to use solely for a road and pipeline."

The department recognizes that the government's appraisal of the property was not based on a determination of its "highest and best use" as a drilling pad, but adds such an appraisal method was only "suggested by plaintiffs nine years after the fact," according to the filing.

The family is asking for at least $40 million, based on various methods of appraising the property's value.

Their lawsuit notes first that federal regulation generally requires companies that develop oil and gas owned by Native Americans to pay a 16.7 percent royalty. However, the state owned the oil and gas under Prudhoe Bay. As part of the lease terms under which the state sold the oil, it collects a 12.5 percent royalty share when the petroleum is pumped to the surface.

Nevertheless, according to the lawsuit, federal regulation states that the BIA should have obtained a lease that pays the family the difference between the state's royalty take and the ideal federal royalty.

From 1994 to 2001, the period in dispute, the 4.17 percent difference would add up to "in excess of $40 million," the lawsuit estimates. (Payments for the years since 2001 are still the subject of an administrative dispute before the Department of Interior's Board of Indian Appeals.)

The Justice Department dismisses the family's argument. The "cited regulation is not applicable at all," it says in its answer.

The lawsuit suggests that, if the royalty argument doesn't hold up, the family still should be granted between $25 million and $40 million based on a "fair annual rental" fee for the land.

The Justice Department "denies any implication that the amounts the plaintiffs have received were less than the present fair annual rental," according to the answer.

If the fair rental argument fails as well, the family's lawsuit offers another. BP at some point gave access from its drilling pad to Arco, whose Alaska assets were later sold to Phillips Petroleum, to drill into the West Niakuk field — without telling the family, the lawsuit claims. The family learned of the arrangement in 2003, it says.

The government failed to properly collect rent related to the West Niakuk oil production or halt the alleged ongoing trespass by ConocoPhillips, the lawsuit argues, and so the family deserves a damage award.

The government's response doesn't get into the details, but again denies the legitimacy of the argument.

Washington, D.C., reporter Sam Bishop can be reached at (202) 662-8721 or sbishop@newsminer.com.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

US Club Owner Gets 10 Years For Forced Labor, Trafficking (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 19, 2006

A nightclub owner was sentenced to 10 years in prison for forcing young South Korean women to work as hostesses, the US Justice Department said.

"Sung Bum Chang imported innocent young women from South Korea and forced them to work at Club Wa under terrible conditions of fear and violence," said Wan Kim, Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division.

Chang, who ran the club in Dallas, Texas, was also ordered to pay 37,000 dollars to the victims.

On June 12 Chang, pleaded guilty to one count of forced labor and one count of conspiracy to commit forced labor.

Prosecutors called this a case of human trafficking, as Chang had set up a network in South Korea to bring young women to the United States with the promise of lucrative jobs.

Once here, he took their passports and locked them indoors, forcing them to drink with customers until late hours.

One young woman leaped from a second-storey window and ran to a community leader who alerted police.

Anti-Illegal Immigration Group Questioned About Letter (AP)

AP, October 19, 2006

(AP) - The leader of an anti-illegal immigration group said she was interviewed by investigators from the attorney general's office Wednesday about a letter sent to Hispanic families in Orange County warning some immigrants could be jailed or deported for voting next month.

Barbara Coe, leader of the California Coalition for Immigration Reform, said she told investigators her group had not authorized the letter and she didn't know who sent it.

The note's letterhead resembles that of the group's, and contains the signature Sergio Ramirez.

"The letterhead was altered and I've never head of any Sergio Ramirez," said Coe during a phone interview.

Calls to the office of state Attorney General Bill Lockyer were not immediately returned. Lockyer's office said Tuesday it was investigating.

Coe said she has received a handful of death threats since last week, when the letter began arriving at an unknown number of Orange County homes. Her group was investigated by the FBI in the late 1990s because members held signs near polls stating only citizens can vote.

Written in Spanish, the letter also says the government has developed a computer system to track down the names of registered voters.

The letter is correct in that only immigrants who are naturalized U.S. citizens can vote, but many of its other contentions are false. It also contains several grammatical errors and reads like a literal translation from English to Spanish, suggesting it was not written by a native Spanish speaker.

Numerous political leaders including Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger have denounced it and called for state and federal investigations.

Barnes Calls Off Voter ID Action Contempt Order No Longer Sought (AJC)

By Ernie Suggs, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 19, 2006

Former Gov. Roy Barnes dropped a request to have his successor, Gov. Sonny Perdue, and the State Election Board found in contempt of court for the mailing of 200,000 letters to Georgia voters that suggested a photo ID was needed to vote in the Nov. 7 general election.

A hearing scheduled for Friday has been canceled.

Barnes filed the contempt motion Monday on behalf of a 60-year-old Atlanta woman who did not have a state-issued ID.

The election board met in a special called meeting Tuesday and voted to again mail letters to about 300,000 voters who received the first letter.

The new letter, to be mailed on or before Oct. 27, clarifies that photo ID is not currently required to vote in Georgia.

Georgia's photo ID law, passed by the Legislature this spring, has failed several times this year to meet legal challenges.

The law was ruled unconstitutional Sept. 19 by Fulton County Superior Court Judge T. Jackson Bedford.

The election board, however, allowed about 200,000 letters to be mailed after the ruling. Many letters also had been mailed before the ruling.

Critics said the original letters would mislead recipients into thinking photo ID was required to vote, and would therefore suppress voter turnout among minorities.

David Worley, a Democratic appointed member of the election board, has threatened to file a complaint with the U.S. Justice Department about the original mailing.

Perdue was not mentioned as being involved in the mailing of the letters and was being sued in his official capacity as head of state government.

Tex McIver, a Republican appointed vice chairman of the election board, initially told the election board that all but 20,000 letters had been sent out before the Sept. 19 ruling.

But the secretary of state's election division later confirmed that nearly 200,000 letters were mailed after Sept. 19.

Shift Change Blamed For Poor Service (TSSC)

By Kelly Marshall Fuller

The State (SC), October 19, 2006

MYRTLE BEACH — A problem during a shift change, not racial bias, was the reason Georgetown resident Rose Rock was not served in May at the Murrells Inlet location of the Cracker Barrel Old Country Store, restaurant chain officials said Wednesday.

A news conference held outside the Murrells Inlet restaurant drew the Rev. Al Sharpton, Rock and officials from the Lebanon, Tenn.-based restaurant.

Rock and restaurant official Diana Wynne offered different versions of what caused Rock and her 21-year-old daughter, Andi Rock, to leave the restaurant May 16 without receiving service.

Rock, mother of comedian Chris Rock, owns a home in Georgetown and is the host of a local radio show.

"We're outraged that racism is permitted," Sharpton said. "Mrs. Rock did what was right. In frustration, she reached out to us."

Wynne, vice president of corporate affairs for Cracker Barrel, said the incident is under investigation.

"We made an honest mistake," she said. "It was not a discrimination issue. It was a service issue."

Wynne said Rock was a regular customer at the Murrells Inlet restaurant before the incident.

Rock visited the restaurant around 4:30 p.m., during the shift change, Wynne said. By mistake, Rock's table was not assigned a server, she said. The restaurant manager offered Rock a free meal, and Rock also received a gift package from Cracker Barrel, Wynne said.

"Cracker Barrel does not tolerate discrimination of any kind."

Rock said she and her daughter sat for 30 minutes before noticing other people receiving iced tea and menus.

A hostess ignored her, and the manager did not tell any servers to apologize, Rock said.

"It's hard to miss two black people in a sea of white folks," Rock said. "We stick out."

Wynne said the oversight at the restaurant has prompted a review of service issues throughout the restaurant chain. Officials with Cracker Barrel have offered to meet with Rock, she said.

It is not the first time the restaurant chain has been scrutinized over allegations of racial bias.

In 2004, a civil action claiming racial discrimination against the restaurant chain was settled without admission of guilt. The agreement came with stipulations by the U.S. Justice Department.

The injunction from the Justice Department forbids Cracker Barrel from denying service or food, or providing inferior service or food, to any person because of race or color.

Kelly Marshall Fuller is a reporter for The (Myrtle Beach) Sun News, a McClatchy newspaper.

Affirmative Action Debate In Michigan Could Influence Nation (CHIT)

By Jodi S. Cohen

Chicago Tribune, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083051

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. -- Her voice tired but her passion as strong as ever, Jennifer Gratz took the lectern in a recent debate here and talked about what she's been talking about for nearly a decade.

"When we put an emphasis on race or sex through university admissions, through public employment, through policy, we teach people that it is OK to treat people differently," Gratz, 29, said as she debated this fall's Michigan referendum that would ban affirmative action in public education, hiring and contracting.

Civil rights leaders said the vote will influence the affirmative action debate nationally.

Gratz, a white woman from suburban Detroit who graduated 12th in her high school class, sued the University of Michigan in 1997 for discrimination after being denied admission. In June 2003, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Gratz's case and another case that colleges and universities can consider a student's race when making admissions decisions in order to promote diversity but can't use rigid formulas to do so.

The day after that ruling, Gratz called Ward Connerly, the black California businessman who led a successful voter initiative to ban affirmative action there. She had met him once —in the coatroom at the Supreme Court. "I said, 'We have to do something about this,'" she recalled during an interview at Grand Valley State University in Grand Rapids.

Three years later, Michigan voters will decide Nov. 7 whether to amend the state constitution to outlaw consideration of race and gender in deciding which applicants get into college, who receives government jobs and what businesses secure state and local contracts. Gratz is executive director of the group behind the measure, known as Proposal 2 or the Michigan Civil Rights Initiative. Connerly has donated $450,000 of the $2 million that has been raised to fund support for the measure, he said.

The vote comes as affirmative action, one of the nation's most controversial social issues, remains in the spotlight. The Supreme Court will hear cases this term from Seattle and Louisville about whether public elementary and high schools can consider race in assigning students to specific schools to maintain a racial balance.

Backers of the Michigan proposal say individuals should be judged on their merits. Opponents say that eliminating affirmative action would derail gains made by minorities and women, and would lead to less diversity in government jobs and the state's colleges and universities, particularly the University of Michigan.

Polls released within the past week were conflicting, but both indicated a tight race with many voters still undecided. Pollster Ed Sarpolus said that whether the proposal passes will depend on whether supporters can sway voters to believe this is an issue about race, or whether opponents can convince the public that women and the greater public will be negatively affected.

"There is a large enough undecided [bloc of voters] that it could go either way," said Sarpolus of EPIC-MRA, a Lansing-based public opinion research firm.

Opponents recently began airing two statewide radio ads, including one that compares the passage of the proposal to the Sept. 11 attacks and Hurricane Katrina disaster.

Karen Shively, a 58-year-old legal secretary who listened to the debate in Grand Rapids, is among the undecided.

"Everyone should be given a fair look. … But people who need a boost up should be given the help," said Shively, who is white. "I guess what I don't understand about this initiative is how far does it go? Will it go too far?"

The proposal's opponents sued to keep the issue out of the election, claiming individuals were misled into thinking that they were supporting affirmative action when they signed petitions to get it on the ballot. A federal judge expressed a belief that there was fraud, but he dismissed the case because there was no evidence that minorities in particular were targeted, which would have violated the Voting Rights Act.

There has been at least one debate or forum somewhere in the state nearly every day for weeks. Activists from both sides hand out pamphlets before University of Michigan football games, religious leaders in Detroit and the suburbs are preaching on the issue, and the National Urban League president has toured the state.

Virtually every religious, political, business and civic organization in Michigan opposes the measure, with groups as diverse as the Michigan Catholic Conference and the Affirmations Lesbian and Gay Community Center joining to form the group One United Michigan, which has raised about $2.7 million, said spokesman David Waymire. Both candidates for governor, incumbent Democrat Jennifer Granholm and Republican challenger Dick DeVos, are against it.

DOJ_NMG_0083052

At Hartford Memorial Baptist Church in Detroit recently , Vivian Carpenter, an African-American business leader and University of Michigan graduate, sold T-shirts and passed out cardboard fans that said: "Don't roll back progress for Michigan. Vote No on 2."

Carpenter, who in 1973 was the second black woman to graduate from the University of Michigan with an engineering degree, credits affirmative action. She was recruited to the university through an outreach program for minority students in Detroit public schools.

"All of these programs are good for leveling the playing field and creating opportunities for minorities where there would be none," said Carpenter, who also has graduate degrees from the university.

But Sarah Ledford, a white U-M engineering student, disagrees that women and minorities should get a boost. She stood outside Michigan Stadium on a recent Saturday, handing out fliers about why citizens should vote "yes" on Proposal 2.

"Even though affirmative action favors me, I hate that I'm favored. I want to be treated fairly," said Ledford, 19. At the University of Michigan, Ledford and women who apply to the engineering school get special consideration, as do men interested in nursing or social work, because their sexes are underrepresented in those fields.

Proposal 2 likely would outlaw such practices, though the courts would be left to sort out whether targeted recruitment, outreach, scholarships and other programs are illegal. The areas most at risk include university admissions policies that consider race and ethnicity as a bonus factor, and local government employment and contracting policies that promote diversity, according to the Citizens Research Council, an independent policy research center in Livonia, Mich.

State hiring and contracting policies currently are based on merit and competitive bidding and likely would not be affected, according to the research group.

In 1996, California passed a similar referendum, called Proposition 209. Washington state voters did the same a few years later.

Since then, enrollments of African-American, Hispanic and Native American freshmen in the University of California system have dropped, particularly at the elite campuses in Berkeley and Los Angeles. At UCLA, 96 black freshmen said they intended to enroll this fall in a class of about 4,800, the lowest number since 1973, which administrators have called a "crisis."

Minority business owners in California, meanwhile, are receiving less state business, according to an analysis of Department of Transportation contracts by the Berkeley-based Discrimination Research Center. Minority businesses received 16 percent of awarded revenue from construction projects in the nine years before Proposition 209, and about 8 percent since then. The study also found that two-thirds of registered minority-owned firms for transportation construction in 1996 are no longer in business.

Connerly, a former University of California regent, said he is considering expanding his campaign to other states depending on the outcome in Michigan.

"To say that our government, whether it is a university or bureaucrats at the Mosquito Abatement District, should be allowed to take our identities into account … is just wrong," he said. "It is a joke when we have policies that openly and blatantly do that."

The Michigan vote may well be seen as a test for other efforts to curb affirmative action nationally.

"We cannot afford to lose this one," said Wade Henderson, president of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, based in Washington, D.C. "It would send a message to the rest of the country that this is really open season on affirmative action programs and equal opportunity initiatives."

Panel Suggests University Amend For Past Slavery Ties (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

BOSTON, Oct. 18 — Extensively documenting Brown University's 18th-century ties to slavery, a university committee called today for the institution to make amends by building a memorial, creating a center for the study of slavery and injustice and increasing efforts to recruit minority students, particularly those from Africa and the West Indies.

The Committee on Slavery and Justice, appointed three years ago by Brown's president, Ruth J. Simmons, a great-granddaughter of slaves who is the first black president of an Ivy League institution, said in a 106-page report: "We cannot change the past. But an institution can hold itself accountable for the past, accepting its burdens and responsibilities along with its benefits and privileges."

DOJ_NMG_0083053

It added, "In the present instance this means acknowledging and taking responsibility for Brown's part in grievous crimes."

The committee did not call for outright reparations, an idea that has support among some African-Americans and had been a controversial issue at Brown several years ago. But the committee's chairman, James T. Campbell, a history professor at Brown, said he believed the recommendations "are substantive and do indeed represent a form of repair."

The committee also recommended that the university publicly and persistently acknowledge its slave ties, including during freshmen orientation. Dr. Campbell said he believed that the recommendations, if implemented, would represent a more concrete effort than that of any other American university to make amends for slave ties.

"I think it is unprecedented," Dr. Campbell said, adding that a few other universities and colleges have established memorials, study programs or issued apologies, but not on the scale of the Brown recommendations. It was not clear how much the committee's recommendations would cost to implement.

"We're not making a claim that somehow Brown is uniquely guilty," Dr. Campbell said. "I think we're making a claim that this is an aspect of our history that not anyone has fully come to terms with. This is a critical step in allowing an institution to move forward."

Even in the North, a number of universities have ties to slavery. Harvard Law School was endowed by money its founder earned selling slaves in Antigua's cane fields. And at Yale, three scholars reported in 2001 that the university relied on slave-trading money for its first scholarships, endowed professorship and library endowment.

Dr. Simmons issued a letter in response to the committee's report, soliciting comments from members of the Brown community and saying she has asked for the findings to be discussed at an open forum. She declined to give her own reaction, saying, "When it is appropriate to do so, I will issue a university response to the recommendations and suggest what we might do."

She said "the committee deserves praise for demonstrating so steadfastly that there is no subject so controversial that it should not be submitted to serious study and debate."

Initial reaction to the recommendations seemed to be appreciative.

"It sounds to me like this makes sense," said Rhett S. Jones, a longtime professor of history and Africana studies at Brown. "I did not expect the committee would emerge saying 'well, you know, Brown should write a check.' I never thought that was in the cards. I'm not sure I think it's even appropriate that a university write a check, even though it's pretty widely agreed on that Brown would not be where it is if it were not for slave money. These recommendations seem to me to be appropriate undertakings for the university."

Brown's ties to slavery are clear but also complex. The university's founder, the Rev. James Manning, freed his only slave, but accepted donations from slave owners and traders, including the Brown family of Providence. At least one of the Brown brothers, John, a treasurer of the college, was an active slave trader, but another brother, Moses, became a Quaker abolitionist, although he ran a textile factory that used cotton grown with slave labor.

In addition, University Hall, which houses Dr. Simmons's office, was built by a crew with at least two slaves.

"Any institution in the United States that existed prior to 1865 was entangled in slavery, but the entanglements are particularly dense in Rhode Island," said Dr. Campbell, noting that the state was the hub through which many slave ships traveled.

The issue caused friction at Brown in 2001, when the student newspaper, the Brown Daily Herald, printed a full-page advertisement produced by a conservative writer, listing "Ten Reasons Why Reparations for Slavery Is a Bad Idea And Racist Too."

The ad, also run by other college newspapers, prompted protests by students who demanded the paper pay "reparations" by donating its advertising fee or giving free advertising space to reparations proponents.

The Brown committee was comprised of 16 faculty members, students and administrators, and its research was extensive. "The official history of Brown will have to be rewritten, entirely scrapped," said Omer Bartov, a professor on the committee who specializes in studying the Holocaust and genocide.

DOJ_NMG_0083054

The report cites some examples of steps taken by other universities: a memorial unveiled last year by the University of North Carolina, a five-year program of workshops and activities at Emory University, and a 2004 vote by the faculty senate of the University of Alabama to apologize for previous faculty members having whipped slaves on campus.

Controversial Ad Links MLK, GOP (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

When a black conservative group ran a radio ad proclaiming that the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. was a Republican, reaction was swift. "We've gotten some e-mails and telephone calls filled with vitriol," said Frances Rice, chairman of the National Black Republican Association. "They've called me Aunt Jemima, a sellout, a traitor to my race."

In the battle for the black electorate, liberals, who make up the overwhelming majority of black voters, have long disagreed with conservatives over ideology, public policy and economic strategies to better the lives of African Americans. But when conservatives placed the civil rights movement in a Republican context, black liberals said, they crossed a line.

"To suggest that Martin could identify with a party that affirms preemptive, predatory war, and whose religious partners hint that God affirms war and favors the rich at the expense of the poor, is to revile Martin," said the Rev. Joseph Lowery, the former president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, which the slain civil rights leader helped establish.

Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), who marched with King in the 1960s, called the ads an "insult to the legacy and the memory of Martin Luther King Jr." and "an affront to all that he stood for."

The spot, which ran for a time in the District, Georgia, Maryland, Ohio and Pennsylvania, will soon run again in those areas, as well as in Miami, Orlando and Tampa, Rice said.

The debate surrounding the ad is the latest skirmish in the ongoing battle over the King legacy. Foes of affirmative action, for example, often cite a line from King's "I Have a Dream" speech in 1963 in which he prayed that his children would not be judged by the color of their skin but by the "content of their character," an adoption that makes black liberals fume. But in the latest fight, civil rights veterans may be surprised to find that some black conservatives agree with them.

Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael Steele (R), who is running for the U.S. Senate, denounced the King ad, and Donald E. Scoggins, president of Republicans for Black Empowerment and a former member of the association, said it was a terrible idea.

Black Republicans railed against the radio ads, with the sharpest criticism coming from former members of the black Republican association.

"The vast majority of black Republicans I know would not have approved of the ad," Scoggins said.

In the ad, a black woman says, "Dr. King was a real man," and a second one responds, "You know he was a Republican."

"Dr. King, a Republican?"

The women go on to say that Democrats started the Ku Klux Klan, lumping together those in the South with others in the North who reached out to African Americans with New Deal programs and by desegregating the armed forces.

The backlash was so fierce that Rice stopped answering telephone calls. "We anticipated some controversy, but my goodness, we struck a nerve," she said in an interview from Sarasota, Fla.

"I absolutely do not regret the ads," said Rice, 62, a native of Atlanta, King's hometown. He "absolutely was a Republican," she insisted. "We were all Republicans in those days. The Democrats were training fire hoses on us, siccing dogs on us."

It is true that Southern Democrats, many of whom called themselves "Dixiecrats," blocked the social and political progress of black Southerners for decades. Among them was Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.), a former local leader in the Ku Klux Klan. Byrd has said he regrets his affiliation.

In 1960, King was arrested for trespassing during a sit-in and held in Georgia's Reidsville prison. Fearing for his son's life, Martin Luther King Sr. appealed to presidential candidate John F. Kennedy to secure his release.

When King was freed, his father vowed to deliver 10 million votes to the Democrat, even though Kennedy was only a reluctant supporter of civil rights. That began four decades of black people voting for liberals.

The younger King voted for Kennedy, and for Democrat Lyndon B. Johnson four years later. In that election, King publicly denounced the Republican candidate, Barry Goldwater.

DOJ_NMG_0083055

Today, the vast majority of black voters are Democrats, including former ambassador to the United Nations Andrew Young and former presidential hopeful Jesse L. Jackson, two former King aides.

That is why the ad was "a joke," said Christopher Arps, a former spokesman for Rice and the association. "Anyone with any sense knows that most black people were Republican at one time. But it's a far stretch to think that in the '60s Martin Luther King was a Republican."

Arps and Scoggins resigned from the association board last year when they disagreed with Rice on a separate issue. She wanted to support President Bush when he came under fire for his administration's slow response to Hurricane Katrina.

"In terms of what we're trying to do, encourage more blacks to look at the Republican Party, I didn't think we could do that in an in-your-face-type way," Scoggins said. "There were bodies floating in the street."

In addition to Scoggins and Arps, at least four other members resigned. Rice questioned their fortitude. The group was founded so that black conservatives could assert themselves, she said, and "when it came time to do something, some stepped back."

"It was a 'my way or the highway' sort of thing," Scoggins said. "I was crushed when this thing happened because it turned out to be completely the opposite of what I thought it would be."

New Laws And Machines May Spell Voting Woes (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 18 — New electronic voting machines have arrived in Yolo County, Calif., but there is one hitch: the audio program for the visually impaired in some of them works only in Vietnamese.

“Talk about panic,” said Freddy Oakley, the county’s top election official. “I’ve got gray-haired ladies as poll workers standing around looking stunned.”

As dozens of states are enforcing new voter registration laws and switching to paperless electronic voting systems, officials across the country are bracing for an Election Day with long lines and heightened confusion, followed by an increase in the number of contested results.

In Maryland, Mississippi and Pennsylvania, a shortage of technicians has vendors for new machines soliciting applications for technical support workers on job Web sites like Monster.com. Ms. Oakley, who is also facing a shortage, raided the computer science department at the University of California, Davis, hiring 60 graduate students as troubleshooters.

Arizona, California, Georgia, Indiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, Ohio and Pennsylvania are among the states considered most likely to experience difficulties, according to voting experts who have been tracking the technology and other election changes.

“We’ve got new laws, new technology, heightened partisanship and a growing involvement of lawyers in the voting process,” said Tova Wang, who studies elections for the Century Foundation, a nonpartisan research group. “We also have the greatest potential for problems in more places next month than in any voting season before.”

Election officials in many of the states are struggling with delays in the delivery of machines before the election as old-fashioned lever and punch-card machines are phased out. A chronic shortage of poll workers, many of them retirees uncomfortable with new technology, has worsened matters.

Wendy S. Noren, the top election official for Boone County, Mo., which includes Columbia, said delays in the delivery of new machines had left her county several weeks behind schedule and with 600 poll workers yet to be trained. Ms. Noren said she also had not yet been provided with the software coding she needed to print the training manuals.

“I think we will make it,” she said, “but my staff is already at the point of passing out, and the sprint is just starting.”

New computerized registration rolls and litigation over new voter identification laws in states like Arizona, Georgia, Indiana and Missouri have left many poll workers and voters unclear about the rules, including whether they are in effect, as the courts have blocked many of the new laws.

DOJ_NMG_0083056

"We're expecting arguments at the polls in these states that will slow everything down and probably cause large numbers of legitimate voters to be turned away or to be forced to vote on provisional ballots," said Barbara Burt, an elections reform director for Common Cause.

Meanwhile, votes in about half of the 45 most competitive Congressional races, including contests in Florida, Georgia and Indiana, will be cast on electronic machines that provide no independent means of verification.

"In a close race, a machine error in one precinct could leave the results in doubt and the losing candidates won't be able to get a recount," said Warren Stewart, policy director for VoteTrustUSA, an advocacy group that has criticized electronic voting.

Deborah L. Markowitz, president of the National Association of Secretaries of State, was less inclined to sound the alarm. She said that since it was not a presidential election year and many states had encouraged voting by mail, fewer people would turn up at the polls than in 2004.

With computerized registration rolls, Ms. Markowitz said, there will be far fewer people incorrectly excluded from the new databases compared with when registration rolls were on paper.

"There will be isolated incidents, there is no doubt about that," she said. "But over all the system will move faster and with fewer problems."

Charles Stewart, head of the political science department at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, published a study this year indicating that from 2000 to 2004, new technology helped reduce the number of improperly marked ballots by about one million votes.

"If you think things are bad and worrisome now, they were much worse before 2000," Mr. Stewart said, adding that breakdowns in the mechanics of voting are simply more highlighted, not more prevalent.

Still, this is a year of firsts for some local election officials. Cherie Poucher, elections director for Wake County, N.C., which includes Raleigh, said she expected 350,000 voters on Election Day, up from the 30,000 in the May primary. She worries that the county's 218 optical scan machines may be unable to handle the increased load. During the primary, 12 of the new machines would not boot up and needed to be replaced.

"In the end, we were lucky," Ms. Poucher said. The machines were replaced within hours, she said, and since her county uses optical scan machines rather than paperless machines, voters were able to deposit paper ballots into a ballot box until replacements arrived.

"I'm an optimist," she said. "But if we have more failures than we have total machines, it could be really difficult even with the paper ballots."

Ms. Burt of Common Cause said there was some disagreement about the likelihood of problems, and difficulty in predicting where problems might emerge, in part because there is little uniformity in how elections are conducted.

Except for rudimentary federal rules on voting age, federal financing for states and counties, and protections for minorities and the disabled, elections are shaped by a variety of local laws, conflicting court rulings and technological choices.

"People might refer to it as a national election system but in truth there is no such thing," Ms. Burt said.

Justin Levitt, a lawyer with the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law, said that on election night his organization will be keeping particularly close watch on North Carolina, Florida and South Dakota, because of new voter registration databases there.

Under the federal Help America Vote Act passed in 2002, election officials were required to create computerized statewide voter registration rolls. These databases were intended to help streamline registration and decrease fraud, and they help political parties track potentially supportive voters. In some states, however, the databases have blocked large numbers of eligible voters from joining registration lists.

North Carolina, for example, requires that information provided by voters for registration forms match information in the motor vehicle or Social Security databases.

"If someone is listed with their maiden name in one list and their married name in another list, that voter will be blocked from the eligible voter roll," said Mr. Levitt, adding that these voters may show up in large numbers and not realize that there is a problem.

DOJ_NMG_0083057

"I certainly don't see a disaster, but frankly I'm very concerned," said Ion Sancho, supervisor of elections in Leon County, Fla., which includes Tallahassee. He said Florida has tried three times to create databases of eligible and ineligible voters but each system has had widespread inaccuracies.

"This is our fourth attempt and I'm worried that voters who have been voting for the last decade will show up at the polls and they won't be listed anywhere," Mr. Sancho said.

A report released last Thursday by the Century Foundation, Common Cause and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights cited concerns that most states have only vague, if any, standards for voting machine distribution.

There is no federal minimum for the ratio of voters to machines and there is wide variation in state standards.

In Wisconsin, the law requires at least one machine for every 200 registered voters. In Michigan, that ratio is 1:600, the report said. Election officials in Ohio, which had some of the longest lines in 2004, passed a law this year setting the ratio at 1:175, the report said. But the law does not take effect until 2013.

Keith A. Cunningham, director of the Allen County board of elections in Ohio and former president of the Ohio Association of Election Officials, said most counties were close to the ratio required by the law.

"I don't believe it is going to be as bad as everyone is predicting," Mr. Cunningham said.

Whether there are problems or not, post-election litigation is likely. A study released this year by the Washington and Lee Law Review found that the number of court cases challenging elections has risen in recent years. In 2004, the number was 361, up from 104 cases in 1998.

Jonah Goldman, a lawyer and elections expert with the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, said his organization is prepared for the worst. With the N.A.A.C.P. and the People for the American Way Foundation, the lawyers group will have about 500 people fielding calls to a national hot line (1-866-OUR-VOTE) about problems and providing information to voters and poll workers.

In 2004, a similar hot line fielded more than 200,000 calls and created a database of about 40,000 reported problems. The coalition is dispatching lawyers in a dozen states to address reports of voter intimidation or to see if litigation is needed to extend hours at polling stations.

"We're not sure what we will be handling," Mr. Goldman said. "But we're pretty confident that there will be no shortage of work that night."

ANTITRUST:

3 Indicted In Price-fixing Conspiracy (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

A federal grand jury in San Francisco yesterday indicted two executives from Samsung Electronics Ltd. and another from Hynix Semiconductor America Inc. on charges of a global conspiracy to fix prices on a memory product used in everything from laptops to video-game consoles, Justice Department officials said.

Each of the three executives is charged with participating in a conspiracy to suppress competition in the multibillion-dollar dynamic random access memory (DRAM) industry in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

"The Antitrust Division will vigorously pursue individuals who engage in criminal cartel conspiracies," said Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett, who heads the division.

"Criminal cartel enforcement is the division's top priority, and both companies and individuals must comply with the antitrust laws."

The indictment, filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco, charged that Il-ung Kim and Young-bae Rha, both of Samsung, and Gary Swanson participated with co-conspirators in the scheme from April 2001 until June 2002. At the time, according to the document, Mr. Kim was vice president of marketing and Mr. Rha was vice president of sales and marketing.

Both men are citizens and residents of South Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0083058

The indictment said that at the time of the conspiracy, Mr. Swanson was a senior vice president at Hynix America, the U.S.-based subsidiary of Hynix Semiconductor Inc., with headquarters in South Korea. Mr. Swanson is a U.S. citizen.

To date, four companies and 16 persons have been charged and fines totaling more than $731 million have resulted from the department's antitrust investigation into the DRAM semiconductor industry.

DRAM is the most commonly used semiconductor memory product, providing high-speed storage and retrieval of electronic information for a variety of computer, telecommunication and consumer electronic products. DRAM sales in the United States in 2004 totaled about $7.7 billion.

The three executives face maximum penalties of three years' imprisonment and fines of $350,000, although department officials said the maximum fines may be increased to twice the gain derived from the crime or twice the loss suffered by the victims if either of those amounts is greater than the maximum fines under the Sherman Act .

Three foreign-based Samsung executives pleaded guilty to the DRAM price-fixing conspiracy in March and August and agreed to serve prison terms ranging from seven to eight months and to each pay a $250,000 fine. In September, a fourth Samsung executive agreed to plead guilty to the DRAM price-fixing conspiracy, serve eight months in prison and pay a $250,000 fine.

In addition, four Hynix Semiconductor executives agreed to plead guilty and serve jail terms ranging from five to eight months and pay $250,000 fines.

Samsung pleaded guilty to the price-fixing conspiracy and paid a $300 million criminal fine in November. Hynix pleaded guilty and paid a $185 million fine in May 2005.

Samsung, Hynix Officials Charged With Price Fixing (Update5) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, October 19, 2006

Oct. 18 (Bloomberg) -- Two Samsung Electronics Inc. executives, including senior vice president Kim Il Ung, and a Hynix Semiconductor Inc. official were accused by the U.S. of conspiring to fix prices for computer memory chips.

Rha Young Bae, former head of Samsung worldwide sales and marketing, Gary Swanson, senior vice president of memory sales and marketing at Hynix, and Kim, senior vice president of Samsung's chip division, were accused of participating in a global conspiracy to artificially boost prices of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, from April 1999 to June 2002, according to a grand jury indictment returned today.

In meetings and telephone conversations with unnamed co- conspirators, Kim and Rha, both citizens of Korea, and Swanson, of the U.S., agreed to rig a November 2001 online auction of chips, set prices charged to certain computer makers and raise and maintain prices for manufacturers, according to the indictment filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco.

U.S. DRAM sales were $7.1 billion in 2004, the U.S. Justice Department said. The indictment is part of a four-year federal investigation into price fixing in the chip market that has led to claims against four companies and 16 individuals who have been fined $731 million, the U.S. said. Samsung, the world's biggest maker of computer memory chips, agreed to pay $300 million last year to settle U.S. antitrust claims.

Innocent

Kim ``did not engage in a price fixing conspiracy," said Lawrence Callaghan, his attorney. ``From our knowledge of the facts and evidence, he is simply not guilty of violating" U.S. antitrust laws ``and we believe he is not guilty of fixing prices."

The executive has never received training in antitrust law, particularly ``the line between gathering competitive intelligence and price checking, which are perfectly legal, and fixing prices," said Callaghan.

Michael Lipman, an attorney for Rha, said his client, who retired in 2002, denies the allegations.

``My client was not involved in any illegal activity and intends to vigorously defend" himself, said Lipman.

John McLean, an attorney for Swanson, a California resident, said his client denies the allegations.

``It's unfortunate, it's a mistake and we look forward to establishing his innocence before a jury," said McLean.

Penalty

The three men, charged with one count of price fixing, each face up to three years in prison and a $350,000 fine or twice the gain or loss caused by the price fixing, whichever is largest.

DRAM is the most commonly used semiconductor memory product, purchased by manufacturers such as Dell Inc. and Hewlett-Packard Co. in making personal computers, laptops, printers, mobile phones, digital cameras and digital music players, among other products.

Three Samsung executives pleaded guilty to a DRAM price- fixing conspiracy in March and August. The Samsung employees agreed to serve prison terms ranging from seven to eight months and to each pay a $250,000 fine.

Last month, a fourth Samsung executive agreed to plead guilty and serve an eight-month term and pay a fine of $250,000.

``Samsung is strongly committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anticompetitive behavior," the company said in a statement today. A message left at Hynix's offices in San Jose seeking comment wasn't returned. Samsung is based in Suwon, South Korea. Hynix is based in Ichon, South Korea.

Second-Largest

Hynix, the second-largest DRAM maker, pleaded guilty to price-fixing claims and was ordered to pay a $185 million fine in May 2005. No. 4 DRAM maker Infineon Technologies AG was fined $160 million and Elpida Memory Inc., Japan's biggest memory chipmaker, was fined $84 million.

Four Hynix executives were previously charged with participating in the DRAM price-fixing conspiracy and agreed to plead guilty and serve jail terms ranging from five to eight months and to each pay a $250,000 fine.

Four Infineon executives and a Micron Technology Inc. executive have also pleaded guilty in the investigation.

Hynix said second-quarter profit rose 36 percent after increasing production faster than industry leader Samsung, the company reported July 20. Net income rose to 324 billion won ($339 million), from 238 billion won a year earlier, the company reported.

Samsung reported a better-than-expected 16 percent increase in third-quarter profit, buoyed by sales of televisions and handsets, the company said Oct. 16. Net income rose to 2.19 trillion won ($2.3 billion) from 1.88 trillion won a year earlier.

Samsung Electronics shares fell 5,000 won to 642,000 won ($671.97) in Kopsi market trading in Seoul. Hynix shares rose 50 won to 37,350 won.

The case is U.S. v. Il Ung Kim, 06-0692, U.S. District Court, Northern District of California, San Francisco.

2 Koreans, One American Charged In Chip Price-fixing Probe (AFP)

AFP, October 19, 2006

An American and two South Korean executives were indicted on charges of participating in a global conspiracy to fix the prices of memory chips used in a range of electronic goods.

The indictments were returned in the US District Court in San Francisco and come after government prosecutors have already charged 13 other individuals in the ongoing investigation, according to a Justice Department statement.

The new charges, which were approved by a federal grand jury earlier Wednesday, were filed against Il Ung Kim, Young Bae Rha and Gary Swanson.

At the time of the alleged conspiracy, between April 2001 and June 2002, Kim and Rha were both employed by the Korean electronics giant Samsung. Both men are Korean citizens.

Swanson, a US citizen, was a senior vice president for memory sales and marketing for Hynix America, the US-based subsidiary of the Hynix Semiconductor Inc. which is headquartered in Korea.

"The Antitrust Division will vigorously pursue individuals who engage in criminal cartel conspiracies," said Thomas Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's Antitrust Division.

"Criminal cartel enforcement is the division's top priority and both companies and individuals must comply with the antitrust laws," Barnett stressed.

The indictments allege that the three executives conspired in a price-fixing and bid-rigging scheme to fix dynamic random access memory (DRAM) prices.

DOJ_NMG_0083060

DRAM memory chips are commonly used in computers, servers, printers, cell phones, digital cameras and other electronic products.

Among other charges, the three stand accused of participating in meetings and conversations where they agreed to fix the prices of DRAM at certain levels.

They each face a maximum penalty of three years in jail and a maximum fine of 350,000 dollars.

Their indictments come after Thomas Quinn, a former US executive of Samsung, agreed to plead guilty and serve jail time last month as part of the ongoing probe which has already placed other industry executives behind bars.

Three More Semiconductor Execs Indicted For Price-fixing (IDG)

By Grant Gross, IDG News Service

IDG News Service, October 19, 2006

They are charged with being co-conspirators in a price-fixing scheme between April 2001 and June 2002

A U.S. grand jury has indicted three former semiconductor vendor executives, two from Samsung Electronics Ltd. and one from Hynix Semiconductor America Inc., for their alleged roles in a "global conspiracy" to fix DRAM (dynamic RAM) prices, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) said.

Indicted Wednesday were Il Ung Kim, former vice president of marketing for Samsung's memory division; Young Bae Rha, former vice president of sales and market for Samsung's memory division; and Gary Swanson, former senior vice president of memory sales and marketing for Hynix America.

They are charged with being co-conspirators in a < price-fixing scheme involving multiple semiconductor vendors between April 2001 and June 2002. The three attended meetings in which the price of DRAM was discussed, agreed to fix prices and exchanged information with competitors on the prices charged to computer makers, according to the indictment.

The three are each charged with participating in the conspiracy to suppress competition in violation of the U.S. Sherman Antitrust Act. The maximum penalty for the conviction of a Sherman Act violation occurring before June 22, 2004, is three years in prison and a U.S. $350,000 fine.

The maximum fines may be increased in certain situations.

Including Wednesday's charges, four companies and 16 individuals have been charged in the DOJ DRAM price-fixing probe. The investigation has resulted in US$731 million in fines, the second highest total obtained by the DOJ in a criminal antitrust investigation aimed at one industry.

DRAM is the most commonly used semiconductor memory product, used in a variety of devices including PCs, laptops, printers, hard disk drives, PDAs (personal digital assistants), mobile phones, digital cameras and telecommunication hubs and routers. There were about $7.7 billion in U.S. DRAM sales in 2004, according to the DOJ.

Three foreign-based Samsung executives pleaded guilty to the DRAM price-fixing conspiracy in March and August. They agreed to serve prison terms ranging from seven to eight months and to each pay a $250,000 fine. In September, a fourth Samsung executive agreed to plead guilty to the DRAM price-fixing conspiracy.

In addition, four Hynix Semiconductor Inc. executives were charged with participating in the DRAM price-fixing conspiracy and agreed to plead guilty and serve jail terms ranging from five to eight months and to each pay a $250,000 fine. In December 2004, four executives of Infineon Technologies AG pleaded guilty to the DRAM price-fixing conspiracy. The Infineon employees served jail terms ranging from four to six months, and each paid a $250,000 fine.

Four companies have been charged with price-fixing in the DRAM investigation. Samsung pleaded guilty to the price-fixing conspiracy and was sentenced to pay a $300 million fine in November 2005. Hynix, the world's second largest DRAM manufacturer, pleaded guilty and was sentenced to pay a $185 million fine in May 2005. Japanese manufacturer Elpida Memory pleaded guilty and was sentenced to pay an $84 million fine in March. German manufacturer Infineon pleaded guilty and was sentenced to pay a $160 million fine in October 2004.

Three More Execs Indicted In Computer Memory Price-fixing Scandal (AP)

AP, October 19, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - Three more computer-component executives were indicted Wednesday for allegedly participating in a worldwide conspiracy to fix the price of computer memory chips.

The indictments bring to 16 the number of executives charged in the scandal, which has resulted in more than $731 million in fines from the Justice Department's antitrust investigation into the industry.

Two executives indicted Wednesday were from Samsung Electronics Ltd., and the third was at Hynix Semiconductor Inc. Both firms are based in South Korea.

In 2002, the Justice Department uncovered a "long-standing conspiracy" among the world's suppliers of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM.

DRAM chips are the most common form of computer memory, with annual sales exceeding $20 billion. The government said collusion began to appear in 1996, when DRAM manufacturing plants around the world greatly increased production and buyers expected prices to drop. Instead, prosecutors alleged, DRAM executives hatched a covert plan to keep prices artificially high and colluded in the United States and abroad.

Wednesday's indictment names Il Ung Kim and Young Bae Rha of Samsung, which already has had four other executives plead guilty to the conspiracy. Gary Swanson, a Hynix executive, also was charged Wednesday, bringing to five the number of officials indicted from that firm.

Bayer Settles Price-Fixing Case (AP-YBIZ)

By David Twiddy, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

Bayer Agrees to $18 Million Settlement in Price-Fixing Case

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) -- Bayer AG has agreed to pay $18 million to settle claims it conspired with other manufacturers to inflate the price of certain plastics, the second multi-million-dollar settlement the company has made this year regarding its polymer operation.

On Tuesday, U.S. District Judge John Lungstrum in Kansas City, Kan., approved the settlement, which covers the company's sales of polyester polyol-based products between Jan. 1, 1998 and Dec. 31, 2004.

The agreement also requires Bayer, headquartered in Germany, to cooperate with plaintiff attorneys as they continue their class-action lawsuit against former co-defendants Uniroyal Chemical Co. and Chemtura Corp., formerly known as Crompton Corp.

Lungstrum also agreed to dismiss defendants Rhein Chemie Corp. and Rhein Chemie Rheinau GmbH, subsidiaries of Lanxess Corp., which was spun off from Bayer last year.

In August, Lungstrum approved a $55.3 million settlement by Bayer in a separate case involving the sale of polyether polyol. Bayer also agreed to help attorneys against former co-defendants BASF Corp., BASF AG, The Dow Chemical Co., Huntsman International Holdings LLC and Lyondell Chemical Co.

A Bayer spokesman provided a company statement Wednesday confirming the two settlements but declined to comment further.

An attorney for the polyester plaintiffs didn't immediately return a phone call for comment.

Bayer disclosed in March that it had been subpoenaed by the Justice Department seeking information about its manufacture and sale of polyurethane products called MDI and TDI, along with other products.

Court documents say Bayer, Dow, BASF, Huntsman and Lyondell control the entire MDI and TDI markets and 75 percent of production of polyether polyol, a polyurethane material that is mixed with other substances to make foams used in furniture, automobile seats and other products.

Federal authorities two years ago consolidated 16 cases filed across the country against polymer manufacturers by customers who alleged the companies had gotten together to fix the price of urethane and urethane chemicals.

http://www.bayer.com

Chicago Deal Could Force Rivals' Hands (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti In New York, Edward Taylor In Frankfurt And Alistair Macdonald In London

DOJ_NMG_0083062

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

Second City Pact Might Pressure Exchanges World-Wide to Unite; NYSE Weighed Bids for CBOT

The New York Stock Exchange's owner twice considered bids for the Chicago Board of Trade, people familiar with the matter said. Now that the CBOT has another suitor, pressure is growing on the Big Board and the world's other major exchanges to pull off their own megadeals.

While Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc. put aside decades of rivalry to announce a merger on Tuesday, other U.S. and European exchanges are having a tough time tying the knot. The Chicago deal, which would create the world's largest financial market and a derivatives-trading powerhouse, could make doing so even harder.

NYSE owner NYSE Group Inc. agreed in June to merge with European stock and derivatives exchange Euronext in a deal valued at $20 billion. But shareholders won't vote on it until December, and now it is bogged down amid political wrangling in Europe. Many leaders there want a big European merger first, and a giant derivatives behemoth in Chicago could accelerate that push.

Nasdaq Stock Market Inc., meanwhile, is sitting on a 25% or so stake in the London Stock Exchange, but so far Europe's largest exchange by the value of stocks traded has spurned advances from Nasdaq and elsewhere.

"Everyone has tried to get into bed with everyone else, but nothing has happened" in Europe, said Richard Grossman, a director of Redmayne Bentley Stockbrokers, based in Leeds in the United Kingdom, which has held LSE stock since it was first sold to the public in 2001.

If approved by shareholders and regulators, the Chicago deal removes from the dance floor two potential partners -- with a combined stock-market value topping $25 billion -- and calls into question the others' overseas expansion plans.

"It sets up an isolationist model, where you may be better being a powerhouse in your home markets first," says Richard Repetto, an analyst in New York at Sandler O'Neill.

The effect will be felt especially keenly at NYSE Group. Chief Executive John Thain transformed the marquee exchange and moved to make the company to be a global force not only in stock trading but also in derivatives. Such financial instruments -- their value is based on an underlying asset or benchmark such as a stock or an index -- have become increasingly important tools in the global investment industry for hedging risks and making sophisticated bets on everything from the economy to the weather.

In mid-2005, the NYSE, the Chicago Merc and others expressed interest in CBOT before it began selling shares of itself to the public. Mr. Thain called CBOT Chief Executive Bernard Dan, but CBOT rebuffed the NYSE, people briefed on the matter said. CBOT launched an initial public offering instead. NYSE declined to comment on CBOT.

To celebrate its first day of trading, CBOT Chairman Charles Carey led a group that rang the bell on the marble balcony overlooking the NYSE's century-old trading floor. Mr. Carey and Mr. Dan visited with NYSE Chairman Marshall Carter, but discussions failed to take off, these people said.

NYSE later hired Citigroup to help consider big mergers and acquisitions with several exchanges, including CBOT, LSE and Euronext, a person familiar with the process said.

In January, the NYSE decided that CBOT, while fast-growing, wouldn't provide what it needed to expand globally -- an overseas platform to list companies that wanted to avoid U.S. securities regulations. Moreover, NYSE and CBOT traded none of the same products, so cutting costs would be difficult. NYSE also saw CME as a powerful foe that could outbid it.

Exchange officials decided that "it wasn't a battle that we could get into and win," the person familiar with the process said.

The NYSE instead pursued Euronext, which operates stock exchanges in Brussels, Paris, Amsterdam and Lisbon as well as the Euronext.liffe derivatives exchange in London. Mr. Thain met with Euronext chief executive Jean-François Théodore in January, and in February more NYSE and Euronext executives conferred at a meeting of world exchange executives in Milan.

Euronext had another bidder: Deutsche Börse AG, the big German operator of the Frankfurt Stock Exchange and part owner of the Eurex derivatives exchange. But Mr. Thain won Euronext's hand first. On June 1, NYSE and Euronext announced a merger of equals to be named NYSE Euronext.

Mr. Théodore promised the deal could be done in six months, while a deal with Deutsche Börse would take twice as long, given antitrust concerns over combining Euronext's and Deutsche Börse's derivatives operations. To signal plans to expand their federation to others, Messrs. Théodore and Thain invited the head of Borsa Italiana, the Italian exchange, to a news conference June 2 at Paris's old trading pit in the 19th-century Palais Brongniart.

Deutsche Börse has tried hard to scotch the deal. It recently negotiated an agreement that could lead to a combination with Borsa Italiana -- a move designed to show that it was also capable of creating a pan-European exchange company that Euronext could join.

European political forces also have been muddling the prospects for the NYSE and Euronext tie-up. Paris Europlace, a lobby group that promotes the French capital as a financial center, commissioned a report, released this month, concluding that neither the NYSE nor the Deutsche Börse bid was right for Euronext.

"All things being equal, my personal preference is for a European solution," European Central Bank President Jean-Claude Trichet said in June. Prime Minister Romano Prodi of Italy said a Deutsche Börse-Euronext deal would "help a Europe that is being born." French President Jacques Chirac recently reaffirmed his support for the creation of a European exchange before a trans-Atlantic deal.

Such comments could sway some shareholders and influence Dutch authorities with power to block the deal; though run from Paris, Euronext is incorporated in Amsterdam and subject to regulations there.

Nasdaq also faces protectionism. Even in the United Kingdom, which considers itself liberal in such matters, a senior official promised to introduce legislation to shield the LSE from foreign regulation if it ends up in the hands of an overseas suitor. It is unclear whether Nasdaq intends to renew its offer.

If NYSE completes the Euronext deal, two exchange giants will emerge with distinctly different strategies. The new CME/CBOT combination, to be called CME Group Inc., will be U.S.-based and devoted to derivatives trading. NYSE Euronext would be diversified across continents and businesses.

Both could attempt to add more exchanges. Mr. Thain is betting that would be easier with a diversified model.

Mr. Thain and his executives have flown almost weekly to Paris and London to lobby politicians and regulators in favor of the deal; they plan to do the same with Euronext shareholders.

There is still a chance that he can get the deal done, but it is looking like he may have to up the NYSE's bid to clinch it.

Write to Aaron Lucchetti at aaron.lucchetti@wsj.com1, Edward Taylor at edward.taylor@wsj.com2 and Alistair MacDonald at alistair.macdonald@wsj.com3

Antitrust Suit Says Avaya Maintenance Policy Is Anti-competitive (AP)

By Linda A. Johnson, Ap Business Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. -- Business communications systems provider Avaya Inc. is accused in a federal antitrust lawsuit of illegally blocking competitors from providing maintenance and repairs to telephone equipment and software sold by Avaya.

Continuant Inc., of Fife, Wash., which operates a telephone system maintenance business throughout North America, said Wednesday that it countersued Basking Ridge-based Avaya after the AT&T spinoff sued Continuant this summer.

The two parties are scheduled to appear in federal court in Trenton, where the two lawsuits were filed, for a hearing on Nov. 14.

Avaya spokeswoman Lynn Newman declined to discuss the case.

Continuant's lawsuit asks the court to permanently bar Avaya "from continuing its anti-competitive conduct," including bundling service contracts with the sales of its telephones, cables and other telecom equipment, and keeping secret from competitors passwords necessary for maintaining the communications systems. Continuant also is seeking compensatory and punitive damages, legal fees and other costs.

"Avaya's the only company that has a policy like this," said Bruce Shelby, Continuant's vice president of sales. "They say a customer doesn't have the right to access their system to perform maintenance" or to hire a third party to do it.

Shelby said his company believes that is illegal and that Avaya is overcharging its customers for maintenance when its service level has declined because of a series of major layoffs.

DOJ_NMG_0083064

"We're able to come in with a better price and, we think, better service," Shelby said, but Avaya effectively blocks system maintenance providers, like his company, from competing with Avaya's licensed business partners.

Avaya filed suit against Continuant and two sister companies on June 5, accusing them of misappropriating trade secrets, interfering with contractual relations, misrepresentation, libel and other offenses.

Avaya later amended its complaint, and Continuant filed a countersuit on Aug. 21, but did not announce it until Wednesday.

Like other telecommunication equipment makers, Avaya has been trying to boost the continuing revenues that come from maintaining communication systems, rather than relying heavily on one-time sales. The company has been struggling with rising costs, falling profits and a depressed share price, culminating with the replacement of its president and chief executive officer, Donald K. Peterson, in July.

___P>

http://www.avaya.com

http://www.continuant.com

Critics Target Federal Circuit (LAW)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, October 19, 2006

In the often highly technical, cutting-edge world of inventions, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit is the Mount Olympus of patent law. But are its 12 Olympians falling?

The U.S. Supreme Court is reviewing more of the circuit court's patent decisions and liking them less, which is a much-noted trend in the relatively small patent bar.

Some patent litigators are increasingly critical of a Federal Circuit that, in its desire to achieve certainty and harmony in patent law, they say, has become overly formalistic, expanding the power of patent holders at the expense of innovation.

And some scholars suggest that after 25 years as the only game in town for review of patent appeals, the Federal Circuit might benefit, both in terms of its overall workload and the development of patent law, from some outside input, not just from the Supreme Court but from a limited number of regional circuit courts getting back into the business of handling patent appeals.

Do the Supreme Court's heightened interest and increased reversals mean that the Federal Circuit has run amok?

"Some of the shriller commentators have suggested the Supreme Court may be concerned the Federal Circuit is a runaway court or a pro-patent court. I don't think there is the slightest substance to those observations by a couple of people," said Chief Judge Paul R. Michel.

His best guess as to why the high court has stepped up its interest, he explained, is that "the Federal Circuit has had a good amount of time to wrestle with fundamental issues of patent law and has developed a body of law on those fundamental issues. The time is ripe for the Supreme Court to review the way we have resolved those issues. It's neither surprising nor worrisome."

Echoing others' comments, litigator Kenneth R. Adamo in the Cleveland office of Jones Day, who has been involved in roughly 30 appeals in the Federal Circuit, said he believes the Supreme Court feels there was not enough supervision previously of the circuit court's work.

"What the justices read and hear from law clerks and others is there's something wrong with the U.S. patent system despite the fact the Federal Circuit was put in place, in large measure, to unify patent jurisprudence," he said.

"Does that mean they think the Federal Circuit is lost in space? No," he added. "They've looked at some of these decisions, the en banc, major decisions with pluralities and concurrences, and are wondering, why is all this still so roiled up?"

HIGH MARKS

The patent law community itself seems divided over whether the Federal Circuit has gone off track and what, if anything, should be done about it. But those who follow the court closely generally give it high marks for being a very hard-working court with very dedicated, smart judges.

Congress created the court in 1982 with the Federal Courts Improvement Act. The court was formed by the merger of the U.S. Court of Customs and Patent Appeals and the appellate division of the U.S. Court of Claims.

DOJ_NMG_0083065

The Federal Circuit is unique in that it is the only Article III appellate court whose jurisdiction is based on subject matter, not geographic location. Although the primary motivation for its creation was to end forum-shopping in patent cases and to bring certainty to patent law, the court also was given nationwide jurisdiction over claims involving international trade, government contracts, trademarks, federal personnel and veterans' benefits, and certain money claims against the federal government.

With the recent Senate confirmation of Judge Kimberly Moore, the court now has a full complement of 12 active judges.

In a speech last summer to the Federal Circuit Bar Association, Michel, the chief judge, reported that the court's overall condition was "fine," but, he added, "We are now stressed, stressed both by the quantity and difficulty of our current cases."

Although the court is generally known as the nation's top patent court, it was just this year that patent appeals became the largest category of cases on the court's docket -- a change with significant impact on the judges' workload.

"Even more significant than the rise in numbers is the rise in complexity, size and difficulty of the technology in these cases," said Michel. "On average, the district court patent cases we receive are perhaps 10 times more difficult than the average patent case in the mid-1980s."

Patent cases represent about one-third of the court's total caseload, said the chief judge, but if time devoted to those cases is measured, instead of just number of cases, the judges spend 50 percent more time adjudicating the patent cases than others on the docket.

The court recently made mandatory its voluntary mediation program for all appeals, said Michel, adding that the change should help the court with its workload. Surprisingly, even when the program was voluntary, a majority of cases that did settle were patent cases, he said.

The court just hired intellectual property litigator James Amend, of counsel to Chicago's Kirkland & Ellis, to run the mediation program.

"I think with this man in place, patent cases will settle at a considerably higher rate than when our program didn't have an ace litigator running it and when it was only voluntary," said Michel.

IS IT SUCCESSFUL?

As the Federal Circuit approaches its 25th birthday, the measure of its success generally depends on whom you talk to and what time period you're talking about, said patent scholar Lee Petherbridge of Loyola Law School, Los Angeles, who, with R. Polk Wagner of the University of Pennsylvania Law School, has done empirical research on the court's work.

"In terms of the pre-Federal Circuit days, the court did go in and take hold of patents and provide certainty," he said. "That much is true, and in that sense it represents success. Patents became stronger; a presumption of validity was more recognized. What that led to was a better ability of the patentee to concentrate capital for research and development."

The court has strengthened patents, which is what Congress intended it to do, said Petherbridge. But, he added, "The same things that bring us good effects from patents also open the system and the court to criticism."

RECORD ON APPEAL

Some of the doctrinal criticism is obviously embodied in the recent appeals to the Supreme Court. Jones Day's Adamo noted: From 1990 to 2001, the court granted certiorari eight times, heard eight cases and affirmed the Federal Circuit's decisions 50 percent of the time. But from 2002 to now, the court granted certiorari nine times, heard seven cases -- and did not affirm in any of the cases.

"I think the Supreme Court has started to pay attention to patent law for two reasons: disquiet with the Federal Circuit and also because patent law and patent reform are so on the radar screen," said patent scholar Timothy R. Holbrook of Chicago-Kent College of Law.

There have been two major recent studies of the patent system that noted problems, as well as patent reform proposals introduced in Congress, said Holbrook. On the "disquiet" reason, he said, "everyone thinks the Federal Circuit is pro-patent."

The court is pro-patent in terms of patent validity, he said. "Patents are supposed to reward significant advances in the state of the art. The obviousness doctrine governs that. But the test articulated by the court makes it very difficult to show the patent is obvious, so we get lots of patents on very simple inventions."

DOJ_NMG_0083066

The court's test for obviousness is at the heart of KSR International v. Teleflex Inc., No. 04-1350, to be decided by the Supreme Court this term. The issue is fundamental to patent validity, and the solicitor general of the United States and the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (PTO) have told the justices that the Federal Circuit is wrong.

KSR and the high court's recent rulings involving the Federal Circuit's view of the doctrine of equivalents and the use of injunctions for patent infringement, said Holbrook, reflect the Supreme Court's concern that patent law is out of control and that the Federal Circuit's formalistic approach is inappropriate.

"The Federal Circuit has this mantra of certainty," he said. "It wants clarity and certainty in the law and draws that from its congressional mandate. The problem is they articulate very bright-line, formal rules. I think the Supreme Court recognizes the need for certainty but disagrees with way the Federal Circuit is doing it."

Much of what the Federal Circuit has done-both good and bad-can be ascribed to excessive formalism, agreed Jay Dratler Jr. of the University of Akron School of Law.

On the good side, he said, the court has narrowed the type of evidence that can be used to construe claims in patent cases, trying to ensure that the evidence used is in the public record, accessible to all.

Where it has gone badly astray, in his opinion, is its unwillingness to look beyond what is written on paper in informing its decisions.

"My complaint, and the complaint of a lot of people, is you can't really understand patents without understanding a little bit of the technology and a lot of the economics that go into the industry," he said. "To make decisions devoid of that background is, to me, nonsensical."

The court does that, Dratler said, not only because of excessive formalism but because most of its judges lack the technical and scientific backgrounds needed for these issues. Although patents are not its sole jurisdiction, patents were the primary motivation for creating the court, he said.

DE NOVO REVIEW

Another major area of concern or criticism is the Federal Circuit's de novo review of district court patent cases and its rather high reversal rate -- roughly 30 percent to 35 percent -- of those decisions. Most of those cases are appeals of summary judgment decisions.

The most important part of any patent dispute is the construction of claim terms in a given patent. After a Supreme Court decision removed claim construction from the province of juries and gave it to judges, the Federal Circuit held that it would review district judges' decisions de novo. Critics of de novo review and the reversal rate say that they increase uncertainty surrounding patents as well as the cost of litigation.

Last year, before she became a Federal Circuit judge, Moore, in an empirical study of district court reversals, reported the reversal rate, eight years after the Supreme Court ruling, was rising instead of declining as judges got more experience with claim construction.

The fault, she wrote, rests with the Federal Circuit, which was not providing sufficient guidance: "There have not evolved any clear canons of claim construction to aid district court judges, and in fact the Federal Circuit judges seem to disagree among themselves regarding the tools available for claim construction."

TIME FOR CHANGE?

So what does it all add up to, these criticisms and the Supreme Court's heightened interest in Federal Circuit rulings? Is it time for radical change?

No one seems to be advocating a return to the pre-Federal Circuit days when forum-shopping in patent cases among the 12 regional appellate courts was rampant and patent law was all over the map.

But some court scholars suggest it is time at least to discuss some change.

Craig A. Nard, director of the Center for Law, Technology and the Arts at Case Western Reserve University School of Law, and John F. Duffy of George Washington University Law School have suggested allowing two or perhaps three regional appellate courts to join the Federal Circuit in reviewing patent appeals.

DOJ_NMG_0083067

"Our view is the problems are not with the judges, but by being the only game in town the Federal Circuit has no competition, does not enjoy a peer or the benefit of sister circuit jurisprudence," explained Nard. "Because of that, it doesn't have the type of engaged, thoughtful rationale other courts have."

Absent a peer, he said, the Federal Circuit has fallen into a kind of insularity and "path dependency." It gets locked into its own precedents, he explained.

"To the extent you have judges on panels disagreeing with another, it looks like the Federal Circuit is all over the place. It's a problem."

There are no intercircuit conflicts to trigger Supreme Court review, he added. The justices, in a disproportionate number of patent cases, ask the solicitor general for his opinion, and the solicitor general turns to the PTO.

"That's OK, but the best way is to have a couple of circuits weigh in and express themselves," said Nard.

And if you are the Federal Circuit with a monopoly on patent jurisprudence, he added, attorneys -- whom courts rely on generally for information about the law and facts in a case -- are somewhat reticent to challenge Federal Circuit precedents and make creative arguments, especially if they are repeat players at the court.

"Our goal is to generate discussion," he said.

No court achieves all expectations, said patent litigator Donald Dunner of Finnegan, Henderson, Farabow, Garrett & Dunner in Washington, D.C.

The Federal Circuit, he said, was originally formed in order to avoid forum-shopping, to bring uniformity and predictability to the process of deciding patent cases, and "largely, it has done that."

He gives the court "very good grades," sees nothing "broken" about it and believes it fares no worse in the Supreme Court than other circuits and better than some, such as the 9th Circuit.

CLAIMS CONSTRUCTION

Michel, the chief judge, is keenly aware of what is said and written about the Federal Circuit. He acknowledges concerns about the reversal rate of district court patent decisions, but notes that claim construction is very complicated with many opportunities to make mistakes.

Because his court does not give district court rulings the usual deference they receive in other cases, "that presses toward our disagreeing on some of the constructions."

But, he said, the average reversal rate in civil litigation is about 20 percent, so 30 percent is not shocking on de novo review of very complex cases.

He thinks that legislation proposing a pilot program in certain district courts designating judges to handle patent cases would help eventually to lower his court's reversal rate.

Michel prizes the diverse backgrounds of his judges and relishes the diversity of the court's caseload. Suggestions that the court is insular, he said, are inaccurate.

"I think the diversity of judges' background and caseload was a brilliant conception of the architects of this court," he said.

That diversity just about guarantees against insularity, he explained. Re-involving the regional appellate courts in patent law, particularly after 25 years of noninvolvement, would create the risk of conflicts in patent law that the Federal Circuit was created to eliminate, Michel said.

"I frankly don't think there is anything fundamentally undesirable about the makeup, caseloads or performance of the Federal Circuit," said Michel.

"At the margins, everyone can have his own personal theory of what little improvements could be made, but in terms of radical changes, I certainly don't see grounds for that," he said.

His court, Michel added, gets criticized about equally by patent holders and nonpatent holders. And, he said, it is "interesting" there is some resentment by a number of tenured patent professors that the court doesn't cite their law review articles.

"We have an extensive body of case law, and that and Supreme Court precedent is what we would mainly be citing," he explained.

DOJ_NMG_0083068

There are true dilemmas in patent law, added Michel. "You're balancing competing social interests, and it's not always clear what the right balance is. Congress has left it broadly defined in the statute, which has not changed greatly since 1952."

"A lot of patent law is judge-made law," Michel said. "It's quite natural and expected that the Supreme Court would, from time to time, dip into the major patent dilemmas and give them a look."

ENVIRONMENT:

As Climate Changes, Large Firms Look At Global-Warming Practice Areas (LAW)

By Petra Pasternak, The Recorder

California Recorder, October 19, 2006

While scientists ponder how quickly the polar ice cap will become a tropical resort -- and California turns the heat up on the auto industry -- law firms are starting to wave their green flags.

Soon after California Attorney General Bill Lockyer announced he was suing carmakers over vehicle pollution, and the state passed a new law to limit greenhouse gas emissions, Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman announced it was putting together a new climate change and sustainability practice group. And Morrison & Foerster announced an event to discuss the new Global Warming Solutions Act.

"We're going to try to start up a group initially within the confines of our IP practice," said MoFo partner Thomas Ciotti. "You've got to start marketing to the community in order to start attracting more business."

Partners are going to discuss hiring needs for his firm's new global-warming practice, dubbed Greentech, at an end-of-month meeting, Ciotti said.

Neither Pillsbury nor MoFo has hired anyone for the new climate groups. But both are earnest about what they call a burgeoning new area and say they're anticipating client needs by connecting previously disparate disciplines.

Ciotti predicted that biodiesel and ethanol manufacturers and chemical companies, for example, will need project finance, transactional, corporate and even IP help as they look to acquire and develop new facilities.

At Pillsbury, San Francisco partner Michael Steel said the new team-in-development consists of lawyers from the environmental and land use litigation practices, as well as from corporate and finance.

"We would expect in the future, as requirements become clearer and regulations are enacted, that businesses will need to figure out ways to comply," Steel said. For example, "They may have to redesign their manufacturing process, and that will require project finance expertise.

"It's a reorganization of the way you comply with environmental law, bringing in a number of different disciplines," Steel said. "You could call it marketing, or you could call it being responsive to your client's needs. Hopefully, they're the same thing."

But not everyone is so gung ho about climate change.

Heller Ehrman environmental partner Joseph Armao said the phone has been ringing from clients calling with more concerns about California's new legislation and the state attorney general's lawsuit. But, he said, it's too soon to devote armies of lawyers or start new practice areas.

"People tend to get ahead of themselves, seeing the next arena," he said. "Heller Ehrman will be the first to form a group -- we'll call it the global warming cooling-off group -- if the state of California continues to file lawsuits along the lines of Lockyer's misguided lawsuit."

Pollinators' Decline Called Threat To Crops (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

Birds, bees, bats and other species that pollinate North American plant life are losing population, according to a study released yesterday by the National Research Council. This "demonstrably downward" trend could damage dozens of commercially important crops, scientists warned, since three-quarters of all flowering plants depend on pollinators for fertilization.

DOJ_NMG_0083069

American honeybees, which pollinate more than 90 commercial crops in the United States, have declined by 30 percent in the last 20 years. This poses a challenge to agricultural interests such as California almond farmers, who need about 1.4 million colonies of honeybees to pollinate 550,000 acres of their trees. By 2012, the state's almond farmers are expected to need bees to pollinate 800,000 acres.

Gene E. Robinson, an entomologist at the University of Illinois and one of the 15 researchers who produced the report, said U.S. farmers had to import honeybees last year for the first time since 1922, underscoring the extent of the problem.

"The honeybee industry is at a critical juncture," Robinson said. "The time for action is now."

A number of factors have cut pollinators' numbers in recent decades, the researchers said. Introduced parasites such as the varroa mite have hurt the honeybee population, and pesticides have also taken a toll. Bats, which carry pollen to a variety of crops, have declined as vandalism and development have destroyed some of their key cave roosts.

John Karges, a Nature Conservancy conservation biologist who works with the endangered Mexican long-nosed bat in West Texas, said the bat's U.S. population fell from 10,000 in 1967 to 1,000 in 1983. The species feeds on nectar from the agave plant, which can be used to produce a sweetener as well as tequila.

"This bat is rare and suspected of declining rangewide," said Karges, adding that it can now be spotted only at one protected cave site in Big Bend National Park. "I don't think anyone's looking at it annually or closely."

The declines have been gradual and in some instances are hard to quantify, the committee concluded. But the panel's chairwoman, entomologist May R. Berenbaum of the University of Illinois, said in a statement that there is already cause for alarm.

"Despite its apparent lack of marquee appeal, a decline in pollinator populations is one form of global change that actually has credible potential to alter the shape and structure of terrestrial ecosystems," Berenbaum said.

Animals carry pollen -- which they pick up inadvertently while feeding on a plant's nectar -- and transfer it from one flowering plant to another, sometimes over significant distances. The process not only boosts plant production but increases species' genetic diversity.

Animal pollinators fertilize more than 187,500 flowering plants worldwide; scientists believe these plants, called angiosperms, gained ecological dominance more than 70 million years ago in part because animals help them disperse their pollen so broadly. Other pollinators include hummingbirds and butterflies, as well as wild bees.

In many ways, pollination works as a chain in which even the largest animals depend on small insects, said committee member Peter Kevan, a professor at the University of Guelph, Ontario.

"Canadian black bears need blueberries, and the blueberries need bees" for pollination, Kevan said. "Without the bees you don't have blueberries, and without the blueberries you don't have black bears."

Despite this crucial link, Robinson said, many ordinary citizens fail to grasp how important pollinators are to food production.

European researchers have also documented serious declines: The diversity of bee species has declined by 40 percent in Britain and 60 percent in Holland since 1980. Europeans have more detailed records of pollinators than Americans, said University of Arizona entomologist Stephen Buchmann, partly because they have more amateur taxonomists keeping track of them.

So far, North American farmers have responded to the shortages by importing bees from Europe and elsewhere, but this strategy carries risks. These imported bees could bring new pests, parasites and diseases along with them, the study warned; the varroa mite came to the United States along with packaged bees.

The National Research Council panel called on scientists and government to collect more data on pollinator populations, and the U.S. Postal Service unveiled four stamps to help raise public awareness of the issue.

"We don't want to become a report on the shelf," said Michael Ruggiero, director of the U.S. Geological Survey's Integrated Taxonomic Information System. "We want to be a cause for action."

Evangelicals Rally Behind Environmental Cause (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon

DOJ_NMG_0083070

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

Democratic strategists are joining forces with conservative evangelicals to promote a faith-based campaign to raise awareness about global warming, in an improbable alliance that could boost Democratic hopes of taking control of Congress.

At a news conference Friday, the president of the Christian Coalition and a board member of the National Association of Evangelicals will announce Call to Action, an effort to make global warming a front-and-center issue over the next three weeks for Christians in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Tennessee, North Carolina, Colorado and several other states with pitched election campaigns.

Through ads on Christian radio, sermons from the pulpit, Bible studies, house parties and a documentary film, "The Great Warming," Christians will be urged to view protecting the environment as a religious and moral issue, every bit as urgent as opposing abortion and gay marriage.

"We're not abandoning our previous positions. We're still pro-life, pro-traditional marriage, pro-morality. But one or two issues can't adequately express the gospel," said the Rev. Joel Hunter, the new president of the Christian Coalition of America.

Hunter is one of scores of evangelical leaders who have become convinced that the planet is facing a crisis and that God expects Christians to act, in part by electing committed environmentalists to office. "I'm trying to make Christians . . . look at candidates in a broader way, and look at individuals, not just parties," Hunter said.

The religious leaders say they are not trying to tip control of Congress to Democrats; under federal law, churches cannot endorse candidates. Pastors can campaign on issues, however, and they acknowledge that the election-season focus on global warming is designed to send a message to the GOP: Don't take us for granted.

"The fact that Republicans believe they have a lock on our voters is damaging to both the party and the church," said Peter Vander Meulen, social-justice coordinator for the Christian Reformed Church.

His denomination has a strong commitment to fighting poverty but is theologically and politically conservative: The church opposes birth control and considers homosexuality "disordered." Vander Meulen estimates that 80 percent of the denomination's 280,000 members are Republicans.

This election, however, he expects "a measurable shift" toward Democrats, as pastors highlight global warming and concerns about the Iraq war.

Democratic consultant Eric Sapp calls the greening of the religious right a "godsend for Democrats." His firm, Common Good Strategies, has drafted a guide for pastors who want to talk about global warming, which includes quotes from scripture and this suggested prayer: "We lament what creation is become due to our sin."

Sapp is especially eager to get global warming on the agenda for congregations in western North Carolina, Pennsylvania and Tennessee, where Democratic candidates for Congress share some values with their Republican opponents, opposing abortion and talking openly about their personal faith. He senses that, in such races, global warming could become a deciding factor for Christian voters.

"When evangelicals feel they have permission to vote on a wider range of issues, they're not going to be thinking that Republicans are God's party," Sapp said.

Local conservatives don't disagree.

"The Republicans have been awkwardly silent on this issue," said Dan Boone, president of Trevecca Nazarene University, an evangelical college in Nashville.

He recently hosted a luncheon for 50 pastors, focusing on global warming, and supplied them with DVDs to show their congregations. Boone has advanced the issue on campus, too.

"My sense," Boone said, "is that Christian voters are beginning to move away from being co-opted by either party."

White evangelicals make up nearly one-quarter of the electorate; 78 percent backed President Bush in 2004. But many have been frustrated with Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress for failing to promote issues they consider important, such as tougher laws on pornography and a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage.

In recent years, as their leaders emphasized abortion, gay rights and school prayer, "evangelical" has come to seem synonymous with "conservative." In fact, however, the shift to the right is a new development. As recently as a decade ago, white evangelicals were fairly evenly divided between the two parties. (President Bush is an evangelical, but so are former Presidents Carter and Clinton, both Democrats.)

DOJ_NMG_0083071

Some top evangelicals now worry that they've become too predictably right-wing. Global warming offers a way to get out of that box. The issue is widely seen as an advantage for Democrats, because Republicans, led by Bush, have resisted steps such as ratifying the Kyoto Protocol to reduce emissions of greenhouse gases.

"Frankly, I'm conservative . . . (but) we're letting our principles lead us where they will," said the Rev. Richard Cizik, a leading evangelical voice on the right.

Democrats stand ready to take advantage. At a recent forum on global warming at Messiah College, a conservative evangelical institution in Grantham, Pa., the Democratic candidate for U.S. Senate, Bob Casey Jr., endorsed the Kyoto Protocol -- and got a warm reception. (The incumbent, Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, did not appear in person; instead, he sent a brief campaign video about other environmental issues.)

In western North Carolina, Democratic candidate Heath Shuler plans to attend a church-sponsored screening of "The Great Warming" as he fights to unseat incumbent Republican Rep. Charles Taylor.

"The Great Warming" is heavy on science, but it also lays out the biblical case for acting on global warming, starting with God's command to Adam to be a good steward of the Earth.

Faith leaders increasingly make a moral argument as well, saying that floods, hurricanes and other effects of global warming will disproportionately affect the poor -- precisely those whom Christ commanded his followers to help.

In the long run, evangelicals leading the Call to Action say they hope, and expect, more Republicans to take up global warming as a priority cause.

"Evangelicals are in the best position to change the GOP's mind on this -- a better position than any group in America, other than big busin

Evangelicals Broaden Their Moral Agenda (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

Evangelical Christian leaders are tackling a growing list of domestic and international issues, such as genocide in Darfur and global warming, despite dissension in their ranks over whether this broader moral agenda will dilute their political power just before crucial elections.

Yesterday, two dozen prominent evangelicals issued a joint appeal for President Bush to take the lead in sending a multinational, U.N.-backed peacekeeping force into the Darfur region of Sudan. They included not just liberal religious leaders but also several notable conservatives, including the Rev. Richard Land of the Southern Baptist Convention and the Rev. Ted Haggard, president of the National Association of Evangelicals.

Today, another broad coalition of evangelical leaders will begin airing advertisements on Christian radio stations calling for action to address climate change. Among them is the new president of the Christian Coalition, who has said he plans to "rebuild and rebrand" the conservative lobbying group.

These initiatives do not sit well with some grass-roots religious conservatives, who prefer to keep the focus on a tighter range of issues, principally opposition to abortion and same-sex unions.

"This new vision, taking on these liberal issues, was the straw that broke the camel's back for us," said John W. Giles, president of Christian Action Alabama, which was the Alabama branch of the Christian Coalition before it broke away from the national organization last month.

"When we heard the new president talking about his opposition to the death penalty and support for raising the minimum wage, we decided it was time to say, 'Hi-ho, Silver!' " Giles said.

The Christian Coalition's new president, the Rev. Joel C. Hunter, pastor of a megachurch in Longwood, Fla., declined to be interviewed. The chairwoman, Roberta Combs, said the board of directors has not taken a position on global warming, the death penalty or the minimum wage.

DOJ_NMG_0083072

Although Hunter was listed on the Darfur appeal and the global-warming initiative as the Christian Coalition's president, he "is doing that sort of as an individual," Combs said. "These are his personal feelings." She added that the board plans to survey supporters before taking new stands.

"We will never leave our core issues, never," Combs said. "But as more people get involved and as younger people get involved, there are other issues that come to the forefront, and we will be open-minded to take a look at them."

Bishop Harry R. Jackson Jr., pastor of Hope Christian Church, a 3,000-member congregation in Lanham, was among the signers of the Darfur appeal. He said he knows that some evangelicals are concerned that their clout will diminish if they take on too many issues. But, like Combs, he pointed to the need to address subjects that matter to young Christians.

"I think you could call this a PR problem, because young people who are very involved in their churches understand the passion for these two issues," he said, referring to abortion and same-sex marriage, "but in the culture at large we can come across as wild-eyed bigots to some because we have only emphasized these things."

Broadening the agenda, "not to 99 things but to five or six core things," such as fighting poverty and providing aid to Africa, "helps improve our image and more accurately reflects the full panoply of our beliefs," Jackson said. "It's hard to say that those two things -- abortion and gay marriage -- are the only things God had in mind in the Bible."

To some evangelicals, however, the new issues are less clear than the old ones, which have led evangelicals to vote overwhelmingly Republican in recent elections.

"I definitely don't like the widening of the agenda, because it muddies the water," said the Rev. Michael Haseltine, pastor of the 2,000-member Maranatha Assembly of God Church in Forest Lake, Minn.

"Be good stewards of the environment? Sure, but how? These tree-huggers and anti-hunters think it's terrible to kill animals. Oppose poverty? Sure, but what's the best way to do it? We can't solve everybody's problems for them," he said. "Family and life issues -- abortion, sexuality -- they're much more clear from the biblical standpoint."

The global-warming radio ads are tied to a documentary film, "The Great Warming," that has been shown in hundreds of churches. "Environmental degradation is an offense against God," the Rev. Richard Cizik, vice president of the National Association of Evangelicals, says in the film.

Cizik has come under fire for his stand from some conservatives, including James C. Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family, who contend that it is uncertain whether global warming is a man-made phenomenon and what to do about it. But the Rev. Pat Robertson, who a year ago criticized the NAE for teaming up with "far-left environmentalists," has changed his mind. "It is getting hotter, and the ice caps are melting, and there is a buildup of carbon dioxide in the air," he said in August.

The Darfur appeal was backed by full-page ads in yesterday's Washington Post and other newspapers, paid for by $575,000 in donations from two individuals who wish to remain anonymous, according to Jack Pannell, spokesman for the liberal evangelical magazine Sojourners. "Without you, Mr. President, Darfur does not have a prayer," said the ads, addressing Bush.

"This is an important day. You see evangelical leaders from across the political spectrum coming together to speak as one voice," Jim Wallis, Sojourners' editor, told reporters.

Conservative signers of the appeal made it clear that they did not intend it to be critical of the White House's efforts to end the crisis. "The president really has been doing more than anybody else, but the president cannot do it alone, and America cannot do it alone," said Land, who heads the Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Agents Break Up Money - Laundering Ring (AP)

AP, October 19, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Law enforcement agents broke up a Colombian money-laundering ring Wednesday, arresting 26 people in three countries and seizing more than $16.5 million in cash and drugs, drug enforcement officials said.

Arrests were made in Bogota and Cali, Colombia; New York, New Jersey, Florida and London, according to Drug Enforcement Administration officials.

More than $10 million in alleged drug profits and more than $6.5 million in cocaine, heroin and marijuana were seized in the operation conducted by DEA, the FBI, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the Internal Revenue Service, New York city and state police and Suffolk County police, authorities said.

In one court document filed in U.S. District Court, New York Police Detective Jon Paul Figueroa said the scheme was used to process some of the billions of dollars generated each year by Colombian drug dealers.

He said narcotics traffickers used the Colombian black market peso exchange to disguise the source of income.

As part of the probe, he said, Colombian law enforcement authorities obtained judicial authorization to intercept telephones used by various peso brokers in Colombia.

He said the Colombian officers also identified money launderers in the New York City area, including some of the defendants, who were collecting and distributing drug proceeds in coordination with their criminal associates in Colombia.

He said the probe also relied on multiple confidential informants who worked with undercover officers posing as people in New York who were able to receive narcotics proceeds and place them into the U.S. banking system to be laundered through the peso exchange.

In one scheme, officials said, a peso broker in Colombia arranged to launder illegal drug money located in New York. He arranged for other defendants to collect the cash and turn it over to another defendant who used it to buy used truck parts from a scrap yard he controlled in Lindenhurst, N.Y. The parts were shipped to Venezuela and Colombia and resold for pesos, the officials said.

U.S. agents obtained seizure warrants for bank accounts throughout the United States that they said had been used to aid the laundering. Colombian agents conducted 24 searches in Bogota and Cali.

The defendants include people from every level of the operations -- peso brokers in Colombia, their criminal confederates in the United States and Colombian business people who knowingly acquired the cheap drug dollars to buy imports, the officials said.

Associated Press writer Michael J. Sniffen in Washington contributed to this report.

26 Arrested In Global Money Laundering Case (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 18, 2006

Federal agents yesterday broke up what authorities described as an international money laundering ring diverting millions of Colombian drug dollars through a sophisticated "Black Market Peso Exchange," an illegal currency exchange system.

U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia in New York said agents arrested 26 persons on money laundering charges in Bogota and Cali, Colombia, New York, New Jersey, Florida and London, seizing more than $10 million in drug proceeds and $6.5 million in cocaine, heroin and marijuana.

According to two indictments and a complaint unsealed in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, the suspects used "peso brokers" to serve as middlemen between cash-heavy drug traffickers and Colombian businesspeople seeking to purchase cheap U.S. dollars outside the highly regulated Colombian banking system.

Mr. Garcia said all of the transactions in the system, dubbed the Colombian Black Market Peso Exchange by authorities, are verbal, without any paper trail, making discovery of the money laundering crimes by international law enforcement extremely difficult.

He said it is one of the primary methods through which Colombian narcotics traffickers launder their illicit funds.

The charging documents said the system involves three steps:

•Drug traffickers sell their drug dollars in the United States to peso brokers in Colombia in exchange for Colombian pesos.

•The peso brokers use criminal associates in the United States to collect the drug money and deposit the illicit funds into the United States banking system.

•The peso brokers sell the drug dollars to Colombian businesspeople seeking cheap dollars outside the legitimate Colombian banking system to purchase goods to be imported back to Colombia.

DOJ_NMG_0083074

Of the 26 persons arrested, Mr. Garcia said, seven were taken into custody in Bogota, seven in Cali, two in Florida and 10 in New York. If convicted, they face a maximum sentence of 20 years each.

DEA Warns Of Soft Drink-cough Syrup Mix (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, October 19, 2006

When San Diego Chargers defensive back Terrence Kiel was charged last month with illegally shipping cases of prescription cough syrup back home to East Texas, it cast a spotlight on a drug trend authorities say is spreading throughout the South and being celebrated in rap songs.

In a statement announcing Kiel's arrest Sept. 26, the Drug Enforcement Administration cited the rising popularity of a concoction that includes codeine-laced syrup mixed with a soft drink or sports drink. Such cocktails — known as "Lean," "Syrup," "Sizzurp" and "Purple Drank" — were popularized in rap mixes in the late 1990s by Robert Earl Davis Jr., a Houston disc jockey known as DJ Screw.

Since then, some teens and young adults in East Texas and beyond have been getting high on drinks in which the key ingredient is a prescription cough suppressant that contains promethazine with codeine, an opiate. DEA Special Agent Doug Coleman, who tracks the drug from the agency's headquarters in Arlington, Va., says users typically mix an ounce of the syrup with Sprite, a sports drink or a regional soft drink called Big Red, then plop in a Jolly Rancher candy and pour it over ice. The opiate produces a feeling of euphoria and causes motor skill impairment that makes users move slowly or lean over.

The scope of cough syrup abuse across the nation is unclear because national drug surveys do not ask about it specifically. However, police, federal drug agents and public health analysts from Texas to Florida say the abuse and illegal sale of codeine syrup are rising and are part of the much larger problem of prescription drug abuse.

In 2004, 8.3% of Texas secondary school students reported having taken enough codeine syrup to get high, according to a survey by the University of Texas.

The misuse of prescription syrups is "a huge trend. We've seen more of it in the last few years than we've ever seen before," Coleman says. "We see a lot of kids getting hold of it" by ordering from online pharmacies that accept unverified prescriptions and identification.

DEA agents say the demand for illicit syrup has sent its price soaring. Syrup that typically sells for $12 a pint that is stolen or obtained illegally from pharmacies and warehouses often is sold to street dealers for about $300 a pint, says Richard Sanders, a DEA agent in Tyler, Texas. He says East Texas dealers then sell it by the ounce to users for $40-$85 — or $640-$1,360 a pint.

The DEA's largest busts involving syrup have been in Texas and Florida, but it is turning up across the South. In August, police in Natchez, Miss., found several bottles of illicit syrup in countywide drug raids, and police in Alexandria, La., seized 15 1-pint bottles from a 48-year-old man.

Overdosing on prescription syrup is potentially fatal, but it's unclear how many people have died drinking such concoctions. Too much codeine, which is produced from morphine, can depress the central nervous system and stop the heart and lungs, Coleman says. "The misconception is that prescription drugs are OK because they are medicine," he says. "But if you're taking 25 times the recommended dosage, it's very dangerous."

In November 2000, DJ Screw, the innovator of rap mixes that glorified syrup drinks, died of a codeine overdose. His re-mixed and slowed-down rap songs reflected the narcotic effects of syrup, says Rolling Stone executive editor Joe Levy.

Since DJ Screw's death, others have extolled syrup drinks in their raps and mixes. Three 6 Mafia, an Oscar-winning hip-hop group, recently had a hit song called Sippin' on the Syrup. "Here in Houston, it went hand in hand with a very innovative form of hip-hop music called 'screw music,' " after DJ Screw, says Ron Peters, assistant professor of behavioral sciences at the University of Texas Health Science Center.

"I'd be surprised if the majority of high school hip-hop fans don't know what syrup is," Levy says. "But it doesn't mean they are using it."

Syrup drinks appeared in Pensacola, Fla., in 1999 as a social drink among drug dealers, says Pensacola police Sgt. Stephen Bauer. Pensacola's narcotics unit recently concluded a wiretap investigation in which cocaine and marijuana dealers routinely mentioned syrup in recorded conversations, Bauer says. In Louisiana, teens are using syrup in the Lafayette and Lake Charles areas, says Kristen Meyer of the state Department of Health and Hospitals. “It's new on everyone's radar,” she says.

DOJ_NMG_0083075

Trafficking of syrup is rising in Texas, says Special Agent Tim Stover of the DEA's Fort Worth office. Dealers in Dallas, Fort Worth and Houston have bought pints from corrupt pharmacy owners for cash, he says.

In Houston, seven pharmacists and a doctor were convicted last summer of illegally diverting more than 2,500 gallons of narcotic cough syrup by creating and filling hundreds of phony prescriptions.

In August, a federal grand jury in Oakland indicted the directors of a non-profit organization set up to distribute medicine in Nigeria. They allegedly used the group to divert prescription drugs, including syrup, to dealers and users.

Despite crackdowns by police, prescription syrup is a popular illicit drug in Tyler, where Kiel's packages were to have been sent. Kiel, who grew up in nearby Lufkin, told DEA agents he shipped the syrup to help out a cousin, says Bob Grimes, Kiel's attorney. The cousin has not been identified; no others have been charged.

Court papers say DEA agents were told of Kiel's shipment by FedEx managers who inspected a package the player had dropped off and found 15 pints of syrup. Kiel was arrested after he took a second box of syrup to FedEx. DEA agents found more syrup in his garage, Special Agent Dan Simmons says. Kiel pleaded not guilty to five felony charges. He could face up to five years in prison if convicted.

Former Soldier Admits To Role In Drug Smuggling (AP)

AP, October 19, 2006

OKLAHOMA CITY A former member of the U-S Army Reserve today became the latest soldier or former soldier to plead guilty to smuggling drugs while in uniform.Terrance Wilson of Oklahoma City pleaded guilty today in federal court in Oklahoma City to a felony conspiracy charges and faces up to five years in prison.Wilson is among the soldiers caught in an F-B-I sting in which agents posed as drug traffickers and bribed soldiers to escort cocaine from Texas to Oklahoma City. He was paid two-thousand dollars for a trip in March 2004.

Chicago Police Raid Targets Bad Heroin (AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

CHICAGO (AP) - Police raided a public housing complex Wednesday in a sweep targeting suspected dealers of deadly fentanyl-laced heroin, authorities said.

Officers were looking for 37 suspects and had arrested about half by Wednesday afternoon, said Chicago police spokeswoman Monique Bond.

The arrests at the Harold Ickes public housing complex followed a federal bust in June at another housing complex nearby, Bond said. Federal drug agents were not involved in Wednesday's raid, she said.

Hundreds of people have died nationwide from heroin laced with the prescription painkiller fentanyl. In Cook County, more than 200 deaths were attributed to fentanyl-laced heroin from April 2005 through August 2006, said Joanna Zoltay, a spokeswoman for the Drug Enforcement Administration in Chicago.

Major Drug Sweep On South Side (CHIT)

By Josh Noel, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, October 18, 2006

Tamela Braylock is tired of the drug dealing in the Harold Ickes pubic housing complex, so she was glad to see police descend Wednesday morning on her lifelong home with more than 30 arrest warrants in a large-scale bust.

But her feelings turned mixed when she recognized a teenager in black pants and a red checkered shirt being led out with his hands behind his back.

"That's my friend's son," said Braylock, 27, of a boy she guessed was 16. "It's [messed] up because he's so young. But maybe now he'll learn."

DOJ_NMG_0083076

In what police say is a continuing effort to dent sales of fentanyl-laced heroin on Chicago's South Side, officers fanned out across the Ickes complex on South State Street for much of the day, trying to arrest 31 people who have been charged with a variety of drug-related crimes.

Dozens of uniformed and plainclothes officers filled the complex as members of the SWAT team stood at the entrances with guns.

By 5 p.m., 20 of the suspects had been arrested, police spokeswoman Monique Bond said. Police will provide more details at a Thursday news conference, she said.

The arrests were the culmination of Operation Fallout, for which police spent close to three months monitoring the complex from mounted cameras and making undercover buys from members of the Gangster Disciples, they said. Sources said 41 buys were made and that a large percentage of the heroin was laced with fentanyl.

Since April 2005 more than 185 people have overdosed in Chicago on heroin laced with the powerful painkiller, authorities have said.

The bust follows a similar effort earlier in the year, Operation Snakebite, which targeted heroin sales in the nearby Dearborn Homes and resulted in drug charges against 47 gang members.

Federal prosecutors have said the gang, the Mickey Cobras, was generating nearly $25,000 per day in heroin sales.

Police said they ran the bust on the Ickes complex because they feared it would become the destination of heroin seekers after the arrests at the Dearborn Homes. Ickes residents have long voiced concerns about drug sales and thanked officers in the halls Wednesday, police said.

"The constant hue and cry here is about gang activity," said Central District Cmdr. James Keating. "The mission is to enhance the quality of life, and the point of that is to get rid of the gangbangers.

"We're doing our best, and it's important that the community sees we're doing our best."

The efforts to stop drug dealing would not end with the arrests, police said.

"Our presence is not just here today," said Lt. John Escalante of the narcotic and gang unit. "We'll be out for quite a while here."

Though largely appreciative, residents were skeptical of any long-term benefit, saying the arrests probably would not fundamentally change life in buildings where dealers spend up to 12 hours in the hallways selling their goods.

"One group leaves, and another comes in," said Joyce Jackson, 34, a mother of four.

Jackson said she is forced to take her children into the building on the back steps most days because she doesn't want to expose them to the dealers.

"Maybe now we can walk up the front steps," Jackson said. "You get real tired of your kids seeing people selling drugs."

Tribune staff reporter Carlos Sadovi contributed to this report.

Harold Ickes Housing Project Targeted In Police Drug And Gangs Sweep (CD)

Chicago Defender, October 19, 2006

Chicago police swept down on the Harold Ickes Housing Project early Wednesday morning in the latest of the city's all out assault on drug dealers and gangs.

The police Narcotics and Gangs Division surrounded the housing project at 22nd and State streets to round up approximately 37 offenders who either are gang members, drug dealers or substance abusers, Chicago police Spokeswoman Monique Bond told the Defender Wednesday.

"A full complement of special units, SWAT teams and tactical units participated in the raid," Bond said. "This was a sole Chicago police take down. This is called Operation Fallout. It's called Operation Fallout because of some of residual activity that may have went from Dearborn (project raids) to Ickes."

The crackdown on the project also was called Operation Fallout because the drugs being sold there (a form of heroin) were so strong "that people were literally falling out," Bond said.

The early morning raid took place during a time when many children in the area were leaving for school. There are three schools in the Ickes vicinity and a church right across the street, Bond said.

DOJ_NMG_0083077

Share your thoughts

on this story on the ChicagoDefender.com message board.

"The response that police received from the community was overwhelming, which included the community being relieved that police were taking this action to take out gang-bangers, drug users and drug dealers," Bond said. "The residents were overwhelmingly supportive of the operation.

Chicago Police Superintendent Philip Cline said in a prepared statement that the drug raids are making a difference.

"Many of these street corner conspiracies and federal cases that have been dismantled can be viewed as a contributing factor in reducing overall crime for the community, as well as restoring the community's quality of life," Cline said in a prepared statement.

A full detailed press conference on the raid and the number of arrests actually made is schedule for today at police headquarters. No time was given for the press conference.

South Side CHA Drug Bust Produces Dozens Of Arrests (WBBM)

WBBM Radio, October 19, 2006

(CBS 2) CHICAGO --- More than 35 people were arrested this morning in a drug bust at a public housing development on the Near South Side.

The drug bust occurred at 24th and State streets, in the Harold Ickes Homes. As of 11 a.m., the scene was still very much active, and residents said it was very much necessary.

"It's a war zone," said Evelyn Lewis. "I go to work – some people at work, they can't believe how it is."

But Lewis knows how it is. In the time she has lived in the Ickes Homes with her two children, she has seen "people selling drugs, using drugs. I don't want my kids to see it."

Neither do police, which is one reason they conducted a sweep at the Ickes Homes. They targeted 37 people in arrests they hope will take a chunk out of the gang and drug problem like at the Dearborn Homes, which are also along State Street just the across the Stevenson Expressway from the Ickes Homes.

Last summer, Operation Snakebite focused on similar troubles on Dearborn Homes. The investigation at Ickes is called Operation Fallout.

Narcotics and Gang Deputy Chief Michael Cronin said the name was because "myself and (Central District) Commander Keating were concerned about the fallout from the Dearborn Homes. We thought maybe the customers would start coming over to Ickes and start buying their heroin."

The problem has revolved around an extremely potent form of heroin that is laced with the painkiller fentanyl. Over the last month, there have been overdoses at Ickes, and officers suspect they are related to fentanyl.

They said police surveillance cameras in the area have helped their investigation, and they promised to keep on the problem.

"I need to stress to you that this in an ongoing investigation, and our presence here today is not just for today. This is not the conclusion of the investigation," said Narcotics and Gang Investigation Unit Lt. John Escalante.

But Lewis said she did not believe the problem would be removed.

"This will die down and go back to the way it was. That's what happens," she said.

When asked if that was her fear, Lewis replied, "That's my knowledge. That's what I know."

But Lewis said she was happy police were executing search warrants and making arrests at the development. As for those wanted, about half are now in custody and they face a range of drug-related charges.

Spring Valley Drug Dealer Gets 11 Years In Federal Prison (JN)

The Journal News, October 18, 2006

WHITE PLAINS - A 45-year-old Spring Valley man has been sentenced to 11 years in federal prison for being part of a cocaine distribution ring.

James E. Johnson ran a network of drug dealers and shuttled cocaine daily in 2004 and 2005 from Queens into Spring Valley, Nanuet and Pearl River.

DOJ_NMG_0083078

Johnson, who also lived in Queens, was convicted of conspiracy to distribute drugs and possession of a weapon. Seven other people were arrested in Rockland, Queens and Suffolk counties as a result of an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the anti-crime units of the Spring Valley and Ramapo police departments.

Johnson was sentenced to seven years for possessing a .45-caliber gun and four years for drug dealing. He had a prior felony conviction 1996 for possession a gun.

Ramapo Detective Sgt. John Lynch estimated Johnson and his crew did about $500 to $2,000 worth of business daily. He said they worked out of two apartments in Spring Valley and sold crack to people and street dealers in gas station parking lots in Pearl River and Nanuet.

Freedom For Sale, Part 1 (MNT)

By Carl Jones

Miami New Times, October 19, 2006

Back in July 1998, Pensacola prosecutors issued an arrest warrant for a 28-year-old father of three named Antonio Monroy. He had been charged with three counts of cocaine trafficking. Soon he was picked up in Miami. He was sent to a federal prison in Coleman, Florida, northwest of Orlando, and a few months later, with a trial looming, he pleaded guilty.

It was the kind of case that breezes through the courts every day.

Then a friend of Antonio's contacted his mother, Virginia. A Miami lawyer could get her son out of prison early, he said.

At the time, Israel Perez Jr. was a defense attorney with almost twenty years of experience, including time clocked as a prosecutor in Fort Myers and Miami-Dade, where he served under Janet Reno. Before he met Antonio Monroy, the only blight on his record had been a 1993 public reprimand by the Florida Bar for improperly handling the funds of a client. Perez had an office in a black and tan tower called the Gables International Plaza in Coral Gables. He seemed like a reputable guy.

Virginia agreed to meet the lawyer, who soon showed up at her aging apartment building on Indian Creek Drive across from the Intracoastal Waterway in Miami Beach. According to the woman's description of that meeting, Perez laid out a plan. Perez would fly to Coleman and tell Antonio to expect two Drug Enforcement Administration agents to visit him after sentencing. Then agents would tell the court he deserved to be freed. It was a sure thing.

The cost to Antonio and his mother would be $100,000.

On March 26, 1999, Antonio was sentenced to nine years in prison. After the sentencing hearing, Antonio's friend contacted Virginia again to find out if she was still interested in buying Antonio's release.

Virginia said she would have to think about it. When she told her son about her conversations with Perez, he decided the whole thing was a scam and contacted the FBI. The bureau then persuaded Virginia and Antonio to meet with Perez — while wearing a wire.

During the next six months, over the course of some dozen meetings or telephone calls, all in Spanish, it became clear that Perez's plan — valid or not — was intricate. Transcripts of conversations he had, along with telephone calls that were recorded, show Perez planned the deceit to minute detail, where it might stall, how disagreements might occur, and generally how to avoid law enforcement scrutiny.

Regardless of all the video- and audio-taped meetings, so far there have been no arrests or indictments in the case. On September 14 the Florida Supreme Court disbarred Perez. A disturbing story is spelled out in a stack of FBI and DEA documents that became public record this summer, after they were introduced as evidence in the bar investigation into Perez. Though a handful of other Miami convicts surfaced, saying they had similar dealings with Perez, the two corrupt DEA agents were never identified. It now seems a probe into the affair has gone nowhere.

Federal authorities declined to comment about the case. So did Monroy. A call placed to Perez's old law office — which by court order is in the process of closing down — reached only an answering machine. A message New Times left was not returned. Calls to three other numbers once monitored by the FBI led to dead ends. Another message was left at Perez's home, with no response. In bar documents, he denied Antonio's claims in a series of letters to Florida Bar investigators.

DOJ_NMG_0083079

If there's any truth to Perez's claims about working with rogue DEA agents, the case raises serious questions about the propriety of drug investigations and prosecutions in South Florida, and about why Perez was never charged with a crime. It could mean there is again a "For Sale" sign on badges in Miami.

It all began on a sweltering July day in 1999 when Perez knocked on the door of Virginia Monroy's sixth-floor apartment in Miami Beach. After several minutes of small talk, they turned to business. She expressed concern for her son and asked lots of questions. Perez patiently answered all of them, describing the legal process that allows for convicted defendants who help the government to leave jail early. He called the $100,000 a "fee" and repeatedly guaranteed it would bring Antonio home.

Referring to the corrupt DEA agents, Perez said to Virginia: "I bring a file like this one to them and tell them, 'This is the man; go do what you have to do.'" He then explained the DEA agents would want their money when Antonio had the recommendation for a sentence reduction in hand.

But, he warned, she could not back out. Otherwise the agents would say Antonio lied. Then he might get more jail time. "In other words," Perez said, "you'll be responsible for your actions."

This warning would be made repeatedly throughout the conversations to come — have the money, or else. Perez also warned Virginia that she and Antonio would have no one to turn to if they decided to rat him out. He said no judge would believe they'd been scammed by the DEA. "They are going to laugh right in that person's face," Perez said.

On the evening of July 18, Virginia Monroy and her daughter-in-law Claudia sat in their car in the parking lot of the La Carreta restaurant on North Kendall Drive. It was just after 6:30, and the two were waiting to meet Perez. Virginia was wired for sound and holding $1500 — money provided to her and photocopied by authorities — to pay for Perez's trip to see Antonio in Coleman.

Colo., Nev. To Vote On Easing Pot Laws (USAT)

By Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, October 19, 2006

DENVER — Colorado and Nevada could become leaders in the movement to legalize marijuana, when voters decide Nov. 7 whether to remove all penalties for adults 21 or older possessing up to an ounce of the drug.

Alaska is the only state that allows penalty-free possession of marijuana, the result of a court decision in August striking down part of a state law that made it a misdemeanor for adults to have less than 1 ounce of marijuana.

In addition to the two statewide ballot measures, at least five cities are letting voters decide whether to direct police to make enforcement of marijuana laws a low priority. Those towns: Missoula, Mont.; Eureka Springs, Ark.; and three California communities — Santa Cruz, Santa Monica and Santa Barbara.

In Colorado, where possession of an ounce or less is classified as a petty offense subject to a $100 fine, backers of Amendment 44 promote marijuana as a healthier alternative to alcohol use.

“Every objective study has found that marijuana is far less harmful to the people who use it and society than alcohol,” says Mason Tvert, campaign director for an organization called Safer Alternative For Enjoyable Recreation (SAFER) that is leading the Colorado ballot drive.

Marijuana possession is illegal under federal laws, which call for up to a year in jail and a $1,000 fine. SAFER says on its website that 99% of marijuana prosecutions come under state and local laws.

Last year, 54% of Denver voters approved a similar measure for the city, but it has had little impact because most cases are prosecuted under state law. “The city initiative didn't change anything,” says Vince DiCroce, head of the city attorney's prosecution staff.

A Rocky Mountain News poll in late September showed 53% of Colorado voters oppose this year's referendum, while 42% favor the marijuana measure.

Colorado Attorney General John Suthers criticizes backers of the measure for “an irresponsible and inaccurate message that legalizing marijuana will make Colorado a safer place.”

DOJ_NMG_0083080

In Nevada, where voters defeated a legalization measure in 2002 by 61%, this year's measure is broader than the one in Colorado. It would allow adults to possess up to an ounce, but also boost criminal penalties for drivers who cause death or serious injury while driving under the influence of alcohol and drugs.

The measure would set up state regulation of marijuana stores, with licensing fees and an excise tax of $45 per ounce. Proceeds would be split between the state general fund and substance abuse programs.

A coalition of law enforcement and community groups opposes the measure. Thirty-three clergy members endorsed the initiative. Paul Hansen, senior pastor of the Holy Spirit Lutheran Church in Las Vegas, says legalization and regulation would prevent some of "the problems that prohibition causes, including exorbitant prices and wild profits" by criminal elements.

Colorado and Nevada are among 11 states that treat possession of small amounts of marijuana as misdemeanors or petty offenses.

Lions Confused By Rogers' Suspension (AP)

AP, October 19, 2006

ALLEN PARK, Mich. (AP) -- The Detroit Lions understand they will be missing star defensive tackle Shaun Rogers for the next month. They just aren't clear why.

The NFL suspended Rogers without pay for the next four games for violating a league rule on banned substances. The league said Wednesday the violation involved an NFL policy that covers anabolic steroids and related substances.

Rogers will be eligible to return for the Thanksgiving Day game against Miami.

Several Lions players said the two-time Pro Bowler fell afoul of a confusing policy that leaves them not knowing which supplements are OK and which are banned. Unlike the league's policy on street drugs, a first offense related to performance-enhancing substances brings a suspension.

"They give us a list, but it is in Greek," said veteran tight end Marcus Pollard. "It would be helpful if the list said which supplements were banned, but it doesn't. It just gives us a list of ingredients, and we have to try to figure out which ones are in each supplement."

The NFL's announcement didn't say what Rogers took, but an official within the league told The Associated Press on Tuesday night that it was an over-the-counter substance. The official spoke on the condition of anonymity because the NFL had not yet announced the suspension.

Lions player representative Dominic Raiola said the confusion means the players have to exercise caution.

"You have to be careful, because you can flunk for NyQuil," he said. "Before I take anything, I go right to the trainers and ask them about it. If there's any question at all, I don't take it."

Lions coach Rod Marinelli said players are warned during training camp about what they should not be taking.

"This shouldn't be a surprise," he said. "Our trainers do a nice job of keeping track of what is good and what isn't."

Tight end Dan Campbell is a supplement user -- he keeps large jars of powder in his locker -- but said he understands the risks.

"This stuff helps me recover faster, which is why I take it," he said. "I'm very careful about checking the labels, but what would happen if they put something else in it? If that happened, I'd go public and make sure everyone knew what the company was doing, but that's still four games off for me."

Pollard isn't willing to take that chance.

"I'm a water-and-Gatorade guy," he said. "The only thing I take is my kids' Flintstones vitamins, and I'm pretty sure those are safe."

Losing Rogers is a blow for the Lions, who are coming off their first win of the season. Detroit (1-5) plays Sunday on the road against the New York Jets (3-3).

The 6-foot-4, 345-pound Rogers is widely regarded as one of the NFL's best defensive tackles. He had a career-high 5 1/2 sacks last year. In six games this season, Rogers had three sacks and 20 tackles.

Marcus Bell will replace Rogers in the starting lineup Sunday against the Jets, but he isn't expected to have the same kind of game-changing impact.

DOJ_NMG_0083081

"It's an impact on us, but I am very confident with Marcus," Marinelli said. "He has to have a great game. They will maybe run inside on us a little more, but if every guy does what he is supposed to do, we'll be fine."

An e-mail message seeking comment was sent to Rogers on Tuesday night.

Cory Redding, Rogers' partner at defensive tackle going back to their college days at Texas, said he talked to Rogers after the news broke Tuesday.

"This is a devastating blow for us," he said. "We're all going to miss the big guy, but he's with his friends and family.

That's what he needs right now."

AP Sports Writer Larry Lage contributed to this report.

Lions' Rogers Is Suspended For Jets' Game And 3 More (NYT)

By David Picker

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y., — The Detroit Lions appeared to turn a corner Sunday, when they beat the Buffalo Bills, 20-17, for their first victory of the season. Maintaining that momentum against the Jets on Sunday at Giants Stadium, however, will most likely be more difficult than they had hoped.

The Lions will be without defensive tackle Shaun Rogers, who was suspended by the National Football League for four games on Wednesday for violating its policy on anabolic steroids and related substances.

Rogers, a two-time Pro Bowl selection, anchored the Lions' defensive line, which is 11th out of 32 teams in the N.F.L. against the run. The Jets have sputtered on the ground this season, but now they sense an opening.

"We know what type of player Shaun Rogers is," Jets quarterback Chad Pennington said Wednesday. "He wreaks havoc anytime he's in the game. You've got to be aware of him. He definitely makes their defense better."

According to The Associated Press, a league official who was granted anonymity said Tuesday night that Rogers's ban was caused by an over-the-counter substance. The Detroit Free Press reported Wednesday that Rogers's agent, Kennard McGuire, said that Rogers had taken an appetite suppressant.

McGuire was not available for comment on Wednesday, a representative from his office said.

Rogers, in his sixth season, is listed on the Lions' Web site as 345 pounds. He has been dealing with a lingering knee injury, and he may use the time away from the game to have minor surgery.

Lions Coach Rod Marinelli indicated during a conference call with reporters on Wednesday that Rogers would not appeal the suspension.

Rogers had 3 sacks and 20 total tackles in six starts for the Lions this season. Cory Redding, a defensive end in his fourth season, is expected to replace him.

"I think they have a good group of defensive linemen, and those guys have played in different spots," Jets Coach Eric Mangini said. "There is some flexibility there to move guys around. Collectively, they play well. And whether it's an injury or a situation like that, I think the group will respond. And whoever they decide to plug in there will do a good job for them."

Runners Of Meth Superlab Get 15Yrs (AP)

AP, October 18, 2006

ATLANTA (AP) -- Two men convicted of running one of the East Coast's largest methamphetamine labs out of the basement of a Smyrna, Georgia, home were sentenced Tuesday to more than 15 years each in federal prison.

Twenty-four-year-old Ignacio Cortes-Valencia was given 21 years in prison, and 31-year-old Gustavo Lara-Murillo received a 17-year sentence.

A third man, 34-year-old Ramon Oseguera-Alanis, will be sentenced later.

The men were arrested during a February 2005 raid where authorities found what is known as a "superlab," or a meth lab that can produce more than ten pounds in a single run. It is the first superlab discovered in the state and one of just a handful found on the East Coast.

DOJ_NMG_0083082

During the raid, nearly 40 pounds of methamphetamine and ten pounds of crystalized methamphetamine—a pure form of the drug— were seized. The drugs had a street value of $2.8 million dollars.

Police also seized 24 full trash bags of empty pseudoephedrine containers which once likely contained about 240,000 of the pills commonly used to create meth.

Few States Allow Forms Spelling Out Patients' Wishes (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, October 19, 2006

Oregon was the first of only a handful of areas where patients and their doctors can fill out simple forms — that carry the legal weight of physicians' orders — outlining what kind of medical care they will receive, from ambulance to hospital to nursing home.

Washington state and West Virginia, along with parts of New York and Wisconsin, have similar programs. Advocates in a handful of other states, including Hawaii, Utah, Florida and Nevada, are developing them.

Ken Brummel-Smith, who heads the department of geriatrics at Florida State University College of Medicine, supports the effort to make the forms available in Florida. He says the case of Terry Schiavo helped fuel debate about the need for the forms. The woman who was in a long-term vegetative state drew national attention when Florida lawmakers and Congress tried to prevent her husband from having her feeding tube removed,

While the idea of the forms did not pass out of Florida legislative committees on its first try, Brummel-Smith says that advocates plan to try again. The debate highlights concerns from all sides.

"People have worries," Brummel-Smith says. "On one side, everyone is worried about whether a form could be used to limit treatment to people who can't be good advocates for themselves, or they perceive a risk of (a medical provider) withholding care in order to save money."

But, he says, others worry that if they are terminally ill, they will face too much unnecessary medical treatment. That's where the forms can help.

"The primary goal is to have patient-centered care, where we follow the patient's wishes. Plain old advance directives don't do that too well," he says.

Florida resident Barbara Ginsburg, 73, of Niceville, is following the debate and says she may consider filling out one of the forms if they are made available.

Ginsburg says she and her husband, Herbert, 80, already have advance directives, often called living wills, which name others to speak for them. The directives also make broad statements about medical treatment.

Her husband's documents state that he wants everything possible done for the first 10 days he's hospitalized. After that, he doesn't want extreme measures taken. Her wishes are a little different.

"I have this horrible fear of lying there hooked up to machines," she says. " As far as I'm concerned, if I'm in any kind of a vegetative state, just pull the plug."

Gang Leaders Get Life Terms (VALLTH)

By Matthias Gafni, Times-Herald staff writer

Vallejo (CA) Times Herald, October 19, 2006

Pitch Dark Family leaders sentenced in federal court

A federal judge on Monday sentenced the leaders of a reputed Vallejo street gang to life in prison without the possibility of parole.

U.S. District Judge Frank C. Damrell sentenced Shango Jaja Greer, 34, and Jason Keith Walker, 31, both of Vallejo, after a lengthy trial in U.S. District Court, Sacramento. In April, after three years in court, a federal jury convicted Greer conducting the affairs of an enterprise through racketeering, and Walker guilty of conspiring to conduct the same offense.

The jury specifically found Greer responsible for a murder in 1994 and 2000, a 1994 attempted murder and various drug trafficking activities. The jury found Walker responsible for two 1994 murders, a 1994 attempted murder and drug trafficking enterprises.

DOJ_NMG_0083083

Prosecutors painted the pair as running Pitch Dark Family, a gang of dope dealers and wannabe rappers, who operated in downtown Vallejo and rubbed out anyone who threatened their territory. Specifically, evidence established that between 1994 and 2000, Pitch Dark family members committed four murders, one attempted murder and trafficked rock cocaine.

"(Monday's) sentences appropriately reflect the heinous reign of terror carried out by Greer and Walker, and other members of the Pitch Dark Family gang," said U.S. Attorney McGregor W. Scott in a released statement. "The efforts of the FBI and the Vallejo Police Department have broken the back of that notorious gang."

Advertisement

In addition to Greer and Walker, six other defendants pleaded guilty to lesser crimes as part of the complex case.

Another defendant, Charles Lee White, has been found competent to stand trial and has a status conference scheduled for Nov. 6 and a trial date set for Feb. 27.

"I'm thrilled to hear that justice has been served," said the sister of Larry Cayton, who was shot to death in Oakland in April 2000 by PDF members. The sister, who lives out of state, spoke Tuesday on condition of anonymity, citing safety concerns.

"As far as the death penalty, me and my parents talked about it, but I don't think we have the right to make that decision," she said. "No one has the right to take someone else's life, but I'm glad to hear they can't hurt anyone anymore. I'm glad they got life without parole."

Prosecutors could have sought the death penalty, but the Justice Department opted against it in this case.

The complex PDF case began in February 2003, when authorities handed down a multiple-count indictment of nine defendants who Vallejo police and FBI agents had investigated for several years in the 1990s. During the four-month trial, more than 90 prosecution witnesses alone testified, many of them drug addicts, dealers, prostitutes and johns.

Salem-area Pipe-bomb Case Leads To An Arrest (SALSJ)

By Alan Gustafson

Salem (OR) Statesman-Journal, October 19, 2006

Bombs were found planted on four vehicles Aug. 10

A 44-year-old Sweet Home man has been arrested and charged with attempted aggravated murder in connection with the planting of four pipe bombs on Salem-area vehicles Aug. 10, authorities said Tuesday.

Lonnie Troy Glinski was arrested without incident Monday at his rural Linn County home, officials said. His girlfriend, Laurie Girtman, also was arrested and charged with hindering prosecution.

Glinski's ex-wife, Stephanie Glinski, who lives in South Salem, was one of his intended victims, authorities said. She and Glinski have two children. A reporter who visited her home Tuesday afternoon to seek comment was turned away by a man who answered the door.

Stephen Dingle, a Marion County deputy district attorney, declined to reveal any motives for the attempted pipe bombings. He said it would be improper to disclose such information before court proceedings.

Investigators said they received a break in the case last week. However, that information also was being kept under wraps by the DA's office.

This week's arrests capped an intense multi-agency investigation led by Salem police and the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

ATF agents and local officials said they were pleased and relieved by the arrests, saying they resolved a high-profile threat that rattled Salem-area residents for weeks.

"Our aggressive joint law enforcement response has answered the community's call," Kelvin Crenshaw, the ATF special agent in charge of the agency's Pacific Northwest's region, said Tuesday in Salem.

Crenshaw said that each pipe bomb was about a foot long and 2 inches in diameter, and each packed enough power to kill by sending shrapnel flying in all directions.

"Make no bones about it; this was a life-and-death situation," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0083084

Crenshaw said that "a significant amount of thought" went into making the bombs. The fact that none exploded was attributed to a mistake, he said. Officials declined to elaborate about why the bombs failed to detonate.

Glinski, lodged at the Marion County jail, faces seven counts of attempted aggravated murder and four counts of possession of a destructive device. He is scheduled to make his first court appearance this morning.

Attempted aggravated murder is a Measure 11 crime, carrying a minimum sentence of 10 years in prison. Possession of a destructive device is a Class C felony, carrying a maximum sentence of five years in prison.

Glinski, if convicted on all counts, potentially faces a life sentence when his age is taken into account, Dingle said. Prosecutors said they will try to have him held without bail.

Investigators continued to gather evidence at Glinski's residence Tuesday. More state and federal charges could be filed against him, Dingle said.

Court records indicate that Glinski had previous scrapes with the law, including a 2003 stalking charge in Linn County stemming from a dispute with a neighbor. He also received a 2003 contempt-of-court citation in Linn County.

Glinski operated two businesses in recent years, Sweet Home Rentals and Sweet Home Excavation, records show.

Federal officials said that the Salem case is rare in that multiple bombs were found on the same day at different locations:

•The first device was found at a Salem Hospital parking garage about 11:50 a.m. Authorities revealed Tuesday that the bomb was planted on a vehicle owned by Denise Foster of Salem.

The bomb rolled out from underneath the car when she pulled at a wire on the side mirror.

Foster declined to comment Tuesday.

•At 12:15 p.m., the Marion County Sheriff's Office received reports of a second device in the parking lot of the Roth's grocery store at Lancaster Drive and Center Street NE.

That bomb apparently fell off a vehicle and wound up in the parking lot. The driver never came forward, police said, and he or she might not have known that a bomb fell off the vehicle.

•The third bomb was reported to police at 5:32 p.m. on a manhole cover near Woodside Drive and Wiltsey Road SE, in the neighborhood where Stephanie Glinski lives.

Police think the bomb was attached to her SUV and fell off, landing in the street, Lt. Bill Kohlmeyer said Tuesday.

•The fourth pipe bomb was found shortly before

8 p.m., attached to a vehicle outside the Tyco Electronics plant in Dallas. Officials identified Mitchell Adams of Salem as the owner of that vehicle. He couldn't be reached for comment Tuesday.

Police bomb squads rendered all four bombs harmless. The bomb found in the Roth's parking lot produced a powerful explosion, sending a cloud of debris at least 50 feet in the air.

In the aftermath of the bomb scare, police advised residents to look under their vehicles and check for any suspicious-looking wires.

Safety precautions were necessary, Kohlmeyer said, given the lethal capacity of the four pipe bombs.

"Up until yesterday, I was still checking under my car," he said.

Statesman Journal reporter Ruth Liao contributed to this story.

Ad Aims To Instill Fear Of Yankton (SFAL)

By Peter Harriman

Sioux Falls (SD) Argus Leader, October 19, 2006

Anti-crime strategy angers Sen. Johnson

If prison isn't enough of a deterrent, officials in eastern Missouri hope a desolate portrayal of Yankton will dissuade potential criminals.

"Nobody you know has a clue where it is. There's no airport, no bus station, no Amtrak," a Project Safe Neighborhood poster claims of the community.

DOJ_NMG_0083085

That the Justice Department, which paid for the advertisement, is trashing Yankton for a good cause - "commit a gun crime and we won't just send you to prison," the ad promises, "we'll send you to Yankton" - doesn't sit well with Sen. Tim Johnson, who fired off a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales telling him there ought to be a better use of federal tax dollars.

"Violent gun crime is a serious problem that needs to be addressed but not at the expense of a community like Yankton and not by using federal dollars to disparage such a thriving, historic community," Johnson said.

He wrote Gonzales, "These public service announcements, which have run in the Eastern District of Missouri describing Yankton as '600 miles away from nowhere,' are inaccurate and an inappropriate expenditure of federal funds."

Sen. John Thune also weighed in on Yankton's behalf.

"Yankton is a vibrant and growing city, and anyone who suggests otherwise has obviously never been there," Thune said.

Johnson's spokesman Julianne Fisher says Johnson became aware of the ad through constituents, and he learned from Yankton officials that the Justice Department's exaggeration was viewed as less than clever in Yankton.

"City officials were not pleased, in part because of economic development concerns," she said. "When you're trying to grow a community, you don't want a federal advertising campaign to call your community the middle of nowhere."

The ad is dominated by a photo of a dirt road and line of utility poles disappearing into an endless horizon of bare, flat fields. And it seeks to discourage incipient criminals with such dire claims as "in summer, the mosquitoes are mean and hungry because there aren't a whole lot of people around."

Reach Peter Harriman at 575-3615.

Johnson Wants Justice Department Posters Pulled (AP)

AP, October 19, 2006

South Dakota Senator Tim Johnson wants the federal government to quit using posters that he says are derogatory and offensive to the Yankton community.

The posters are being used in East St. Louis as part of a Safe Neighborhoods program to reduce gun crime.

The caption on one poster says violators could be sent to a federal prison camp in Yankton that's "in the middle of nowhere" without an airport, bus station or Amtrak. It says mosquitoes are "mean and hungry" because there aren't many people around.

Johnson sent a letter to the attorney general complaining about the use of tax money to disparage a community.

IMMIGRATION:

Former Nazi Guard Freed To Uncertain Fate (FREEP)

By David Ashenfelter, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, October 18, 2006

Johann Leprich, the former Nazi concentration camp guard who was jailed in 2003 after agents found him hiding in a secret compartment in his Clinton Township home, has been released from federal custody.

And now he's literally a man without a country.

Federal officials said they freed Leprich on Monday at the request of his lawyer after the government failed to find a country willing to accept Leprich, who was stripped of his citizenship in 1987 and ordered deported in 2004.

Although Justice Department officials vowed to continue their 20-year effort to remove him, his lawyer predicted the battle is over.

"They'll have to call it quits," attorney Joseph McGinness of Cleveland said Tuesday. "What country is going to accept an 81-year-old man who is in declining health?"

Last week, the U.S. Supreme Court refused to review the case of Iwan Mandycz of Sterling Heights, who was stripped of his citizenship last year for serving as a guard at two Nazi concentration camps in Poland in World War II. The Justice Department won't say if it would seek deportation. Mandycz, 86, suffers from Alzheimer's disease.

DOJ_NMG_0083086

On Monday, Leprich was taken from the Calhoun County Jail to U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement headquarters in Detroit and released on an electronic tether to his wife and son, ICE spokesman Greg Palmore said.

He said Leprich must report weekly to ICE, which will continue to seek deportation.

There was no answer Tuesday at Leprich's home.

On Sept. 18, McGinness petitioned the U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids for Leprich's release, citing a 2001 U.S. Supreme Court decision requiring that the government free immigrants who haven't been deported within six months of obtaining a removal order.

The Justice Department, in a response filed Monday, said it released Leprich because Romania, Hungary and Germany had refused to accept him, despite high-level meetings with officials from those countries.

Leprich was born in 1925 in Romania to ethnic German parents, court documents show. In 1940, Romania reluctantly gave up portions of Transylvania -- including Leprich's village -- to Hungary, a German ally.

He was drafted into the Hungarian Army. But in 1943, he and other ethnic German men were allowed to transfer to the German Waffen SS, court papers say.

Leprich admitted that, from November 1943 to April or May of 1944, he was a guard at Mauthausen concentration camp, in Nazi-annexed Austria, where thousands were killed.

He became a U.S. prisoner of war in 1945 and lived in Germany until 1952 when he immigrated to the United States. He became a U.S. citizen in 1958.

In 1986, the government initiated deportation proceedings, saying Leprich had lied about his Nazi past. In 1987, a federal judge revoked his citizenship, prompting him to flee to Canada, where he lived 16 years.

Flow Of Immigrants' Money To Latin America Surges (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

There is a common cycle to immigration from Latin America. Immigrants arrive in the United States and quickly find work. Several months later — in the case of illegal migrants, as soon as they have finished paying off the smuggler who brought them across the border — they start sending money home.

According to a new report about immigrants' money transfers to Latin America, the remittances flow from almost every state. Even in states that had virtually no Latin American immigrants only a few years ago, like Mississippi and Pennsylvania, a growing trickle of money is making its way south to places like Tlalchapa, Mexico, or Panajachel, in the Guatemalan highlands.

"Twenty years ago the money was coming from four or five states; now it's coming from every corner of the country," said Sergio Bendixen, a Miami pollster who surveyed some 2,500 immigrants, legal and illegal, for the survey on which the report was based.

For the nation as a whole, the flow of money has become a torrent. According to the study, sponsored by the Multilateral Investment Fund of the 47-nation Inter-American Development Bank, remittances from the United States to Latin America this year will total more than $45 billion. That is 51 percent higher than they were only two years ago.

About three-quarters of Latino immigrants who were surveyed send money home regularly, up from some 60 percent in a similar survey in 2004. This may largely reflect growth in the population of illegal immigrants, who tend to send money home more often than others. They accounted for about 40 percent of remitters in the survey, up from a third in 2004.

Moreover, with immigration to the United States a regular part of the life cycle for large numbers of men and women in many parts of Latin America, sending money back to relatives at home has developed into a moral obligation.

"If you don't send money to your mother, you are a bad son," Mr. Bendixen said. "Remittances companies say this in their TV ads."

The study's estimates on remittances are in line with population figures from the Census Bureau, which found last year that Latin American immigrants made up 6.6 percent of the nation's household population (that is, excluding people in jail, on military bases and such), more than half the total immigrant population.

DOJ_NMG_0083087

The bureau also found that 1.2 percent of the household population of Pennsylvania was born in Latin America, as were 0.7 percent of the population of Ohio and 2 percent of the population of Indiana. These were states with virtually no Latino immigrants five years ago.

According to the data from the Inter-American Development Bank, money transfers from Indiana should approach $400 million this year, with the total from Pennsylvania above $500 million and from Ohio more than $214 million.

Indeed, the study found Latino immigrants sending money from 48 of the 50 states — excluding only Montana and West Virginia, where, Mr. Bendixen said, he did not survey because he expected very few remitters.

In addition to those two states, the survey suffers from very small samples in some with the most recent immigrant populations. But Mr. Bendixen said that in these states, the remittance figures should be off by no more than 10 percent.

The data are consistent with a known pattern in which Latino migrants move from immigrant-heavy states like Illinois to new frontiers like Pennsylvania in search of jobs.

“Somebody who is already here hears about a new plant opening and goes there,” observed Jeffrey S. Passel, a demographer at the Pew Hispanic Institute. “After a while, the word gets back to Mexico, and the migrant stream is no longer from California to a meatpacking plant in Iowa. It’s Mexico to a plant in Iowa.”

The reconstruction of New Orleans after Hurricane Katrina provides an example of how immigrant populations coalesce around jobs. Latino immigrants have flocked to New Orleans, where another study has found that by this summer, they accounted for half the reconstruction force, with 54 percent of them working in the United States illegally.

They too have begun to send money back. According to the bank’s survey, remittances to Latin America from Louisiana should top $200 million this year, a 240 percent increase since 2004.

Immigrants Sending $45 Billion Home (WP)

By Krissah Williams

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

Immigrant workers are sending more money than ever to their families in Latin America, but two new studies show that only a small portion of the billions of dollars directed there has gone to economic development.

A report released yesterday by the Inter-American Development Bank estimates that immigrants living in the United States will send $45 billion to family members this year, representing a steady increase from about $2 billion in 1980.

That money, known as remittances, is five times as large as official development assistance to Latin America and the Caribbean. Remittances have grown as more migrants, often unemployed in their homelands, have come north in search of work. At the same time, governments and international development groups have busily debated how to leverage remittance flows to create jobs and lasting investments.

"We know that this is a very important poverty-alleviation program for 20 million families [in Latin America and the Caribbean]," said Donald Terry, manager of the Multilateral Investment Fund of the Inter-American Development Bank. "The big question is can we turn this into a local economic development program."

About $3 billion in remittances will go to El Salvador this year, or about 15 percent of that country's gross domestic product and more money per capita than flows to Mexico, which will receive $24 billion from immigrants living in the United States.

According to the Inter-American Development Bank, nearly 90 percent of immigrants living in the District, Maryland and Virginia regularly send money to their home countries, totaling an estimated $2.2 billion this year. World Bank researchers, who will release a report later this month, found that the overall impact of remittances on Latin American economies is modest at best. For every one percent increase in the share of remittances to a country's gross domestic product, the fraction of the population living in poverty is reduced by about 0.4 percent.

Humberto Lopez, who co-authored the upcoming World Bank report "Close to Home: The Development Impact of Remittances in Latin America," said the money sent home by migrant workers cannot be seen as a substitute for good economic policies.

"The countries that benefit the most are the countries with the better investment environment and the countries with the better-educated population," Lopez said. Remittances "are probably more an opportunity than any other thing."

DOJ_NMG_0083088

To spur greater development and poverty reduction, the Inter-American Development Bank has advocated greater access to savings accounts for remittance recipients and participation in micro-finance institutions, which offer small loans to remittance recipients.

Most of the money immigrant workers send to their families is used for basic needs, such as food, medicine and shelter, but more than half of the immigrants surveyed by the Inter-American Development Bank said that they would like to invest a portion of that money. But the majority of Latin America's financial institutions don't have programs that help the families of migrant workers, who are often poor and rural, open savings accounts or start small businesses.

"Poor people save," Terry said. "Poor people will invest if you give them the opportunity to do that."

The development bank's survey put the percent of remittances available for investment at 15 to 20 percent, or about $12 billion. Nearly 30 percent of people who send money home have used it to buy property, about 1 percent have helped start a business, and less than 5 percent have opened a savings account back home.

Governments have had more success leveraging remittances sent home by community groups formed by immigrants living in the United States. Several years ago, Mexico started a matching grant program, which challenges immigrants to raise money for development and infrastructure projects in their home towns. The government matches the funds three-to-one. The Pan American Development Foundation has a similar program with Banco AgrÃ-cola SA, a Salvadoran bank. Next week it plans to begin school repairs in Intipuca, a home town to many Salvadorans in the Washington area. Comunidad del Esteron, a District-based group, raised $9,400 for the project and the bank put up the rest of the money.

Suit: Arizona Targets Money Wired From Immigrant Communities (CHIT)

By Oscar Avila

Chicago Tribune, October 19, 2006

A Burbank truck driver sued Wednesday to block Arizona authorities from seizing large money transfers sent from Illinois and 25 other states targeted because they have significant illegal-immigrant populations.

Arizona officials report that since 2002, they have seized $17 million in a little-known campaign to foil criminal networks that often wire money through Western Union and other firms to help smuggle drugs and illegal immigrants over the border from Mexico.

Wednesday's suit, filed in federal court in Arizona, argues that the seizures are unconstitutional because the dragnet is too broad.

The Burbank man, Javier Torres, said he sent $1,000 via Western Union in March to pay for a car he bought from a friend in suburban Phoenix. When Torres' friend did not get the money, Torres said he contacted Western Union, which passed along his name to Arizona authorities. Soon Torres said he received a call from state investigators, who said he had to prove the transfer was part of a legitimate transaction to get the money back.

Because he could not produce documentation of the auto purchase—he had already resold the car, he said—Torres never recovered the money he wired. He ended up having to pay his friend a second time by mail.

State courts have allowed Arizona Atty. Gen. Terry Goddard's office to stop transfers that come from certain states, exceed a certain amount and are executed by certain companies during a specified period.

Most of the transfers were wired to recipients in Arizona. But until a court stopped the practice recently, Goddard's office had seized some transfers from Illinois and other states to Mexico.

Torres joined two other plaintiffs from California and North Carolina in alleging that the only basis for seizing the wire transfers was that they are $1,000 or more in most cases.

Plaintiffs also say their right to due process has been violated because senders aren't adequately notified how to contest the seizures.

The plaintiffs, all Latino, two of them immigrants, are seeking to make the suit a class-action.

Matthew Piers, one of Torres' attorneys, told reporters that hundreds of Illinois consumers have had their wire transfers seized.

DOJ_NMG_0083089

Piers said he is not surprised that Illinois transactions were targeted because the state has an estimated 520,000 undocumented immigrants, the fifth-highest population in the country.

Arizona authorities said their state is the "geographic funnel" for drug runners and immigrant smugglers, known as coyotes. They said wire transfers through firms such as Western Union and MoneyGram are key components of bring illegal immigrants to the Midwest and East Coast.

In a statement released Wednesday, Goddard vowed to continue with the program and warned that the lawsuit could cripple smuggling investigations.

Although a spokeswoman declined to address the lawsuit's allegations directly, Goddard said in his statement: "Every effort has been made to prevent the seizure of any funds from people not involved in human smuggling. We have met with Arizona community organizations to be sure that anyone receiving legitimate money transfers would be able to claim their money."

Spokeswoman Andrea Esquer noted that the office must receive permission from an Arizona state court before executing any warrant. She said the office notifies every recipient that a transfer has been intercepted, and provides a bilingual hot-line to receive information.

But plaintiffs complain that the burden of proof is on them to get their money back. Esquer explained that the money can be retrieved "as long as [consumers] can say that it's a legitimate transaction."

After a period of months, the attorney general's office will petition the courts to take seized money that has gone unclaimed and bring it into the office's general investigative fund, Esquer said.

Piers said the goal of combating smuggling is a worthy one but stressed that it doesn't justify Arizona's approach.

"Those [smuggling] activities should be stopped. Those activities are illegal and visit great suffering on people," Piers said. "But the government in this country must always act within the boundaries of the Constitution."

Anita Ramasastry, a law professor at the University of Washington, said the U.S. government has previously required companies to report certain transactions to specific nations as it tries to intercept criminal money transfers.

Arizona's approach appears novel, she said, because one state's authorities are targeting other U.S. states.

Ramasastry said Arizona officials might be able to defend a broad sweep if they can produce data showing patterns of criminal activity with certain types of transactions. Ramasastry added, however, that Arizona authorities are approaching the issue "backwards" by stopping transactions and then sifting through them to find criminal violations.

Even as Western Union pursues its own lawsuit against Arizona officials, immigrant advocates are seeking more plaintiffs for their lawsuit, which has been organized by the non-profit Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights.

Torres said the experience has left him disillusioned, and he said he will never wire money again. The authorities accused me "of sending the money for drugs or for the coyotes. I never imagined they would say that. I felt like they thought I was a criminal," Torres said.

oavila@tribune.com

Crossing Guards In Training (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

ARTESIA, N.M. — On a hot afternoon in May, buses carrying people with dreams of a better life rumbled across the desert to a converted Bible college on the edge of this oil town of 12,000.

As each bus rolled toward the front gate, an imposing welcome party came into view: a cluster of about a dozen men and women in sunglasses, broad-brimmed hats and crisp green uniforms, standing ramrod straight.

A former Marine on one bus flashed back to his boot camp days, and groaned: "Oh, no. Not again."

By day's end, the 50 members of Class 620 had settled in at the U.S. Border Patrol Academy, where over the next five months they would be chiseled into America's first line of defense on the southern border.

Among the recruits that day were Joseph Sorrento, whose dream of entering law enforcement led him far from his home in Buffalo, N.Y.; Philip Marquez, who had been boxing curtains at a warehouse in Brownsville, Texas; and Katy Foscue, who along with her husband had given up a trucking job and moved to a town near Tucson.

DOJ_NMG_0083090

The three entered at a crucial time in the agency's history. Washington has been consumed with debate over illegal immigration. Hundreds of thousands of migrants have marched to demand amnesty. President Bush and congressional hard-liners who vowed to block his guest worker program have so far agreed on only one thing: The nation needs more Border Patrol agents along the border with Mexico.

That has placed intense pressure on the academy, which graduated 1,122 trainees last year but will enroll 3,600 this year. Traditionally, Border Patrol recruits have come mostly from the Southwest and had law enforcement or military backgrounds. Now, the patrol is forced to entice more diverse candidates from other parts of the country. Earlier this year, a crop of trainees would enter the academy every few weeks. Classes now start weekly — Class 642 arrived today — and the academy is expanding. Modular classrooms and dormitories are mushrooming across its 2,500-acre campus.

The students enter an institution that's unlike any other law enforcement school — part police academy, part law school, part language institute. They learn to shoot, drive off-road and speak Spanish. Seventeen percent of all trainees do not complete the training. Some fail, but most who leave are worn down by the rigors and isolation of the academy. Thirty-four members of Class 620 would make it.

The tone was set the moment the trainees stepped off their buses May 18. The instructors ordered them to get their ID badges from the security building outside the gate fast, double-time.

After the buses pulled inside the academy and the trainees filled out the requisite paperwork, the instructors barked another command. They had seven minutes to unload their belongings and place them in their rooms. The students dashed into the squat, motel-like buildings where they would live for the next 20 weeks and found that their shared rooms contained just enough space for a bunk bed and one desk.

Foscue wasn't fazed. She'd expected the rough treatment. It was the next order that was most intimidating: Empty your biggest bag. You'll need it to carry your textbooks.

*

Finding a Career Path

After seven years of seeing the country while driving their own truck, Katy and Matt Foscue decided they wanted to live in the Arizona desert. They bought a house outside Tucson, where illegal immigration was as much a part of the scenery as towering saguaro cactuses. Migrants routinely traveled through a wash at the edge of the Foscues' property.

The two called the Border Patrol once, when they saw a white van abandoned along the route. But they were never alarmed about their own safety. "They're here to work," Katy, 35, said of illegal immigrants. "They don't want to get caught or do something stupid."

It wasn't the migrants that got the couple into the patrol. It was a haircut.

Matt was getting a trim one day last year when his barber began chatting with others in the shop about Border Patrol agents and how they never complain about their jobs.

Matt was intrigued, and quizzed the barber, who had several agents as customers. He introduced some to the Foscues. The more they heard, the more they liked: Every day is a different challenge. The benefits and pay are good — after four years, agents can make about $65,000 with overtime. And there's a pension after 20 years.

The Foscues decided to fill out applications. They began running and doing push-ups to condition the "trucker bodies" they'd acquired. They accepted the randomness of the bureaucracy — although they'd applied at the same time, Matt, 37, was scheduled to start the academy in Class 624, one month later than his wife. They would not be allowed to share a dorm room, and they would have to rent a room at a bed and breakfast to see each other on weekends.

In Buffalo, Sorrento had been tending bar at an Irish pub and trying to figure out what to do after college. He longed for a career in law enforcement, and was about to take a job in the New York state prison system. But he dreaded working indoors in a harsh environment.

Sorrento poured out his worries one night to a friend at the pub who suggested the Border Patrol.

The friend, a former agent who'd moved back to Buffalo for personal reasons, warned Sorrento about the academy. You'll be in physical training for what seems like hours, but when you look at the clock, only 15 minutes will have passed. The instructors will douse you with pepper spray and sic other trainees on you to hone your self-defense techniques.

DOJ_NMG_0083091

That night, Sorrento went home, logged on to the Border Patrol's website and e-mailed in his application. He started running four times a week.

Sorrento had only one worry — leaving the city where he had spent his entire life. All academy graduates are assigned to the busier southern border. (Only veterans can apply to transfer to the northern border.)

"It's tough leaving your friends and family," said Sorrento, 24.

In Brownsville, Marquez was bouncing from job to job.

A member of the Army reserves, Marquez was pulled out of college in 2002 to go to Afghanistan. When he returned to Brownsville the following year, he got married. But steady work eluded him. Marquez sold cars. He taught as a substitute teacher, and labored in a warehouse. He had always thought that he'd join the patrol someday; the agency had long been the only reliable employer on the border. Marquez sent in his application, and eventually was accepted.

Marquez's parents are legal Mexican immigrants and he has many relatives across the border, but he saw no contradiction to starting a career stopping people from crossing illegally.

"They're coming over here to get jobs, and I'm doing the same thing," said Marquez, 26. "I'm just doing a job."

*

Language Barrier

Lying on his back in a sweltering room one of his first days at the academy, Marquez had to admit that he was out of shape.

Instructors demanded that the class do 200 abdominal crunches, and after a few dozen, Marquez was unable to move. He lagged at the back of the class during runs at the high desert's 3,300--foot elevation. Instructors who followed the runners in a golf cart to pick up the injured yelled at him to climb aboard.

"No, sir!" Marquez shouted, and dashed to catch up with the rest of the class.

Sorrento was in the lead. He had conditioned himself so well that he was the top runner in his group and given the privilege of carrying the class flag during runs and marches. He mastered the shooting and physical-fitness tests.

But only a fraction of each day is spent on the shooting range or in physical training. Most of the time, the recruits are inside, studying law enforcement procedures, immigration law and radio codes they will use in the field. They also spend two hours a day in Spanish class. About half of all trainees are native speakers; for the rest, Spanish is usually the most treacherous course.

In 18 weeks, Sorrento went from speaking no Spanish to being able to ask questions and give orders in the language. He passed all his weekly exams and his final. But he didn't always feel comfortable using the language.

That's what tripped him up during a role-playing session designed to mimic incidents on the border. Sorrento had to interview a Spanish speaker of questionable citizenship (played by an actor) and forward the information to a dispatcher — something he would do daily once he started his job.

The actor tried to make Sorrento uncomfortable, muttering under his breath and mocking the trainee's Spanish. Sorrento got the character's name wrong, and had to be corrected. Increasingly flustered, Sorrento misheard the response from the dispatcher that the suspect had three convictions for immigrant smuggling.

Sorrento did hear the dispatcher give him the suspect's birthplace: Tecate, Baja California. He hesitated, then said: "Esta arrestado."

Instructor Gabriel Espino halted the action. "Why are you arresting him?"

Sorrento and Marquez, his partner in the exercise, began to search for reasons: We can detain him and get more information. He has prior convictions. Espino eyed them skeptically.

Exasperated, Sorrento asked: "Is there a Baja California in the United States?"

Espino stared. "No," he said. "Where are you from?"

Sorrento threw up his hands, and the stress of having to interrogate in a foreign language vanished from his face. "Buffalo," he said. All three men burst into laughter.

*

Rookie Mistakes

DOJ_NMG_0083092

T.J. Bonner remembers his first days in the field after graduating from the academy 15 years ago. He and a journeyman officer had watched a group of illegal immigrants flee through brush outside San Diego. The veteran said to let them go, but Bonner wanted to give chase.

"We can follow their footprints," Bonner recalled saying. "So, he humors me. And we follow their footprints — right into a Safeway parking lot. And he looks at me and says, 'Let's go back, kid.' "

Bonner, now president of the union that represents Border Patrol agents, said the academy still turns out graduates who are too gung-ho.

The rookie in Marquez showed itself during a class on high-risk traffic stops. The trainees and instructors wore protective gear and were armed with paintball guns to demonstrate the split-second judgment required of agents during vehicle stops.

In the simulation, Marquez and his partner pulled up to two drug smugglers. One, played by instructor Erik Cansino, ran into a field, taunting Marquez's partner, who followed him at a distance of several yards.

Marquez roughly cuffed the other instructor, turned, and charged at Cansino.

The instructor peppered Marquez with simulated bullets. Marquez dropped, his face-shield and bodysuit covered in pink splotches. As Cansino walked past his prone body, Marquez stuck out his leg to trip the instructor, rationalizing that he was supposed to fight to the end.

Marquez got up and ran back to the debriefing wearing a big grin. The lead instructor, Carlos Hernandez, wasn't amused.

"You're here in a controlled environment — he painted you up, you got a little dirty," Hernandez said. "In the real world … "

"You'd be dead," a classmate chimed in.

"Do you really want someone going to your home, telling your wife you didn't make it?" Hernandez asked Marquez. The correct move was to let the guy wander off and call for backup, then track him.

Marquez smiled sheepishly and sat down.

*

When to Use a Weapon

Instructors privately marveled at Katy Foscue's conditioning. She was far smaller than most recruits — 5-foot-1 and weighing barely more than 100 pounds. But she was able to handle the most demanding workouts.

Foscue was one of only seven women in Class 620. Four of them dropped out, and one flunked her physical fitness exam. "You definitely know you're going into a man's work," she said with a laugh.

In one exercise, Foscue dressed in a bodysuit and held a padded baton while three of her classmates — also wearing protective suits — came at her from all directions. She hit the first in the knee, and the instructor told him to fall onto the mat.

The other two were tougher. One danced out of Foscue's reach as the other grabbed her and began wrestling her to the ground. Foscue's classmates, lining the walls of the workout room, began to shout advice: "Escalate force!" "Stack!" "Weapon, use your weapon!"

Hemmed in by the two men, Foscue wriggled, jabbing at them with her elbows and knees. Her training kicked in. She reached for her holstered plastic gun just as the instructor yelled that the simulation was over.

The lesson for Foscue was clear. In certain situations she'd have to use weapons — baton, pepper spray, or her gun — sooner.

"They say it's not unusual to encounter groups of 50 by yourself," she said. "That's intimidating."

*

To Their Stations

After months of being crammed in tiny dorm rooms, eating the same food in the mess hall and spending up to 10 hours a day training in the classroom or in the blazing sun, it was over.

On Sept. 26, graduation day, Class 620 gathered outside the academy auditorium. Foscue handed out cards and photos to her classmates.

The trainees knew where they were headed. Foscue was going back to southern Arizona to work at the Tucson station. (Her husband was assigned to a neighboring station.) Sorrento was also headed to Tucson. Marquez was going to Boulevard, a station in the hills east of San Diego. He was worried about the cost of living — he and his wife had rented a studio apartment for $990 a month.

DOJ_NMG_0083093

Graduation was a relatively rapid affair. Michael T. McCall, a wry Georgian, was selected to give the class speech. "When I came here I could barely speak Spanish," he said. "Well, now I'm happy to say I can still barely speak Spanish."

After a comic review of the difficulties of the curriculum, McCall became serious. "Every member of Class 620 struggled with some part of the academics. It may have been immigration law, Spanish or physical techniques," McCall said. "Every member you see here today held on and didn't give up."

The 34 graduates walked across the auditorium one by one, and accepted their credentials and badges. They stood and swore the oath of office. Then they marched out, hugged their families, introduced them to classmates and an instructor or two, and fled the campus. After five months, they were eager to get to the border.

TAX:

IRS Aims To Limit A Deferral Strategy (WSJ)

By Rachel Emma Silverman

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

The federal government is cracking down on a popular tax-deferral strategy.

On Tuesday, the Internal Revenue Service and Treasury Department issued proposed regulations that would change the tax treatment of transactions in which sellers exchange real estate or other property for an annuity. The move may effectively end a strategy called a "private annuity trust," which has grown popular in recent years as the real-estate market has soared.

In a private annuity trust, sellers essentially exchange appreciated assets for fixed annuity payments, which spread out their capital-gains taxes over many years. The idea had been to avoid paying the upfront capital gains that would have been owed if the seller simply had sold the asset outright. Instead, the seller had been taxed on the annuity payments when they came out of the trust, effectively spreading out the taxes over a longer period.

The proposed regulations essentially would end the capital-gains tax deferral for these deals. Instead, a seller would be taxed on the full, fair-market value of the annuity at the time of the exchange. That means the seller's total capital gains would be taxable at the time of the deal, instead of over a period of years.

The move caught many tax advisers by surprise. "It definitely was a shocker," says Anthony March, chief trust adviser for the National Private Annuity Trust, in Kitty Hawk, N.C., who says the firm is scrambling to contact clients who haven't yet completed deals and help them consider other options for the sale of appreciated property. "We are basically reinventing ourselves today."

The changes were in part designed to curb deals that the IRS and Treasury felt were abusive. Still, the agencies recognize that property sometimes is exchanged for an annuity for valid nontax reasons, such as estate planning and passing down a closely-held business. The proposed regulations aren't intended to stop such transactions but to make sure that they are appropriately accounted for.

The new regulations would only affect new annuity transactions done later than yesterday. Certain deals that the IRS and Treasury feel "pose the least likelihood of abuse" have an even later effective date.

"We aren't going to be recommending any more private annuity trusts until the regulations are permanently voted in and the final version of those regulations are clarified," says Kevin McBarron, president of the National Association for Private Annuity Trusts in Irvine, Calif. "From now until then, we are not going to be doing any more business until we see that."

The IRS and Treasury say that sellers still will be able to use "installment sales," in which payments -- and taxes -- are made over a period of years.

For now, advisers say that private-annuity arrangements are likely to decline in popularity. "I think fewer people will do them," says Kevin McGrath, an Atlanta lawyer, who had been critical of the private-annuity trusts. But he says the new regulations may result in curbing many transactions that aren't abusive.

DOJ_NMG_0083094

"I think private annuity trusts are kaput because nobody wants to pay a tax upfront," says Stephan Leimberg, publisher of newsletters for tax professionals, who has published extensively on private-annuity transactions. Under the proposed regulations, "you've got the worst of all possible worlds -- you'll have a huge tax to pay and no cash to pay the tax."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

N.C. Testing Praised (WSJ)

Winston-Salem Journal, October 19, 2006

President Bush, speaking yesterday at a Greensboro elementary school, praised the high standards and testing requirements of the No Child Left Behind law, his signature public-education program.

"It can't do the teaching. It can't be a leader. But it can help people who care deeply about the life of a child to succeed," Bush told about 200 people at Falkener Elementary School.

Bush called on the U.S. Congress to reauthorize and strengthen No Child Left Behind, saying that it forces schools to identify students who are falling below grade level early in their educational careers. And, he said, it motivates teachers to improve the performance of those students.

He also defended the law's emphasis on standardized tests.

"I understand the debate - teaching to the test. No, you're teaching the child to read so they can pass a comprehensive test," Bush said. "If you don't test, you don't know. And if you don't know, you can't correct."

The president's one-day trip to Greensboro was his third visit to North Carolina this year. But he did not campaign for either of the state's two Republican congressmen who are facing stiff challenges from Democrats.

Before his speech, he ate lunch with community leaders at a barbecue restaurant in Greensboro, and afterward, he traveled to Randleman to visit Victory Junction Gang Camp, a camp for children with chronic illnesses.

Yesterday evening, Bush attended a fundraising dinner in Greensboro that raised an estimated $600,000 for the Republican National Committee. The money will be funneled to Republican candidates in close congressional races around the country, said Jim Culbertson, a retired Winston-Salem businessman who helped organize the fundraiser.

With Election Day less than three weeks away and Republicans fighting to retain control of Congress, Bush's decision to visit Greensboro was politically strategic, political experts said.

Rather than campaigning in a battleground state, he came to North Carolina, which has no U.S. Senate race this year and only two close House races, both in districts that Bush did not visit. But North Carolina has always been politically friendly to Bush and has been a strong fundraising state for him.

"North Carolina donors aren't tapped out already from a close Senate race and a number of competitive House races," said John Dinan, a political scientist at Wake Forest University.

In some competitive districts around the country, Dinan said, a Bush campaign visit would be seen as a liability for Republican candidates trying to distance themselves from the president. The most recent opinion polls have measured Bush's national approval rating at just under 40 percent.

"The Republican Party has been selective in deploying the president for visits," Dinan said. "For this particular president, it's true he was more of a draw in 2002 and 2004. It does appear that he's making fewer visits across the country than he did in the previous two congressional years."

When the president has traveled this year, he has focused more on private fundraisers than on public campaign appearances, Dinan said.

The two Republican House members in North Carolina facing competitive races - Robin Hayes of the 8th District, and Charles Taylor of the 11th District - did not attend Bush's speech. Hayes was expected to join Bush in Randleman and was expected to attend the fundraiser. Taylor was campaigning in his district all day.

Two Republican congressmen who were at the speech - Sen. Richard Burr and U.S. Rep. Virginia Foxx - took questions about whether Republicans are trying to separate themselves from Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0083095

"I don't think there's any member of the Republican delegation that would want to distance themselves from the president," said Foxx, who represents the 5th District that comprises most of Northwest North Carolina.

She said she made a special effort to be at the speech so as not to be perceived as avoiding the president.

In his 30-minute speech, Bush said he believes that learning to read is "a modern-day civil right," and he cited statistics showing that the achievement gap between white students and black and Hispanic students has narrowed since the passage five years ago of No Child Left Behind.

Improving American public schools is critical in a global economy, Bush said.

"If a child in China gets a good engineering degree, and a child in America doesn't, China's going to be more competitive in the 21st century," he said.

He also praised North Carolina for finding innovative ways to meet the requirements of No Child Left Behind. He portrayed Falkener, the school where he spoke, as an example of the law's effectiveness.

Falkener, which has a high percentage of poor students, has experienced a dramatic increase in its test scores since the law was enacted.

Under No Child Left Behind, schools are judged on whether they meet "adequate yearly progress," a term referring to how much improvement students in various subgroups demonstrate on standardized tests. Schools that repeatedly fail to make sufficient progress are at risk of being closed.

Proponents of the law say that it forces teachers to meet ambitious annual standards. Some educators critical of the law say that it gives too much weight to standardized tests and that Congress does not provide enough money for states to meet the law's requirements.

A fourth-grader who has a bad day on a standardized test could contribute to federally-mandated penalties for a school, said Mary Fulton, a policy analyst at the Education Commission of the States, a nonpartisan research group.

"That's going to affect how a school looks on No Child Left Behind, and is that fair?" she asked. "You can have a bad day and not do very well on your test. Are we placing too much emphasis on the exams, when they might just be a snapshot of what happens on one day?"

Fulton also questioned Bush's certainty that No Child Left Behind is responsible for educational improvements in particular schools, such as Falkener. Many local factors, such as tutoring programs or new teachers, also play a role, she said, and it's difficult to measure them all.

"It's very difficult to make these broad claims that it's improving student performance or closing achievement gaps. It might be, but there's a lot of other factors at play," she said.

The reauthorization of No Child Left Behind will be important, Fulton said, because it will allow Congress to make changes to the law based on how it has worked for its first five years.

Bush said he wants Congress to reauthorize the law next year, but Fulton said she expects Congress to wait until after the 2008 presidential election for political reasons.

Bush In N.C. (EDN)

By J. Brian Ewing

Eden Daily News, October 19, 2006

GREENSBORO - President Bush said Wednesday it would be a "huge mistake" if Congress failed to reauthorize the No Child Left Behind Act. Bush's comments came during a stop on his daylong tour of the Triad.

Originally passed with bi-partisan support, No Child Left Behind is set to expire next year, and sharp criticism from educators has placed its future on shaky ground.

The president spoke for nearly 30 minutes to a crowd of supporters, politicians and local educators in a small auditorium of Falkener Elementary. White House officials selected the magnet school to host the visit because annual test scores there have risen dramatically under No Child Left Behind.

No Child Left Behind uses federal funding to encourage states to test students and group their scores by race, gender, socioeconomic status and special needs. The program was one of the first initiatives for Bush after he took office in 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0083096

Twelve of Rockingham County's 25 schools, or 48 percent, met Adequate Yearly Progress during the 2002-03 school year. Scores improved the next school year, with 20 of 25 schools, or 80 percent, meeting AYP goals. Scores dropped in 2005, when only 12 schools made the goal. Preliminary scores for 2005-06 show 17 schools meeting AYP standards.

Reading scores for all grades were released in July. High school math scores were released Oct. 5, and remaining math scores will be released early next month. Final AYP results for the county will be available next month after math scores are finalized.

Bush defended the testing components of the initiative and stressed schools must be held accountable.

Opponents argue the initiative forces teachers to teach to a test, as opposed to taking a more comprehensive look at the subject.

"I understand the debate, you know, they're teaching to test. No, you're teaching a child to read so they can pass a comprehensive test," he said. "You know, if you don't test, you don't know."

Dr. Rodney Shotwell, Rockingham County schools superintendent, was at the school to watch Bush speak. Shotwell has mixed thoughts on the initiative, saying North Carolina had strong accountability components in place prior to No Child Left Behind. But, he said, there have been improvements because of the act.

"I think overall the accountability we have with our kids is better," Shotwell said. He said he is concerned about some of the standards No Child Left Behind places on schools to hire "highly qualified" teachers. Most notably, the program is credited with influencing the state's decision to shorten the number of years lateral-entry teachers have to become certified. The tougher rules have caused anxiety in a state in which many school districts struggle to find teachers.

"The problem is you need 12,000 new teachers every year, and the university system is only cranking out 4,000," Shotwell said.

The president said he is looking for additional funding for school tutors and bonuses for teachers whose students show improvement.

"If this school board decides they want to provide incentives for teachers based upon results, the federal government will provide money to help you do that. I like the idea."

Bush praised North Carolina for making strides toward meeting No Child Left Behind goals.

"Your state was the first in the nation to establish an accountability system, and one of the first to have the testing plans approved under No Child Left Behind," he said. "In other words, your state led. And I congratulate the state leaders and those involved with education for being bold on behalf of the children of your state."

Because of officials' willingness to work with No Child Left Behind, Bush said his administration was willing to work with North Carolina to ensure the accountability measurements were accurate.

"And so, in other words, we'll be rational and reasonable, but what we will not do is allow schools to lower standards," he said.

The president said North Carolina's fourth- and eighth-grade black students have some of the highest math scores in the nation. He said the achievement gap between white students and minority students is closing.

The achievement gap must close if the U.S. hopes to compete in a global economy, Bush said.

"Whether we like it or not, there is competition for jobs of the future."

Shotwell agrees.

"We have to view ourselves as the economic catalyst," he said. Shotwell said state and local officials need to realize that a well educated workforce will bring jobs to a community, and the only way public schools are able to educate that workforce is with better funding.

The president said he wants to see more standardized testing in high schools, too.

"I'm worried about high school, and I think the new law ought to focus a lot on high school," he said. Bush said he believes high school students should face the same amount of standardized testing as elementary school children, and the curricula should be equally scrutinized.

DOJ_NMG_0083097

Bush also lauded the state for its efforts to offer advance placement courses and the International Baccalaureate program. He said one of the goals of a renewed No Child Left Behind will be 70,000 teachers trained to teach advance-placement courses.

Bush didn't avoid talking about school relocation and vouchers, two of the most controversial aspects of the initiative. No Child Left Behind gives parents of students in schools that have failed to meet annual goals for three consecutive years the right to move their children to another school. The Washington D.C. school district began providing such vouchers, with support from federal money.

Opponents argue there will never be enough funding for all students, and public schools would only get worse, not better, if the vouchers were offered nationally.

Bush said he understands the obstacles educators face, and he believes No Child Left Behind will help.

"I understand what it means for public schools to guess whether or not a child can read and write, and add and subtract, and I understand fully the consequences of a system that guesses," he said. "A system which measures and corrects problems is a system which will help meet the great promise of this country."

Staff Writer J. Brian Ewing can be reached at jewing@edendailynews.com mailto:jewing@edendailynews.com> or 349-4331 ext. 24.

Bush Goes On Base-building Trip To N.C. (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

President Bush took a day off from the politics of national security Wednesday and went on a Southern charm offensive that included time with children, NASCAR drivers, devoted Republicans and some sweet tea.

Bush's return to his "compassionate conservative" roots came during a base-building trip to North Carolina, a state he won easily in both his presidential races. But even in the conservative South, many voters have grown unhappy with Bush's leadership with Iraq under continuing violence.

Bush did not mention those troubles while visiting with voters three weeks before Election Day, but focused on his education agenda and old-fashioned politicking with plenty of local flavor.

Noticeably missing on Bush's North Carolina itinerary were campaign stops with Reps. Charles Taylor and Robin Hayes, a pair of veteran Republicans facing spirited Democratic challenges that could help tip the balance of power in the House. He didn't go near their districts. Bush was to attend a fundraising dinner for the Republican National Committee at a private residence where no media coverage was allowed.

Rep. Howard Coble, who represents the district that includes the children's camp, told the News & Record of Greensboro this week that he wasn't sure what the political value of the visit would be.

"I'm not uncomfortable having him here," Coble told the newspaper. "I don't know that it helps. But it doesn't hurt and it might help. There are a lot of his supporters who are simply not happy with Iraq. I'm not happy about it. But that doesn't mean I dislike my president."

Bush greeted lunchtime diners at Stamey's, chatting into a cell phone that one man thrust into his hand. Then he ate a classic North Carolina lunch of barbecue pork and chicken, cole slaw, hush puppies, sweet tea and peach cobbler with vanilla ice cream.

At the school, Bush drew excited gasps from fifth grader Ta'kyria Woodard when he entered her class, and he leaned over and whispered in her ear to calm her. Then he went to the third grade computer lab and threw a presidential glare to silence some rambunctious boys. Turning to the cameras, Bush said, "Reminds me of my days in the class."

Bush's speech in the school's multipurpose room was the third event in as many weeks focusing on the classroom. Those speeches come as a series of school shootings in recent weeks have unnerved parents across the nation.

Bush's signature education bill, No Child Left Behind, is up for reauthorization next year. Congressional Democrats helped hand him a bipartisan victory with that law five years ago. But the politics have changed and a Democratic majority on Capitol Hill could make it tougher for Bush to get the law reapproved without increased funding and other work.

DOJ_NMG_0083098

Bush said the school is an example of why No Child Left Behind should be renewed. He said the percentage of third graders reading at grade level increased from 46 percent to 76 percent in four years.

"I think it would be a huge mistake for the United States Congress not to reauthorize this important piece of legislation," Bush said. "And the reason I say that is because it's working. We have achieved concrete results."

Later, Bush visited Victory Junction Gang Camp for critically ill children. The camp was created by NASCAR driver Kyle Petty and his wife, Pattie, in memory of their son Adam. Adam Petty was killed six years ago in a racetrack crash at 19 years old.

The kids aren't at the camp during the week in the fall, but four children came in for photo opportunties with the president — fishing and repairing a mock-up NASCAR. Bush also posed for pictures with the NASCAR drivers who came in — Kyle and Richard Petty, Michael Waltrip and Jimmie Johnson.

An Elon University poll last month showed slightly more disapprove than approve of the president in the state, 49 percent to 45 percent.

Bush ended his trip with a $900,000 fundraiser for the Republican National Committee at the home of Louis DeJoy, CEO of New Breed Inc. It was closed to the public and the media, but the RNC said 620 people bought tickets.

While Bush has expressed complete confidence that Republicans will keep control Congress, Vice President Dick Cheney said Tuesday that the GOP will hold the Senate and has "a good shot at holding the House."

White House spokesman Tony Snow said any suggestion that Cheney's confidence has diminished was "over-parsing."

___

Associated Press writer Tim Whitmire contributed to this report.

Bush Touts No Child Left Behind (UPI)

United Press International, October 19, 2006

GREENSBORO, N.C., Oct. 18 (UPI) -- President Bush in North Carolina called the No Child Left Behind Act a success, despite continuing questions about its effectiveness and desirability.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, with Bush at a Greensboro elementary school Wednesday, said the program holds schools "accountable for ensuring every child -- whether white, African-American, Hispanic or special education -- can read and do math at grade level by 2014."

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow denied the timing of the president's visit had any political motives.

"It's important to remind (people) that you've got a president who's pushing for higher standards and more resources," Snow told the daily press briefing en route to Greensboro.

The program is up for reauthorization in 2007 with a Congress that may be Democratically controlled.

Utah became the first state in 2005 to let school districts ignore provisions of the law if they conflict with state programs. The Department of Education has threatened to withhold federal education funding as a result.

Bush Touts Education Program (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

GREENSBORO, N.C. — President Bush on Wednesday renewed his efforts to win reauthorization of his signature education program when the new Congress begins work next year, and said he would not yield on one of its most controversial components: the requirement that standardized tests periodically measure students' progress.

"We'll be rational and reasonable, but what we will not do is allow schools to lower standards. And what we will not do is allow people to get rid of accountability systems," Bush said.

He spoke at a Greensboro magnet school, presenting its students' academic progress in recent years as evidence that the No Child Left Behind law was achieving its goals.

The measure expires at the end of next school year, but can be extended automatically if no changes are made.

No Child Left Behind, which Bush signed in January 2002, has become the centerpiece of his domestic social policy.

Critics, particularly Democrats, say that though the president speaks frequently about the law, he has not committed enough money to help pay for the requirements it imposes on schools.

DOJ_NMG_0083099

Two hours before Bush's appearance here, the Democratic National Committee sent an e-mail to reporters, citing a study by Democrats on the House Committee on Education and the Workforce. According to their figures, Bush has shortchanged funding for the legislation by $40 billion since the law took effect, and in the 2007 budget he proposed providing half of the money promised for the most disadvantaged students.

The president spoke at Waldo C. Falkener Elementary School, which offers a primary-school version of the International Baccalaureate program. Its student body is 98% nonwhite; 91% of the students receive free or discounted lunches.

Over four years, Bush said, the proportion of third-grade students reading at their grade level had gone from 46% to 76%. He attributed such gains to No Child Left Behind's demand that schools monitor progress with standardized tests and then act to correct deficiencies uncovered by the tests. Critics argue that "teaching to the test" does not necessarily prepare students to become engaged in a broader curriculum.

Bush spent much of the day in North Carolina. He joined politicians, local officials and business leaders for lunch at a local barbecue restaurant, where he ate pork and chicken, hush puppies, barbecue slaw, peach cobbler and vanilla ice cream.

Later, in Randleman, N.C., he visited the Victory Junction Gang Camp for children with chronic medical conditions or serious illnesses, and then spoke at a closed-door reception that was expected to raise $900,000 for the Republican National Committee.

Social Security Benefits To Rise In 2007 (AP-Y)

By Martin Crutsinger, Ap Economics Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

Social Security checks for nearly 49 million retirees are going up by 3.3 percent next year — an average increase of $33 per month, though rising health care costs will take a bite out of the gain.

The monthly benefit for the typical retiree will rise to $1,044 from an average of $1,011 this year.

The cost of living adjustment announced Wednesday by the Social Security Administration will go to more than 53 million people. Nearly 49 million receive Social Security benefits and the rest Supplemental Security Income payments aimed at the poor.

The 3.3 percent increase compares with a 4.1 percent benefit rise in for 2006, which had been the biggest increase in 15 years.

Benefit payments, which have been tied to inflation since 1975, surged by double-digit amounts in the high-inflation years of 1980 and 1981 but increases have been more moderate in recent years as the Federal Reserve has had more success keeping inflation under control.

The COLA amount is based on the change in the Consumer Price Index from the July-September quarter of this year compared with the same quarter in 2005.

Last year, prices surged in September, reflecting a big spike in energy costs after Hurricane Katrina.

But this year, energy prices, which initially leaped because of rising Mideast tensions, have been falling since late summer. Those declines helped pull consumer prices down by 0.5 percent in September, the biggest drop in 10 months.

Falling energy prices should help retirees deal with winter heating bills, which for the first time in a number of years are expected to be lower this winter.

The average retired couple, both receiving Social Security benefits, will see their monthly check go from $1,658 to $1,713.

The standard SSI payment will go from $603 to $623 per month for an individual, and from $904 to $934 for a couple.

The average monthly check for a disabled worker will rise from $947 to $979.

Eleven million taxpayers will pay higher taxes next year because the maximum amount of Social Security earnings subject to the payroll tax will rise from $94,200 to $97,500. In all, an estimated 163 million workers will pay Social Security taxes in 2007.

The $33 per month average monthly increase for Social Security retirees in 2007 compares with a $39 rise for 2006.

Part of the 2007 gain will be eaten up by a $5 increase in the payments retirees must make for Medicare Part B insurance, which pays for their doctors' visits and other outpatient care.

DOJ_NMG_0083100

The increase will push the monthly premium for most Medicare recipients to $93.50, a rise of 5.6 percent. But that is down from the double-digit increases over the past three years when health care costs far outpaced overall inflation.

About 1.5 million Medicare beneficiaries, those making more than $80,000 annually, will pay an additional $12.50 to $68.60 per month above the $93.50 premium. As part of the 2003 drug benefit law, higher-income Medicare patients for the first time will face a larger premium based on a sliding scale.

"Seniors are being asked to foot more and more of the bill while the larger issue of controlling runaway health care costs languishes largely ignored in Washington," said Barbara Kennelly, president of the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare.

The administration has said the monthly premium for prescription drug coverage, known as Part D, should average $24 next year, the same as this year, a forecast Democrats contend is misleading. They estimate that the bulk of Medicare recipients are in drug plans which will increase on average by about $5 per month.

Still, economists said most seniors will be facing better prospects in terms of inflation in 2007 than last year, when the price of natural gas and home heating oil were soaring.

Advocates for the elderly said that the cost of living adjustment was a critical safety net for the nearly one-third of retirees who rely on Social Security for 90 percent or more of their income.

"The fundamental value of Social Security is becoming even more critical as America's traditional pension system declines," said David Sloane, government relations director for AARP, which represents people 50 and older. "The COLA is critical for maintaining purchasing power over time."

President Bush, who pledged to make overhaul of Social Security and Medicare top priorities in his second term, has failed to make headway in Congress with a plan to offer private savings accounts for younger workers.

Democrats said Wednesday Bush will have to drop the idea of partially privatizing Social Security if he wants to get any legislation passed in his last two years in office.

"Social Security's guarantee continues to be threatened by the president and his congressional allies, who believe in a privatization scheme that would over time eliminate Social Security's guaranteed benefit for most people," said Rep. Sander Levin, D-Mich.

___

On the Net:

Social Security Administration: http://www.socialsecurity.gov

Social Security Benefits To Increase 3.3% (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 18 (AP) — Social Security checks for nearly 49 million retirees will go up by 3.3 percent next year, an average increase of $33 a month.

The monthly benefit for the typical retiree will rise to $1,044, from an average of $1,011 this year.

The increase, a cost of living adjustment announced Wednesday by the Social Security Administration, will go to more than 53 million people.

Nearly 49 million of those people receive Social Security benefits; the rest receive Supplemental Security Income benefits, aimed at the poor.

The increase for 2006 was 4.1 percent, which had been the biggest increase in 15 years.

Benefit payments, which have been tied to inflation since 1975, surged by double-digit amounts in the high-inflation years of 1980 and 1981, but increases have been more moderate in recent years as the Federal Reserve has had more success keeping inflation under control.

Social Security Raise For Elderly And Disabled (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083101

WASHINGTON — Elderly and disabled Social Security beneficiaries will receive a cost-of-living increase next year of 3.3%, or $33 a month, for the average recipient, the government announced today.

Supplemental Security Income benefits for the elderly and disabled poor will rise by a like amount.

The payroll tax rate that supports Social Security will remain at 12.4%, shared equally by employers and employees. But the wage base to which the tax applies will rise from $94,200 this year to $97,500 in 2007.

AARP, the nation's largest organization representing seniors, welcomed the benefit increase, calling it "the only lifelong hedge against inflation for most Americans in retirement today."

The cost-of-living adjustment, AARP said, "is particularly critical for the nearly one-third of beneficiaries who rely on Social Security for almost all their income."

The benefit increase in 2007 is dictated by the rise in the consumer price index from July through September of 2005 to the same three months of 2006. The Labor Department, in its monthly report on consumer inflation issued today, pegged that figure at 3.3%.

In 2006, Social Security benefits were adjusted upward by 4.1%, the largest increase in 15 years.

The Social Security Administration said the 3.3% raise would apply to the benefits of 49 million elderly and disabled recipients of regular Social Security benefits and 7 million Supplemental Security Income recipients. Because of overlaps, more than 53 million persons will enjoy one or the other of the benefit increases, or both.

For a single person, the average monthly Social Security benefit will rise from $1,011 today to $1,044 starting in January. For a couple, the average will rise from $1,658 to $1,713.

The increase in wages to which the Social Security payroll tax applies depends on the increase in average wages, which is usually greater than price inflation. The increase in the wage base in 2007 will be 3.5%.

The payroll tax also contains a 2.9% component, split by employer and employee, to support the Medicare program. The Medicare tax applies to all wages without limit.

Social Security Checks To Rise 3.3% In 2007 (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Social Security checks will be going up by 3.3% in 2007, a smaller percentage gain than this year because inflation was lower, the Social Security Administration said.

The cost-of-living adjustment will translate into an average monthly increase of $33 for the typical retiree, pushing the average monthly benefit to $1,044 from $1,011 currently. The cost-of-living adjustment is pegged to the September consumer-price index.

Separately, the Internal Revenue Service announced inflation adjustments to various limits on employer-sponsored, tax-advantaged retirement plans. The ceiling on wages diverted to 401(k) plans, for instance, will go to $15,500 from $15,000.

The Social Security cost-of-living increase will go to more than 53 million people who receive Social Security and Supplemental Security Income payments. The 3.3% increase compares with a 4.1% rise in monthly benefits for 2006, which had been the biggest increase in 15 years. Social Security benefits have been adjusted automatically for inflation each year since 1975.

Government Retirement Benefits To Rise 3.3% (WP)

By Nell Henderson And Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

Social Security retirement and disability payments to nearly 49 million people, as well as pensions for millions of federal retirees, will rise 3.3 percent in January to help recipients keep up with inflation, the government said yesterday.

The change will boost average monthly Social Security retirement benefits by $33, to $1,044.

More than one in six people in the United States receive federal benefits that will increase because of the annual cost-of-living adjustment. The change provides an important boost each year to the economy of the Washington area, which is home to hundreds of thousands of retired federal workers and members of the military.

DOJ_NMG_0083102

Federal retirees covered by the Civil Service Retirement System and people who receive military and Foreign Service annuities will also receive the 3.3 percent increase.

Federal workers who retired under the newer Federal Employees Retirement System and who are 62 or older will receive a 2.3 percent cost-of-living increase in their pensions, under the separate rules for that program.

About 330,000 federal retirees and spouses of deceased retirees live in the District, Maryland and Virginia, and 189,168 military retirees live in the region. Nationwide, there are more than 2.4 million federal retirees and about 1.9 million military retirees.

More than 7 million recipients of Supplemental Security Income, which is provided to low-income people, will also receive 3.3 percent increases. That change will take effect slightly sooner, on Dec. 29.

The adjustment that goes into effect in January will be smaller than the 4.1 percent boost granted in January this year, mostly because the recent decline in fuel prices has driven down inflation. Still, because inflation was relatively high for most of the past year, the 3.3 percent cost-of-living change will be the second-highest in six years.

While Social Security recipients will receive bigger benefits next year, about 11 million people will pay more in Social Security taxes because the maximum annual earnings subject to the payroll tax will increase to $97,500 from $94,200, the government said. About 163 million workers pay the tax.

The annual cost-of-living adjustments are announced after the federal budget year ends Sept. 30, and after the Labor Department has calculated inflation in September.

Inflation fell sharply last month, primarily because of lower prices for gasoline and other fuels. The Labor Department said its consumer price index declined 0.5 percent last month, the steepest monthly drop since November.

Fuel prices rose over most of the past year, but have fallen since mid-August, leaving the price index 2.1 percent higher in September than in September 2005. The cost-of-living adjustment is based on a slightly different version of the price index that gives greater weight to energy prices.

Lower fuel prices help the economy by easing inflation pressures and boosting consumers' buying power, enabling them to spend less at the pump and more at the mall, the market and elsewhere. But details in the Labor Department report showed other inflation pressures evident in rents, hotel rates and prices for clothing, medical care, education and other items.

The Census Bureau, in a separate report yesterday, said builders broke ground on more new projects than in the month before, but also sought fewer permits for future construction.

Together, the various figures provided "a mixed picture" of an economy in which lower fuel prices are benefiting consumers at a time when the housing market is still weakening and other inflation pressures remain strong, said Ethan S. Harris, chief U.S. economist at Lehman Brothers Inc. "A very well-timed drop in energy prices is providing a nice offset to the gloom and doom coming out of the housing market," he said.

Stock prices rose after the price report strengthened analysts' expectations that consumers will keep spending in the months ahead -- and that Federal Reserve policymakers will hold interest rates steady when they meet next Tuesday and Wednesday. The Dow Jones industrial average rose briefly above 12,000 points yesterday, an all-time high, but closed at 11,992.68, up 42.66.

Federal Reserve policymakers have welcomed the fall in fuel prices, but remain concerned about other inflation pressures. They look to core measures of price increases, excluding volatile food and fuel prices, for a sense of the economy's underlying inflation rate. The core price index rose 0.2 percent last month and 2.9 percent in the year that ended in September, the highest 12-month rate in 10 years.

Several Fed policymakers, including Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, have said in recent weeks that they expect slowing economic growth to weaken inflation in the months ahead. But they remain worried that price increases may continue at an unacceptable rate.

The central bankers left their benchmark short-term interest rate unchanged at their last meeting, in September. But they saw "substantial risk" that inflation might not decline as expected, and thought that more interest rate increases might be necessary to tame prices, minutes of the meeting showed.

DOJ_NMG_0083103

The high core inflation figures for September are likely to heighten worries at the Fed, said Alan Ruskin, chief international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital. "The Fed is not out of the woods and will have to continue to talk tough" on inflation," he said.

Workers' average pay rose faster than prices last month. Average weekly earnings for most workers rose 1 percent, the biggest monthly increase in more than three years, after adjusting for inflation, the Labor Department said in a separate report.

Those wages were also 2.2 percent higher in September than a year earlier, after adjusting for inflation, the biggest 12-month increase in nearly eight years. These are the wages earned by factory workers and non-managerial service industry workers, who together make up 80 percent of the labor force.

Cost Of Living, A Fickle Formula (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

Federal retirees, many on fixed incomes, look forward to the annual COLA announcement. But whether the cost-of-living adjustments keep pace with health-care costs, property taxes and rising prices is not an easy calculation.

Larry Daks , a retired Foreign Service officer in Northern Virginia, said his pension increase should help him cope with rising consumer prices, assuming his health-care costs remain reasonable.

"I like to see a COLA every year," Daks said, adding that it reinforced "a sense that the government has sort of a contract with us and is trying to do something for us every year."

But Gerald Cornell of Burtonsville, who worked for the Internal Revenue Service and served in the military, said his health-insurance company has scheduled a sharp jump in premiums for next year that will drain his COLA dry.

"The average person is going backward," he said.

Yesterday's announcement of a Social Security COLA increase triggered adjustments for government retirees, raising the average annuity in one of the largest pension programs, the Civil Service Retirement System, by $80 a month.

Government employees are covered by a number of retirement systems. To pass along COLAs, the systems use salary-based formulas to determine annuities and rules, which have been modified by Congress in some years. Federal employees covered by older retirement programs typically receive a pension considered generous by private-sector standards, while employees hired after 1984 receive a smaller pension and Social Security income, and may enroll in a 401(k)-type savings program.

For 2007, retirees covered by the Civil Service Retirement System, regular military retirees and many Foreign Service officers will receive a 3.3 percent COLA.

People who retired under the newer Federal Employees Retirement System and are 62 or older will receive a 2.3 percent COLA. The smaller COLA also will go to some military retirees and some Foreign Service officers.

The average annuity under the old Civil Service Retirement System will increase to $2,532 from $2,452 per month, the Office of Personnel Management said. The average monthly retirement check for FERS retirees will rise to $916 from $896 next year, the OPM said.

There are about 2.4 million federal retirees, with about 330,000 retirees and survivors in the District, Virginia and Maryland.

The average monthly retirement payment for the military will be $1,705 next year, though average monthly retiree military pay next year will be higher in Virginia ($2,277) and Maryland ($1,859), according to Pentagon data.

Nationwide, there are about 1.94 million military retirees, with 189,168 in the District, Virginia and Maryland.

State Department officials said computations were not available on COLAs for the Foreign Service but estimated that monthly payments to about 6,100 retired officers and surviving spouses in the Washington area would average $4,384 next year. Nationwide, there are 14,328 retired Foreign Service officers.

Many federal retirees continue to work after leaving the government, and some move from the Washington area in a bid to stretch their retirement income.

DOJ_NMG_0083104

Virginia A. Broadbent moved to Orange, Va., from Alexandria after retiring from the Agriculture Department in 1994. "Quite clearly I could obtain a better house at a lower price here at the time I bought," she said. "I would be living in a hovel if I was living in the D.C. area."

But she is worried that property tax rates in Orange will increase this year, cutting into her CSRS pension. "I have become more cautious and concerned about money. I would love to see a COLA that kept pace with the cost of living in a more realistic sense," she said.

Broadbent said a COLA of "4 to 5 percent would seem nicer to me" and noted that she is thinking of returning to work on a part-time basis.

Kleeman never stopped working. Her government career included about 20 years at the Government Accountability Office, a congressional agency, and she left federal service in 1994 to join George Washington University as a distinguished executive in residence, teaching and helping students plan their careers.

While in government, she was covered by CSRS and FERS, which gives her a mixed COLA. Her retirement benefits are "certainly generous," she said, but noted that many federal employees will need to invest wisely in the Thrift Savings Plan, their 401(k)-type program, to achieve a comfortable retirement.

"I don't think I will get rich on the 3.3," she quipped, adding, on a more somber note, that "very few people now in government service are going to be able to leave a large inheritance."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

Band on the run

"I play the flute, sax and guitar, and I'll be playing all three Saturday night," White House spokesman Tony Snow told Inside the Beltway yesterday.

The obvious next question: Where does he find the time?

Much has been written of late about Mr. Snow and his myriad gigs. When not speaking on behalf of the president of the United States, he's taking the unprecedented step for a White House press secretary and appearing at Republican fundraisers across the country.

And, we didn't need to remind him, awaiting his arrival at home are his wife, three children and a host of pets.

"We're down to one guinea pig, one cat and two dogs," Mr. Snow said. "Look, my family always comes first. And my wife and kids will all be there Saturday night."

He was referring to a charity concert his rock 'n' roll band, Beats Workin', will perform at the Old Town Theater on King Street in Alexandria. (The show, from 8 p.m. to midnight, is $35 and includes a food buffet and a cash bar. Tickets can be reserved at www.oldtowntheater.com.)

"We're a cover band. We play stuff from the '60s, '70s, '80s and a little bit of the '50s," Mr. Snow said. And yes, the band has its groupies.

"Everybody pulls for a bunch of old guys who can still play rock 'n' roll," he said. "Mostly I'll be playing guitar on Saturday night. That's when the people will see me let it all out."

So he finds music to be a stress reliever?

"Yes, although I'm just getting back with the band," Mr. Snow said. "After my [serious bout with] cancer last year I was out the whole time. I played with the band a few weeks ago, and I'm still working back into the starting rotation."

Given the many hats he's worn -- most recently host of the "Tony Snow Show" on Fox News Radio; "Weekend Live With Tony Snow" and "Fox News Sunday" on the Fox News Channel; syndicated columnist; presidential speechwriter; and newspaperman (including editorial page editor of The Washington Times) -- where does Mr. Snow see himself in five years?

"I don't have a clue. But I see myself in five minutes on Marine One," Mr. Snow replied, darting out of his West Wing office to board the presidential helicopter.

Mrs. Laura

DOJ_NMG_0083105

We always eagerly await the newest Talking Presidents doll.

There's the Ronald Reagan talking doll ("Mr. Gorbachev, tear down this wall"), the George W. Bush doll ("Working hard to put food on your family"), George Bush ("Read my lips") and Donald H. Rumsfeld ("The only choice one has is to proceed").

The newest talking doll, just in time for Christmas, is "Dr. Laura" ("I am my kids' mom").

Laura Schlessinger, of course, is a popular radio personality and best-selling author of 14 books. As a doll, Mrs. Schlessinger stands 11 inches tall and is packaged in a display box that includes photos from her personal collection.

(No doubt Inside the Beltway will be hearing again from Mrs. Schlessinger. The last time we included her in our column she wrote back, numerous times, to complain -- OK, she went ballistic -- because we didn't place "Dr." before her name. We explained to her that the newspaper's writing style recognizes only medical doctors with the honorific, but she refused to listen.

(So much for being "the kind of person you'd like to come home to every day" -- as she preaches on her show.)

PR ladies

There are three finalists for the 2006 Washington PR Woman of the Year award, as determined by the Washington Women in Public Relations: Kristen Grimm, president and founder of Spitfire Strategies; Margery Kraus, president and chief executive officer of APCO Worldwide; and Marilynn Deane Mendell, president of Win Spin CIC Inc.

The winner will be crowned Nov. 15 at a Mayflower Hotel awards luncheon honoring all three finalists. Good luck, ladies.

Yo, Frankie

What Washington event this weekend would bring together a pair of Supreme Court justices, a baseball legend, a famous crooner and a couple of seasoned Hollywood actors?

Given their surnames, it would be the annual convention and awards gala of the National Italian American Foundation (NIAF).

Newly appointed Supreme Court Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. will be receiving a special achievement award from his colleague, Justice Antonin Scalia, while Chrysler Group CEO and President Tom LaSorda will receive achievement honors from baseball great Tommy Lasorda. Other awards will be presented to, among others, singer Frankie Valli and philanthropist Catherine Reynolds.

In addition, actor and director Mel Brooks will be at the Hilton Washington & Towers to represent his late wife, actress Anne Bancroft, who will be posthumously inducted into the NIAF Italian American Hall of Fame by actor Alan Alda.

Congress's Dismal Grades (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

The editors of National Journal, a respected and independent Washington publication, had the smart idea of inviting 11 distinguished economists to fill out a score card on the economic performance of the Republican Congress. The grades are published in the latest issue of the weekly magazine.

The economists were asked to score Congress in seven categories, using letter grades. The composite score of four categories was a C, meaning average by historical standards. Two got a B-minus and one a D. Not exactly a huge vote of confidence.

Who were these 11 judges? National Journal describes them as "prominent 'nonaligned' economists -- people who, by virtue of their work and long careers outside of politics, have earned reputations for delivering unvarnished analysis of economic policy."

Their individual credentials are impressive. "Ethan Harris, Maury Harris, Allen Sinai, and David Wyss are well known on Wall Street," the editors write. "Nariman Behravesh of Global Insight is one of the most respected economic forecasters. Lyle Gramley is a former governor on the Federal Reserve Board, and Michael Mussa is former research director at the International Monetary Fund. Edward Leamer is director of the Business Forecast Project at UCLA's Anderson School of Management, and James F. Smith is a professor at the Kenan-Flagler Business School at the University of North Carolina. David Lereah is a longtime chief economist at the National Association of Realtors. Victor Zarnowitz has long worked at the Conference Board, the business group that issues closely watched numbers on consumer confidence and leading economic indicators, and he serves on the committee of economists that decides when recessions begin and end."

DOJ_NMG_0083106

Short-term fiscal policy grades averaged out at B-minus. Gramley and Sinai gave it an A and A-minus, largely because the tax cuts had stimulated investment and productivity. Five others put it down around C, because so little revenue growth was channeled into reducing budget deficits.

The only other category that rated an overall B-minus was government regulation. The range of grades was small, with only one D and seven at or near B. The reason: The economists applaud restraint. As Lereah said, "Less regulation is usually better than more."

That's about all the good news. In long-term growth and competitiveness, the grade was C. No one gave it more than a B-minus, largely because the tax cuts were passed without reforms and because congressional efforts to improve education and training of the workforce seemed feeble.

International economic policy also was graded C. In the face of rising balance-of-payments deficits -- a key measure of economic activity between countries -- major trade initiatives have stalled. Although radical protectionist measures have been rejected, Congress has balked at bigger steps to open international markets, the economists said.

Congress was given a C for its economic leadership, and the same grade for its overall economic performance. Aside from cutting taxes, the lawmakers did little to help or harm the economy. They balked at tax reform and Social Security reform but made some improvements in pension reliability. Overall, this Congress was no better or worse than most of its predecessors, the graders said.

But there was one area where they said Congress failed and failed badly. That was long-term fiscal policy. There were five F's, three D's and no grade higher than a B-minus, for a composite grade of D. Speaking of the long-term liabilities of Medicare and Social Security, Gramley told National Journal, "Congress and the administration are not facing" reality. Behravesh called the response to those long-term deficits "quite irresponsible."

Does all this add up to a case for or against the Republican Congress? The economists were not asked that question, but most of their comments convey support for the Bush tax cuts and opposition to the trade restrictions favored by many Democrats.

Still, a chart that is part of the National Journal story gives pause. It compares the economic performance of the first 5 1/2 years of this Bush administration with identical periods under Presidents Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton. Personal income after inflation and taxes rose 22.7 percent under Reagan, 20.4 percent under Clinton and only 14.1 percent under Bush.

That's certainly not a C, and it may not even be a passing grade.

Catching Conflicts At The FDA (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

A GUILTY PLEA FROM FORMER FDA Commissioner Lester M. Crawford shows that the ethics guardians are making some progress against conflicts of interest at the Food and Drug Administration. Now they need to delve deeper into ethical lapses at the agency, which has been suffering a crisis of confidence.

Crawford, who resigned as commissioner a little more than a year ago, pleaded guilty Tuesday to lying to investigators about stock he owned in companies that were regulated by the FDA. Yet, according to one study, more than a fourth of the experts who sit on the FDA's advisory panels, which review the safety and effectiveness of drugs, have potential economic stakes in drugs they consider.

Other independent reports have found that regulators often ignored safety experts and refused to move against drugs that showed signs of serious side effects. That's one reason Vioxx, despite its heart risks, remained on pharmacy shelves long after it should have been pulled. Political pressure also has weighed on the agency, which dithered about approving over-the-counter sales of Plan B, the morning-after contraceptive pill, despite its positive ratings from agency scientists.

Current legislation to make drug evaluators and safety experts work together more closely, and to give the safety side more autonomy, would take the agency one step forward. But Congress should take the opportunity to impose more comprehensive reforms next year when it reconsiders the user fees that provide much of the FDA's funding.

DOJ_NMG_0083107

Reforms will require striking a sensible balance between the need for expertise and tolerance for conflict. The agency needs specialists well versed in the substances it regulates, but such people often gain their expertise by working or consulting for drug companies. One way to mitigate such conflicts of interest is to require disclosure — and recusal when there is a meaningful conflict.

The FDA also has suffered from both a literal and metaphorical lack of leadership, spending most of the last two years under acting and interim commissioners. The current acting commissioner, Texas surgeon Andrew C. von Eschenbach, is a solid replacement for Crawford. He deserves to be confirmed by Congress so that the FDA can turn its full attention to regaining the public's confidence and protecting its health.

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Cracks 12,000, Sets Another Record (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, October 19, 2006

NEW YORK — Another day, another record-breaking milestone on Wall Street, as the Dow Jones industrial average finally cracked the 12,000 barrier Wednesday for the first time and hit a fresh all-time high.

The Dow, which has set highs in eight of its past 12 sessions, was unable to close above 12,000, and finished up 42.66 points, or 0.4%, to 11,992.68. The Dow crossed 12,000 for the first time 34 seconds into trading, Dow Jones Indexes says, and hit a record intraday high of 12,049.51 roughly 14 minutes later as investors reacted positively to a strong earnings report late Tuesday from tech titan and Dow stock IBM.

The Standard & Poor's 500 gained 1.91 points, or 0.1%, to 1365.96. The Nasdaq composite fell 7.80 points, or 0.3%, to close at 2337.15. The broad S&P 500 reached an intraday high at 1372.87, its highest in nearly six years, but the momentum faded.

As is often the case when major market indexes near milestones, such as new highs or big round numbers like Dow 12,000, the nation's oldest stock index has come under selling pressure as investors gauge whether to buy or sell stocks at peak prices.

“Traders trade around big numbers,” says Stuart Freeman, chief equity strategist at A.G. Edwards. “If it breaks through, traders will run it higher; if it doesn't they will trade it lower.”

Freeman says the Dow hitting 12,000, or 11,000 or 13,000, is not significant. What is significant for investors, he says, is to measure the prices of stocks relative to earnings at current levels. And if you do that, he says, it's clear that stocks are trading at much cheaper valuations than they were the last time the Dow peaked, back in January 2000. At that peak, he says the broad U.S. market was trading at nearly 30 times expected earnings. Now, stocks' valuations are about half of the peak's level.

Driving the rally Wednesday was a benign report on inflation at the consumer level and more strong third-quarter earnings gains posted by U.S. companies. (Earnings, 1-2B; CPI report, 3B.) IBM, which rose $2.87 to $89.82 after reporting a 50% jump in profit, was a big boost to the Dow. The Dow is price-weighted, so when high-priced stocks do well, it has a disproportionate impact on the Dow's gain.

Highlights:

Johnson & Johnson, another Dow stock, rose $2.07 to $68.15 after the drug and consumer products giant raised its 2006 forecast.

GOP Tries To Shift Focus To Economy (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

The Foley scandal has dropped off the front pages and House Republicans are aggressively trying to shift attention in the final weeks of the campaign season to the healthy economy and the damage they say would be done if Democrats take control of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0083108

"Today's record-setting stock market rally is proof that Republican economic policies of tax relief work," said House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois. He hailed the Dow Jones Industrial Average passage of the 12,000 mark, which he said was largely a result of efforts by the Republican-controlled Congress to cut taxes and streamline government regulation.

"If Democrats had their way, they would erase stock market gains by raising taxes and stalling the economy, destroying job growth and putting leaders in place that are in favor of tax increases," Mr. Hastert said. "In fact, if the Democratic majority blocked our efforts at making tax relief permanent, Nancy Pelosi and the leadership would raise taxes on hardworking American families with two children by at least $2,000."

Republicans issued a list of initiatives that they fear would gain traction under a Democrat-led Congress.

Among them is H.R. 3760, which would create the Department of Peace. Authored by Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, Ohio Democrat, the Department of Peace and Nonviolence Act has 74 co-sponsors.

Also listed is H.R. 4683, which essentially would nationalize health care by expanding Medicare to cover all Americans.

Others Democratic proposals they cited included eliminating mandatory minimum sentences for selling crack cocaine, allowing felons to vote, federal regulation of restaurant menus and a "bill of welfare rights" that would grant protections to those on welfare.

"This list of the bills," said Majority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri, "would be great fodder for the late-night talk show hosts if it weren't true. Instead, it's just plain scary."

Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, yesterday restated her belief that the House needs new leadership.

"Republicans are determined to stay the course with their failed policies that have taken America in the wrong direction," she said. "As our economy continues to leave middle-class families behind, the war in Iraq spirals out of control, and charges of corruption and scandal swirl in Congress, the American people believe it is time for a change -- not Republican business as usual."

If Democrats win control, Mrs. Pelosi said, "we will turn the most closed and corrupt Congress in history into the most open and honest. We will take our nation in a new direction by restoring truth and trust to the halls of power with our honest leadership, open government act."

Lower Energy Prices Help Consumer Price Index Decline 0.5% (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

Rapidly falling energy prices helped push consumer prices down sharply last month, the government reported yesterday.

But the decline did not entirely dispel inflation worries because the measure of retail prices that excludes volatile food and energy costs held steady at a level above the Federal Reserve's comfort zone.

Wall Street — already energized by stronger-than-expected profits from I.B.M. and Intel and construction data that showed a steep drop in building permits — saw the latest evidence as an encouraging sign that the Fed will keep interest rates unchanged for now. The central bank's policy setting committee will meet next week to review short-term lending rates, currently at 5.25 percent.

Stocks surged at the start of trading yesterday and the Dow Jones industrial average leapt past 12,000 for the first time. The exuberance was short-lived, however. The blue-chip index retreated later in the morning, ending the day up 42.66 points, at 11,992.68.

The federal government also announced that Social Security payments, which are based on changes in the Consumer Price Index over the previous 12 months, will increase 3.3 percent in 2007.

For the 53 million Americans that receive Social Security checks, that will raise the average monthly payment by $33, the Social Security Administration said.

While overall consumer prices fell last month by 0.5 percent, the core Consumer Price Index, which excludes food and energy, rose by 0.2 percent. It was the third consecutive month that the core index grew by 0.2 percent and an indication to many economists that underlying inflation may be peaking.

DOJ_NMG_0083109

With core prices up 2.9 percent compared with last September, well above the 1.5 percent to 2.5 percent level that central bankers consider ideal, the economists cautioned that it is still not clear whether the Fed will have more tightening to do next year.

"The fundamentals for inflation still look mildly unfriendly," said Ethan Harris, chief United States economist for Lehman Brothers. "When people talk about inflation turning, they're forgetting about the lags. Inflation doesn't turn with the economy. It usually takes a couple of quarters."

As the economy continues to slow, the Federal Reserve's forecast is that inflation will slow as well. The central bank has said that slower growth, led by a decline in the housing market, will help pull inflation back down to tolerable levels.

Indeed, a report from the Commerce Department showed yesterday that building permits fell by 6.3 percent in September, to the lowest rate since October 2001.

The number of housing starts last month increased 5.9 percent.

The rise in new home construction did surprise economists, but it is not likely to foreshadow any immediate bounce-back in residential construction. Construction activity is often volatile for a number of reasons, particularly the weather.

Building permits, therefore, are considered to be a better barometer of the strength of the housing industry because they measure how much demand builders are expecting.

"Even a cursory glance at the awful permits numbers should disabuse all but the most incurable optimists" of the notion that the new housing market will improve soon, Ian Shepherdson, chief United States economist with High Frequency Economics, wrote in a research report.

In another sign that investors do not believe the Fed will raise rates any further, interest rates on long-term bonds fell yesterday for the third consecutive day. And that view was echoed by several Wall Street analysts.

"The surge in core inflation is abating," a team of economists from Goldman Sachs wrote in a research report.

As long as future inflation readings do not look any worse than yesterday's report, and economic growth continues to slow at a moderate pace, the Fed can afford to wait for the effects of two years of interest rate increases to take hold.

Most economists believe that when the Fed gathers next week, it will leave interest rates untouched for the third time in a row.

"From the Fed's point of view, slower growth opens up a little bit of a gap," said Stuart G. Hoffman, chief economist with PNC Financial.

The Labor Department report showed that on a seasonally adjusted basis, consumer prices rose at slower rates in September on a number of goods and services like clothing, food and household furnishings.

The price of transportation, including gasoline and vehicle purchases, was the only major category of the price index that actually declined in September.

High rental costs kept the core price index elevated in September. Compared with September a year ago, housing prices, which are tied to a measure of rents rather than what homes are actually selling for, rose 4.1 percent, faster than any other component of the index except medical care.

In a separate report, the Labor Department said that the average weekly earnings for ordinary workers, adjusted for inflation, rose by 1 percent in September. Average hourly earnings rose 0.2 percent.

Consumer Prices Fall, But Core Measure Inches Higher (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

Falling gasoline prices pushed overall consumer prices lower in September, significantly increasing Americans' purchasing power, but underlying data signaled plenty of inflation hazards ahead.

Meanwhile, the nation's home builders stepped up construction last month, defying signs of a weakening housing market. But a sharp decline in building permits points to softening in residential construction in the months ahead.

DOJ_NMG_0083110

Consumer prices fell 0.5% in September, led by a 13.5% plunge in gasoline prices, the Labor Department said. Excluding food and energy, the department's "core" measure of consumer prices rose 0.2% for the third consecutive month. This measure is closely monitored by Federal Reserve policy makers because it gives a clearer picture of underlying activity.

Many economists said the modest rise in core prices is another sign that inflation is retreating enough to dissuade the Federal Reserve from changing interest rates anytime soon. "We may have seen the peak of this inflation scare," said Mark Vitner, a senior economist at Wachovia Corp., of Charlotte, N.C.

September was the first month this year that overall consumer prices didn't rise, and it relieved some of the pressure on consumers' pocketbooks. The average worker's weekly pay outpaced inflation by 1% in September; inflation-adjusted wages last month were up 2.2% from a year ago.

The latest figures tentatively suggest that the economic scenario of slower expansion and reduced inflation sought by the Fed is playing out. "We are in the midst of a near picture-perfect soft landing," said Bernard Baumohl, executive director of the Economic Outlook Group, of Princeton Junction, N.J. "What's most interesting from the latest set of reports is that this economy may be ready to take off again by mid-2007."

Price gains could reaccelerate if gasoline prices rebound or the economy gains more momentum, and inflation is far stronger than the Fed would like it to be. The Labor Department's measure of core consumer prices in September was up 2.9% from a year ago, outpacing the 2.1% rise in prices overall. Similarly, the Commerce Department's core price indicator, the personal-consumption expenditure price index -- the Fed's preferred inflation gauge -- rose 0.2% in August and was 2.5% higher than a year earlier.

Both measures show core inflation running at its fastest clip in more than 10 years, and well above the Fed's presumed comfort zone of between a 1% and 2% rate. The Fed has indicated it can tolerate higher-than-usual levels of core inflation for the short term, but any further acceleration could prompt it to raise interest rates.

That means core inflation must slow somewhat from its current trend of 0.2% monthly gains before the Fed is satisfied that inflation risks are abating. Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., of New York, said if core inflation continues to expand at its current monthly rate, the annual rate as measured by the Labor Department will hover at 2.9% for the next two months before rising to 3.0% in December.

For now, the plunge in oil prices and the slowdown in economic expansion appear to be having an impact. After rising at an annual rate of more than 3.5% in the second quarter, core inflation increased at a slower 2.9% in the third quarter.

Speaking earlier this week, San Francisco Fed president Janet Yellen said: "Although I'm somewhat encouraged that various measures of core inflation have edged down recently, it's clear that more progress is needed."

Inflation expectations, as measured by consumer surveys and yield spreads in the bond market, have also retreated. That is extremely important for the Fed's credibility, because expectations of higher inflation can have a self-fulfilling effect, as workers push for higher wages and companies charge higher prices.

Several other wild cards could affect the inflation outlook. Labor costs, which have been rising, could further accelerate and exert more inflation pressure in the months ahead. The degree to which the housing market stabilizes or continues to weaken will have a major impact on overall expansion, and therefore on estimates of how much inflation may decline.

The Commerce Department reported yesterday that new-home construction last month rose 5.9% from August to an annual rate of 1.77 million units. Housing starts were still down 18% from a year earlier.

But permits for new construction, an indicator of future activity, fell 6.3% in September and there is still a historically high inventory of unsold homes on the market. Prices are also falling in many markets.

As a result, many economists said, home builders will be forced to curtail new construction in the months ahead. "The bounce in housing starts is a temporary phenomenon," said Dave Seiders, chief economist at the National Association of Home Builders, of Washington, D.C. "There's no question we have a supply-demand balance problem right now."

Consumer Prices, Construction Starts Supply Good News (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083111

WASHINGTON — Consumer prices fell sharply in September as energy prices took the biggest tumble in nearly a year, the government said Wednesday in a report that buoyed the stock market.

Separately, the Commerce Department said new home and apartment construction rose 5.9% in September from August, surprising analysts. Still, construction was 18% below year-ago levels, and building permits were down 28% from September 2005, reflecting a slide in the previously hot sector.

Stock prices rose as traders interpreted the reports to mean that slower inflation and a cooling, but not collapsing, economy will let the Fed continue to hold interest rates at 5.25%. The Dow Jones rose 42.66 to 11,992.68.

While the overall picture is improving, core inflation, which excludes food and energy, is still too high for comfort, some analysts cautioned. The Fed is watching core figures to see if slowing growth and previous rate increases are cutting inflation.

"There will be a couple quarters of very sluggish economic growth. Some will think we're falling into recession, it will be that close," says Ken Mayland of ClearView Economics.

"That will take the pressure off of core inflation. But it will take time. It will take months. Do the inflation hawks within the Fed have patience? Do the markets?" Mayland says.

The Labor Department said the consumer price index fell 0.5% in September, the biggest decrease since a 0.7% drop in November 2005. The fall was led by a 7.2% drop in energy prices, including a 13.5% drop in gasoline prices. Overall, consumer prices are up 2.1% in the past 12 months.

The core inflation rate was 0.2%, in line with economists' expectations. In the past 12 months, the core inflation rate has been a brisk 2.9%, the highest level in a decade. That's well above the Fed's preferred 1% to 2% annual rate, though monthly increases have leveled off.

The rise in home construction, after three months of declines, may not spell the bottom of the market. Gains were concentrated in the South, and the drop in permit applications is accelerating.

"It isn't over. It has barely begun," says Ian Shepherdson of High Frequency Economics.

The Fed raised its target for short-term interest rates 17 times from mid-2004 to mid-2006. The central bank voted to leave rates unchanged at its August and September meetings. The Fed will next meet Tuesday and Wednesday.

Falling US Fuel Prices Ease Fears Of Recession (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, October 19, 2006

Even with OPEC's decision this week to cut oil production, lower energy prices could persist - bringing a welcome boost to the economy.

The "oil dividend" is worldwide but comes at a sensitive time for the United States. By easing costs for heating homes, commuting, and running factories, lower energy prices reduce worries about a possible recession for the world's biggest economy.

Lower energy prices also promise to help fight inflation. According to a report Tuesday gasoline prices posted a record one-month plunge of 22.2 percent. And Wednesday, thanks in part to fuel costs, the Labor Department announced its broad index of consumer prices fell 0.5 percent in September.

"The lower energy prices certainly help," says John Silvia, chief economist at Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, N.C. This doesn't assure a so-called soft landing for the economy, he says, but "it's enhancing the chances."

Crude oil still costs twice what it did three years ago, but the change over the past two months is significant. Motorists could soon be pumping gasoline at $2 a gallon, down from summer highs above $3.

Cheaper natural gas, meanwhile, promises to keep heating bills lower this winter, too.

Over the past two months price shifts in gasoline and natural gas have put some $90 billion, annualized, back in US consumers' pockets, according to research by economist Andrew Tilton at the investment firm Goldman, Sachs. That's sizable even in a $13 trillion economy.

By some estimates, the amount more than offsets the hit homeowners are taking from an upward jump in adjustable mortgage rates.

DOJ_NMG_0083112

Several factors explain the softening of energy prices, from the end of the summer driving season to fewer hurricanes, which could affect drilling platforms in the Gulf of Mexico. Demand cools for fossil fuels

Perhaps the biggest factor, however, is cooling demand for fossil fuels. That reflects some conservation by consumers, but it also stems from a slowing economy - the very problem that lower energy costs are now helping to alleviate.

"Demand continues to grow but at very low rates," says Mark Routt, a senior analyst at the consulting firm Energy Security Analysis Inc. of Wakefield, Mass.

America's output of goods and services, after expanding faster than 3 percent annually in 2004 and 2005, slipped to a 2.6 percent annualized rate in the second quarter, and third-quarter numbers are expected to be slower still.

Even as Chinese energy demand continues to soar, forecasters have pared back their outlook for the US, the biggest oil consumer.

The International Energy Agency last week predicted that world oil consumption will rise 1.2 percent this year and 1.7 percent next year. Those numbers shaved just a tenth of percentage point off prior forecasts, but such changes at the margins make a difference in energy prices.

Conservation also is playing a role. American consumption of gasoline typically grows by more than 1 percent a year, Mr. Routt notes. This year's growth will be less than 1 percent, not keeping pace with a population that surpassed the 300 million milestone this week.

This represents a natural response of the marketplace to higher-priced oil in 2004 and beyond. It prods consumers to use less and gives suppliers an incentive to expand production. Mood changes, prices dip

All this has changed the mood of those who trade oil contracts on commodity markets. The price of oil has fallen from about $75 a barrel to $60 or lower in recent weeks.

Prices could still spike if supplies are disrupted in places like the Middle East, Iran, or Nigeria.

But the OPEC cartel is responding to the changed outlook. The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries meets Thursday in Qatar to formalize plans for a production cut of 1 million barrels a day.

It's not clear if the group will actually pull that much supply off world markets. Member nations aren't unanimous in their outlook, but backers of a cut don't want to let prices fall too far.

Routt sees oil prices staying relatively flat, but he wouldn't be surprised if gasoline dips below $2 as refiners shift to cheaper winter products.

Mr. Silvia's team of economists at Wachovia believe oil prices will remain around $60 a barrel early next year. He says gasoline is unlikely to fall to $2 a gallon from the current level of $2.23. US economy adjusts

All this comes as the US economy is in a phase of adjustment. The Federal Reserve is trying to guide the economy into what economists call a soft landing, to restrain inflation without causing an outright economic slump.

It has raised interest rates incrementally since mid-2004 but is now sitting on the sidelines as the economy, and inflation, cools.

But soft landings aren't easy to achieve. The risk of recession has risen along with tighter monetary policy. To some economists, falling oil prices could be a symptom of that risk.

Merrill Lynch's David Rosenberg, in a recent report, notes oil prices fell 25 percent in the six months prior to the recession in 2001.

The price cut didn't prevent that recession, he says, because "the decline in crude was symptomatic of slower demand" in the economy. Mixed expectations for the US economy

Today the housing market that was driven by low interest rates has weakened. A gauge of industrial production, announced Tuesday, fell 0.6 percent in September, a much steeper dive than analysts expected.

US employers created a tepid 51,000 jobs in September, according to the Labor Department's initial tally two weeks ago.

Still, other economists believe the US economy remains on solid footing. Silvia's forecast is for moderate growth, with the question of recession hinging on the housing market. For now, he says, lower energy prices are giving an important boost to consumers.

DOJ_NMG_0083113

Demand For Gasoline Surges As Prices Take A Dive (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — Americans are celebrating plunging gasoline prices by hitting the roads.

After barely rising during the summer months, gasoline demand rose swiftly in September, the American Petroleum Institute said Wednesday.

Deliveries of gasoline to U.S. service stations, a proxy for demand, rose more than 4% in September from the same month a year ago. That number was boosted by the comparison with September 2005, when Hurricanes Katrina and Rita interrupted deliveries.

But even excluding the hurricane effects, gas demand likely was up approximately 2% in September, API economist Ron Planting says. That's about triple the average increase over the prior six months and the biggest gain since August 2005.

"Lower prices are encouraging people to get back out there and drive," says Stephen Brown, director of energy economics at the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas. Good weather in much of the USA in September and increased security measures at airports, which turned some people off on flying, also likely encouraged travelers to get behind the wheel, Brown says.

In one of the largest one-month changes on record, the nationwide average gasoline price fell 47 cents, or 17%, in September, according to motorist club AAA and the Oil Price Information Service.

The U.S. average for a gallon of regular Wednesday was $2.219, down 27% from this year's peak of $3.04 a gallon on Aug. 10 and off 52 cents from a year ago. The lowest average price Wednesday was in Missouri, where it was $2.02 a gallon; the highest was in Hawaii, where the average was $2.98.

While the higher prices this year didn't actually reduce gasoline consumption in most months, it led to slower-than-normal increases in demand. The historical average is for gains of 1.5% to 2%, API's Planting says.

Population growth, a healthy economy and lower gasoline prices will likely continue to boost gasoline demand going forward, says Kevin Lindemer, head of the energy group at economic consulting firm Global Insight.

"The underlying forces that create gasoline demand are still there," he says.

But increased demand will keep propping up prices, warns Alliance to Save Energy President Kateri Callahan, who calls the decline in gas prices "not all good news," because it makes it harder to persuade people to conserve.

"People have a false sense of security that (gasoline prices) are going to stay low and go lower," Callahan says.

Swati Gunale of Indianapolis has been planning for months to drive to Arkansas this weekend for a volunteer vacation, where she will be helping to build a hiking trail along the Buffalo National River.

Although the 33-year-old would have taken the trip even with gas prices high, the decline in costs at the pump will make her vacation less costly.

"It's an added bonus for me," she says.

Has Diesel Grown On The United States? (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

:

Steering the big E320 sedan, Mercedes-Benz engineer Rudolf W. Thom comes around a corner and gently presses down on the accelerator, revealing the faint yet familiar sound of a diesel engine.

"If you compare this diesel to the diesels of the past, can you hear this diesel?" he said. "Can you smell this diesel? It is not like the bad diesels of the past."

The E320 gets 35 miles per gallon, 30 percent better than the comparable gasoline version of the car. Because of favorable tax policies in Europe, diesels have taken off there in the past 15 years, accounting for 50 percent of the new models sold each year. In the United States, development of the market has lagged because of government concerns over what the fuel does to air quality; diesel vehicles make up just 3.2 percent of the market.

DOJ_NMG_0083114

The dynamics began to shift this week. On Sunday, the Environmental Protection Agency began requiring refiners and fuel importers to reduce the sulfur content in diesel fuel by 97 percent. The low-sulfur fuel opens the door to a new generation of clean diesel cars, and automakers are moving to bring out more models in the U.S. market.

The change promises to significantly cut air pollution caused by diesel emissions. Regulators say high concentrations of sulfur in the old diesel fuel poison the engine systems that clean exhaust of harmful pollutants. The biggest concern is particulate matter, one of the byproducts of engine combustion, said Margo Oge, director of the EPA's office of transportation and air quality. The particles are a fraction of the size of a human hair. Public health advocates have described the particles as tiny spaceships that dive into the respiratory system when people inhale, damaging the lining of the lungs.

Particles from diesel emissions are classified by the government as a potential carcinogen and are linked to premature deaths, heart attacks to respiratory illness.

Mark MacLeod, director of special projects for Environmental Defense, an advocacy group, said the new EPA rules are expected to prevent about 8,000 premature deaths each year, 1.5 million lost work days and 360,000 asthma attacks.

Detroit automakers have pledged to expand diesel offerings, particularly in pickup trucks. J.D. Power and Associates projects that the diesel share of light-vehicle sales is expected to increase to more than 10 percent by the middle of the next decade from 3.2 percent in 2005. Japanese automakers are also stepping up development of diesel technology.

As U.S. consumers become more sensitive to higher gas prices, German automakers view diesels as their best weapon in the U.S. market to counter strong sales of gas-electric hybrids. They claim a long history of innovation in diesel technology. Mercedes sold large numbers of diesels in the United States in the 1980s. Volkswagen AG for years has sold diesel versions of its popular cars, including the Jetta and the Beetle.

In this country, automakers have shied away from diesels since the early 1980s. GM produced a diesel engine during that decade that was used throughout its lineup. But auto analysts say the engine had problems with piston rings and cylinder combustion. The cars were smoky, loud and slow. Some diesels wouldn't start in cold weather. Mercedes models of that era also are remembered as being slow and noisy, helping cause consumers to sour on diesel technology.

"Consequently, all the Big Three have been afraid to do diesel," said Casey Selecman, manager of North American powertrain forecasts at CSM Worldwide. "They believe the American public still sees diesels that way. Now they have this great competency in Europe. All the things that plagued the diesels in the early '80s are now gone."

At Mercedes, marketers have developed the name Bluetec for the company's diesel engines in the United States to try to cleanse them of persistent negative perceptions. The company said other German automakers may use the name to sell diesel technology.

"We have to make a mind-set change because the diesel name is damaged," Thom said.

Mr. Pombo's Map (NYT)

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

When you add up the energy resources of the American West, one of the biggest items in the ledger is oil shale — rock formations containing deposits that can be distilled, by heating, into oil. The estimate of the petroleum locked up in these deposits is enormous: perhaps 800 billion barrels of recoverable oil, most of it in the Green River Formation, which lies beneath Colorado, Wyoming and Utah.

The processes for extracting oil shale are still hugely expensive — which is fortunate, because the potential environmental costs are staggering. You can pump oil from oil shale by heating the underground formations, with untold effect on groundwater. Or you can dig it all up, cart it away and heat it somewhere else, scarring vast tracts of the West.

None of this has stopped Congressman Richard Pombo of California — champion of the idea that we can drill our way to energy independence — from throwing yet another economic bone to the energy sector. In a little-noticed provision of the much-reviled Deep Ocean Energy Resources Act — which the House passed in June and the Senate will take up when Congress returns — Mr. Pombo lowered the royalty rate for oil shale from 12.5 percent to 1 percent. Should the day arrive when the price of shale oil becomes competitive, this could turn out to be an extraordinary giveaway of federal revenue (most oil shale lies under federal land) and a huge incentive to wreak environmental damage.

DOJ_NMG_0083115

None of this is surprising. Mr. Pombo, who is chairman of the House Resources Committee and is facing a tight race for re-election, has been well- financed by oil and gas producers. He has done his best to give away public resources and throw away prudent restraints on energy exploration.

We believe that this country must pursue energy independence. But unlike Mr. Pombo, we believe that there is a vibrant new economy to be found in conservation and that is where our future lies. When we try to envision the America that Mr. Pombo has mapped out for us, all we can see is a nation committed to devouring itself, one barrel of oil at a time.

Oil-Price Drop Challenges OPEC Unity (WSJ)

By Chip Cummins

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

Saudi Arabian oil czar Ali Naimi worked for years to turn OPEC from a group of squabbling politicians into an effective price-enforcing posse patrolling world oil markets. Now, with the oil cartel facing its first significant price drop in years, that unity of purpose is showing strain.

The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries is set to meet Thursday in Qatar in an effort to bolster sagging prices. Members are trying to hammer out a tricky agreement about how to share the pain of any cut in crude-oil output that they announce at the meeting. They also will try to reverse sharp internal divisions that threaten the cartel's longer-term ability to prop up prices.

The outcome of this horse-trading could have big implications for OPEC's credibility as a price cop and thus for fuel users around the world. Falling gasoline prices have been an especially big boon to consumers in the U.S., the world's largest economy and biggest importer, partially offsetting the blow caused by falling American home prices. It is also a test for the cohesion built by Mr. Naimi, OPEC's de facto leader as the oil minister of Saudi Arabia, the group's top producer.

Many OPEC officials have indicated in recent weeks that they have all but agreed to cut output by some one million barrels a day. How ministers finesse the details of any cut and deliver their message will be nearly as important as whether they greenlight a decision to trim output.

One question is whether the reduction under discussion, of roughly 4% of the group's output, would come from OPEC's current production levels of about 27.5 million barrels a day or from its recently suspended output ceiling of 28 million barrels. The latter choice would mean a real cut of just half a million barrels, or less than 1% of the roughly 84 million barrels a day the world consumes.

OPEC, which pumps about a third of the world's oil, has been notoriously fractious in the past, especially when prices head south. At such times, members tend to duke it out over market share, eager to make up lost revenue from falling prices by pumping extra volume.

Worried by a fast drop in oil markets, OPEC ministers have signaled they at least agree on the need for some sort of cut to defend prices.

"It is reasonable to say they need to get at least a half million barrels a day, maybe one million barrels a day, off the market," said Adam Sieminski, an oil analyst for Deutsche Bank in New York. OPEC then might still need to cut more sharply in December, when the group is scheduled to meet in Nigeria, Mr. Sieminski said.

But in Doha, Qatar, the group faces an even more difficult task than fixing on a headline number: how to distribute any reduction fairly among members. OPEC officials have been publicly contradicting themselves over what kind of deal is in the works.

Many ministers have suggested $55 a barrel for U.S. benchmark crude as a price the group would defend, though some have hinted they crave prices closer to $60.

Benchmark U.S. crude futures settled at $57.65 a barrel Wednesday on the New York Mercantile Exchange, down $1.28 and some 25% lower than the settlement high of $77.03 in July. They remain well below an inflation-adjusted high of $99.56, reached in April 1980.

DOJ_NMG_0083116

OPEC and other forecasters have recently lowered their projections for oil-demand growth. Fresh sources of non-OPEC production have come on line, including a pipeline carrying crude from the Caspian Sea. And inventories of stored oil, especially in the U.S., the world's biggest consumer, have risen, putting pressure on prices.

Under Mr. Naimi, OPEC members won back credibility in the market by sticking to production-cut promises to defend prices. Now, with prices falling, OPEC has essentially split into two camps. On one side is a group of countries -- including Kuwait, Algeria and Libya -- that have been able to greatly exceed the individual production quotas OPEC had assigned each member. Meanwhile, countries such as Venezuela, Iran and Indonesia have struggled to meet their quotas. Mr. Naimi has kept mum, but Saudi Arabia is squarely in the heavy-producer category, and it has been trimming its output quietly in recent months.

One option favored by the underproducers would be across-the-board reductions in individual quotas. That would allow them to keep output unchanged. But it would force the group's overproducers to cut actual output much more sharply, a move this second group has resisted publicly.

"Nobody is talking about cutting from quotas," Kuwaiti oil minister Sheikh Ali Al Jarah Al Sabah said Wednesday. "I think there's a minimum of understanding that all parties will participate" in any cut announced at the meeting, he said.

The squabbling has shaken market confidence in OPEC's resolve. The big risk for OPEC, analysts say, is that the group fails to commit itself to any meaningful cut, instead opting for temporary or voluntary cuts from each member, or promising to make real cuts, but at some unspecified time in the future.

--Ayesha Daya contributed to this article.

Write to Chip Cummins at chip.cummins@wsj.com1

Study Of Cancers At IBM Is Released (WSJ)

By William M. Bulkeley

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

A long-suppressed study finding elevated rates of many cancers among workers at International Business Machines Corp. was published in Environmental Health, a peer-reviewed online scientific journal.

IBM has fought for several years to prevent release of the study done by Richard Clapp, a Boston University professor of environmental health. The study analyzes data collected by IBM itself on the ages and causes of death of nearly 32,000 people who had worked at IBM and died between 1969 and 2001. IBM has maintained the analysis is "junk science" that misuses the data.

Mr. Clapp got hold of the data, known as IBM's "Corporate Mortality File," as an expert witness who analyzed it for lawyers in California. They had sued IBM on behalf of a number of workers at a disk-drive plant in San Jose who got cancer. Although the plaintiffs settled after several lost their lawsuits, Mr. Clapp sought to publish his analysis.

The study attracted attention beyond the courtroom in 2004, when it was scheduled to be published in a quarterly issue of the scholarly journal Clinics in Occupational and Environmental Medicine, which is owned by Anglo-Dutch publishing giant Reed Elsevier. After IBM objected to use of the data, which had been released only for purposes of the case, Reed declined to publish Mr. Clapp's paper. Reed said the paper was original research that conflicted with the mission of the issue, which was to assess previous research.

Mr. Clapp said that earlier this year, IBM stopped attempting to block publication. The study, "Mortality among U.S. employees of a large computer manufacturing company," looked at death records of men and women who had worked for IBM for five years.

Mr. Clapp then compared the rate of cancer deaths among the workers to the national death rate from particular cancers. Among the 27,272 men who died, there are 7,697 cancer deaths -- "significantly greater" than the 7,206 cancer deaths that were expected based on the national average. Several individual cancers showed particularly high rates compared with national averages, including cancers of the digestive organs, kidneys, brain and central nervous system and malignant melanoma of the skin.

DOJ_NMG_0083117

Among the 4,669 female deaths, 1,667 were from cancer, which Mr. Clapp said was well above the 1,454 that were expected based on national data. Breast cancer, lung cancer, female genital cancer, brain and nervous-system cancers rates were all elevated compared with national averages.

Mr. Clapp also concluded that deaths from cancer as a proportion of all deaths were also elevated among IBM manufacturing workers. For this part of his analysis, he used records for workers who had been involved for at least 30 days in semiconductor and disk-drive manufacturing plants in California, Minnesota, New York and Vermont.

Mr. Clapp said cancer rates were somewhat higher in the manufacturing subgroup, including for deaths from breast cancer in women and kidney cancer and melanoma in men.

Across the technology industry, semiconductor and disk-drive plants use chemicals and solvents that have been linked to cancer. But the database didn't have information specifying which workers were exposed to which chemicals. Mr. Clapp said the data also failed to provide any information on whether the dead employees had been smokers or what other jobs they might have held.

An IBM spokesman said the study is "based on flawed methodology and woefully incomplete data." He said an IBM-funded study led by a researcher from the University of Alabama at Birmingham, which has been published, found 126,000 current and former IBM workers at three semiconductor and hard-drive plants over three decades "had lower overall mortality and cancer incidence rates than the general population."

Mr. Clapp said that study's results were largely consistent with his except the IBM study wasn't adjusted to eliminate the "healthy worker" effect. Employed people are generally healthier than nonworkers, so comparing them directly to the general population is misleading, he said.

Universal Health Care: We Can't Afford Not To (USAT)

By Timothy Johnson

USA Today, October 19, 2006

The most basic question about health care reform is an old one: Should basic care be a "right" for everyone regardless of income, pre-existing illness or bad genes — or should it be a "privilege" obtained by hard work or bestowed by good birth? We would never argue that police and fire protection should be distributed based on income, so why should health care?

That's an emotionally charged issue, but there is one observation almost everyone agrees with: Our present health care "system" (a messy mix of personal, employer and government health insurance) badly needs reform. We spend more than twice as much per person on health care as other industrialized countries do — about $6,100 here vs. an average of $2,550 elsewhere in 2004 — yet we are the only such country that does not provide universal insurance coverage. How can that be?

Unfortunately, there is often no correlation between amounts spent and results. For example, in 2000, Medicare spending in Manhattan was more than $10,000 per person vs. less than $5,000 in Portland, Ore. — and Portland had better treatment results.

We will spend more than $2 trillion (yes, that's a "t") on health care this year. Yet, we rank last among 23 industrialized countries in infant mortality.

One major reason for these appalling numbers is the huge number of uninsured or underinsured in our country who do not get timely care. So why not make health care a right so every American can potentially benefit from early intervention and better prevention?

The abuse argument

One of the arguments against universal coverage usually unfolds under the ironic label "moral hazard" — that if we morally weak humans are offered something "free" (meaning that someone else is paying for it) we will abuse it. For example, a bowl of free candy will disappear much more quickly than candy you have to pay for yourself. But that argument assumes people would consume health care in the same way they gobble down free candy. I think that conclusion is crazy. Other than seasoned hypochondriacs, who wants to unnecessarily visit the doctor or go into the hospital — just because you have insurance — instead of going to the beach or playing golf?

DOJ_NMG_0083118

Of course, there will be some abuse, but that should be easily outweighed by offering many more of us a chance to be healthier, not to mention a better shot at "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

Indeed, the real moral hazard when it comes to health care is what we are doing right now: not providing basic care to our citizens through cost effective health insurance for everyone. Not only is it the right thing to do morally, but I would argue it makes sense economically by providing prevention and care in the early stages of disease when it will usually cost less and be more effective. Better to treat pneumonia early with antibiotics than end up in the intensive care unit on a respirator with lung failure.

Efficient care

Some experts argue that with more thoughtful use of the money we now spend (electronic records to replace paper, better bargaining for drug and device prices, etc.), we can provide basic care to everyone with relatively little increase in total expenditure.

Efficient health care systems such as the reformed Veterans Administration hospital system already make a case. The VA, which provides often excellent care, costs about $5,000 per patient annually vs. $6,500 for private Medicare patients.

And here is a final question: How long do we want to be known as the wealthiest country in the world — and the only one that does not provide universal health insurance when we could and should?

Timothy Johnson, medical editor for ABC News, provides medical analysis for World News, Nightline, 20/20 and Good Morning America.

Posted at 12:15 AM/ET, October 19, 2006 in Forum commentary, Health care/Insurance - Forum | Permalink

High Hopes, And Higher Home Prices, In Anacostia (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

The newest government-supported housing in the District is a landscaped development of four-bedroom homes with Palladian windows, cathedral ceilings, hardwood floors and prices that reach $584,000.

The District gave the builders of the Homes at Woodmont about $1 million toward the $14 million project on Good Hope Road SE because it wants to attract professionals and their money to the most economically distressed section of the city.

The project inverts the traditional notion of housing subsidies because it isn't aimed at low-income buyers.

"We're trying to create diversity in the southeast quadrant of the city, to break up pockets of poverty," said Leo Clarke, special projects coordinator at the D.C. Department of Housing and Community Development, which gave the developers a grant toward the cost of preparing the land for construction. "We're trying to encourage investment in an otherwise blighted area."

The city is trying to use tax dollars, housing policy and, in one instance, legal power to inject middle-class elements into the long-distressed area, which is east of the Anacostia River at the northern tip of Ward 8 and has the city's largest concentration of public housing and the lowest median income.

Earlier this year, in a controversial move, the city used eminent domain to seize a worn shopping center less than a mile from the Homes at Woodmont. Over the protests of storekeepers, District officials are trying to replace the liquor stores and dollar stores in the Skyland shopping center with higher-end shops and restaurants.

City officials hope the Homes at Woodmont will help the neighborhood by raising property values, encouraging landowners to rehabilitate shabby buildings and adding residents with money to spend at higher-end shops.

"We already have an overabundance of low-income and affordable housing," said Albert R. Hopkins, executive director of the Anacostia Community Development Corp. "What we need is market rate."

Attracting higher incomes to the neighborhood is key to more shops and better services, Hopkins said. "Local and national retailers, they look at demographics and income levels," he said.

Along the streets surrounding the Homes at Woodmont, 42 percent of families live below the poverty line; the median income was $19,950 in 2000, according to the U.S. Census. Most of the homes are modest brick rowhouses or apartment buildings with bars on the windows. Many date to the 1960s and look worn.

"Southeast Washington needs a whole lifestyle change," said L. Yvonne Moore, an advisory neighborhood commissioner who lives across Good Hope Road from the new houses. "It's time that people see Southeast is not just a dumping ground for social services and apartments with Section 8" public housing subsidies, said Moore, a retired teacher. "We have to have more choices. My kids are educated professionals. Where does my son live? In Arlington, Va. And my daughter lives in Southwest, in a condo."

DOJ_NMG_0083119

Moore lives in Marbury Plaza, an apartment complex built in the 1970s for upscale black professionals. Much like the Homes at Woodmont, Marbury Plaza was intended to attract people with disposable income. But the complex began to deteriorate in the 1980s, and now residents in the soot-stained building complain of repair and security problems.

The Woodmont development lies between two projects that have received heavy public investment: Good Hope Marketplace, a shopping center that opened in 1997, and Anacostia Gateway, an office and retail complex under construction in the heart of Historic Anacostia.

"Once that Anacostia Gateway opens, this whole area is going to take off," said A. Gene Edgecombe of VMS LLC, one of the builders of the Homes at Woodmont. He pointed to the location -- less than 10 minutes by car to L'Enfant Plaza, downtown or Capitol Hill -- as a major selling point.

The new houses sprang from negotiations between the community and a developer, which used $10.4 million in city funds to build a 176-unit apartment building for low-income renters in 2002. Neighbors initially objected, saying the area was saturated with apartments. "The neighbors wanted stable, long-term homeowners," said Sarah Davidson, vice president of KSI, which built the apartments.

To appease the community, KSI pledged to build single-family homes on several adjacent wooded acres. Then it sold the land to IDS/VMS to build the houses.

Without the city's financial help, IDS President Andy Botticello said, the single-family houses wouldn't have been feasible because the land needed expensive correction of soil problems. The soil issues delayed construction, increasing costs, he said.

The Woodmont project is under construction; the first five homes should be ready for occupancy next month, Botticello said.

But the development's contours and feel are already apparent. It has a distinctly suburban look, more Annandale than Anacostia. The homes are on smaller lots than in the suburbs, but that's the main difference.

The houses have brick fronts, peaked roofs and many amenities -- including whirlpool soaking tubs and attached garages. The development backs onto federal parkland, so the houses face woods instead of city streets. "Our construction guys keep running into deer," Edgecombe said.

As a condition of the city's grant, the developers agreed to discount the first 13 of the 35 houses by about $100,000 under market value. But there were no income restrictions on buyers. Anybody could purchase the discounted housing; they just had to be fast.

With no advertising and not even a "For Sale" sign on the property, the developers got more than 1,000 e-mails from would-be buyers through their Web site and sold the houses in waves starting in 2002. That reassured Riggs Bank, the original lender, that a market exists for half-million-dollar homes in Anacostia, Botticello said.

The developers expect to put the remaining 17 lots on the market next month, with house prices ranging from $489,000 to $584,000. There are no income restriction on these, either.

Most buyers are moving up from townhouses, condominiums or rental apartments. Many have a connection to Southeast. "I had a townhouse in Prince George's County, and I wanted to come home to D.C.," said Karen Beddoe, a 35-year-old Washington native whose parents live in Ward 8. "You never realize how much a place has to offer until you leave it."

Beddoe, an accountant with the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, stumbled across the Homes at Woodmont on the Internet. "I couldn't let that go by," said Beddoe, a single mother of two. "I jumped at the opportunity. I was just so lucky."

She signed a $360,000 contract for a four-bedroom, 2 1/2 -bath house. The same money would buy a one-bedroom condominium about one-third the size of that 3,300-square-foot home in one of the city's affluent neighborhoods.

"I pass my new house every day on the way to work," said Beddoe, who has waited for the home through years of construction. "Some days, I slow down and say, 'That's mine! That's mine!' "

DOJ_NMG_0083120

One recent day, Beddoe toured her unfinished house with Edgecombe and Botticello. The hardwood floors, carpeting and appliances had yet to be installed, and the electricity wasn't connected. But to Beddoe, it resembled a page from Better Homes and Gardens. "I love it!" she cooed, surveying the walk-in closet in the master bedroom. "This is Karen's closet! I've got plans!"

Gome Legesse, another buyer, said her family tried to sway her against buying a house in Anacostia. "They didn't want me to go there. They said it wasn't secure," said Legesse, a 40-year-old computer technician for the District government who rents an apartment at Florida Avenue and North Capitol Street NW. "I told them not to worry about it, that a lot was developing around the area."

Legesse has agreed to pay about $302,000. "I couldn't beat the price," she said. "It is my dream to live in a single-family house."

3 Doctors Assail Lilly Study Of Sepsis Drug (NYT)

By Alex Berenson

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

Three doctors at the National Institutes of Health have sharply criticized Eli Lilly for its efforts to promote the use of Xigris, an expensive treatment for patients with sepsis, an often deadly blood infection.

In an article published yesterday in The New England Journal of Medicine, the doctors wrote that Lilly — the nation's sixth-largest drug maker — had manipulated treatment guidelines for sepsis patients to promote Xigris at the expense of older, cheaper and equally effective treatments.

Sales of Xigris have fallen far short of expectations since it was approved in 2001. In the first six months of this year, Lilly sold just $98 million of Xigris worldwide, a drop of 16 percent from the same period last year. Fewer than 150 patients a day receive Xigris in the United States.

The journal article says that Lilly, in financing a task force called "Values, Ethics and Rationing in Critical Care," had implicitly criticized doctors for "rationing" Xigris because of its expense. But in fact, the article says, evidence from clinical trials provides little support for using Xigris under any circumstances.

To promote Xigris, Lilly used "marketing strategies masquerading as evidence-based medicine," they wrote.

The authors of the article are Dr. Peter Q. Eichacker, Dr. Charles Natanson and Dr. Robert L. Danner, who are senior investigators in the critical care medicine department at the N.I.H.

Two recent clinical trials of Xigris have been discontinued because the drug increased the risk of severe bleeding and — at best — did not reduce the overall death rate in patients who received it.

In a statement in response to the article, Lilly said yesterday that it had behaved properly and disclosed its role in financing a task force of doctors and scientists that devised treatment guidelines for sepsis.

"Lilly felt a clear obligation to support educational efforts in the health care community, both on the disease state over all and on the medicine to ensure appropriate use," the company said.

Xigris, which costs about $8,000 for a four-day course of treatment, generated controversy even before federal regulators approved it in November 2001. To win approval, Lilly presented results from a clinical trial that showed that Xigris reduced the risk of death in sepsis patients to 25 percent, down from 31 percent with older treatments.

But the details of the data from the trial left many scientists who reviewed it unconvinced of Xigris's efficacy. Half of the 20 scientists who reviewed the drug for a Food and Drug Administration advisory committee hearing in October 2001 said the agency should not approve the drug without more data.

A month later, the F.D.A. approved Xigris, but warned that its use should be limited to the sickest patients, where it appeared to have the greatest efficacy. The next year, Lilly gave $1.8 million to a task force of 20 scientists and hospital directors. In 2004, the group published guidelines that rated Xigris more highly than older treatments for which clinical trials treating sepsis had never been conducted.

In the New England Journal article, the N.I.H. scientists criticized those findings, arguing that the older treatments should not have been dismissed, despite the lack of clinical trials. The benefits of older treatments like antibiotics were already so well-known that withholding them from patients, even in the controlled setting of a trial, would have been unethical, the authors wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0083121

Eli Lilly's Role In Treatment Is Cited (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

Several government doctors say drug maker Eli Lilly & Co. subtly orchestrated medical guidelines for treatment of an often lethal blood infection, hoping to boost sales of a drug whose value is being debated.

Such involvement could open another door to corporate interests trying to shape health care, beyond funding experiments and cozying up to doctors in labs or at luncheons. Guidelines are meant to reflect independent medical opinion.

"This company is trying to insinuate its drug into many aspects of patient care that industry really shouldn't be involved in," said Dr. Naomi O'Grady, a critical-care specialist at the National Institutes of Health.

Three of her NIH colleagues claim in today's New England Journal of Medicine that Lilly worked through medical societies to influence standards for treating the blood infection, sepsis. Ultimately, Xigris was incorporated into the guidelines.

Lilly said in a prepared statement that it is taking the concerns raised "very seriously" and has examined the issue closely. It defended its activities by saying that it had an educational obligation to inform patients and providers about the disease, about which little had been known when the drug made its debut in 2001. "The standards for Lilly grants, then as now, are high, and we will continue to examine policies and procedures to ensure that our behavior in all things match our core values..." the company said in the statement.

Beyond paying for the initiative, Lilly said it didn't believe it played a role in developing guideline content. It said that its funding for grants was fully disclosed.

A doctor who helped oversee writing of the guidelines also rejected the accusation. He said that the guidelines were written to benefit patients, not the drug company.

"We've been catching grief because we've been taking a lot of Lilly money -- and we're appreciative of Lilly giving it," said Dr. Phil Dellinger, of Cooper University Hospital, in Camden, N.J. The guidelines committee and a larger information campaign on sepsis were heavily funded by the Indianapolis-based pharmaceutical company.

The two-year-old sepsis guidelines urge that very ill patients at risk of dying get the novel anticlotting drug Xigris, the only medicine that directly attacks the disease. A $6,800 treatment can help protect organs destroyed by the bacterial infection, once called blood poisoning. About 750,000 cases occur in the U.S. each year, and nearly one-third prove fatal.

The Food and Drug Administration approved Xigris in 2001, despite an evenly split vote by its advisory committee. The lead author of today's Journal article, Dr. Peter Q. Eichacker, voted against approval as an adviser. The other two authors are Dr. Charles Natanson and Dr. Robert L. Danner.

"There's enough controversy and questionable data about the drug that it shouldn't be a standard," Dr. Eichacker said in an interview.

Some critics are unhappy that the drug, which works only for the sickest patients, was approved on the basis of a single experiment. Later studies spurred fresh concerns about its effectiveness, bleeding risk and heightened mortality in some patients.

Lilly defends the drug on its Web site, calling it "a breakthrough therapy that has helped save thousands of lives."

Copyright © 2006 Associated Press

Debate Surrounds End-of-life Health Care Costs (USAT)

By Julie Appleby, USA TODAY

USA Today, October 19, 2006

If you are dying in Miami, the last six months of your life might well look like this: You'll see doctors, mostly specialists, 46 times; spend more than six days in an intensive care unit and stand a 27% chance of dying in a hospital ICU. The tab for your doctor and hospital care will run just over $23,000.

But spend those last six months in Portland, Ore., and you'll go to the doctor 18 times, half of those visits with your primary care doctor, spend one day in intensive care and stand a 13% chance of dying in an ICU. You'll likely die at home, with the support of a hospice program. Total tab: slightly more than $14,000.

Researchers at the Dartmouth Atlas Project, a program at the Dartmouth Medical School that evaluates variation in medical care, analyzed Medicare data on patients with chronic illnesses to develop those statistics, showing that it costs far more to die in some parts of the country than in others.

While researchers are able to show differences in costs, the real question remains how much of those additional hospitalizations, tests and doctor visits resulted in better care or better quality of life? Finding answers to that question is difficult and controversial, but health policy experts say doing so will become increasingly important as the U.S. seeks ways to slow the rapid rise in health care spending.

"There's a tremendous opportunity for both improving quality and enhancing efficiency in the care of people with very serious illnesses at the end of life," says geriatrician Joanne Lynn, who spent much of her career at think tank RAND studying end-of-life care.

She says substantial progress could be made in slowing rising costs if the U.S. health system could find better ways to reduce hospitalizations for people at the end of life, such as providing more in-home services.

Portland and Miami reflect that tremendous variation among regions. The most expensive city out of 309 hospital referral regions is Manhattan, at a cost of $35,838 for the last six months; the least expensive is Wichita Falls, Texas, at $10,913.

Estimates show that about 27% of Medicare's annual $327 billion budget goes to care for patients in their final year of life.

While that's not altogether surprising given Medicare's demographics — most patients are over 65 — researchers say it's important to find out if that is money well spent.

While not the major factor driving health care spending, costs involved in sustaining patients in their final days are likely to get a closer look by both Medicare and private insurers as health costs continue to spiral and the population ages.

Why costs vary

Why is it more expensive to die in some areas of the country than others?

The number of doctors and hospital beds is part of it: The more there are, the more care a person gets. Also playing roles: the expectations of patients and the practice patterns of doctors.

Portland has fewer ICU beds and specialists per person than Miami, which is also more multicultural, with a greater variety of views on end-of-life medical care.

But experts on the end-of-life care say one main reason for the vast difference between the two cities may be that in Oregon, doctors, or staff at hospitals and hospices, encourage patients with life-threatening illnesses to talk about the end of life, what kind of medical care they want and where they want to die. The state has a history of such debate: Oregon residents have long supported palliative care, a term usually used to describe medical care for the terminally ill that focuses more on comfort treatments than cures. And, in 1994, voters there became the first in the nation to approve doctor-assisted suicide, a referendum signed into law in 1998.

"We have fewer hospitals and ICU beds than Miami does and, yes, that's a factor. But making a plan and how everyone supports you to have that plan is what makes the difference," says Susan Tolle, a medical doctor and director of the Center for Ethics in Health Care at Oregon Health & Science University.

The ways people die in Portland and Miami illustrate the vast variation in what is done at the end of life in America.

Across the nation, some patients spend much of their final weeks seeing specialists, having tests, trying new drugs. Many die attached to machines, such as ventilators, in hospitals.

For some patients, that's exactly the right care. Doing everything that can be done to save an 18-year-old motorcycle-crash victim makes sense. But what about an 85-year-old with heart failure, diabetes and cancer? Do you continue aggressive chemotherapy?

Then the answers are not so clear-cut.

Complicating matters is that medicine often doesn't know what the most effective treatments are. And doctors are trained to save lives. As a result, some patients may be pushed into more than they want by a medical system that values doing something over doing nothing, even when futile.

DOJ_NMG_0083123

"One of the things that frustrates us all is to see care being provided in an absolutely futile situation ... and doctors and hospitals are not accountable but are also being rewarded (financially) for that (futile care)," says John Santa, medical director for the Center for Evidence-Based Policy in Portland.

When not to treat

Not so long ago, Americans were felled by a bad infection or an accident or a sudden illness, such as a heart attack. Advances in medicine mean more of us are living longer, but often with disabilities.

"Many more of us make it to older age, and so there's much more we can do (medically)," says geriatrician Lynn.

But, increasingly, ethicists, economists and patient advocates are questioning whether the spending mentality is best for elderly patients or the long-term financial future of programs such as Medicare.

"We are going to double the number of people who are sick, old and frail in about 15 years," says Lynn. "It would be a good thing to try on some ways of thinking about how to live that well ... and at a cost the community can sustain."

She and others say there's not enough money to give everyone a treatment with a one-in-a-million chance of success. "None of us wants to bankrupt our community on desperate, long-shot treatments," Lynn says. "The question is, how do we build a sustainable health system?"

Those questions about what care to give and when to quit are deeply personal. A USA TODAY/Kaiser/ABC poll of 1,201 Americans taken by telephone in September found the public divided on the answers.

When asked if it is better to keep a terminally ill person alive as long as possible, regardless of the expense, or to make a judgment as to whether it's worth the expense, 48% said it's better to weigh the costs, compared with 40% who said to keep the person alive as long as possible, regardless of the cost.

Among those 65 and older, 60% said expense should be considered, compared with 28% who said cost should not enter the decision. The nationally representative poll has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Improving quality of care

Still, not everyone agrees that slowing spending at the end of life is a panacea for rapidly rising health costs. Such costs are driven by a host of factors, of which the amount spent in the last six months of life is but a part. "There are so many things that would result in very substantial resources being saved, and (end-of-life care), on my list of things, is not at the top," says Santa.

Things closer to the top of his list include unnecessary back surgeries, hysterectomies and what he calls an over-reliance on some expensive brand-name drugs when generics would work just as well.

But Santa and other proponents of the Oregon model say its importance goes well beyond any cost savings that might result. Rather, they say it's a way to give patients more control over their own medical treatment and is changing a culture of medicine that has been reluctant to discuss dying.

Oregon's program allowing people to register their wishes on the single page Physician Order for Life Sustaining Treatments (POLST) form began in 1995 and is widely accepted in the medical community, although it took time to build.

On the forms, patients can say whether they want cardiopulmonary resuscitation, antibiotics or feeding tubes. Conversely, they can specify that they want full treatment, including breathing machines and feeding tubes. And for how long.

The forms differ from so-called advance directives, which are also called living wills, which name someone to speak on behalf of a patient and state patient wishes. Instead, the forms are doctor's orders, similar to directions written into medical charts, that are recognized and followed by medical personnel from technicians on ambulances to staff at hospitals and nursing homes.

Tolle says most of her patients want to talk about their care and the way they want to die, although the adult children of many are often more reticent.

"It's actually not that difficult to talk to approximately 80% of my patients for the first time about an advance plan," Tolle says. "What is horribly difficult is to talk to their children, who are not ready to talk about Mom and Dad dying."

She says younger people or those without life-threatening illnesses are encouraged to fill out legal documents for an advance directive, mainly to name a person who can make medical decisions for them if they are unable to make them for themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0083124

The POLST forms in Oregon, which are printed on bright pink paper and can be transmitted electronically by hospitals and other medical providers, are "for the individual who is in life's last chapter," she says.

Robert Smith, a 79-year-old retired accountant in Portland, says he brought up the subject with his doctor and filled out the form as part of his overall estate planning, which includes a will, a designation of someone to speak for him if he is unable and funeral arrangements.

His form says he wants antibiotic treatment but does not want to be kept alive artificially. "If there's no hope of my continuing to live, I do not want a feeding tube," says Smith, who encourages others to write down their desires and talk with family and friends about them. "It's part of the care you have for your family, that you told them what to do," says Smith.

Tolle says the program's designers did not focus on whether it would save money. "A few individuals might want to spend more and want everything done," says Tolle. "And we would fight for them, too."

Bush Sidelined As Defeat Looms (FT)

By Edward Luce And Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, October 19, 2006

George W. Bush used to win elections for Republicans. But with the exception of private fund-raising events, at which he still excels, most of the US president's fellow Republicans are now pretending he does not exist.

With fewer than three weeks to go before Americans vote in midterm Congressional elections, Mr Bush's approval ratings are even lower than those of his colleagues, whose defeat to the opposition Democrats next month is now widely assumed. Republicans have controlled the House of Representatives since 1994 and the Senate since 2002.

According to the Congress Daily, Mr Bush has appeared on platforms with Republican candidates only 15 times since the start of August compared with 29 times over the same period in 2002 – the last midterm elections, which his party won decisively. "What candidates want is Bush's fundraising not his presence," said Chuck Schumer, Democratic senator for New York. "Rare is the Republican who wants to stand next to him in public."

The relative absence of the president from the campaign trail bears a striking resemblance to the way Tony Blair, UK prime minister, was all but removed from Labour's European election campaign a year before the 2005 general election. Though Mr Blair went on to win that election, Labour's vote slumped.

Such is the sense of gloom in Republican ranks that party leaders are openly admitting the possibility of defeat on November 7. There may be an element of managing expectation, but such doom-mongering is previously unheard of for the Republicans.

On Monday, both Dick Cheney, US vice-president, and Mitt Romney, outgoing governor of Massachusetts, who is tipped as a Republican presidential frontrunner for the 2008 election, conceded the possibility the Democrats could win the House.

Some are even contemplating a Democrat clean sweep of both chambers. The Democrats need to win just 15 more seats in the 435-member house to gain a majority and add six more in the senate where 33 of the chamber's 100 seats are up for grabs.

Polling shows that the level of motivation among Democratic voters is far higher than among Republicans.

And swing voters are turning to the Democrats. Even the mid-western state of Ohio, which proved critical to Mr Bush's 2004 presidential victory, is set to turn Democrat "blue", according to recent polls.

"If you look at what independent voters say about Iraq, the state of economy, and the recent scandals in Congress then they are all tilting Democrat," said Mark Mellman, a Democratic pollster.

The consequence is that for the first time in years, Republican hopes now hang less on the party's ability to win the argument but on its impressive war chest and famed ability to get out its own vote.

The financial edge over the Democrats is substantial. "We have a $56m advantage," said Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee.

Bush Limits Role On The Campaign Trail (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083125

At the start of this month, President George W. Bush traversed four states on a three-day swing in what seemed to usher in a hectic period of campaigning for the mid-term elections. White House officials said he would be on the road "almost constantly" and had more requests for him "than we could shake a stick at".

A glance at Mr Bush's schedule since then, however, suggests he has become the invisible man. Last week he had just two events for candidates. Instead he spent most of the week at the White House, finding time to pose with the US Air Force Thunderbirds aerobatic team and talk to the leader of the Southern Baptist Convention. His wife, Laura, a notoriously reluctant campaigner, had four campaign events.

This week is little different. Mr Bush has two campaign events on Thursday for senators whose images seem in worse shape than his own. George Allen's race in Virginia has been side-tracked since he uttered an alleged racial slur. Don Sherwood in Pennsylvania has been forced to run embarrassing adverts denying that he tried to choke a woman he was having an affair with.

Mr Bush's role is a reflection of his diminished stature, his low approval rating of 37 per cent and the fact he personifies an unpopular war. It contrasts with 2002, when his approval was at 62 per cent. From August to mid-October that year he spoke at 29 events with candidates. This year's equivalent number is 15, according to Congress Daily.

Republicans now often invoke Mr Bush in campaign adverts only to distance themselves. Chris Shays, a congressmen from Connecticut, says: "I've gone against the president and the Republican leadership when I think they're wrong." The only mention of Mr Bush on his website notes that he signed the "leave no pet behind" bill on disaster planning. Several candidates have cited "scheduling conflicts" to avoid appearing with Mr Bush. Michael Steele, a Senate candidate for Maryland missed his own presidential fundraiser.

Democrats want to make Mr Bush as visible as possible. Many have run advertisements targeting their rivals' votes for the "Bush agenda". Last week in an even more direct swipe, the September Fund, an independent group, launched a mocking advert showing Americans in a park interrogating a shrub. It cuts to an image of Mr Bush, noting it is "also kind of ridiculous to think you're going to get an answer from this one".

The White House denies he has been absent from the campaign. Sara Taylor, political director, says he has done more events than 2002. "There will be an aggressive schedule by the end of the campaign. We always anticipated this would be a challenging cycle and did events in the more competitive races early on."

She denies that the decision to focus on two less competitive races last week suggests his presence is too toxic for closer races. The rationale was to "make sure some of these second-tier candidates have an overpowering amount of resources".

Mr Bush's fundraising efforts have been unprecedented. The Republican National Committee says he has done 80 events, largely in closed private homes, bringing in $188m (€150m, £100m) this election cycle. That is a rate of about $179,000 per day. In 2002, according to Mark Knoller of CBS Radio News, Mr Bush did 68 fundraisers generating $145m.

While there is political logic in having these events in private homes, there is economic logic too, says Saul Anuzis, chairman of the Michigan Republican party. Hosting Mr Bush in a private home means they are more exclusive. "If there is a mass event there is a lower ticket price and the logistics are more of a headache."

Yet he concedes tensions. "The president is the best fundraiser the party has but at the same time his approval ratings are not at the highest levels so you are not looking for public events as much . . . On a net basis he is an asset, because you get free media and the motivation of the base."

For Republican strategists such as Charlie Black, the biggest difference Mr Bush can make is to define the debate by staging events. "What he can do is set the agenda."

While he is likely to have a busier schedule in the final three weeks, Mr Bush seems eager to play down his own role, telling Fox News this week: "All races are local. The president can help set the tone, the president can help frame the issues; but all races are local."

Laura Bush, Unlike George, A Hit On Republican Campaign Trail (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil

Bloomberg, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083126

When President George W. Bush came to Tennessee last month to raise money for Republican Senate candidate Bob Corker, the event was a no-press-allowed affair held at a private residence.

When first lady Laura Bush came for the same purpose last week, she appeared at the Knoxville Convention Center, with Corker standing proudly at her side -- and media most definitely welcome.

In this autumn of Republican discontent, party candidates who shy away from appearances with the president and Vice President Dick Cheney are gladly greeting the barnstorming first lady.

``She is more popular, and more welcome, in many parts of the country than the president," said former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer. ``In races where the moderates are in the most trouble, Laura Bush is the one who can do the most good."

Susan Whitson, the first lady's press secretary, said Laura Bush has attended three or four times as many events this year as she did four years ago. She has helped raise more than $14 million, including the $500,000 she generated for Corker and the Tennessee Republican Party in Knoxville.

``She likes doing it, and, more importantly, she understands the importance of doing it," Whitson said. ``She's happy to help any way she can."

Velvet Glove

As she hits the campaign trail on behalf of Republican candidates, the first lady, 59, favors the velvet glove approach over hard-edged partisanship.

In Knoxville, she praised Corker's position on education -- her signature issue -- and said he would work to keep taxes low and support the military.

``Bob's dedication to the people of Tennessee, and his achievements, remind us of why he must be elected to the United States Senate," she said.

Typically, there was no mention of Corker's Democratic opponent, Representative Harold Ford, or the national Democrats who have made antipathy to her husband an issue in the midterm elections.

While such positive, nonpartisan rhetoric is in keeping with the first lady's image as a traditional political spouse removed from policy making, ``State of Denial," a new book by Washington Post assistant managing editor Bob Woodward, paints a somewhat different picture.

Housecleaning

Woodward writes that she met frequently with former White House Chief of Staff Andy Card and supported his unsuccessful attempt to oust Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld as part of a second-term housecleaning.

White House press secretary Tony Snow on Sept. 29 quoted Whitson as saying that Woodward's account was ``flatly not true."

In a March 24 interview on CNN's ``Larry King Live" show, the first lady said she does discuss personnel matters with her husband. ``That's one of the things we do talk about the most, are personalities," she said. ``And I know everyone, as well as he does, who works here. I've worked with them also. So I would certainly give him that kind of advice."

The first lady's campaign stop in Tennessee was an example of the White House's strategy to use her in competitive races. Corker is in a tough battle for the seat now held by retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. Recent polls show him in a virtual dead heat with Ford.

First Lady, First Aid

While the president carried Tennessee in both 2000 and 2004, he is currently no more popular there than in the rest of the nation. A poll by Middle Tennessee State University conducted Sept. 19-30 found that Bush's job approval was 40 percent, close to his rating in national surveys.

Earlier this month, the first lady starred at fund-raising events for a pair of embattled New York congressman, Tom Reynolds and John Sweeney.

She has also campaigned for a trio of Connecticut House members -- Chris Shays, Nancy Johnson and Rob Simmons -- as well as Republican Senator Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island. All face difficult races.

DOJ_NMG_0083127

While the president has occasionally campaigned in places where he's especially unpopular, such as Connecticut, many candidates -- among them, Corker and Senator Mike DeWine of Ohio -- have appeared with him only at private events. DeWine is battling a stiff challenge from Democrat Sherrod Brown.

Closed Events

According to the president's schedule and a list of public speeches, including fund-raisers, posted on the White House Web site, 46 percent of his campaign events during this election cycle have been private affairs off-limits to the press.

His wife, with no political baggage to speak of, has no qualms about venturing into campaign no-man's land. ``There aren't many places where it is easy for the president to go these days, but that's not true for her, and candidates don't have to be afraid of being seen with her," said Stuart Rothenberg, editor of the Rothenberg Political Report, a nonpartisan newsletter based in Washington.

While pollsters don't often ask respondents to rate first ladies, a January USA Today/CNN/Gallup survey measured Mrs. Bush's job approval rating at 82 percent. For the president's second term, the first lady's approval numbers have been roughly twice her husband's.

They also compare favorably with other recent first ladies. Gallup surveys show Hillary Rodham Clinton left the White House with a 66 percent approval rating, Barbara Bush was at 85 percent early in her husband's term and Nancy Reagan left with 74 percent approving of her performance.

Presidential Punchline

The disparity between the president's poll ratings and those of his wife has occasionally led him to joke about the spousal approval gap.

At an Oct. 4 event for Republican Representative Rick Renzi in Scottsdale, Arizona, Bush said, ``I know Renzi well enough to know that he can be a plainspoken fellow. And he said to me, `I want you to know, you weren't my first choice for this breakfast.'"

To gales of laughter, Bush quoted Renzi as saying: ```I really wanted Laura to come.'"

First Real Test Of Rove's Game Plan (FT)

By Jacob Weisberg

Financial Times, October 19, 2006

Is Karl Rove the great mastermind of American politics? Everyone seems to think so. President George W. Bush's nicknames for him include The Architect and Boy Genius. Other Republicans see Mr Rove as a shaman who can conjure victory out of the air – and Democrats tend to agree. (They prefer to think they have been losing to a nefarious wizard than to a lazy lightweight.) The political press, always more comfortable with personality than ideology, cottons on readily to the myth that the country is run by an elusive puppeteer.

Mr Rove is indisputably a detail-minded, relentless and methodical political operator with unusual skill at networking and organisation-building. He is also, clearly, a strategic and historical thinker. The conventional assumption has long been that elections are fought in the centre and that whoever can claim the lion's share of persuadable voters wins. But after Mr Bush took office in 2001,

Mr Rove stood that too-obvious notion on its head, rejecting the pursuit of swing votes in favour of a deliver-the-base plan. Boiled down to a line, Roveism says that Republicans can win by mobilising and motivating their core supporters. The 2004 election seemed to prove the theory right.

How Republicans Hope To Hold The Senate (Time)

By MIKE ALLEN

Time, October 19, 2006

By holding their breath, for starters. With party strategists increasingly afraid the Senate is slipping away, Republican officials are moving money around in high-stakes triage.

BY MIKE ALLEN/WASHINGTON

Republican officials are trying to project confidence about keeping the Senate by spending heavily, and forcing Democrats to do the same, in blue states like Michigan, Maryland and New Jersey. But: Florida in 2000. Ohio in '04. Virginia in '06?

DOJ_NMG_0083128

Strategists in both parties tell TIME that they now believe control of the Senate could turn on a race that wasn't on anyone's toss-up list two months ago -- the Democratic challenge by former Navy Secretary Jim Webb (D) to Senator George Allen, a once-popular Republican who has suffered an epidemic of self-inflicted wounds.

Top GOP officials deny they are depending on any one state, or that an implosion in any particular state such as Ohio necessarily means disaster on Nov. 7. "We've always had a couple of scenarios for keeping the Senate -- I think that's the best way to play it," said a Republican Party decision-maker who spoke on condition of anonymity in order to be more candid. "I'm not saying this is a great year. It is possible."

The National Republican Senatorial Committee, which had once hoped the son of the legendary Washington Redskins coach would be able to fend for himself, is having to spend $900,000 on radio ads and mailings in Virginia to try to shore up Allen, a boot-wearing, tobacco-dipping conservative who once hoped to fill the Ronald Reagan niche in the '08 presidential field. The committee had already spent $450,000 there, but decided this week that it would have to spend the maximum it can, doubling its investment.

"Senator Allen has to make sure his margins are high in Southwest Virginia, and then he has to neutralize somewhat Northern Virginia," the Republican official said. "He's focused on both of those, but the environment's tough." President George W. Bush is appearing Thursday at a fund-raising reception at the Science Museum of Virginia, in Richmond -- a telling sign of how critical the race has become.

Republican officials say they budgeted money for Virginia, and deny that it's a hardship. But that IS $900,000 that can't help transfuse Sen. Mike DeWine in Ohio -- a race that some GOP officials believe is lost but that others insist remains a top priority. And it's $900,000 that can't help Republicans pull off a coup in New Jersey, where even Democrats concede that Sen. Robert Menendez is vulnerable to Tom Kean Jr., a Republican whose father was Governor, because of continuing revelations about Menendez links to corruption. "We're optimistic about New Jersey," the GOP official said. "People see him as a crook. It's on the front page of the newspaper all the time. It's in these people's minds." On the other side, a new ad from the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) says Kean "sided with George Bush" on Iraq and concludes: "Tom Kean Junior. Wrong on Bush. Wrong on Iraq. Wrong for New Jersey."

The political world went into a tizzy on Monday after the lead story of The New York Times, based on authoritative sourcing, said party officials had decided "to effectively write off" DeWine's seat. Several polls since then have showed the Democrat, Sherrod Brown, opening up a sizeable lead over DeWine. Phil Singer, the DSCC communications director, gleefully issued a memo accusing Republicans of a "Cut & Run" strategy in Ohio. Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman held a conference call with Ohio reporters to say that DeWine remains an "incredibly top priority."

"We're putting our money where our mouth is," Mehlman said on the call. "No state will receive more resources from the Republican National Committee than Ohio. From this point forward, we will spend millions more on turnout and millions more on message. We have a huge staff. And intend and have right now a very aggressive program." A national party committee on Tuesday launched a new television ad campaign attacking Brown.

Another Republican official said the party is banking on the message that Brown is "incredibly liberal, and the state just isn't that liberal, and there's time for people to learn a lot more about Brown."

As proof that they are not limiting themselves to a few firewall states, NRSC officials say they are spending $650,000 in Maryland, where Lt. Gov. Michael Steele once was one of the party's greatest hopes to pick up a Democratic seat, but finds himself struggling against Democrat Ben Cardin in an overwhelmingly Democratic state.

Republican officials now concede they could lose a net of 23 to 27 seats in the House, that higher figure being close to twice the 15 Democrats would need to take control. Democrats would need six seats to take control of the Senate, and Republican officials tell TIME they see several scenarios for warding that off. One Republican strategist close to the White House gave this forecast: "We're going to lose Pennsylvania, Ohio and Rhode Island. That's three. Virginia, I think we hold. Tennessee, I think we hold. I'm less certain we're going to hold Missouri and I'm least certain we hold Montana. But to take control, Democrats have to win three of those four, and that's unlikely." If Democrats picked up five, the chamber would be 50-50, guaranteeing frequent appearances by Vice President Cheney as President of the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0083129

Some White House officials became convinced that the House might be lost after they saw polls showing the page scandal had brutalized Republican approval ratings, and one senior party official says that's also part of the reason that the party's hold on the Senate is in such peril. "I kind of see the Foley thing as the tipping point," the official said. "People are just unhappy already and that just did it."

September

2010:29 am

Clearing the Diplomatic Brush: What Happens at the U.N. When Bush and Clinton Collide

Posted by Mike Allen | E-Mail This | Permalink | Comments (0)

Former President Bill Clinton was holding court in a hallway at the soul-deadening United Nations complex in Manhattan on Tuesday when his Secret Service agents started to stir. Another Secret Service detail was coming down the elevator, accompanying his successor.

"Look who's here!" President George W. Bush called out merrily. The William J. Clinton foundation is based in New York, and No. 42 is taking over a Sheraton this week for the second annual edition of his Clinton Global Initiative, which aims to change the world by focusing the attention of 50 heads of state, a smattering of celebrities and other leaders on energy and climate change, global health, poverty alleviation, and mitigating religious and ethnic conflict. First Lady Laura Bush helps him kick off the three-day gathering Wednesday, an invitation that came partly in reciprocation for asking him to speak last year at the Texas Book Festival, which she founded.

So Clinton had a few things on his mind but he roared a friendly greeting to No. 43. The President was dashing out of a luncheon early and heading back to his hotel for a meeting with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, who was hitching a ride in the White House motorcade.

"Have you met Talabani?" Bush asked Clinton, using a casual shorthand that might be startling if you weren't used to the President's gregarious approach to personal diplomacy. The discouraging news about Iraq continues, including the statement by Gen. John Abizaid, who oversees the U.S. Central Command, at breakfast with defense reporters on Tuesday that the number of American soldiers in-country â€“ now up to 140,000 -- is unlikely to go down before next spring.

But at least for an hour, the President got to bask in adulation from Talabani, who saluted him before cameras as "the hero of liberation of Iraq." Talabani went on to say his people "very much appreciate the sacrifice of brave American army, those who gave their life to liberate our country from the worst kind of dictatorship." Bush had introduced him to reporters by saying: "History will judge you kindly, Mr. President, when they look back and realize that under your leadership a new democracy began to flourish in the heart of the Middle East, called Iraq."

In keeping with White House custom, they were appearing before a pair of Iraqi flags and a pair of U.S. flags, meeting cameras after the non-public part of the meeting, which included about eight delegation members and translators on each side. Aides later revealed that Bush and Talabani had a brief one-on-one as well.

Meghan O'Sullivan, Deputy National Security Advisor for Iraq and Afghanistan, told reporters later that the two had begun talking through an Arabic interpreter. "But I'd say about 20 minutes into the meeting, Talabani sort of leaned forward in his seat, and the President kind of leaned forward in his seat, and they just started talking in English," O'Sullivan recalled. "I think they were feeling that the pace of their exchange and what they wanted to say was being slowed down by the translation."

O'Sullivan was then asked about a statement the President had made during his availability with Talabani. "I spoke today at the United Nations, and in my speech I spoke directly to the people of Iraq," he said. " â€¦ I want them to know we appreciate their courage. And I want them to know that the United States of America stands with them, so long as the government continues to make the tough choices necessary for peace to prevail."

Reporters perked up their ears when they heard the "so long as" part. Olivier Knox of Agence France-Presse drew laughter from the press corps when he told O'Sullivan that "sounds like conditional love to me."

"That's something that has been in a lot of the President's comments," O'Sullivan replied, suggesting this was not new news, but also not disabusing him of his interpretation. "And I think it reflects the reality that the Iraqis have a lot of difficult decisions to do, these are hard decision to make, and that we need to both encourage and urge them to take on these decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0083130

â€¦ We look at the security situation and recognize that part of this has a security solution, but a security solution won't be the whole solution. It's got to be a political one, as well, it has to be an economic one, as well."

Jim Rutenberg of The New York Times followed up by asking if there is a "kind of if/then â€¦ that if they don't rise to the challenge, the U.S. will be less inclined to continue helping?"

"There was no 'if/then' in the conversation that happened today," O'Sullivan responded. "I don't think there was anything threatening about it. It was constructive." The President was headed back to Washington in late morning after a meeting with Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas.

Practically No One Thinks Republicans Can Hold The House (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, October 19, 2006

Except at the White House and the top reaches of the Republican National Committee, I can hardly find a single politician, consultant or pollster, Democratic or Republican, who thinks the GOP can retain control of the House.

And even at the White House, the messages are mixed. Strategist-in-chief Karl Rove is proclaiming that Republicans will pull out a victory. On the other hand, one aide also told me that the chances of Republicans retaining narrow control is in the 40 percent to 45 percent range — that is, less than a 50-50 shot — while Democrats' chances of winning either narrowly or with a bigger margin are greater.

Republicans are more optimistic about the Senate, where they think retaining contested seats in Arizona, Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia will leave them with a 51-seat majority, assuming they lose in Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island, and fail to pick up New Jersey.

GOP officials hotly deny reports that they are pulling money out of Sen. Mike DeWine's (R) desperate bid to survive a catastrophic political climate in Ohio, but in recent polls he trails Rep. Sherrod Brown (D) by double digits.

Republican consultants I've talked to say they expect House losses to range anywhere from 20 seats — five more than Democrats need to take over — up to 30 or more.

Democrats say they frantically are trying to keep up with new House opportunities that previously were deemed second- or third-tier contests — as many as 60 seats potentially in play, up from 50 a few weeks ago. "The field is vast," one consultant told me.

As The Washington Post reported Wednesday, Democratic operatives desperately are appealing for money to contest newly competitive House races to establish a working majority, rather than a narrow one.

Among the seats Democrats now consider in play are Colorado's 5th district, which came open with the retirement of GOP Rep. Joel Hefley. President Bush carried the district with 66 percent of the vote in 2004. Also considered in play is Michigan's 7th, where Bush won 54 percent and moderate Rep. Joe Schwarz lost the GOP primary to conservative Tim Walberg.

Other potential new targets are Reps. Jim Leach in Iowa's 2nd district; Jean Schmidt in Ohio's 2nd; Gil Gutknecht in Minnesota's 1st; Mike Ferguson in New Jersey's 7th; Charles Bass in New Hampshire's 2nd; Robin Hayes in North Carolina's 8th; and Cathy McMorris in Washington's 5th, plus Nevada's 2nd, an open seat being vacated by GOP Rep. Jim Gibbons.

Bush carried those 10 districts by an average of 54.7 percent.

For Republicans, the optimistic view has been that the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) would fade quickly and allow Republicans to get back to their message — namely, that the economy is good and that Democrats can't be trusted on national security. Then, the GOP would kick in with its superior financial and get-out-the-vote machinery to rescue its candidates from a generally unfavorable environment.

But the Foley scandal hasn't disappeared, the guilty plea by Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) has revived the Jack Abramoff scandal, and the already endangered Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) is the target of a separate federal investigation.

Now, Congress' collective approval rating is down to 24 percent, according to Gallup, just a point higher than it was in late October 1994, when Democrats lost 52 House seats and eight Senate seats.

DOJ_NMG_0083131

The news from Iraq remains depressingly violent, and the prospect of a post-election call for a new strategy from a commission headed by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.) does not improve the environment.

Bush's overall approval rating in the latest Gallup Poll was 37 percent, 4 points below what former President Bill Clinton's was in 1994. Dealing with North Korea's nuclear threat may help him marginally, but it hurts that the threat is worsening on his watch.

The latest RealClearPolitics.com generic ballot gives Democrats a 14-point edge in House races. In 1994, Republicans outpolled Democrats by just 7 points, and Democratic experts calculate that, factoring in gerrymandering of House districts, they need a national vote margin of just 7 points to 8 points to capture 15 seats.

In a joint survey for National Public Radio, the first-rate GOP and Democratic polling firms Public Opinion Strategies and Greenberg Quinlan Rosner reported this week that in the 48 most-contested House districts, when voters were asked, by name, which candidate they favored, 50 percent chose the Democrat to 43 percent for the Republican. Six percent were undecided.

In the 38 districts now held by Republicans of those 48 contested seats, Democrats outscored the GOP by 48 percent to 44 percent. In 2004, Republican candidates won in those districts by an average of 58.7 percent.

In the 35 districts carried by President Bush in 2004, Democrats outpolled Republicans by 50 percent to 43 percent in the NPR poll. In 2004, Bush carried those districts with an average of 57 percent of the vote.

The NPR poll confirmed earlier national survey findings that Democrats currently outmatch Republicans in both "voter intensity" — the enthusiasm they have about voting — and "voter loyalty," their preference for their own party's candidate.

Eighty-nine percent of voters who supported Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in 2004 say they plan to vote for the Democrat for Congress this year, the survey showed, while only 73 percent of Bush voters plan to vote Republican.

Moreover, NPR found, independent voters in the 48 districts broke 50 percent to 30 percent for Democrats, confirming other polls showing a lopsided preference for Democrats among independents.

Party professionals often say that "independents don't vote" in off-year elections, and the NPR poll calculated that they'd represent just 14 percent of voters in the 48 key districts. However, exit polls show that they accounted for 27 percent of the vote in 1994 and split 56 percent to 44 percent for Republicans.

One GOP pollster told me that the Democratic tilt of swing voters — especially independents and white women — is the main factor operating against his party this year. "They are frustrated with the lack of success in Iraq. They are scared about the future of the economy. They doubt us on social issues. And, they say, 'We let you run things for 12 years. We want something different.'"

The result, he said, is that "Democrats are sitting on our three-yard line. It's first and goal. Maybe we can hold them, but they've got four plays to score. If they don't, it's their fault." The bottom line is that Republicans need to be better at defense than the Chicago Bears.

Fight For Congress Extends Into GOP Strongholds (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- America does not get much more Republican than Idaho. President Bush pulled in 68 percent of the vote in 2004, and the state has an all-GOP congressional delegation.

But to keep one of Idaho's House seats in Republican hands, the national GOP in recent weeks has poured in hundreds of thousands of dollars for television ads and brought in a parade of party bigwigs to campaign.

Such a huge effort in a district that should be a cakewalk for Republicans is a measure of how deep into GOP territory the fight for control of Congress has reached.

Over the last two months, the number of House Republican seats in serious contention has jumped week by week, giving Democrats an ever-bigger target to shoot at in their quest for a majority. Even a top Republican strategist estimates that the number of highly vulnerable Republican seats has more than doubled in recent weeks -- and now far exceeds the 15 seats Democrats need to pick up to win a House majority.

DOJ_NMG_0083132

"Things look very bad for them now," GOP pollster Frank Luntz said of Republican prospects. "There used to be 15 races that were vulnerable, then it was 20. . . . Today you'd say 35 seats are in play."

In the battle for the Senate, prospects are brighter than they were a few months ago for Democrats to pick up the six seats they need to win control.

All that reflects an unusually fluid political landscape that has sent candidates, party leaders and interest groups scrambling to recalibrate strategy. The Republican Party has dropped plans for ads in South Carolina and other areas they now concede are lost causes. The AFL-CIO has opened fronts in its get-out-the-vote drive in Tennessee and Virginia, reflecting the union's assessment that Democratic chances have improved there. National Democratic leaders are taking greater interest in districts in California and Minnesota, where newly strengthened candidates need support.

"It's hard to keep track of the new races that are looking very competitive," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., vice chairman of the committee responsible for electing Democrats to the House. "They are popping up all over the place."

Bush will be doing his part for Republicans on Thursday, campaigning for two incumbents who are in worse political shape than they were just two months ago: Sen. George Allen of Virginia, who had been expected to coast to re-election but is now less assured after a series of missteps; and Rep. Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania, who is fighting for political survival amid accusations that he tried to choke his mistress.

The president has remained publicly upbeat about Republicans' prospects, despite the bruising the party has taken over the congressional page sex scandal, sectarian violence in Iraq and criticism of Bush's handling of the North Korean nuclear threat.

But privately, GOP anxiety is growing -- especially among House Republicans who believe their leaders' handling of the page scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., has made a bad situation worse. After listening in on a telephone conference call among House Republicans last week, Luntz said, "The bitterness about how the leadership has handled Foley is indescribable."

In more evidence of the challenge facing Republicans, a new poll found that voter support for the party and its continued leadership of Congress has sunk below the level Democrats saw before they lost control of the House and Senate in 1994.

The Wall Street Journal/NBC News Poll, released Wednesday, pegged voter approval of Congress at 16 percent, matching its lowest point since the House bank scandal of 1992 that set the stage for Democrats to lose their majorities. Voters in the new survey also said they preferred Democrats over Republicans to control Congress, 52 percent to 37 percent -- a gap that, according to a Wall Street Journal account, far exceeds the 6-point lead that Republicans enjoyed just before taking control of Congress in 1994.

The poll included 1,006 registered voters and carried a margin of error of 3.1 percentage points.

Still, some analysts say Republicans could reduce their losses in the final weeks of the campaign if the spotlight moves to issues that play to GOP strengths, such as the war on terrorism and falling gas prices.

"The spotlight could shift another time or two before Nov. 7," said Charlie Cook, editor of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

For some time, the House has seemed much more likely than the Senate to turn Democratic. That was in part because most of the competitive Senate races have been in conservative-leaning states, such as Montana, Missouri and Tennessee -- thought to be tough terrain for Democrats. Not long ago, only two incumbent Republicans in Democratic-leaning states seemed ripe for picking: Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania and Lincoln Chafee in Rhode Island.

In recent months, however, a series of developments have made it easier to imagine Democrats winning the six seats they are looking for. Some analysts have practically written off Montana, where Republican Sen. Conrad Burns has been under fire for his links to disgraced former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff. In four other key states, Democrats are running close to or ahead of Republican opponents: Ohio, Tennessee, Virginia and Missouri.

In the final three weeks of the campaign, both parties will be deciding on almost a daily basis how to allocate resources. "This is a very fluid process," said Brian Nick, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

Republicans are debating how much money to pour into Ohio. GOP Sen. Mike DeWine is trailing his Democratic opponent by double digits and may be a lost cause. But at the same time, the state has several competitive House races that would be hurt if the national party pulled back.Republicans also face a choice about how much to invest in New Jersey, where Sen. Robert Menendez is about the only incumbent Democratic senator who seems at risk.

DOJ_NMG_0083133

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee this week put up its first ad for him. Republicans transferred $500,000 to help GOP challenger Tom Kean Jr. pay for ads. But it remains to be seen whether the GOP will make a further commitment to this heavily Democratic state.

The battle for the House is even more fluid. The Cook Political Report's count of the most hotly contested Republican seats has hit 43, up from 35 in early September.

In the GOP stronghold of Idaho, an especially surprising contest is brewing. In a race to succeed Republican Rep. Butch Otter, a bitter GOP primary was won by state legislator William Sali, who has been at odds with the state party establishment and has had trouble raising money.

The National Republican Congressional Committee this week weighed in with an ad attacking Democrat Larry Grant. The air time it bought was worth $377,000 over three weeks, according to a survey of local stations by Grant's media consultant, Peter Fenn. To further boost the Republican, Vice President Dick Cheney, Republican Party chairman Ken Mehlman and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., have campaigned there.

"If someone had told me six months ago that Republicans would bring in the vice president, the speaker of the House and the Republican chairman in a month and a half's time, I would have said they were stark raving crazy," said Fenn.

Meanwhile, Republicans have pulled back most of their efforts to challenge Democratic incumbents such as Rep. John Spratt of South Carolina and Alan Mollohan of West Virginia. The GOP campaign committee has given back air time it had reserved for those races, as well as for two open seats in Ohio.

Democrats are juggling demands from candidates for attention and resources. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has begun listing "emerging campaigns" to encourage donors to give to promising candidates.

Uphill Hike For Republicans In Colorado (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. -- Even amid the Rocky Mountains, it is hard to paint Colorado as a pretty picture for Republicans this fall.

Rep. Bob Beauprez, the former state party chairman, is trailing in the race for governor, and Republicans could lose his House seat in suburban Denver as well. Here in the Fifth District, retiring Rep. Joel Hefley refuses to endorse the Republican running for his seat. And in the vast rural Fourth, stretching from Fort Collins to the state's eastern high plains, the national party is spending heavily to save Rep. Marilyn Musgrave in counties President Bush won easily.

• Interactive Graphic:1 More information on the candidates and issues in Colorado's fourth district2, fifth district3 and seventh district4.

Colorado Democrats, having been teased before, know this bubble can yet burst. But the combination of war in Iraq and scandal at home has fed into voter frustration with Congress, for which Republicans as the majority are paying a price. A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News Poll suggests Congress is at its lowest standing with the electorate since at least 1992. In a nod to this, during a campaign debate over the summer Mr. Beauprez asked to be addressed as "Bob," not "congressman."

Heading into next month's midterm elections, Colorado -- with its history of ticket-splitting -- illustrates the nation's roller-coaster politics this year. Ms. Musgrave faces not one, but two challengers: a former Reagan appointee and Vietnam veteran who poses with his 2005 Harley Davidson Softail Deluxe, and a state legislator who is a onetime high-school basketball star from the South Bronx.

"We've always been a state that's quirky. We're populist, we're anti-Washington," says Republican Rick O'Donnell, locked in a tight race for Mr. Beauprez's Seventh District seat. "I'm running in a headwind, but I'm also thrilled not being an incumbent."

For the White House, having three Republican seats in play in a state like Colorado spells trouble. Democrats must net 15 seats to take over the House; even if they fail, administration officials privately worry that a loss of 10 to 12 seats could hamstring the president's agenda and make him more of a lame duck.

DOJ_NMG_0083134

Yet to save themselves, Colorado Republicans have so forcefully seized the issue of illegal immigration, they risk alienating Latino voters and crippling Mr. Bush's efforts to address the problem of millions of undocumented workers now in the U.S.

This week a Texas millionaire who helped finance the Swift Boat campaign against John Kerry resurfaced behind immigration ads in Denver targeting Democrat Ed Perlmutter, who has held a narrow lead over Mr. O'Donnell.

Meanwhile, Ms. Musgrave, a star to the Christian right but a lackluster campaigner, is proving to be costly. Not only has she required sizable aid from the national party, but her actions helped to jeopardize the race for the seat from the neighboring Fifth District, by aggravating the divide between traditional Western conservatives such as Mr. Hefley and a more aggressive type of conservative identified with her national campaign against same-sex marriage.

"I wonder if they are going to get tired of saving Marilyn and look at somebody they don't have to save every time," Mr. Hefley says.

Ms. Musgrave was instrumental in lining up money and endorsements for Doug Lamborn, a state senator who won the August primary with the guidance of a veteran Musgrave political operative. Allies including the Colorado Christian Coalition sent mailings accusing Mr. Lamborn's Republican rivals of supporting a radical homosexual agenda, and the nastiness of the primary campaign infuriated Mr. Hefley, a 20-year incumbent who had warned the candidates to avoid negative attacks.

"I will not vote for Doug Lamborn, I will not," says Mr. Hefley, who was chairman of the House Ethics Committee when the panel admonished then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay for conduct in fund raising and pressing a colleague on a vote.

Mr. Lamborn says of his politics: "I stand for principle. I'm not much of a compromiser."

The White House is worried enough that the president intervened personally with Mr. Hefley, but to no avail.

Mr. Bush "is on top of this, a little race in the West," Mr. Hefley says with some wonder, and a chuckle. "It puts me at the center of a hurricane....If Lamborn loses, I will get full credit for it."

Ms. Musgrave says she acted out of friendship for Mr. Lamborn, and denies any swipe at Mr. Hefley tied to Mr. DeLay, whose political committees have helped her in the past. Nonetheless, the feud has created an opening for Democratic newcomer Jay Fawcett, an Air Force Academy graduate and combat veteran who finds himself suddenly competitive in a district with a 2-1 Republican advantage.

A recent Denver Post poll showed the two men running neck and neck with a large undecided vote. Republicans say the numbers are misleading, but anecdotal evidence from Democratic polls for Bill Ritter, Mr. Beauprez's rival in the gubernatorial race, also show him running better than expected in El Paso County, the heart of the Fifth District.

Mr. Fawcett hopes to reach out to disaffected Republicans and independents by going back to fundamentals like the Constitution. At a debate Saturday, when asked what values are most important to "our national culture," Mr. Lamborn spoke of "marriage between one man and one woman." Mr. Fawcett cited the Constitution. "It talks about rights and it talks about responsibilities," he said. "If we lose the Constitution, we lose America."

In the Fourth District, independent candidate Frederic "Eric" Eidsness, a disaffected Republican running on the Reform slate, wants Congress to reassert itself under the Constitution. "The shifting of balance of power to the executive branch is dangerous," he said at a recent candidate forum in Longmont. His campaign is being helped by former Republican Rep. Jim Johnson, who once represented the district and challenged Richard Nixon over the Vietnam War.

With little money, Mr. Eidsness can't expect to win, but could be a factor in determining who does, depending on the votes he takes from the other candidates. Ms. Musgrave leads her Democratic rival, state Rep. Angie Paccione, after ads highlighting Ms. Paccione's personal financial troubles and bankruptcy 14 years ago. But Ms. Paccione, who has won praise from farm interests for listening to their concerns, isn't yielding.

At the Longmont candidate forum Thursday night, the congresswoman read her speech and left without answering reporters' questions.

By comparison, Ms. Paccione, a record-setting high-school basketball player who went on to Stanford, made her remarks with intensity. Republicans call her "Angry Angie"; Ms. Paccione, the daughter of an African-American mother and an Italian father, says it is just her spirit.

"I am unbought and unbossed," she says. "I'm a very passionate person because I believe there is a desperate need for change in America."

DOJ_NMG_0083135

Democrats Set Sights On Wins In Ohio (WP/AP)

By David Espo

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

GREENVILLE, Ohio. -- For more than a decade, Ohio was the place where Democratic dreams went to die. Now, in the state that sealed President Bush's 2004 re-election, even Republicans concede Rep. Ted Strickland in on track to become the first Democratic governor in 16 years.

At the same time, Rep. Sherrod Brown has clawed his way to a large lead in the polls over GOP Sen. Mike DeWine.

Democrats have led for weeks for two House seats long in Republican hands, and party officials talk giddily of snatching two or three more seats _ gains that would almost certainly portend an end to GOP control of the House.

Already Republicans have abandoned plans to advertise or run their highly regarded get-out-the-vote program in races to replace Brown or Strickland in the House.

"There is this Republican fatigue here in Ohio," says Chris Redfern, chairman of a Democratic Party that has been shut out in statewide political races for more than a decade.

"We've got incompetent leadership at the statehouse and you can't beat that right? But every day there's George Bush," he said with more than a hint of sarcasm.

Republicans dismiss talk of a political tidal wave, and say even Rep. Deborah Pryce, a member of the House leadership, is making a comeback in a race that seemed lost.

But increasingly, their goal is to minimize losses at a time of widespread voter discontent over the economy, the war in Iraq and corruption.

Sensing danger, they urge voters not to lash out indiscriminately, despite unhappiness with President Bush, outgoing Republican Gov. Bob Taft and a steady diet of scandals.

"Some things have happened over the years that shouldn't have happened," State Auditor Betty Montgomery confessed to a Republican gathering in western Ohio recently. "But that isn't everybody's fault."

Even politicians at the dawn of a congressional career criticize Taft, who is concluding his second term with low approval ratings.

"When a governor raises taxes as a Republican, particularly when you're trying to get out of a recession, that's just bad leadership," said Jim Jordan, who clashed with the governor while serving in the legislature. Jordan is favored to win an open House seat with ease.

Not even Democrats could dream up the corruption double feature that has unspooled in recent days, GOP Rep. Bob Ney pleading guilty in the Jack Abramoff scandal last Friday, and party fundraiser Tom Noe going on trial in a separate state corruption probe on Monday.

"Bob Ney is a liar, a criminal and a disgrace to public service," said Republican chairman Bob Bennett in a written statement. Not coincidentally, perhaps, Democrats lead in the polls in the race for his seat.

Public polling underscores the political difficulty for Republicans, particularly DeWine and gubernatorial candidate J. Kenneth Blackwell.

A New York Times/CBS News survey reported that 70 percent of Ohioans surveyed said the state and the nation were on the wrong track.

Nearly two-thirds rated the economy as bad, suggesting more anxiety about jobs and pocketbook issues than elsewhere in the country. Sixty percent disapprove of Bush's handling of the war.

Even lifelong Republicans, the men and women who donate their money and time, make plain their distress.

Outside a fundraiser, one man strode up to Rep. John Boehner, the House majority leader, and lectured him about the scandal involving disgraced Rep. Mark Foley and his sexually explicit computer messages to congressional pages.

A few hours later, Betty Fox stopped to answer questions at the Darke County Republican party pig roast, a pulled pork-and-speeches affair in a cavernous cinder-block exhibition hall on the local fair grounds.

DOJ_NMG_0083136

She'll vote Republican up and down the ticket, she said, but Iraq weighs on her mind. "I was all for Bush going in there because I thought he had prayed about it," the 77-year-old Greenville resident said. But, she added, "It isn't going well and I don't know what can be done about it."

There's no barbecue or slaw _ or friendly chatter _ 90 miles distant that evening. It's more like dueling pistols at close range when Rep. Steve Chabot and Democratic challenger John Cranley debate in suburban Cincinnati.

A conservative since his election to Congress in 1994, Chabot tries to establish independent credentials. He stresses that he was one of only 16 GOP lawmakers to support Democratic legislation increasing disclosure of political activities.

Condemning Foley, he says anyone who knew about his activities and didn't take action "should be bounced out ... I don't care who they are."

Then he turns his attention to his rival, a member of the Cincinnati city council. The city has a bad business environment, he says. "Crime rates are way too high, too."

Cranley is next. "When Steve got elected in 1994 on the Contract with America they said they were going to end the scandals. Boy did they fail," he said. "They preach market solutions and what do they do? They give out no-bid contracts."

He criticizes Republicans on the war in Iraq and for refusing to raise the minimum wage increase. "I've taken a pledge not to accept a pay raise until the federal budget is balanced," he concludes.

Chabot, relentless, sees an opening.

"It's great my opponent takes a pledge not to take a pay raise in Congress, because he's taken them on the city council."

Given the political environment, officials in both parties budgeted for television advertising in the Chabot-Cranley race months ago, and have made good on their promises.

It's Chabot's toughest race in six years, a durable incumbent struggling against a tide. In contrast, Republican officials say Rep. Jean Schmidt's difficulties in a next-door district are largely of her own making.

Elected to a safely Republican seat in 2005, she quickly drew national attention during a debate over Iraq. "Cowards cut and run, Marines never do," she said, speaking of Rep. John Murtha, a 37-year veteran of the Marines. She quickly apologized.

If Murtha, D-Pa., forgave, he didn't forget, campaigning recently for Democratic challenger Victoria Wulsin. Unlike Cranley, Wulsin is in political limbo, waiting to find out whether Democratic Party strategists in Washington deem her race competitive enough to invest in.

"I think Rahm Emanuel is about to send me a check, so that's good," she said of the chairman of the House Democratic campaign committee. "I don't think it's come yet."

Republicans insist Chabot is comfortably ahead, and Schmidt is in no danger of losing.

But they're not taking any chances, either, even though the district gave Bush 64 percent of the vote in 2004.

The House GOP campaign committee recently spent more than $100,000 for mass mailings to shore up Schmidt's chances.

DNC To Borrow Money For Last-minute Tossups (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

The Democratic National Committee will borrow up to $10 million for additional House and Senate campaigns the DNC now thinks it has a chance to win in next month's midterm elections, a senior party official said yesterday.

With some campaign polls showing that more Republican-held seats than previously believed were vulnerable to a Democratic takeover, DNC Chairman Howard Dean has decided to obtain last-minute loans to pour more money into TV ads and other campaign assistance during the next 19 days, the party official told The Washington Times.

"I can confirm that the DNC is taking out a line of credit for a possible $5 million to $10 million loan to target more funding towards predominantly Senate and also House races," the official told the Times.

Some of the borrowed money will be spent on "an outreach-media program" aimed at black and Hispanic voters in targeted House races where increased minority turnout is seen as the key to boosting Democratic gains in Congress, the official said.

DOJ_NMG_0083137

With 19 days to go before the election, Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), and Sen. Charles E. Schumer, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, have been pressuring Mr. Dean to pour money into a number of their party's unexpectedly close races.

Two possible targets for additional funding are in Virginia, where Republican Sen. George Allen is in a surprisingly tight battle with Democrat James H. Webb Jr., and in New Jersey, where Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez is in a dead heat with Republican state Sen. Tom Kean Jr.

Mr. Emanuel, who has been bickering with Mr. Dean for much of the year over campaign funding for House races, thinks that as many as 58 seats are now in play and that with more campaign resources, Democrats could pick up as many as 40 seats, instead of the original estimates of 15 to 20.

Independent forecasters also point to a higher number of Republican congressional seats that are now at risk. Political analyst Stuart Rothenberg told his weekly newsletter subscribers yesterday that "we are increasing our target range of likely Democratic gains to 18-25 [House] seats, and we cannot completely rule out the possibility of a tidal wave that could produce a Democratic gain well above that."

The DNC has spent most of its funds on Mr. Dean's national party-building strategy to put paid campaign workers in all of the states this year.

"They see an opportunity of a lifetime to regain the majority, and they don't want to miss that because of lack of money. They are willing to take a risk with credit rather than being underfunded in the final weeks," said Nathan Gonzales, an election analyst at the Rothenberg Political Report.

Heading into the final leg of the election last month, the Republican National Committee reported raising $7.7 million in August, with $29.8 million cash on hand, while the DNC said it had raised $6.6 million but had only $10.9 million in the bank, according to the latest figures available.

DNC officials said yesterday that they had raised $25 million this year for the campaigns, the bulk of which went into House and Senate races.

The Republican Party has substantially outraised the Democrats in the battleground congressional races. Federal Election Commission reports showed the National Republican Congressional Committee has spent $28 million on behalf of its candidates in 27 tossup contests, compared with $13.8 million spent by the DCCC.

"Between now and the election, we will spend $100 million in target House and Senate races," White House political strategist Karl Rove said Tuesday in an interview with reporters and editors at the Times.

Conservative Voters Likely To Stay Home (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

The Republican Party can stave off defeat with a strong turnout on Nov. 7, party leaders are telling the faithful -- but they are finding it tough to sell that message to some disillusioned conservative voters.

"The message hasn't gotten across because a lot of people are sick and tired of thinking the only reason for going to the polls is to vote for the Republicans because they are lesser of two evils," said Tom McClusky, vice president for government affairs at the Family Research Council (FRC), a leading social conservative group.

"Conservatives aren't motivated to come out, is what I'm finding," said conservative campaign consultant Rick Shaftan, who is based in Sparta, N.J. "They see no reason to re-elect the people who are in office."

A top Republican pollster confidentially echoed those sentiments.

"There are very definitely trouble signs in many states of what we call the 'LRs' -- the lethargic Republicans," said the pollster, who agreed to speak on the condition of anonymity. "They are unhappy with the president and have little love lost for Congress."

There's little danger that such voters would switch to the Democrats, but "the real problem is that they won't vote at all," the pollster said.

With Election Day less than three weeks away, however, efforts to mobilize conservative voters are intensifying.

DOJ_NMG_0083138

Top Republicans -- including President Bush, his chief strategist Karl Rove, Vice President Dick Cheney and Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman -- have been meeting with conservative activists, columnists and broadcasters, emphasizing the importance of this midterm election. That message has rippled out via newspapers, magazines, TV, radio and the Internet.

An e-mail sent this week by the conservative group GOPUSA.com carried the subject line, "Don't you dare not vote," and featured a column by veteran activist Doug Patton appealing to Republican voters' patriotism.

"As you contemplate how to express your frustration with Republican leaders who may have mishandled the power we have entrusted to them," Mr. Patton wrote, "consider how you would explain your apathy to the 1.2 million brave men who have given their lives in America's wars over the last 230 years."

Meanwhile, FRC President Tony Perkins sent an e-mail this week asking supporters to sign a "values voter" pledge. The e-mail warned that "too many elective officeholders are content to downplay social issues," but said "officials need to hear from us, again and again, that elections are about values first -- moral and social norms."

Many Republicans are worried that the sex scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley of Florida will depress turnout among religious conservatives who have been staunchly loyal to the Republican Party.

"Until the Foley scandal broke, there wasn't even a mathematical possibility of a Democratic takeover of either body of Congress," South Dakota-based campaign consultant Paul Erickson said. "But Foley introduced a concrete voting-base suppression factor that is immeasurable until election night."

To explain the disaffection of some conservative voters, Mr. Shaftan cited the national party's assistance to liberal Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee against conservative challenger Stephen Laffey in last month's Rhode Island primary.

"The Republican leadership spent $1 million on helping Chafee, and then it wonders why conservatives don't think they're wanted in this party," Mr. Shaftan said. "They think the leadership wants them to come out every year, shine your shoes, then go sit in the back of the bus, take their Bibles and read them and shut up."

Republican media consultant Craig Shirley said the party's national leadership appears to be trying to scare disaffected voters to the polls by arguing that Republicans aren't as bad as the Democrats.

"It would be nice if the national party started talking about what we are for ... instead of simply trashing the left," Mr. Shirley said. "We used to be proud of our ideas about less government and more freedom."

In New Jersey, Mr. Shaftan said polling shows a similar attitude among rank-and-file voters.

"The left is ready for war, but our people say [Republicans in Congress] need to be taught a lesson," Mr. Shaftan said. "Lots of our base are not going to come out and vote."

Such discouragement has also affected many of the religious voters who were widely credited with pushing Mr. Bush to victory two years ago, Mr. Perkins said.

"There is no question that the level of enthusiasm that carried voters into the 2004 election is much diminished, however, the core of what has been described as 'values voters' will vote," the FRC president said, but warned, "The GOP should not count their votes before they are cast."

It may already be too late to reach many conservative voters, said one alumnus of the 1994 "Republican Revolution" that swept the party to its first House majority in 40 years.

"I sense that conservatives have largely already tuned out to the coming elections, after six years of burgeoning federal spending and inaction on key issues, such as immigration," said former Georgia Rep. Bob Barr.

"The Republican Party has become the party of the government status quo," he said, "and conservatives see no reason to reward it with their votes."

Moderates In Kansas Decide They're Not In GOP Anymore (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083139

WICHITA -- Paul Morrison, a career prosecutor who specializes in putting killers behind bars, has the bulletproof rÃ©sumÃ© and the rugged looks of a law-and-order Republican, which is what he was until last year. That was when he announced he would run for attorney general -- as a Democrat.

He is now running neck-and-neck with Republican Phill Kline, an iconic social conservative who made headlines by seeking the names of abortion-clinic patients and vowing to defend science-teaching standards that challenge Darwinian evolution. What's more, Morrison is raising money faster than Kline and pulling more cash from Republicans than Democrats.

Nor is Morrison alone. In a state that voted nearly 2 to 1 for President Bush in 2004, nine former Republicans will be on the November ballot as Democrats. Among them is Mark Parkinson, a former chairman of the Kansas Republican Party, who changed parties to run for lieutenant governor with the popular Democratic governor, Kathleen Sebelius.

"I'd reached a breaking point," Parkinson said, preparing for a rally in Wichita alongside Sebelius. "I want to work on relevant issues and not on a lot of things that don't matter."

The Kansas developments coincide with efforts by Democrats across the country to capture moderate Republican and independent voters dismayed with partisan bickering from both parties, particularly from the Republican right. The spirit of the attempted Democratic comeback in Kansas, set by Sebelius, is a search for the workable political center.

Though yet untested in the election booth, the Democratic developments in Kansas reflect polls in many parts of the country. As elsewhere, Democrats and moderate Republicans say they are frustrated with policies and practices they trace to Republican leadership, including the Iraq war, ballooning government spending, ethics violations and the influence of social conservatives.

A long-standing split among Kansas Republicans has deepened in recent years. One fresh sign came from the Johnson County Sun, which said it would endorse virtually the entire Democratic ticket, including Morrison and Parkinson, after endorsing fewer than a dozen Democrats in the past half-century.

"So what in the world has happened?" publisher Steve Rose asked in a recent column. "The Republican Party has changed, and it has changed monumentally. You almost cannot be a victorious traditional Republican candidate with mainstream values in Johnson County or in Kansas anymore." Ron Freeman, executive director of the Kansas GOP, called the migrating candidates -- Parkinson, Morrison and seven state House candidates, including one party-switching incumbent -- "a simple case of political opportunism."

"It's really more about them than it is about the party," Freeman said. "They obviously feel the Democratic Party is weak enough that, without any history in the party, they can be front-runners in the party."

Republicans control three-quarters of the state Senate and two-thirds of the House. The state has not elected a Democratic U.S. senator since the 1930s, although voters have been more willing to put Democrats in the governor's mansion. Rep. Dennis Moore became the lone Kansas Democrat in Congress in 1998 by appealing to crossover moderates -- the heart of this year's strategy.

Democrats consider it significant that 58 GOP incumbents in the state House drew Democratic opposition this year, compared with 39 in 2004. In the September primary, moderates mobilized to carry two Board of Education seats held by conservatives who had embarrassed many Kansans by endorsing a fundamentalist-Christian critique of evolution.

The recruiter-in-chief is Sebelius, who persuaded Republican Cessna executive John E. Moore to switch parties in 2002 and run to be her lieutenant governor.

"These are people who felt banished," Sebelius said in an interview before crowing to Democratic campaign workers: "We have some remarkable conversions. My favorite kind of revival is going to a place where someone says, 'I've been a Republican all my life, and I've seen the light.' " Sebelius, who has a solid lead over Republican challenger Jim Barnett, is the daughter-in-law of a Republican former member of Congress, and she likes to say the first Republican she converted was her husband. She has shown, notably in debates over school funding and the state budget, that she can negotiate compromises acceptable to both parties. Kansas has had a balanced budget for four straight years after six years of deficits.

This year, with Moore stepping aside, Sebelius recruited Parkinson, who views himself as squarely in the mainstream, talking up fiscal responsibility and a favorable business climate. He favors embryonic stem cell research, a woman's right to choose abortion and the teaching of evolution as settled scientific theory.

DOJ_NMG_0083140

It was also the governor who sold Morrison on the attorney general's race. "She said what I'd been thinking for three years," Morrison said.

In a Morrison radio ad, John Walsh of "America's Most Wanted" introduces the Johnson County district attorney as "one of the toughest prosecutors Kansas has ever seen" and names two of Morrison's best-known murder cases. Walsh asserts, in a dig at Kline, that after 26 years as a prosecutor, Morrison has the "right priorities."

Kline is a confident politician who has buoyed the Republican right and disturbed his opponents. He drafted a law restricting late-term abortion and won a recent Supreme Court case reinstating the death penalty. His most controversial moves were subpoenaing the medical records of more than 80 women and girls who received abortions in 2003 and seeking to require health workers to report the sexual activities of girls under 16.

"The office has become much more political under his leadership," Morrison said in an interview in his Olathe office. Morrison says his political hero is former U.S. senator John C. Danforth, the Missourian who recently published a rebuke of the GOP that contends the national party is beholden to the Christian right.

"Most Kansas Republicans are fairly moderate," Morrison said. "They're like most Kansas Democrats."

Kline spokeswoman Sherriene Jones denied Morrison's contention that the Kansas GOP has moved too far to the right: "The Republican Party reflects Kansas values, reflects loyalty and reflects family," she said. "It's Mr. Morrison who has changed."

The Democratic National Committee is spending money and sending staff to Kansas as part of Chairman Howard Dean's much-debated 50-state strategy of extending the party's influence in unlikely places. The DNC will not reveal its spending or the size of the staff, but a spokesman said the infusion permits a statewide organizing effort not possible before.

With Sebelius and Parkinson so far ahead in the gubernatorial race, attention has shifted to the competition for attorney general, considered too close to call. As Parkinson, who describes Morrison as his best friend, puts it, "It's going to say a whole lot about what the state of Kansas is right now."

Whatever happens, Kansas State University political scientist Joseph A. Aistrup said, the duel between Republican moderates and conservatives will no doubt continue. He said the party switchers represent a "temporary setback" for the state GOP.

"The cultural conservatives have lost before, and they just keep on coming back," Aistrup said. "They don't pick up their marbles and go home."

Poll Signals More Republican Woes As Disapproval Of Congress Grows (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes And John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With just 19 days until the midterm elections, a new poll shows both President Bush and his party in worse shape among voters than Democrats were in the October before they lost control of Capitol Hill a dozen years ago.

Support for the Republican-led Congress has eroded to its lowest point since the party's watershed 1994 victory that brought it House and Senate majorities.

A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll illustrates the political toll Republicans are paying for rising discontent over the Iraq war, as well as a spate of scandals including the disclosure that Republican House leaders knew of inappropriate emails to House pages from Florida Rep. Mark Foley, who resigned late last month. Voters' approval of Congress has fallen to 16% from 20% since early September, while their disapproval has risen to 75% from 65%.

IN THE POLLS

• Graphic: Bush's approval ratings across multiple polls1

• See the full poll results2. (Adobe Acrobat required3)

• Battlegrounds:4 Who's ahead in the most hotly contested Senate and gubernatorial races? Dig into the latest Zogby poll data.

CAST YOUR VOTE

• Question of the Day: Which branch of the federal government do you respect the most these days?5

DOJ_NMG_0083141

That 16% rating statistically matches Congress's lowest point in the 17 years the Journal and NBC have polled, set in April 1992 when Democrats were in control and suffering from a scandal involving lawmakers' overdrafts from the House bank. The latest results set other records for the Journal/NBC surveys, all ominous for Republicans -- "a harbinger," in the words of Journal/NBC pollster Peter Hart, "of what's ahead for the incumbent party. It's as simple as that."

They include:

By 52% to 37%, voters say they want Democrats rather than Republicans to control Congress. That 15-point advantage is the widest ever registered by either party in the Journal/NBC surveys. Also, the result marks the first time voter preference for one party has exceeded 50%.

Half of independents say they want Democrats to take charge, while only a quarter of them back Republicans. "It's very unusual to see a majority of independents pick one political party," notes Bill McInturff, the Republican pollster who conducts the surveys with Mr. Hart, his Democratic counterpart.

Two-thirds of the electorate rates this year's Congress "below average" or "one of the worst" -- the poorest showing on that question since it was first asked in 1990.

Mr. Bush, who in the past typically drew high ratings personally even when his job-approval scores sagged, now is viewed negatively by a 52% majority -- essentially tying the worst rating of his presidency.

As for the Republican Party, 32% of voters rate it positively but 49% negatively -- the highest negative ever in the surveys for either party. On the other hand, the Democratic Party's reputation improved. After months in which it had a net negative rating only slightly better than Republicans', the party now is viewed positively by 37% and negatively by 35%.

Along with other findings favorable to Democrats, Messrs. Hart and McInturff see a potential turning point for the party. For months, the Republican pollster has espoused "McInturff's Thesis: If there's a decisive election, it's because the other party becomes a credible alternative." Until now, he has argued, voters' doubts about Democrats were standing in the way of the party making significant gains. But yesterday, the Republican pollster agreed with Mr. Hart that voters now see Democrats as at least "a marginally acceptable alternative."

The Journal/NBC telephone survey of 1,006 registered voters, conducted Oct. 13-16, carries a margin of error of +/- 3.1 percentage points.

To be sure, the poll isn't a forecast of what ultimately happens on Nov. 7. Polls amount to a snapshot in time, and unforeseen events could change the dynamic -- though the latest results do follow a trend of steady deterioration in support for Mr. Bush and the Republican-led Congress since just after the president's re-election in 2004.

Despite the steady drumbeat of ever-worsening polls, Republican leaders say they are counting on their superior get-out-the-vote operation and financial advantage to salvage enough seats to maintain control of the Senate, if not the House.

With the prospects of a Democratic takeover becoming more real to voters, Republicans have begun rallying their demoralized base and fence-sitters with visions of tax increases, liberal social policies and weakness on national security if the opposition controls Congress. House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, a Missouri Republican, yesterday sent an email to the media suggesting House Democrats would "plot to establish a Department of Peace, raise your taxes and minimize penalties for crack dealers."

Republicans also have sought to take credit, so far elusive, for recent good economic news, a significant drop in gasoline prices from summer's peaks and a rising stock market. The new poll did show a slight uptick in voters' views of Mr. Bush's handling of the economy: Approval rose to 44% from 39% in June. Still, a 52% majority says it disapproves of his economic stewardship.

One solace for Republican incumbents: National polls are decidedly imperfect predictors of local election outcomes, particularly given voters' historic penchant for saying they loathe Congress but like their own representative. While only 16% of voters approve of Congress, more than twice that many -- 39% -- said in answer to another poll question that their own representative deserves to be re-elected.

But 45% say "it is time to give a new person a chance." And by other measures in the poll, Republicans are at a greater disadvantage heading toward Election Day than Democrats were 12 years ago just before voters ended their 40-year reign in Congress.

In October 1994, with the public fed up with scandals and the failure of President Clinton and his party's lawmakers to deliver in key areas such as health care, voters said by a nine-point margin -- 46% to 37% -- that they wanted Republicans to take control. That compares with the 15-point margin today in favor of Democrats' taking the reins.

This midterm, like 1994, is shaping up as a referendum on an unpopular president who isn't on the ballot, leaving his party to bear the brunt of voters' wrath. Mr. Bush, however, is even less popular than Mr. Clinton was as Election Day approached. Back then, 45% disapproved of Mr. Clinton's job performance, compared with Mr. Bush's 57% disapproval rating.

The new poll also suggests the advantages that have helped Republicans sustain their majority in Congress -- gerrymandered House districts, a well-oiled turnout machine and the national-security issue -- all have been somewhat neutralized by the political winds buffeting the party. Democrats need to gain a net 15 seats for a House majority, and they now have polls showing leads in about 40 Republican-held districts from New England through the Mountain West -- with none of their own in serious jeopardy.

Republican spending records indicate greatly diminished hopes of unseating Democratic incumbents in Ohio, West Virginia, South Carolina and Texas, while some of their own incumbents once thought safe, such as Rep. Gil Gutknecht in Minnesota, are now in Democrats' sights. Republican Rep. Curt Weldon, already fighting for his political life in Pennsylvania, now is the subject of a Federal Bureau of Investigation corruption probe.

As for the Senate, the six seats Democrats need for a 51-seat majority no longer are thought to be out of reach, strategists in both parties agree. Pulling it off will mean some fairly dramatic in-roads into Republican territory: defeating red-state incumbents, Sens. George Allen of Virginia and Jon Kyl of Arizona, or having Tennessee voters make Democratic Rep. Harold Ford the first African-American elected statewide there.

Democratic rank-and-file voters continue to appear significantly more eager to show up on Election Day, a sign that Republicans' get-out-the-vote efforts may not provide the political insurance they are banking on. Some 60% of Democratic voters express the highest possible level of interest in the election, compared with 48% of Republicans. Similarly, 53% of Democrats call themselves more enthusiastic than in the past about voting, compared with 38% of Republicans.

Mr. McInturff recalled that Republicans enjoyed a similar double-digit edge in voter enthusiasm prior to the 1994 election, when Democrats were the demoralized party. But this year, Republicans are disillusioned by huge federal spending, scandals, illegal immigration and Congress's inaction on a raft of issues.

According to the poll, the electorate overall embraces the idea of breaking up the Republican Party's six-year hold on power in both the legislative and executive branches. By 48% to 26%, voters call Republican control of the White House, House and Senate "a bad thing." Nearly four of 10 voters say their vote for Congress will be a signal of opposition to Mr. Bush; two in 10 say it will signal support for him.

On key issues, Democrats hold the upper hand. They enjoy a 28-percentage-point edge on the question of which party could best deal with Social Security, the issue Mr. Bush unsuccessfully sought to capitalize on in 2005; a 13-point lead in handling the economy; a 10-point edge on ethics in government; and a three-point edge on immigration, which congressional Republicans had hoped to make their signature issue.

Republicans retained their edge, though diminished, on dealing with the fight against terror, nuclear proliferation and moral issues.

But public dismay over Iraq and the Foley scandal overwhelmed all else for Republicans. Mr. Hart called the Foley story "the coagulant" that caused voters' uncertainties about the Republican-led Congress to jell. "This is the event that allowed certain voters to say, 'Enough,' " he said.

By 47% to 14%, voters say what they have learned in recent weeks makes them feel "less favorable" toward Republicans retaining their majority on Capitol Hill. By contrast, voters say by 37% to 22% that they feel more favorably disposed toward Democrats winning control.

Nearly all have heard of the Foley scandal, and most are unhappy with how House Speaker Dennis Hastert and other Republican leaders have handled it. Fully 55% -- including four of 10 conservatives -- are dissatisfied with the actions of Republican leaders. That is twice the 27% who say they are satisfied.

DOJ_NMG_0083143

Amid unrelenting bad news from Iraq as sectarian violence rages there, just 33% of voters approve of Mr. Bush's handling of the war, down from 36% in June. Disapproval has risen to 63%.

By an overwhelming 68% to 20%, voters calls themselves "less optimistic" about the course of events in Iraq. A 57% majority says the president hasn't given good reasons for U.S. troops to remain there. And ominously for Republican congressional candidates, a 39% plurality say Democrats could better deal with Iraq, while 31% prefer Republicans. That reverses the five-point edge Republicans held early last month.

By 40% to 31%, a plurality of voters now see the situation in Iraq as a civil war among Iraqis, rather than a war between American troops and foreign terrorists there. Significantly, Mr. McInturff said, that assessment is shared by those who voted for Mr. Bush in 2004 and those who supported Democratic Sen. John Kerry for president -- groups that agree on little else.

If Americans continue to see U.S. troops caught in the middle of a civil war, Mr. McInturff said, "that will ratchet up the pressure to terminate our deployment in Iraq."

Democrats Would Reverse Bush's Work (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

The Democrats' election-year agenda, which says what they will do if the voters put them back in charge of Congress, would seek to overturn or change just about everything President Bush and the Republicans have done since 2001.

Key parts of their agenda call for repealing the bulk of the administration's tax cuts, ending the ban on federal funding for new lines of stem-cell research and limiting some of the investigative, prosecutorial and surveillance methods in the counterterrorism USA Patriot Act.

Many of the details of their agenda may not be that widely known among rank-and-file voters, but opinion surveys show that ignorance may not matter as the election moves into its final weeks. On just about every major issue -- Iraq, terrorism, the economy, health care, immigration and ethics in government -- voters say they trust Democrats more than the Republicans to do a better job of handling them, according to recent polls.

But a top election pollster questions whether Democrats' agenda will play that much of a role in the election's outcome and whether many voters even know whether they have offered alternatives to Mr. Bush's policies. At the same time, a Democratic defense-policy strategist thinks his party's national-security proposals were excessively watered down to appeal to a broader electorate.

"If the Democrats win, it will have all the elements of a Forrest Gump victory. In other words, things swirling around them over which they were barely aware," independent pollster John Zogby said, referring to the slow-thinking movie character who always succeeded, but without any grand design in mind.

"There will not be a proactive agenda that wins this for them. I don't know if the electorate sees the Democrats as having an alternative to the Bush plan. They've put it out, but the party's leadership hasn't led with it," Mr. Zogby said. "They have pretty much sought to avoid a discussion of Iraq."

This would stand in contrast to the 1994 congressional sweep by Republicans who ran on their comprehensive, highly detailed "Contract With America," giving them a more-sweeping mandate than is likely for the Democrats.

Any Democratic agenda would still be constrained by Mr. Bush in the White House and his veto power.

Democratic leaders call their agenda "A New Direction for America," but much of its details are what Republican leaders call "boilerplate" Democratic dogma that the party has been proposing for years, such as raising the federal minimum wage to $7.25, rolling back the Bush tax cuts, expanding new stem-cell research, raising taxes on oil companies and boosting government spending for college-tuition loans and Pell Grants.

On the war in Iraq, the Democrats' agenda calls for "a tough, smart plan to transform failed Bush administration policies in Iraq" and for a "phased redeployment of U.S. forces from Iraq."

To combat terrorism, it proposes to "double the size of Special Forces to destroy Osama bin Laden and the terrorist networks like al Qaeda" and to "rebuild a state-of-the-art military capable of projecting power wherever necessary." Both provisions, national-security analysts say, have been at the heart of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's military reforms ever since the September 11 attacks in 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0083144

Michael O'Hanlon, a national-security analyst at the Brookings Institution who often advises Democratic congressional leaders, says that although the agenda's phased redeployment "is not cut and run, I would rather see Democrats offer some more ideas about what we could do in Iraq to make things better."

"At least this [agenda] avoids the problem of being too extreme. They are generally trying to be responsible and reasonable. But it's still thin gruel, given how much we need good ideas," Mr. O'Hanlon said.

Democratic officials, however, said their agenda was a key factor in their consistent lead in the election polls.

"We are talking about it in campaigns across the country and we'll keep talking about it," said Stacie Paxton, a Democratic National Committee spokesman.

On the agenda's Iraq proposals, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's chief spokesman, Brendan Daly noted that even former Republican Secretary of State James A. Baker III "now says we need significant changes in strategy in Iraq."

A major domestic-policy plank in the Democrats' agenda is a rollback of the tax cuts, which has become the party's campaign mantra. But there is division within the party's ranks over how far they should go in attempting to repeal the across-the-board tax cuts that lowered tax rates for low-to-moderate income workers and doubled the child-tax credit that affects mostly middle-income families.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York, who likely would become chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee if the Democrats win the House back, has said that he could not think of a single Bush tax cut that he supported and suggested that all of them should be repealed. But Mrs. Pelosi, who would be in line to become speaker, said last week that the tax-cut rollback would only affect people earning $250,000 a year or more.

"But the consequences of repealing all the Bush tax cuts would hit people in much lower income-tax brackets and millions more who were removed from the tax rolls by Bush's reforms," said Scott A. Hodge, chief executive of the nonpartisan Tax Foundation.

"There are about 15 million more taxpayers off the tax rolls today, compared to the end of the Clinton administration. Almost all of those people have incomes below $50,000 a year. Many have children who not only receive the $1,000-per-child tax credit, but also the refundable earned-income tax credit for families in need of additional income," Mr. Hodge said.

"They would all be back on the tax rolls if you repealed the Bush tax cuts," he said.

Judge Bars Notices At Polls On Votes For Foley's Substitute (NYT)

By Christine Jordan Sexton

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

TALLAHASSEE, Fla., Oct. 18 — A judge on Wednesday barred election supervisors from posting signs in polling places explaining that votes cast for former Representative Mark Foley would go to the substitute candidate.

The judge, Janet E. Ferris of Circuit Court in Leon County, issued her decision days before voters can begin casting ballots under the early voting system of Florida.

Judge Ferris, ruling on a complaint by the Florida Democratic Party, said the Legislature had not authorized such postings in its law on replacement candidates. The law requires the original candidate's name to be the ballot if the change is made after the primary results have been certified.

"The court is not at liberty to question the Legislature's decision or its judgment in enacting the statute," the judge wrote. "And there can be little doubt that it understood the confusion likely to result where voters know that the person reflected on the ballot is no longer seeking the position."

Interpreting the statute "as permitting the proposed intrusion into the polling place," the judge added, would be "an extrapolation far beyond the Legislature's words."

Mr. Foley, a Republican, resigned on Sept. 29 after sexually explicit e-mail and instant messages he sent to former and current Congressional pages were made public.

DOJ_NMG_0083145

Tim Mahoney, the Democrat running in that district, had not been expected to beat Mr. Foley. But experts now consider Mr. Mahoney as leading the race to defeat the substitute, State Representative Joe Negron.

The contest has drawn national attention as Republicans struggle to maintain control of the House.

Dawn Roberts, supervisor of the State Elections Division, had advised supervisors in the eight counties in the 16th Congressional District, stretching across the state from Palm Beach to Charlotte County, to post notices explaining that votes for Mr. Foley would go to Mr. Negron.

Ms. Roberts advised that the note be posted at all early voting sites, polling places and, preferably, in all voting booths. She also advised that it be sent with absentee ballots.

The elections supervisors disagreed, saying state law clearly prevented them from doing so.

Until the judge's ruling, the supervisors had agreed to post the notices.

Lawyers for Secretary of State Sue M. Cobb, who oversees the elections division and is appointed by Gov. Jeb Bush, a Republican, argued that the notices would be educational and would prevent widespread confusion. A spokesman for the agency said it would appeal the ruling.

Also on Wednesday, Mr. Foley's lawyers said that they had given the state attorney's office in Palm Beach County the name of the clergyman who Mr. Foley said had molested him as a teenager. The lawyers said that "to the best of our knowledge" the clergyman is no longer in the United States.

A spokeswoman for the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Miami said it would probably identify him to the public after finding out the details.

A lawyer for Mr. Foley has said the statute of limitations on such charges expired long ago.

Upstart Leaves The Campaigning To The Congressman (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

AKRON, N.Y. -- You want the candidate to do that door-to-door, knock-knock-and-glad-hand stuff? That's ridiculous.

Jack Davis roams around his factory and pays for campaign commercials. He doesn't care for flacks, either: Before sitting down to talk to a reporter, he shoos his spokesman out the door.

Davis is not sure why the Democrats wanted him to run in the 26th Congressional District in Upstate New York in the first place. He can rehearse his negatives as quick as any Republican. "I'm a white Anglo-Saxon millionaire owner of a non-union factory," he said.

Davis, 73, has a white mane, narrow hips and a bony run of a face, and he paces about his office. "When the Democrats first asked me to run, I said, 'Yeah, great idea, except I'm a Republican.' "

Jack Davis is the anti-candidate, and so far his strategy, if that's what you want to call it, has the look of distilled brilliance. A recent poll found Davis, who changed his party registration from Republican to Democrat in 2004, has jumped 17 percentage points ahead of Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, a Republican power broker.

Davis is helped greatly by the fact that the House Republicans in general, and Reynolds in particular, have tripped through a trapdoor labeled "Congressional Page Scandal." Reynolds, a beefy political pro who rarely spots a back that doesn't beg for a friendly slap, wears a haunted look of late.

Two weeks ago Reynolds flew to Upstate New York and surrounded himself with 25 children (staffers' kids, friends' kids, pretty much anyone wholesome-looking and under the age of 14) before calling in the local media to talk about politics, sex and naughty instant messages. Then Reynolds ran a television ad to explain his role in the controversy, in which his eyes dart here and there and rarely look squarely at the camera. Comedian Jon Stewart's "The Daily Show" ran the commercial nearly in its entirety, figuring it trumped any attempt at satire.

Ray Yacuzzo, the Genesee County Democratic Party chairman, says he is baffled by Davis the non-campaigning candidate. But who can argue with success? "This campaign is like physics," Yacuzzo says. "Reynolds has so much negative momentum, it looks like Jack Davis is picking up speed."

DOJ_NMG_0083146

You try to obtain a campaign schedule for Davis, and his spokesman Curtis Ellis says there isn't one. You click on the "Events" tab on Davis's Web site, and it reads: "Check back soon. . . ." Ellis does give you directions to Davis's factory, which lies out in the rolling farmland of far eastern Erie County. The I Squared R Element Co., which Davis owns and very actively manages, manufactures silicon-carbide heating elements that are used in high-temperature electric furnaces.

Davis waves at you to follow him and embarks on a fast-paced walking tour of his factory. Most of the 75 employees make more than $20 an hour and appear genuinely to respect their boss. This factory is the only one of its kind left in this nation (his competitors have moved south of the border or overseas), which circles back to why Davis ran against Reynolds in 2004 and again this year. Davis loathes free trade and globalization.

"We've got to get off this globalization kick," Davis says. "We're the only country in the world that believes in it."

In the manner of a self-made man accustomed to having those on his payroll listen attentively, Davis declines to measure his words. He speaks to the lives of many working-class New Yorkers upstate, where the carcasses of factories do not become luxury lofts. They just stand abandoned.

"Globalization's profits come back for the top 10 percent in our society, but look what it does to the middle class," he says. "Job, retirement plans, a pension: It's all going away."

Davis, a big Lou Dobbs fan, wants to impose cliff-high tariffs on goods from "Red China" and build tall fences on the border with Mexico. And no amnesty for illegal immigrants; it would just encourage them. "I see radical Mexicans saying President Polk took their land in the war with Mexico." He whacks the table. "Well, here's what I have to say: You lost that war, baby!"

Let it be noted that Davis is not spreading the Gospel According to Rahm Emanuel, the Chicago congressman who champions neo-liberalism and free trade and has masterminded the Democrats' congressional electoral assault this autumn.

Davis wiggles his bushy eyebrows. "Rahm told me he believes in a big tent," Davis says. "I said: 'Fine, let me in.' "

A few years back, Davis was a Republican high roller, writing fat checks to upstate Republicans. When Vice President Cheney rolled into Buffalo, Davis wrote a $2,000 check for Cheney but took out a full-page ad in the Buffalo newspaper decrying the Republican embrace of free trade. Cheney's crowd was not keen about that.

"This Cheney woman comes running to me in the parking lot and says: 'You can't talk to the press!' " Davis recalls. His response? "The next day I talked to the Democratic county chairman. . . ." Polls still show that a third of voters in this district don't know who Davis is. Whatever. He's wrapped up nominations from the Independence Party and the Working Families Party, giving him three ballot positions on Nov. 7. He's spending $3 million of his own money on the race. And he's convinced he's got it figured out.

Davis opens his door and lets his spokesman come back in. "I don't see the point," Davis says by way of goodbye, "in wasting time going around campaigning."

Senate Could Dust Off 50-50 Deal (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, October 19, 2006

As the political landscape continues to improve for Senate Democrats, it appears increasingly likely that the chamber could return to a 50-50 split in January — an extraordinary scenario neither party seems anxious to relive.

But with seven GOP-held Senate seats very much in play, Republicans and Democrats alike privately acknowledge they are facing at least the prospect of an equal party balance in the 110th Congress. Such a scenario leaves more questions than answers, but both parties agree it likely would force them to revisit a delicate power-sharing agreement struck by Senate leaders in early 2001.

“That’s a good starting point,” said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.). “It’s a useful starting point for discussions.”

A Republican Senate aide said the arrangement employed for a portion of 2001 certainly is one Senators will “pull off the shelf and read.” But the aide cautioned that it would serve as just “one of the things to think about. It is in no way a binding document.”

DOJ_NMG_0083147

Six years ago when the Senate was split evenly for a period of the 107th Congress, then-Majority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and then-Minority Leader Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) negotiated an unprecedented deal to divvy up power. Republicans kept their chairmanships and Lott remained in charge of the body by virtue of Republican Vice President Cheney's role as President of the Senate. But Democrats were given equal committee representation, staff and resources.

At the time, Lott drew a rash of criticism from his own party for giving up too much, while Democrats largely were favorable toward the deal after having served at a five-seat disadvantage in the previous Congress. But, as Lott said at the time: "I believe Tom and I have a commitment to work together to find a way to deal with that that is fair and that will not kill the legislative agenda."

Daschle characterized it as an agreement based on a premise "that both parties are going to be invested in the legislative process and in this Congress; that we both will have ownership in this process; and that we both will have a reason to want to move the legislative agenda forward."

The agreement specifically provided for equal representation and funding on committees, but it also made clear that if one party attained a clear majority over the ensuing two years, the agreement would be dead. Both sides acknowledged concessions: Lott agreed to split the committees down the middle, while Daschle conceded chairmanships and control of the floor to the Republicans.

The deal lasted about five months, until May 2001 when then-Republican Sen. Jim Jeffords (Vt.) bolted the GOP to become an Independent and caucus with the Democrats. Jeffords' move shifted control of the chamber to Democrats, the Majority Leader's post to Daschle and vacated the power-sharing agreement.

And now, an unfavorable electoral landscape for the GOP may prompt the historic pact to rear its head again.

A former aide to Lott said the 2001 deal, albeit briefly held, "was a precedent that worked" and inevitably will serve as a guidepost for any future Senate power-sharing deals.

But the former aide cautioned that the terms of the earlier power-sharing deal are not set in stone, and future negotiations likely will be lengthy and hard fought.

"You can't gauge it," the former Lott aide said, adding that talks "may come to a standstill. They are going to start out at very different positions. Reid will start at the extreme left, and the new Republican Leader will start at the extreme right."

Still, a former Daschle aide agreed that the Lott-Daschle deal is "the logical place to start."

"I'm not saying you are going to end up there, but if you have something in the past — the recent past — that worked, why wouldn't you start there?" the Daschle staffer asked. "Maybe you can improve upon it, but at least use it as a starting point."

While some view the agreement as the best jumping-off point for negotiations, several Senate sources pointed out that the 2001 deal holds no official weight given it was part of a nonbinding resolution. And, many Senate sources suggest that the incoming leaders may be less willing to compromise if the GOP majorities slip and partisanship heightens even further on the Hill.

"You could have a back-and-forth tug of war between the minority and the majority," the one-time Lott aide suggested.

A current Democratic Senate aide said: "The partisan nature of the chamber now would make it almost impossible for that kind of comity [of 2001] to exist."

By any measure, the political circumstances of an evenly divided Senate in 2007 would be vastly different from 2001. For starters, two different party leaders would face off at the negotiating table in now-Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (Ky.), the all-but-certain Republican Leader in the next Congress, and Reid.

McConnell and Reid will begin the 110th Congress having not yet operated as direct leadership adversaries. Even so, both Senators have strong ties to the institutional foundations of the chamber and have a long history of striking compromises across the aisle.

"There's a good chance they could come up with something workable," said Congressional scholar and Roll Call contributing writer Norman Ornstein. "They don't dislike each other, and have a very cordial working relationship. Each understands the other.

"They can work it out, so long as they keep open the lines of communication."

But several variables remain, including whether the House falls to the Democrats in November.

DOJ_NMG_0083148

Sources in both parties said if Democrats win the House, Reid may view his party as the one with a mandate from the electorate and would push harder than Daschle did to gain an advantage against Senate Republicans.

McConnell, meanwhile, may be more inclined than Lott to insist that his party be given greater power, since the Senate could be the party's only Congressional foothold.

In addition, President Bush will be facing his final two years in the White House. Republicans and Democrats alike noted Bush — as a lame-duck president — likely would put added pressure on McConnell and the GOP leadership to grasp for as much authority as possible, and give up little to the Democrats under a 50-50 split.

In his role as President of the Senate, Cheney also could seek to assert himself to a greater degree, both during power-sharing talks and later as he almost certainly would be called on to regularly break tie votes.

The Democrats acknowledge they hold one significant trump card, however. They can filibuster any organizing resolution of the chamber if they are unhappy with the power allocated to them by the GOP.

"My guess is the Democrats will say, 'Let's do what we did before,' and then say, 'If not, then we're not organizing' and hold their feet to the fire," said a former Senate Democratic chief of staff who watched the 2001 agreement unfold. "We'll hold out for more than we got from them last time."

With three weeks until Election Day, Republican Senate seats in Missouri, Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee and Virginia are all vulnerable to Democratic pickups. Just one Democratic-held seat, New Jersey, is viewed as a possible GOP gain.

Observers still suggest it would be a long shot for the Democrats to sweep the board and take control of the chamber in January. But they do believe the minority has a solid shot at acquiring five seats.

"Obviously when you have as many states in play as there are," suggested one Republican strategist, "it's certainly not unrealistic to think about that scenario."

"It is probably the single most likely scenario," Ornstein added. "Democrats are in range to pick up five seats. They could pick up six, and they may fall short of five, but it seems to me there is a reasonable chance of that happening."

Allen, Webb Pull In Presidents As They Beef Up Push To Nov. 7 (WP)

By Tim Craig

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

President Bush and former president Bill Clinton will wade into Virginia's closely contested U.S. Senate race today at separate fundraisers that underscore the growing importance of the state in the fight for control of Congress.

The presidential visits for Sen. George Allen (R) and Democratic challenger James Webb will raise money and rally supporters for the final push to the Nov. 7 election. But the events come as Allen and Webb are using either the name "Clinton" or "Bush" to sway voters who either love or hate the current or former president.

"Bush mobilizes the Democrats, and Clinton mobilizes the Republicans," said Merle Black, a political science professor at Emory University who is following Virginia's Senate race.

Bush will be raising money for Allen in Richmond this afternoon. In the evening, Clinton will attend a sold-out Webb fundraiser at the McLean home of former senator Charles S. Robb (D-Va.). Webb and Clinton are expected to meet with reporters after the private event.

Webb and the Democrats are trying to make the race into a referendum on Bush and his Iraq war policy. A Washington Post poll taken a week ago showed 43 percent of likely Virginia voters approve of the way Bush is handling his job -- about the same nationally -- and 54 percent say the war in Iraq was not worth fighting. But fewer of those voters say their feelings about Bush will influence their Senate vote, compared with the number in a national poll.

Allen has responded by trying to link Webb to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who some perceive as being too liberal for many Virginia voters.

"Webb is bought and sold by the left wing of the Democratic Party," said Dick Wadhams, Allen's campaign manager, who noted that until recently, Webb did not get along with Bill Clinton. "It really raises the question, can you really trust Jim Webb on anything he says when he swings back and forth between such extremes from one year to another?"

DOJ_NMG_0083149

Kristian Denny Todd, a Webb spokesman, responded by saying "Bush and George Allen are one of the same. . . . They might as well be the same person."

When Webb was asked about Bush's visit, he said, "I hope he brings [Vice President] Cheney, too," who polls show is unpopular with voters.

Political analysts say both Webb and Allen are taking risks by bringing Bush and Clinton into the state, despite each one's ability to raise more than $1 million at a single event.

For Allen, a presidential visit could play with conservative voters who continue to admire Bush despite his low standing in the polls. But Allen has been taking subtle steps to draw distinctions between himself and the president.

Allen has been appearing alongside Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), who has sparred with Bush over prisoner interrogations and recently said he wants to change course in Iraq if the violence does not subside soon. Yesterday, Warner was with Allen when he picked up the endorsement of the Veterans of Foreign Wars Political Action Committee and the National Vietnam and Gulf War Veterans Coalition at an event in Manassas.

Webb, meanwhile, will be appearing alongside a Democrat who lost Virginia in both of his presidential races. Clinton's reputation has improved since he left office, but analysts say he is still a divisive figure for some Republicans and veterans, who make up a sizable voting bloc in the state.

"Certainly, George Allen doesn't want to be seen too closely tied to the unpopular Bush administration and Jim Webb has to be careful, too, because Bill Clinton remains a negative symbol for many voters in this state, especially given Allen's efforts to tie Jim Webb to Hillary Clinton," said Mark J. Rozell, a political science professor at George Mason University.

Webb, a former marine who was wounded in Vietnam, disliked Clinton for years and once said he presided over "the most corrupt administration in modern memory."

Star Power To Fill War Chests (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

With control of the Senate at stake in Virginia, the two parties have called in their top fundraisers -- President Bush and former President Bill Clinton -- to shore up campaign coffers and boost political spirits.

Mr. Bush this afternoon will host a fundraiser for Republican Sen. George Allen, while Mr. Clinton tonight will ask Democrats to open their arms -- and wallets -- to James H. Webb Jr.

Top Republicans counting on Mr. Allen to help them retain their majority say a cash infusion from the president will act as insurance for their optimism, and Internet activists are urging their followers to tell every Virginian they know to vote for Mr. Webb.

A senior White House official told The Washington Times on Tuesday that Mr. Bush tonight will talk about taxes and the war on terror, a continuing theme as Mr. Allen tries to paint Mr. Webb as an out-of-touch liberal.

"Allen will win," the official said. "Webb is not connecting well and is just not hitting what he needs to hit."

But Webb supporters think Virginia is ready for a change.

"The Democratic tide is building across Virginia," former Lt.Gov. Donald S. Beyer Jr. said in an e-mail soliciting donations for Mr. Webb.

The Clinton visit "will give people a shot in the arm in the last couple of weeks," said Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, a Democrat who last fall benefited from his $1.5 million event with the former president.

Mr. Kaine said Mr. Clinton's visit created an "energy" that helped bolster his momentum in the final weeks of the gubernatorial campaign.

Mr. Webb still badly needs the cash to keep his television ads on the air until the Nov. 7 election.

Mr. Webb's campaign Web site asks his supporters to donate to the "Fight Back Fund," where each $100,000 will pay for one day of ads.

Mr. Bush's private fundraiser, to be held at the Science Museum of Virginia in Richmond, is expected to raise $500,000 to $600,000 and energize the Republican faithful.

First lady Laura Bush also is expected to raise $100,000 at a Northern Virginia fundraiser with Mr. Allen's wife, Susan.

DOJ_NMG_0083150

The White House official was confident the cash will help Mr. Allen fight the negative $1 million television ad campaign the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC) is running against him. "We're a considerable distance towards getting this problem solved," the official said.

Mr. Allen's campaign said he will use the money for its get-out-the-vote operation, a crucial element to winning a campaign when the national mood favors the Democrats.

DSCC Chairman Charles E. Schumer of New York told reporters this week that his group would spend $20 million nationally on get-out-the vote efforts. Democrats need a net gain of six seats to hold the majority in the Senate.

Although Mr. Allen has a slight lead or is tied with Mr. Webb in most polls, the Virginia seat is "teetering on the edge," pollster Charlie Cook wrote in the National Journal this week.

Party activists on both sides are welcoming the comparison between the dueling presidents.

Mr. Clinton, who lost in Virginia in 1992 and 1996, will headline the fundraiser at the McLean home of former Democratic Sen. Charles S. Robb.

"Brilliant," wrote a blogger on the pro-Allen A-Team Blog. "Do an event with Bill Clinton who lost Virginia twice and Chuck Robb who lost his last statewide election to your current opponent. On Nov. 8, Webb can join them as part of a trio of Virginia losers."

The Allen campaign yesterday dredged up comments that Mr. Webb, a former Republican, made in 1992 calling the Clinton White House the "most corrupt administration in modern memory."

Mark J. Rozell, a professor of public policy at George Mason University, warned that the presidential visitors could harm more than help the campaigns.

Mr. Allen doesn't want to seem too tight with Mr. Bush, whose approval rating hovers in the high 30s. Mr. Webb has said Mr. Allen has been a "rubber stamp" for an unpopular war.

"Virginians are growing sick of Allen's unquestioning support of the bloody U.S. occupation of Iraq," reads a post on an anti-war site organizing a protest to coincide with Mr. Bush's visit.

At the same time, Mr. Clinton is a "negative symbol" for many Virginia conservatives, Mr. Rozell said.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton has held a fundraiser for Mr. Webb, a move Mr. Allen says proves his opponent will be loyal to the New York senator and other liberals.

"Having the Clintons in town will help George Allen mobilize the conservative core of his party," Mr. Rozell said.

Mr. Allen has raised $13.4 million for his re-election. Most political observers expected him to have an easy race and be able to save most of that cash for a potential 2008 White House bid.

Instead, he's facing a tough fight with Mr. Webb, who served as President Reagan's secretary of the Navy. Mr. Allen also has been forced to deflect accusations that he used racial slurs as a young man, which surfaced after he called an Indian-American man working for the Webb campaign "macaca."

As of Oct. 1, Mr. Allen had $5.5 million in the bank and Mr. Webb had $2.7 million.

The men have spent $10.3 million combined, but that does not include money from outside groups such as the DSCC. In 2000, Mr. Allen and Mr. Robb spent $16.7 million combined.

Allen Changes Direction On War In Iraq (DPHR)

By Jim Hodges

Daily Press, October 19, 2006

LYNCHBURG -- Senator George Allen, who has voted down the line with the Bush administration on the conduct of the war in Iraq, signaled a change of direction today.

Democratic opponent Jim Webb asked why it had taken so long.

"Although our principles and strategic goals remain unchanged, mistakes have been made and progress has been too slow," said Allen before the Virginia Association of School Superintendents.

Allen also said that the Iraqis should be given 60 to 90 days to stem the violence, particularly in Baghdad, before the U.S. initiates a change.

DOJ_NMG_0083151

Allen also had harsh terms for the Iraqis. "The Iraqi people and the Iraqi leaders need to show some backbone, some spine," Allen said. "We can't continue doing the same things and expect different results. We have to adapt our operations, adapt our tactics."

Allen's change follows his being endorsed by Senator John Warner, who recently returned from a trip to Iraq to say that the war was not working.

At a rally across town, Webb said Allen's change in his view of the war was not unexpected.

"He's been trying to get his position like me since we began the race," Webb said.

As to Iraq's taking over its own destiny, Webb scoffed. "We can't put this on an Iraqi government that can't even control the road from the green zone to the airport."

Allen For Senate (WT)

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

For the past six years and previously as governor from 1994-1998, Sen. George Allen has ably represented the Commonwealth of Virginia. A vigorous conservative, he is a good choice for both moderate and conservative voters this November. The Washington Times endorses him for re-election to the U.S. Senate over Democratic challenger James Webb.

Mr. Allen's opponents have tried to obscure his record, which is no surprise. Mr. Allen has voted to cut taxes; opposed illegal immigration; supported the Patriot Act and other tough antiterrorismmeasures; supported our troops in Iraq and Afghanistan; and voted for conservative judges. He has also pushed free trade; defended traditional marriage; expanded opportunities for education and health care; aggressively worked to improve benefits for veterans; and sponsored economic, transportation and military initiatives which improved the livelihoods of Virginians across the state. That's a record the citizens of the Commonwealth can applaud.

Not so well known is Mr. Allen's record on local matters: Mr. Allen has pushed to widen I-66 inside the Beltway and helped spur the Springfield Interchange and Wilson Bridge projects. He pushed the Dulles Corridor Metrorail project and widening of I-95 between Route 123 and the Fairfax County Parkway. He has secured $3.63 billion in federal nanotechnology funding, the largest such investment in history. He has fought to prevent discriminatory and innovation-stifling taxation on Internet businesses. He has secured greater rates of return for Virginia's gas-tax dollars, which means more federal money for roads, highways and other state infrastructure.

He has also done right by Virginia's veterans. He has pushed for active-duty-equivalent health and education benefits for reservists and members of the National Guard. He sponsored legislation to increase the service member's death benefit from $12,000 to $100,000. He saved the Defense and Veterans Brain-Injury Center from a damaging budget cut and found scarce dollars to improve its treatment of wounded service members. He has also helped finance unprecedented health-care improvements at the Department of Veterans Affairs which has advanced by leaps and bounds in recent years.

As governor of Virginia, Mr. Allen cut taxes by $1 billion, abolished parole for violent criminals and swept away years of inefficient government regulations. A decade later these accomplishments still yield dividends for Virginians.

In a Senate with as slim a Republican majority as the current one -- one which could shrink this November -- there are scenarios in which a George Allen loss would flip the Senate to Democratic control. That would likely mean no more constitutionalist judges, no tough immigration reform, withdrawal from Iraq, a dismantling of tough antiterrorism measures; and paralysis on much of the Bush administration's remaining agenda. The stakes are high.

James Webb is an intelligent and honorable servant of his country, but he is not the man conservatives remember as President Reagan's Secretary of the Navy in 1987-88. This estranged Republican-turned-Democrat is now a pro-choice, pro-homosexual "marriage," anti-Iraq war liege of the Democratic party. Hillary Clinton and John Kerry have campaigned for Mr. Webb, and he will be honored by Bill Clinton this week. An intensely negative campaign on behalf of the challenger has partially obscured the chasm between Mr. Webb's current views and those of conservative Virginia. It can't be hidden, however. The James Webb of 2006 is too liberal for the Commonwealth.

For Virginians who favor low taxes, strong defense, limited government and traditional values, George Allen is the clear choice for U.S. Senate. This newspaper endorses him without reservation.

DOJ_NMG_0083152

Clinton Urges Dems To Question Criticism (AP-Y)

By Philip Elliott

AP, October 19, 2006

Former President Clinton bemoaned ideologues who describe opponents as "running for office on his or her way to hell" and urged Democrats not to shy from fighting back.

Clinton, criticizing Republicans weeks before the midterm elections, told an audience at Georgetown University on Wednesday that intellectual debate should trump partisan rancor and either-or choices are false.

"Most of us long for politics where we have genuine arguments, vigorous disagreements but we don't claim to have the whole truth and we don't demonize our opponents and we work for what's best for the American people," he said.

Clinton, whose wife Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., is eyeing a 2008 White House run, spoke at his alma mater to mark the 15th anniversary of his series of speeches there as a then-fledgling presidential candidate. The former president gave notice that Democrats would not be passive victims of attacks.

"This is a contact sport, politics," he said. "You can't complain about being attacked. It's like Yao Ming complaining about being fouled playing basketball."

Clinton said he doesn't see Democrats shying from the debate.

"It's not that we want a bland, mushy, meaningless politics," he said. "We like our debate. ... We understand that campaigns will be heated and only one side can win. But we want it to be connected somehow to real lives and real people, to aspirations of ordinary Americans to the future of our children and our grandchildren."

Recently, the former president engaged in a testy exchange with Fox News over his administration's record on terrorism.

During remarks that were framed as a discussion of the common good, Clinton decried personal attacks against candidates for perceived lack of faith.

"It's not about who represents the religious truth and who is basically running for office on his or her way to hell," Clinton said.

Clinton also argued that the GOP has allowed its conservative element to drown out moderate voices.

"The ideological, right-wing element of the Republican Party has been building strength, partly in reaction to things that happened 40 years ago — Barry Goldwater's defeat, the excess of the '60s, Ronald Reagan's election" he said. "But this is the first time on a consistent basis, the most conservative, the most ideological wing of the Republican Party has had both the executive and legislative branches with a very distinct governing philosophy and very distinct political philosophy."

He said the United States' effort to develop new weapons and cut taxes undercut the moral arguments.

"They favor unilateralism whenever possible and cooperation when it is inevitable," Clinton said without specifically mentioning members of the Bush administration.

"The problem with ideology is, if you've got an ideology, you've already got your mind made up. You know all the answers and that makes evidence irrelevant and arguments a waste of time. You tend to govern by assertion and attacks."

In response, Tracey Schmitt, a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee, said, "It's not surprising to hear these attacks from a man widely recognized for repeatedly playing the blame game to cover his own mistakes."

Clinton spoke at an event sponsored by the Center for American Progress, a Democratic group run by his former chief of staff, John Podesta.

Clinton Reflects On His 2 Terms And Hits Hard At Republicans (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 18 — With fewer than three weeks until the midterm elections, former President Bill Clinton resumed his role as chief communicator of the Democratic Party on Wednesday in a speech that wrapped policy objectives in soaring rhetoric about bringing Americans together behind a single purpose.

Under the banner of securing the “common good,” Mr. Clinton reflected on his eight years in office as a time of effective governance and pressed Democrats to fight back against Republican claims of moral superiority.

DOJ_NMG_0083153

In a speech designed to commemorate his policy addresses from his presidential campaign 15 years earlier, Mr. Clinton did not prescribe remedies for his party or give expansive advice about the 2008 presidential campaign. And his advisers insisted that the speech, at Georgetown University, was not tied to any presidential aspirations of his wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Instead, Mr. Clinton's advisers said, the address was an effort to convey the purpose of his two terms under a single heading. Mr. Clinton reviewed many of the themes of his own political career, especially that of leveling the economic playing field for all Americans.

He portrayed Republicans as reactionary extremists who have been effective at winning elections but not running the country. And he urged greater dialogue between the two sides, to reach consensus and hear each other's views.

"Not that we want a bland, mushy, meaningless politics — we like our debates," Mr. Clinton said. "The country has been well served by its progressive and conservative traditions. We understand that campaigns will be heated, but we want it to be connected somehow to the real lives of real people, to the aspirations of ordinary Americans."

He continued: "This sort of politics — striving for a common good — for me stands in stark contrast to both the political and governing philosophy of the leadership in Washington today and for the last six years."

"The more ideological, right-wing element of the Republican Party has been building strength, partly in reaction to things that happened 40 years ago," Mr. Clinton said.

The speech, delivered at his alma mater, was the keynote address at a seminar sponsored by a research organization, the Center for American Progress, directed by Mr. Clinton's former chief of staff, John Podesta.

John Halpin, a scholar at the center who worked on the conference, said Mr. Clinton's message helped fill a void left by Congressional Democrats, who have, in recent elections, failed to put their messages under a single, comprehensible umbrella that voters can understand.

"I don't think we've gotten a lot of foundational leadership from the Hill on this," Mr. Halpin said. "I think a lot of people are still stuck in this mindset of projecting a litany of policy solutions."

Clinton Lists Differences With GOP, Administration (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

Former president Bill Clinton said yesterday that the governing Republican majority has abandoned the common good in favor of ideologically driven politics that demonize its opponents, has forced ordinary Americans to fend for themselves and has too often left the United States isolated internationally.

Speaking three weeks before the midterm elections, Clinton used a lengthy speech looking back at his own administration to offer sharp contrasts between the approach of Democrats in the 1990s and that of Republicans since President Bush took office more than five years ago.

"They believe the country is best served by the maximum concentration of wealth and power in the hands of the right people," he told a mostly student audience at Georgetown University. "Right in both senses."

Clinton went on to say that while Democrats "believe in mutual responsibility, they believe that in large measure people make or break their own lives and you're on your own." He continued: "We believe in striving, at least, to cooperate with others because we think there are very few problems in the world we can solve on our own. They favor unilateralism whenever possible and cooperation when it's unavoidable."

Clinton was critical of various Bush administration policies. Noting that there are no easy solutions, he said the administration has undermined its efforts to stop North Korea and Iran from developing nuclear weapons by seeking funds for two new nuclear weapons for the U.S. arsenal.

The pretext for yesterday's address was to reprise a series of speeches Clinton gave at Georgetown 15 years ago as he was launching his first campaign for the White House. Those speeches set out Clinton's centrist New Democrat philosophy with what he then called a "New Covenant" of opportunity, responsibility and community. That framed the campaign message he used to win the White House in 1992 and the blueprint he used through much of his presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0083154

Speaking at a conference sponsored by the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank that has become home to many of his former aides and advisers, Clinton also decried the state of political discourse, arguing that it has become far more rancorous and destructive than when he ran a decade ago.

"It's not that we want a bland, mushy, meaningless politics," he said. "We like our debates. . . . We understand that campaigns will be heated and only one side can win. But we want it to be connected somehow to the real lives of real people, to the aspirations of ordinary Americans, to the future of our children and grandchildren."

Clinton tried to square his sharp criticism of Republicans with his call for a different tone in political debate by stressing that there is a difference between engaging in debates about issues and philosophies and launching personal attacks.

"I long for the day when we will return to a debate that is not about who's a good person and who's a slug, not about who represents the religious truth and who is basically running for office on his or her way to hell," he said. "I long for the day when Republicans and Democrats will sit around and have these raucous, exciting arguments and actually love learning from one another and we create the common good out of the dynamic center."

Tracey Schmitt, a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee, responded by saying: "It's not surprising to hear these attacks from a man widely recognized for repeatedly playing the blame game to cover his own mistakes."

Clinton Comeback (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe And Holly Bailey

Newsweek, October 19, 2006

When Hillary Clinton and John McCain traded rhetorical blows over North Korea last week, some pundits hailed the exchange as a taste of 2008: a titanic clash between the early front runners in the next presidential election.

They forgot that the real titans of modern politics have yet to leave the stage: two relatively young, two-term presidents who show no sign of stepping out of the national debate on domestic politics and foreign affairs. Welcome to the heavyweight title fight between Bill Clinton and George W. Bush.

Clinton declared his political comeback Wednesday with a set-piece speech that is aimed, according to his aides, at framing his governing philosophy in the context of the 2006 elections. Clinton's goal: to show why his philosophy works, and why Bush's doesn't. Clinton, of course, doesn't cite Bush's name. But he hardly pulls his punches against what he calls "the leadership in Washington today."

In theory, Wednesday's speech marked the 15th anniversary of Clinton's "new covenant" speech at Georgetown University. In practice, it marked a reinventing of Clinton's themes—three weeks before the congressional elections—for today's problems.

Back in 1991 (as he was running for president), Clinton explained his new covenant like this: "People once looked at the president and the Congress to bring us together, to solve problems, to make progress. Now, in the face of massive challenges, our government stands discredited, our people are disillusioned. There's a hole in our politics where our sense of common purpose used to be."

Now the disillusion and discontent is fueled more by war than the economy. But Clinton is still trying to offer a vision of what he calls the "common good" instead of division over taxes, culture and conflict. "We believe in mutual responsibility. They believe that, in large measure, people make or break their own lives and you're on your own," he explained in today's speech. "We believe in striving, at least, to cooperate with others because we think that there are very few problems in the world we can solve on our own. They favor unilateralism whenever possible, and cooperation when it's unavoidable."

Clinton touched on some old themes: what he sees as the GOP's giveaways to big corporations and the wealthiest Americans, instead of his policy priorities: expanded health care, fiscal responsibility and tax cuts for the middle class. But he also outlined a New Democrat's approach to foreign policy. "I think the common-good approach on national security worked," he said. "It was a combination of carrots and sticks. We did have military encounters. We didn't succeed at everything we tried to do, but I think on balance the world was safer when we stopped than when we started."

Since the deadly Indian Ocean tsunami of 2004, Clinton and George H.W. Bush—the man he beat in 1992—have formed a close working relationship that has been transformational. And aides say the current president genuinely enjoys Clinton's company, as well.

DOJ_NMG_0083155

But there's another transformation that has quietly taken place over the last six years. When Clinton left office, his approval numbers in the Gallup poll were at a low 39 percent in early 2001. Today they are 20 points higher, and they have risen steadily as President Bush's numbers have dropped. Something similar happened to former president George H.W. Bush through the Monica Lewinsky scandal. That rise in 41's standing helped propel his son into a presidential campaign. It's entirely possible that Clinton's comeback will help propel his wife into her presidential campaign.

In the meantime, it's worth comparing the campaign schedules of the current president and his predecessor. On Thursday night, both Bush and Clinton will be in Virginia. In Richmond, the current president is scheduled to stump for embattled Sen. George Allen. At the exact same time, the former president will be headlining a private fund-raiser in McLean for Allen's Democratic opponent, Jim Webb. Last week, Bush headlined a $1.1 million fund-raiser for GOP congressional hopeful Peter Roskam. On Monday, Clinton will head to Illinois to campaign for Roskam's opponent, Tammy Duckworth, where he is expected to raise about $1 million. Wherever Bush goes, Clinton follows.

Yet Bush's profile is often lower than Clinton's on the campaign trail. While Clinton has been a welcomed speaker by Democrats in many of the nation's hottest House and Senate races, Bush's campaign schedule just isn't what it was four years ago.

Since August, Bush has appeared at public campaign events outside Washington just 15 times, according to an analysis by National Journal. By comparison, Bush had appeared at 29 public campaign events during the same period in 2002. White House officials have discounted the analysis because it does not take into account the private fund-raising Bush has done in recent weeks—including a stopover in Ohio for Sen. Mike DeWine. Yet there's no disputing that many Republican candidates have kept Bush at arm's length this year.

While Bush's schedule for the final weeks of the campaign hasn't been finalized, a tentative schedule provided by a senior administration official has the president on the road for just two to three events each week before Election Day—not the heavy schedule one might expect for a president whose party is in real jeopardy of losing control of Congress.

In contrast, Clinton has been a hot ticket in recent weeks, following his highly publicized interview on "Fox News Sunday" in which he angrily defended his administration's legacy on his handling of Al Qaeda and terrorism. He has stumped for congressional candidates in hotly contested races in Tennessee, Missouri, Ohio, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Minnesota, among other states.

Last weekend, he headlined a fund-raiser for Iowa Democrats in Des Moines, where he paraded into the room on a long red carpet like a celebrity on Oscar night. Women shrieked and men fumbled with their cameras as the former president walked by offering handshakes and high-fives. It could have been a scene straight out of 1996—except "Hail to the Chief" was replaced by a song off of U2's latest album.

Just as Bush has stepped up his attacks on Democrats in the final weeks of the campaign, Clinton has started trashing the current administration for increasing the federal deficit, bungling the response on Hurricane Katrina and for being "the most secretive and unaccountable" White House in history.

"You cannot blame the entire Republican Party," Clinton told supporters in Iowa. Casting his speech notes aside, the former president accused Republicans of trying to "paint themselves as pure and the rest of us who don't agree with them as stained" in order to stay in power. All three branches of government, Clinton said, were in control "not of the Republican Party, but of the most ideological, the most right wing, the most extreme sliver of the Republican Party."

Democrats, Clinton said, have a "big responsibility." "Forget about politics," he whispered. "Just go out and find somebody and look them dead in the eye and say, 'You know this isn't right'… We can do better, and this year, it's a job that Democrats have to do alone."

It's not clear that Clinton can connect with his old "common ground" message. But he is trying to identify the problem that every recent poll points to: a deep dismay with today's politics and the direction of the country. A recent Pew Research Center poll found 30 per cent of Americans said they were satisfied with the way things were going in the country. That's lower than Bush's personal approval ratings (37 percent) and lower than the number who said the military effort in Iraq was going fairly well or very well (also 37 percent).

DOJ_NMG_0083156

That national discontent does not just originate with Iraq or Bush, even if they are big factors behind the gloom. Only Republican and Democratic leaders rate lower than Bush, and by a slim margin, voters dislike the GOP more (33 percent approval versus 35 percent for Democrats).

Back in 2000, Bush shared a striking political quality with Clinton, even as the current president ran on a slogan of restoring honor to the Oval Office: he shared his optimism. In that period, he called Bill Clinton "the shadow," tapping into the anger over Clinton's scandals by offering a fresh start.

Three campaign seasons later, the political message hasn't changed much—but the messenger has. Now it's Bill Clinton who is talking about a fresh start, while Bush's message is more about finishing what he started: more about gritty resolve than a brighter day ahead. That's the opening that the boy from Hope is trying, once again, to exploit.

Fall TV Lineup Filled With Political Spots (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, October 19, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS — Patty Wetterling, the Democratic congressional candidate in a Republican-leaning district here, trailed her opponent by 9 percentage points a month ago. Then she ran a stark, 30-second TV commercial.

The ad has helped turn the race around.

Four days after Florida Rep. Mark Foley resigned in disgrace, Wetterling broadcast the first ad in the country on the scandal over Foley's suggestive computer messages to former congressional pages. She demanded an investigation, and she noted her activism on behalf of children, a cause she adopted after her 11-year-old son Jacob was abducted 17 years ago and never seen again.

Now, a Minneapolis Star-Tribune poll released Tuesday gives Wetterling an 8-point lead over Republican Michele Bachmann, who had been favored to carry the 6th Congressional District, the most conservative in the state.

Between the ad itself and the coverage it generated, "there's not anybody in the state who doesn't know Patty Wetterling is connected to that issue," says political scientist Steve Smith, who lives in the district.

Though some candidates are experimenting with posting ads on websites and campaign video on YouTube, old-fashioned commercials on local TV stations remain what Democratic strategist David Axelrod calls "the nuclear weapon" of politics.

As the Nov. 7 elections approach, viewers across the country face an autumn deluge of campaign ads, especially in places such as Minnesota that have several competitive races. During the local news shows here — campaigns prefer them on the theory that people who tune in to the news are likely to be voters — the customary ads for new cars and diet aids have been largely replaced by ones for candidates.

On Minneapolis-St. Paul stations alone, more than $7.4 million had been spent by last Friday on ads aimed at shaping the election outcome, according to the media firm TNSMI/Campaign Media Analysis Group, and the most intense three weeks of advertising were still ahead.

In the House race, Wetterling had spent $874,000, Bachmann $416,000 and the National Republican Congressional Committee $1.2 million. Each of the two Senate candidates and two gubernatorial candidates had spent $1 million or more.

"TV is still the weapon of choice for politicians," says Evan Tracey of TNSMI. He predicts a record $1.4 billion to $1.6 billion will be spent nationwide on political ads this year, with no signs of a drain to the Internet. "It delivers the largest audience in the most efficient manner."

At KARE-TV here, for example, not one campaign chose the less-expensive option of posting ads on the station's website instead of or in addition to putting them on the air.

Most Americans insist they don't believe what is said in campaign commercials. Half of those polled by USA TODAY/Gallup this month said they believe "not much" of what's in political ads; 20% said they believe "nothing at all." Only 5% said they believe all or almost all of what was said.

Campaign strategists and political scientists say ads do work, though, especially the negative ones that voters profess to hate.

DOJ_NMG_0083157

To look at this month's onslaught of campaign pitches, USA TODAY tracked all the political commercials broadcast on a single day, Oct. 10, on KARE, an NBC affiliate and the Twin Cities market's top-rated news station. (KARE is owned by Gannett, as is USA TODAY.)

The first ad, for Democratic Senate candidate Amy Klobuchar, catches early risers at 5:06 a.m., two hours before the first streaks of dawn. It's shown again 16 times, the last at midnight. Through the day, there are 10 ads for her opponent, Republican Mark Kennedy, 12 for Democratic gubernatorial candidate Mike Hatch, 5 for Bachmann and 4 for Wetterling.

Oh, and 11 ads against Wetterling financed by the GOP House campaign committee.

Of the 59 campaign ads on the air this day, 22 are mostly positive, giving reasons to vote for a candidate. Thirty-seven are mostly negative, giving reasons not to vote for the other side. Democrats' ads are almost evenly divided — 17 positive, 16 negative — while Republican ads are negative by 4-to-1. That's one sign that Republican candidates are on the defensive this year.

There's no doubt what Republicans want to talk about: taxes. Sixteen GOP ads focus entirely on taxes, and the other 10 all mention the subject. In contrast, just two of the Democratic ads focus on taxes. Two others are Wetterling's ads on the Foley scandal. Seventeen include a mix of issues, from the federal budget deficit to college loans.

The 12 ads aired by Hatch, the Democratic gubernatorial candidate, feature a buzz-cut police officer in uniform and badge defending Hatch and criticizing Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty on public safety.

Pawlenty, in a tossup race for re-election, isn't on the air on this day. The next morning, he unveils a commercial that uses a “referee” wearing black-and-white stripes and blowing a whistle to accuse Hatch of supporting higher taxes.

Political ads' first task: sway the undecided voters who determine close races.

In the House race, Bachmann's spot runs first, at 5:31 a.m. It touts her record of “fighting for lower taxes” as a state senator, including her support for eliminating the estate tax. The 30-second spot shows her speaking at a lectern, chairing a meeting and poised to dig into a hamburger at a picnic.

The ad doesn't mention Bachmann's opponent, but a half-hour later, Wetterling is slammed, courtesy of the National Republican Congressional Committee. By law, such independent ads can't be coordinated with the campaign, but national committees in both parties routinely fire at the opposition while the candidate takes the high road.

Wetterling is shown walking in slow motion as the announcer says she “broke her promise” not to run for the seat again after she lost a bid two years ago — there is the sound of a paper being torn in half — and labels her “a high-tax liberal politician we can't trust.”

At 9:29 a.m., in a sort of debate-by-ad, Wetterling punches back. Wetterling, a junior high math teacher before she became an activist for children, rotates two different ads today. One of them, focusing on the Foley scandal, blames congressional leaders for a “coverup” of Foley's misbehavior and demands the resignation of any who are found to be involved.

The other talks about taxes.

“Politician Michele Bachmann claims she's for lower taxes,” the announcer says, then adds that she has expressed support for a national sales tax. That would increase the cost of a car, home, groceries or a gallon of gas by 23%, he says.

“Michele Bachmann: Radical ideas we can't afford,” he says, as the sort of music heard in movies just before the killer jumps out of the closet plays in the background.

The juxtaposition of opposing ads is often no accident. The Federal Communications Commission requires stations to maintain a public log of campaign ads as they are booked. As elections approach, both parties send trackers to the stations nearly every day to check what the other side has in the works.

What's missing from the day of ads is as notable as what's included. Not one cites party affiliation — the better to attract independent voters — and none mentions the Iraq war or any other foreign-policy issue.

The war is an unavoidable topic in other venues, of course, including campaign debates and TV newscasts. Through this day, local news programs repeatedly report that a 27-year-old Army sergeant from Montevideo, Minn., has been injured by a roadside bomb in Iraq.

But Republican candidates don't want to spotlight the increasingly unpopular war or the president whose approval ratings have slumped, says political scientist Steven Schier of Carleton College in Northfield, Minn. The subject carries risks for Democrats, too, who are trying to appeal to independent and Republican voters.

DOJ_NMG_0083158

In her ads, Klobuchar is trying to be seen not as an anti-war liberal but as a tough-minded prosecutor, says Smith, who teaches at Washington University in St. Louis. Klobuchar is the chief prosecutor in Hennepin County, which includes Minneapolis.

In his ads, Kennedy is trying to nick Klobuchar while softening the edges of his image.

Klobuchar's ad runs midway through The Tonight Show with Jay Leno. Kennedy's ad follows 15 minutes later.

"Why are you picking on Amy Klobuchar?" a little old lady wearing a pink sweater demands as she sits next to Kennedy on a park bench, slapping his shoulder with the back of her hand. "Saying she gave out all those plea bargains and that she will ration our prescription drugs? You said she wanted to raise Social Security taxes and will give Social Security to illegal immigrants. Why did you say all those things?"

"Because they're true," replies Kennedy, wearing a plaid shirt and gray sweater.

"Oh," she says, mollified like the Emily Litella character portrayed by the late Gilda Radner on Saturday Night Live. "Never mind."

Klobuchar's double-digit lead in statewide polls has prompted the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee to cancel plans to buy airtime in the race. It will use the money on closer contests in Missouri and elsewhere. KARE general manager John Remes calls the number of ads for and against a candidate "an excellent barometer" of how close a contest is.

Even Bev Carleson, the 73-year-old woman from St. Louis Park, Minn., who was hired to appear in Kennedy's ad, isn't sure she's been persuaded by it.

She got the job not because of her politics but because the ad firm asked local talent agencies for a "quirky" old lady. After years of operating a hardware store with her then-husband, Carleson began at age 60 what she calls a "mini-career" of appearing in local ads.

Filming two versions of the 30-second spot took six hours on a sunny Sunday afternoon.

"He has a very clean-cut, boyish look, and his plaid shirt, you know — he's a very, very nice man," Carleson says of Kennedy. But when it comes to the election, put her down as undecided. "I have not made up my mind," she says, and doesn't feel any need to do so until Election Day is closer.

She'll have a chance to see a lot more TV ads about it before then.

Tables Turned For The G.O.P. Over Iraq Issue (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 18 — Four months ago, the White House offered a set of clear political directions to Republicans heading into the midterm elections: embrace the war in Iraq as critical to the antiterrorism fight and belittle Democrats as advocates of a "cut and run" policy of weakness.

With three weeks until Election Day, Republican candidates are barely mentioning Iraq on the campaign trail and in their television advertisements.

Even President Bush, continuing to attack Democrats for opposing the war, has largely dropped his call of "stay the course" and replaced it with a more nuanced promise of flexibility.

It is the Democrats who have seized on Iraq as a central issue. In debates and in speeches, candidates are pummeling Republicans with accusations of a failed war.

Rather than avoiding confrontation on Iraq as they did in 2002 and 2004, they are spotlighting their opposition in new television advertisements that feature mayhem and violence in Iraq, denounce Republicans for supporting Mr. Bush and, in at least one case, demand the ouster of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"I support our troops and I voted for the war, but we shouldn't stay the course, as Mr. Corker wants," Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., the Democratic candidate for Senate in Tennessee, says in one advertisement.

Mr. Ford's Republican opponent, Bob Corker, is shown against a backdrop of wartime scenes, saying, "We should stay the course," a phrase that Republicans once described as a rallying cry for the campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0083159

Taken together, the discussion on the campaign trail suggests just how much of a problem the Iraq war has become for Republicans. It represents a startling contrast with the two national elections beginning in 2002 with the preparation for the Iraq invasion, in which Republicans used the issue to keep Democrats on the run on foreign policy and national security.

The development also suggests that what has been a classic strategy of Mr. Bush's senior adviser, Karl Rove — to turn a weakness into a strength — is not working as well as the White House had hoped.

"As the Iraq war gets more unpopular, the environment for Republican candidates erodes," said Mark Campbell, a Republican strategist who represents several Congressional candidates, including Representative Jim Gerlach of Pennsylvania, who is fighting for re-election in one of the toughest races.

"Only in an election year this complicated can Republicans be happy that Mark Foley knocked the Iraq war off the front page," Mr. Campbell said.

A senior strategist familiar with Republican polling who insisted on anonymity to share internal data said that as of midsummer it was clear that "stay the course" was a self-defeating argument.

At that point, the strategist said, Republicans started trying to refine their oratory or refocus the debate back to discussing terrorism, where Republicans continue to say they wield the stronger hand and where candidates are running advertisements that Democrats describe as effective.

Democrats, seeing similar data in their polls, advised candidates to confront Republicans aggressively, in the view that accusations that Democrats would "cut and run" would not blunt Democrats' efforts to mock Republicans as wanting to "stay the course."

"For the first time in modern memory, Democrats are actually on the offensive when it comes to national security," said Matt Bennett, a founder of Third Way, a moderate Democratic organization that has been briefing Democrats on discussing the war and national security. "It is really stunning."

As of this week, party officials said, Democratic candidates in at least 17 of roughly 35 closely contested Congressional seats and at least six of eight Senate races considered close are running television advertisements against the Iraq war, presenting viewpoints that extend to calling for a troop withdrawal.

More broadly, Democrats in all parts of the country, in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio and New Mexico are embracing the war issue.

"It's not just the Northeast and the West Coast," Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, head of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said. "It's places like Virginia and Tennessee. Iraq and foreign policy are to a large extent albatrosses around the Republicans' neck this year. And they don't know what to do about it."

Republicans and Democrats said the White House effort to turn the war into an affirmative Republican issue was undercut by the increasing violence there, along with more American deaths that have brought the war home in the form of mournful articles in local newspapers.

That complicated the White House effort to present the Iraq war as part of the antiterrorism effort, and it has contributed to support for the war reaching record or near-record lows.

In the New York Times/CBS News Poll taken from Oct. 5 to Oct. 8, two-thirds of respondents said they disapproved of Mr. Bush's handling of the war and 66 percent said the war was going somewhat or very badly.

In the poll, 45 percent said Democrats were more likely to make the right decision on Iraq, compared with 34 percent of Republicans.

The White House counselor, Dan Bartlett, said Mr. Bush had always emphasized flexibility in tactics to achieve victory in Iraq. Mr. Bartlett said the president's recent added emphasis on adaptability had been prompted by the violence in Iraq and reactions to it, not because Republicans were on the defensive.

"The public sees what's happening in Iraq, they see the persistent violence, and they want to make sure that we're adapting," Mr. Bartlett said.

He said the White House and the Republican Party were not about to cede the traditional advantages on national security to Democrats. Mr. Bush, he added, would step up his attacks on their national security credentials at campaign appearances in Pennsylvania and Virginia on behalf of two of the most endangered candidates, Senator George Allen of Virginia and Representative Don Sherwood of Pennsylvania.

DOJ_NMG_0083160

Mr. Bartlett said Iraq remained a winning issue in the broader context of the war on terrorism, which the party would continue to hit hard.

Mr. Bush tried to do that on Wednesday in an interview on ABC News, telling George Stephanopoulos, the interviewer, that when voters go to the polls on Nov. 7 "they're going to want to know what that person's going to do, what is the plan for a candidate on Iraq, what do they believe?"

When Mr. Stephanopoulos asked Mr. Bush whether the increasing violence in Iraq was similar to the Tet Offensive in 1968, the Vietnam War campaign that is often cited as turning American opinion against the war, Mr. Bush said such a comparison "could be right," suggesting that terrorists were aiming for a similar result.

Mr. Bush's aides said he would continue to criticize Democrats on the war even if his words were not echoed by Republican candidates the way they were in 2002 and 2004.

In this environment, several Republicans said they had given up on trying to win an advantage on the war and would be satisfied in at least wrestling Democrats to a draw on it.

"When you lay out arguments in a clear way, you can argue this thing to sort of neutral at worst and, possibly, a slight advantage," said Russ Schriefer, a Republican strategist who is advising several candidates this year.

Mr. Schriefer said the best case that Republicans could make now was that "we can't afford to leave until the job is finished."

Andrew Kohut, president of the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, which has polled extensively on attitudes toward the war, said Pew figures suggested that one hope for Republicans earlier in this campaign — that Democrats would be hurt if they were perceived as criticizing the war without offering a strategy for withdrawal — had not been borne out.

"They are not getting punished for not offering an opinion," Mr. Kohut said. "The Democrats have an advantage on this issue, without having to say much about it."

Republicans and Democrats said they could not name any examples of Republicans' trying to use the war as a campaign issue.

But examples of the war being used by Democrats were abundant this week. In a debate in New Jersey, Thomas H. Kean Jr., the Republican challenger to Senator Robert Menendez, was repeatedly asked — 27 times, according to a statement put out by Senate Democrats — whether he would have voted for the resolution authorizing the Iraq war.

Mr. Kean refused to answer.

In Florida on Wednesday, Ron Klein, the Democratic challenger to Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr., an embattled Republican, attacked Mr. Shaw with an advertisement that said the congressman "even refuses to question Bush's handling of the war in Iraq."

And in Rhode Island, Sheldon Whitehouse, a Democrat who is making a strong challenge to Senator Lincoln Chafee, one of the six most-endangered Republicans, began running an advertisement urging the dismissal of Mr. Rumsfeld.

"Chafee refuses to call for his firing," the commercial said.

Linking Iraq To The War On Terror Has Downside For GOP (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, October 19, 2006

President Bush and his allies have spent months trying to drum up support for the administration's Iraq policies by arguing that the Iraq War isn't merely an isolated battle but rather the front line in a much larger war against terrorism.

Of course, that's not a new strategy. They did the same thing leading up to the 2004 presidential election, and they apparently succeeded, because exit polls showed a narrow majority of Americans saw Iraq as part of the fight against terrorism. The president won a second term because of that fight.

This year, it's fashionable to believe the link between those two "wars" has been severed in the public's mind. After all, a clear majority of Americans now tell pollsters they think the Iraq War is a mistake, even though they support the war against terror.

DOJ_NMG_0083161

My view is somewhat different. I believe the president has achieved what he wanted to achieve all along — to have Americans see Iraq as part of the larger American effort against terror — but he failed to understand that U.S. military and policy failures in Iraq could cause Americans to see the war on terror as failing as well.

Consider what we all have been witnessing in Iraq: a growing number of U.S. casualties and fatalities; increased reports of violence and anti-Americanism; ineffectiveness on the part of the U.S.-backed Iraqi government; and little or no progress toward the establishment of a stable Iraqi government that can overcome sectarian loyalties and make progress toward a sustainable democracy.

It's no wonder Americans give the president increasingly poor grades on his handling of the war on terror. By Bush's own standard, the front line of the war against terror — his Iraq policy — has been considerably less than successful.

"They have destroyed their great numbers on the war against terror by linking it to Iraq," one GOP observer I talked with recently commented.

While it is true that the public gives the president somewhat higher marks for handling the war on terror than for handling the Iraq War, the gap between the two has been shrinking.

Of course, the war on terrorism includes more than the Iraq War; it involves uncovering plots, apprehending potential terrorists, stopping the flow of money to terrorist groups and more. On some of those fronts, the administration has clearly been successful, and some Americans give the president credit for those successes. But in Iraq, and increasingly in the other military theater, Afghanistan, U.S. policy certainly appears flawed.

For Republicans, the virtual elimination of the war on terror as an effective political issue is a disaster, since it has been the party's ace in the hole.

Anyone who has watched the day-to-day arguments in races around the country has no choice but to come to the conclusion that Republican candidates have few issues at their disposal except the personal warts of their Democratic opponents.

In a number of races, including the Senate contests in Virginia and Montana, Republican incumbents apparently have adopted the worn-out strategy of longtime Republican consultant Arthur Finkelstein: Call your opponent a liberal as long and as loudly as you can, and eventually the voters will agree.

Well, this year that simply isn't working. It's hard to paint former Navy Secretary Jim Webb as a liberal, especially since he doesn't have a legislative record, and Montana Democrat Jon Tester looks more like a farmer with a buzz cut (which he is) than a liberal.

And given the Bush administration's performance in Iraq, Congress' handling of Social Security and immigration and the number of GOP officeholders who are headed for jail or who have been totally discredited, voters don't much care about buzzwords being thrown around by Republican strategists and candidates.

In Virginia, one television ad for Sen. George Allen (R) shows challenger Webb with Democratic Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Edward Kennedy (Mass.) and John Kerry (Mass.). For many Republicans, those are still scary images. The only question is whether they are scarier than Bush, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) right now.

I'm not suggesting that Republican consultants deserve most of the blame for the lack of issues to use against Democrats this cycle. Rather, the fault rests with the White House and with some Republicans on Capitol Hill, who fumbled Social Security, immigration, ethics and lobbying reform and, most importantly, the Iraq War.

But the lack of issues can't be ignored, and it helps explain why Republicans have been unable to drive a wedge between voters and Democrats this election year.

Democrats also deserve credit for finally addressing some of the problems that they created for themselves over the past 35 years.

For at least the past two years, their leaders have not passed up the chance to reiterate their support for the war against terror, thereby going a long way toward neutralizing the GOP's advantage on national security.

DOJ_NMG_0083162

To a great extent, they repositioned themselves on national security and defense the way Republicans once did when they turned around education by emphasizing reform, rather than the GOP's previous rhetoric of calling for the elimination of the Department of Education.

So now, Democrats have some newfound credibility on national security. Let's see what they do with it over the next couple of years.

Stuart Rothenberg is editor of the Rothenberg Political Report.

Iraq Is Big Issue For Voters Seeing The Upside Of War (NYT)

By John Leland

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

MADISON, Ala. — In this boomtown of military contractors and veterans, Carla Rock, 36, sat on an aluminum bleacher on a recent afternoon watching her children's tennis lesson and discussing the coming midterm elections.

Mrs. Rock said that she was aware of the unease about the war in some parts of the country, and that she was concerned about the nuclear test in North Korea. But over all, she said, America is on the right course.

"I feel things are good here," she said. "The economy's good, so it's hard to rock the boat."

Mrs. Rock, a Republican who twice voted for President Bush, said she would not want Democrats to take control of Congress with the country at war.

"I'd rather they be on the same page," she said of the White House and Congress.

Madison, a well-to-do community of new brick housing developments on former cotton fields, is one of the fastest-growing towns in the Southeast. Its population of 36,000 is more than double what it was in 1990, largely because of the military and aerospace industries, which employ more than half the area's workers. Companies like Boeing, Hewlett-Packard and Raytheon have branches here.

In interviews this month about the elections, the overriding concern here was, in fact, the war in Iraq. But many residents said they were not seeking dramatic change.

In the big races here, polls show commanding leads for the incumbents: Gov. Bob Riley, a Republican, and Representative Bud Cramer, a conservative Democrat who is running uncontested. Statewide, of the four Republican members of Congress in contested races, none faces serious challenge. Alabama's seats in the Senate, both held by Republicans, are not up for election until 2008 and 2010. The close races here are for lieutenant governor, attorney general and secretary of state.

Even so, the concerns expressed in interviews were less on local affairs than national ones.

While many here have friends or relatives serving in Iraq, the town has also benefited from military contracts, which lead to high salaries, low unemployment and rising real estate values.

"As much as people hate to say it, when the country is at war, it makes our area more productive and creates jobs," said Bob Wagner, 52, an engineer for a military contractor who also serves on the City Council.

This year alone, new or expanding companies have brought 3,000 jobs and $175 million in investment to the area. A 3,800-acre research park abutting the Redstone Arsenal Army base is the second largest in the country.

In the last midterm election, Mr. Wagner, a registered Republican and former marine, said his greatest concern was to "make sure America stood up to our enemies." He added, "When 9/11 hit I was all gung-ho to go to Afghanistan." On Iraq, he said he trusted the administration to pick the best course.

"I think there will be a time to move the troops out," Mr. Wagner said, "and I expect our leaders to have that information and act on it."

In addition to the war, he said another concern was property taxes: he does not think they are high enough.

With the community's rapid growth, Mr. Wagner said, "I'm worried about how we bring more money into the area" for schools, roads and other infrastructure.

Northern Alabama, which benefited from New Deal programs in the 1930's like the Tennessee Valley Authority, was once largely Democratic but now regularly splits the ticket, voting for Republican presidential candidates since 1980 while sending conservative Democrats to Congress. Madison's churches, including large Baptist and United Methodist congregations, are thriving but not very politically active.

DOJ_NMG_0083163

"Dissatisfaction with the war came late to Alabama," said David J. Lanoue, chairman of the political science department at the University of Alabama. "Instead of the president's approval declining to 35 percent, it declined to 50 percent or slightly above."

Dr. Lanoue added that the state Democratic Party had been weakened by years of defeat, and was hindered by district lines that favor incumbents. Republican candidates also benefit from the coattails of Governor Riley, he said.

Still, some residents of Madison, often those who have relatives in the military, say the Iraq war is changing their minds about a lot of things.

Helen Lee, 55, twice voted for President Bush, but now said he lacked the right experience to send troops to war. Like many residents, she comes from a family of servicemen, including her father, grandfather and husband; her son is on inactive status in the Marine Corps while he attends college.

Mrs. Lee is a registered Independent who says she votes mostly Republican. In the last midterm elections, in 2002, the Sept. 11 attacks were fresh in her mind, she said, and her biggest concern was for national safety. Now, Mrs. Lee said she had lost confidence in Mr. Bush.

"Bush is not listening to his active-duty military people," she said. "Bush and his advisers never served. You don't go in and 'take somebody out.' He's ignoring history, including centuries of hatred."

Aaron Beale, 26, a marine corporal on inactive reserve, is also impatient about Iraq. Mr. Beale said that four years ago he supported Mr. Bush and the plans for war, but his feelings have changed. Though he agreed with the push to remove Saddam Hussein, he said: "The war has gone on so long because we don't have enough troops. I've had friends killed because we're doing patrol missions with our hands tied. We can't defend ourselves."

In the coming election, Mr. Beale said that he wanted Democrats to win majorities in Congress, but that he was not tied to either party. "I used to be closer to the Democrats," he said, "but now it doesn't matter to me, as long as we get someone who knows what he's doing."

While he waits to be redeployed, Mr. Beale, too, is benefiting from the booming local economy: he is working as a personal trainer, largely for the successful military contractors and their families. "It's all a Catch-22," he said.

In a bungalow in Madison's historic district, Michael Murch, 39, an engineer who works on missile simulation, said that he was most concerned about terrorism and Iraq, but that people should have expected the war to go on this long. "A lot of people choose not to accept that," Mr. Murch said. In the long run, he said he expected the war to reduce the threat of terrorism, even if it meant higher risk along the way.

Like some others, Mr. Murch said he felt sheltered in Madison, but that in the last four years he had become more concerned about some national issues, including same-sex marriage — which he described as "an irritation" rather than a voting issue — and illegal immigration. Illegal immigrants have become "integral to the economy, but they're starting to strain some parts of the country," he said. "You can't round them up and throw them out. We can't live without them. But I'd like to stop the flow. That would be a voting issue."

Mr. Murch said the war had hurt some parts of the local economy, because financing for some research and development projects had gone to buying military equipment. But over all, he said that he thought the economy was strong and that he was planning an addition to double the size of his house. "It feels good to me because I'm not having some of the problems that they have in the rest of the state," he said. Even if engineers in Madison get caught in budget shifts, he added, "There's an abundance of jobs."

McCaskill Calls For Rumsfeld's Firing; Talent Does Not (CCT)

By David A. Lieb

The Contra Costa Times, October 19, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - She has declared Iraq a mess, called for a redeployment in two years and chastised Republican Sen. Jim Talent for not questioning Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld.

DOJ_NMG_0083164

Now Missouri Senate challenger Claire McCaskill has joined various Democrats nationally in asserting that Rumsfeld should be fired.

McCaskill, Missouri's auditor, added Rumsfeld's ouster to her Iraqi war critique during her fifth and final debate against Talent in Missouri's nationally watched Senate race. Talent declined to say whether Rumsfeld should be retained or removed, but continued his defense of President Bush's war policies.

Responding to McCaskill's many criticisms, Talent declared: "She wants to pull out of Iraq, you can hear it, and the government will collapse and terrorists will take over."

The war in Iraq has been one of the most consistent themes both nationally and in Missouri's Senate campaign for the Nov. 7 elections. Democrats need to gain six seats to wrest control of the Senate from Republicans, and polls show Talent and McCaskill about even.

On Wednesday, McCaskill rattled off a list of what she said had been poor advice from Rumsfeld - that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction when it did not; that sectarian conflict would not bog down the U.S. military; that there would be no U.S. occupation in Iraq.

"He should definitely be fired," McCaskill said in response to a question from a debate panelist. "He has not given one piece of advice to this president that turned out to be true."

Talent, asked the same question, replied: "I don't normally tell presidents who they ought to have or not have in the national chain of command."

As he did in a debate Monday in Springfield, Talent went on the offensive Wednesday by questioning the business practices of McCaskill's husband, whether her family had paid all its taxes and her effectiveness as a Kansas City area prosecutor in 1990s.

"My opponent has a record that suggests she's not going to change the system in Washington and might even be part of the problem," Talent said.

McCaskill defended her record on each account and claimed Talent was running a "a campaign of innuendo," which she suggested Talent himself did not really believe.

"I think he's a good man, and I think he works hard," McCaskill said. "I don't believe he's comfortable trying to assault my character as he is, but he's going along with his political advisers who tell him you have to hit her hard and make it personal."

Later at the urging of a media panelist, the candidates whose campaign commercials have become increasingly negative showered some praise on each other. McCaskill described Talent as "very intelligent," a hard-worker and a "strong family man." Talent described McCaskill as a "tenacious battler" who has remained committed to her children.

The debate before about 200 people at Kansas City's University Academy charter school was not televised live because one of the sponsoring television stations, KMBC, chose not to pre-empt the hit show "Dancing with the Stars." Instead, the debate is to be broadcast Thursday night. A loud and constant hum over the sound system made it difficult for the audience to hear the candidates' voices.

At one point in the debate, Talent complained that McCaskill had called him "a false patriot" and that her campaign had said he was "surrounded by scandal."

McCaskill apologized for the false patriot remark - made during a September campaign stop in Jefferson City - but added she disagreed with the level of funding for veterans benefits that Talent and the Republican-led Congress had approved.

"You are surrounded by scandal, but it's not your fault, it's because you're in Washington," McCaskill added, drawing the largest laugh of the evening from the audience.

The candidates were asked what two pieces of legislation they would like to see passed in the first 100 days of Congress, should their party win control in this year's elections.

McCaskill provided three answers: implementation of all of the recommendations from the bipartisan commission established after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks; an increase in the federal minimum wage; and an amendment to the Medicare prescription drug law to allow negotiations with pharmaceutical companies for lower prices.

Talent defended the existing Medicare prescription drug law as a good deal for seniors and provided one wished-for bill to pass - his own measure permitting small businesses to pool together in buying health insurance for their employees.

DOJ_NMG_0083165

McCaskill rebutted that Talent has been unsuccessful in passing the bill for several years and suggested it didn't go far enough in mandating the types of health problems that insurers must cover.

Many Jabs In Missouri Senate Debate, But No KO (SLPD)

By Matt Franck

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 19, 2006

One started throwing punches at the opening bell. The other began by symbolically laying aside her gloves.

But by the time the fifth and final debate between Sen. Jim Talent and Missouri Auditor Claire McCaskill had concluded Wednesday, both had taken their share of jabs at each other.

Talent opened the debate in Kansas City by returning to a tactic he used in a debate Monday in Springfield. Once again, he launched into an assault on issues related chiefly to McCaskill's personal life, such as her husband's finances and property taxes she was once late in paying.

In so doing, Talent attempted to turn the race's dynamic on its head.

Throughout the campaign, McCaskill has portrayed Talent as a Washington insider, incapable of changing the system. But Talent sought to topple that pillar of McCaskill's strategy.

"My opponent has a record that suggests that she's not going to change the system, and she might be even part of the problem," he said.

McCaskill, in turn, used her opening statement to rebuke Talent for engaging in a campaign that she said was based on innuendo and character assault. She pledged to stick to the issues and suggested that Talent could not do likewise because his advisers had told him to engage in attacks.

"I think he's a good man," McCaskill said. "I don't think he's comfortable attacking my character like he is. They have convinced him that he needs to do this."

TODAY'S TALK: Televised debates: Valuable insight into candidates or political theater?

In most every respect, Wednesday's debate returned to themes that already had been well-trodden in four prior debates. The two even parroted many of the exact lines they had used in prior engagements.

Once again, McCaskill sought to portray Talent as an unquestioning supporter of President George W. Bush's policies, most notably the war in Iraq. But she broke new ground, calling for the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

"He should definitely be fired," she said. "He has not given one piece of advice to this president that has turned out to be correct."

Talent said the war had been more difficult than anticipated. He said Rumsfeld had been at a disadvantage because of prior cutbacks in military staffing. Finishing the task, he said, is the only alternative in the conflict.

"The only thing worse than going through what we're going through now in Iraq is going through it for nothing," Talent said.

On other issues, the two candidates again differed in their takes on the economy. Talent cited low unemployment, double-digit economic growth and a surging stock market as validation that tax cuts approved in recent years were stimulating the economy.

McCaskill suggested that the only ones enjoying those financial statistics are those on Wall Street.

"If Senator Talent thinks that Americans are feeling this prosperity, he's not talking to real Missourians," she said.

The two also differed on a new prescription drug plan for older adults. Talent said the plan was working. McCaskill said Congress didn't do enough to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies for lower prices.

The two found rare common ground, at least partially, on the issue of education policy. Both said the No Child Left Behind law was too fixated on rigid goals, rather than rewarding schools that improve.

The debate offered each candidate a chance to question the other. As she did in a debate Monday, McCaskill asked Talent to state whether he supports a state ballot measure to increase the minimum wage.

Talent declined, saying that's an issue for state voters. But he said he supports minimum wage increases - if coupled with tax breaks for small business.

DOJ_NMG_0083166

Talent again questioned McCaskill's personal record, such as taxes she was late paying on a condo. McCaskill has said that the property was occupied by her brother and that she paid the taxes when she learned they were delinquent.

Talent's harshest criticism was of the finances of McCaskill's husband, saying he oversees a complex web of businesses, dozens of which pay no taxes.

McCaskill said she and her husband had provided highly detailed information to the Senate on her family's finances, which she said were completely proper.

"Just because my husband's businesses are complicated doesn't mean he's done anything wrong," she said.

Going negative

The most bitter exchanges between the two were on the campaign itself.

Talent said he had stuck to parts of McCaskill's record that are relevant to the office. In contrast, he said, McCaskill has often attacked him with no specifics, such as connecting him to scandal and challenging his patriotism.

McCaskill apologized for calling Talent a false patriot but would not back down from other remarks.

"You are surrounded by scandal, but it's not your fault. It's because you are in Washington," she said, drawing the night's biggest response from the audience.

The two did speak well of each other when asked to do so by one of the panelists. McCaskill praised Talent for his intelligence. Talent, in turn, said he respected McCaskill's tenacity.

The Kansas City event was the final round of a statewide tour of debates in Lake of the Ozarks, Clayton and Springfield. Additionally, the two candidates squared off on national television on NBC's "Meet the Press."

The debate was held at the University Academy Charter School before an audience of nearly 200. The debate will not be broadcast on television or radio until today in Kansas City. It is scheduled to air in St. Louis on KETC (Channel 9) at 9 p.m. Friday.

Iraq War Key Point Of Dispute In Senate Race (BSUN)

By Sumathi Reddy

The Baltimore Sun, October 19, 2006

Increasing his attacks on the president's Iraq policy, Senatorial candidate U.S. Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin today called for the administration to fire Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and develop a plan to bring American troops home immediately.

Cardin, a Democrat, criticized his Republican opponent, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, for his support of President Bush's Iraq policy -- an accusation the Steele campaign adamantly denied today.

"There is a major difference between Michael Steele and me on what we need to do in Iraq and what we need to do in foreign policy," said Cardin speaking at Towson University at an event organized by a group of College Democrats. "I believe we need change. Michael Steele believes in the status quo."

Doug Heye, Steele's communications director, insisted that Steele has been critical of the administration's Iraq policy.

"Michael Steele has not been silent on this issue," Heye said. "He has called for the president to be more open with what the mission on hand is and to set specific benchmarks so that we can get the job done as quickly as possible and bring our troops home as quickly as possible."

Heye said he did not know Steele's position on Rumsfeld. He said Steele does not support a timetable, unlike Cardin.

Cardin remained less specific than in a speech he gave four months ago in which he set the end of 2007 as a goal for a full troop withdrawal.

Today he said "we don't need a time schedule," but when asked he said the figure given by military experts, of 10,000 troops a month, was a "reasonable expectation."

Calling the administration's Iraq policy a "disaster" and "colossal mistake," Cardin charged that Bush and his administration have "mismanaged this war at just about every step," and have neglected to acknowledge their mistakes.

He again reiterated that the National Guard troops must be the first to return home so they can defend the country against potential terrorist attacks and natural disasters. He also called for an international conference with Iraq and other countries to implement a cease-fire and discuss how to rebuild the country.

DOJ_NMG_0083167

Citing the development of nuclear weapons in North Korea and potentially Iran, Cardin charged that Iraq had led the administration to lose focus on the war against terror.

"We had a failure in North Korea policy as a result of this administration's focus on Iraq rather than focusing on the real dangers against America," said Cardin.

Heye said Cardin's Iraq position is not as clear and consistent as the congressman portrays it.

At today's event, Cardin said he has always remained opposed to the war and voted against it four years ago. "It may not have been a popular vote four years ago but it was the right vote and I'm proud of that," he said.

When asked by a student what his biggest mistake as a congressman has been, he said, "I'm sorry that I haven't been more effective in stopping this war in Iraq."

Blacks Divided On Whether Hoyer's 'Slavish' Remark Was Racist (WT)

By Jon Ward And S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

Opinion was mixed among black leaders in Prince George's County yesterday about whether a top Democrat's comment that Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele is "slavishly" devoted to the Republican Party is racist.

"If there are those that feel offended, then I guess it has merit," said the Rev. Joel Peebles, assistant pastor at Jericho City of Praise, a large black church.

Mr. Peebles attended an afternoon luncheon in Beltsville, where he and about 30 other pastors listened to Mr. Steele, a black Republican running for the U.S. Senate, speak about his moral convictions.

House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer, Southern Maryland Democrat, made the comment Sunday before a group of mostly black business leaders in Upper Marlboro, as reported by MSNBC.

Mr. Hoyer, who is white, has apologized for the remark, saying he should not have used the word "slavish," but that he meant no offense.

"Why use that word?" Mr. Steele said in an interview. "You saying it tells me you think it and feel it."

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, Mr. Steele's Democratic opponent, yesterday agreed that Mr. Hoyer's remarks were "the wrong words to use," but said the apology should "put an end to it."

Race has played a key role in the Maryland Senate race, which has been one of the most-watched contests in the nation. Mr. Steele, the first black to win a statewide election in Maryland, has the potential to capture votes among the Democratic Party's most loyal voting bloc -- blacks.

Wayne Frazier, a black businessman who attended Sunday's luncheon, said that he was not offended by the remark and did not see or hear anyone else who was offended by it.

"After Steny Hoyer spoke, it was a standing ovation they gave him," said Mr. Frazier, who is a staunch Cardin supporter. "It didn't affect the audience at all."

"I see it as Michael Steele refusing to address the issues and trying to incite folks," Mr. Frazier said.

Mr. Steele rejected that argument.

"In my view, it is absolutely [racist]," Mr. Steele said in an interview. "Why do [the rules] always seem to change with me?"

In 2002, Mr. Hoyer called Mr. Steele a "token" candidate, and state Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. called him an "Uncle Tom." Both Democrats later apologized for their remarks.

Meanwhile, a Cardin staffer last month was fired for referring to Mr. Steele as an "Oreo" on her personal Web log, and a liberal blogger last year depicted Mr. Steele as a minstrel.

A few influential pastors at the luncheon declined to comment on Mr. Hoyer's remark.

But the Rev. Emma Jean Thompson, co-pastor of Integrity Church in Landover, said, "Many times if you are black and want to be a Republican, you are breaking away from the plantation, and I passionately disagree with that."

The Rev. Anthony Evans, head of the National Black Church Initiative, condemned the remark, and the Maryland Republican Party called on Mr. Hoyer to resign.

DOJ_NMG_0083168

Also yesterday, Mr. Steele released a new commercial in which he criticizes the Republicans for covering up a congressional-page scandal involving Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican.

"When I see Washington politicians covering up scandal, protecting each other rather than protecting children, it's time to show them the door," Mr. Steele says. "And I don't care which party they're in."

Mr. Cardin has led Mr. Steele in most polls, but a new Survey USA poll yesterday showed that the two candidates are even.

Lieberman Debates Rivals About Iraq War (AP-Y)

By Andrew Miga

AP, October 18, 2006

The Iraq war touched off a war of words Wednesday as Sen. Joe Lieberman debated four candidates trying to succeed him in the Senate.

Two minor party candidates joined Democrat Ned Lamont in assailing Lieberman's support for the war. Republican Alan Schlesinger reminded the group that the Senate lacks the authority to withdraw troops.

"Three-and-a-half years ago, President Bush rushed our country into war," said Lamont, a wealthy businessman who rode a wave of anti-war sentiment to an August primary victory over Lieberman. "Senator Lieberman cheered him on every step of the way."

Lieberman, who is running as an independent, said, "No one wants to end the war in Iraq more than I do." But he warned against pulling out troops before the job is done.

The three-term senator and former vice presidential nominee criticized Lamont's support for a Senate resolution earlier this year that would have set a July 1 deadline for withdrawing U.S. troops.

"That would be a recipe for disaster," Lieberman said. "We've got to end the war in Iraq, but we've got to do it in the right way."

Green Party candidate Ralph Ferrucci and Concerned Citizens Party candidate Timothy Knibbs joined Lamont in calling for redeployment of U.S. forces in Iraq.

"We really need to pull these troops out right now," Ferrucci said.

Knibbs said the United States had no constitutional, legal or moral ground to invade Iraq.

"We need to get out of Iraq immediately," he said.

Schlesinger delivered an energetic debate performance similar to the one he gave Monday, but the long-shot candidate had a harder time Wednesday because of two minor party candidates.

Schlesinger cautioned that senators lack the power to withdraw troops.

"The problem in Iraq is not military," he said. "The problem in Iraq is political."

Lieberman's Iraq Stance Draws Fire In Debate (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

HARTFORD, Oct 18 — Facing criticism from all sides of the political spectrum, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman was forced to defend himself in a five-way debate on Wednesday, at times appearing frustrated and repeatedly invoking his experience to fend off the group of opponents who are trying to unseat him.

Unlike the situation in the first debate on Monday, which included only the three major candidates and largely steered away from the war in Iraq, Mr. Leiberman's four opponents spent much of their time this time assailing his support of the war.

And this time Ned Lamont, who defeated Mr. Lieberman in the Democratic primary, primarily because of his opposition to the senator's support of the conflict, was joined by two minor party candidates in sharply criticizing Mr. Lieberman.

Alan Schlesinger, the Republican candidate who widely trails Mr. Lamont and Mr. Lieberman in the polls, called for a three-state solution in Iraq, saying: "The problem in Iraq is not the military. The problem in Iraq is political."

Beyond the war, each of the challengers repeatedly turned Mr. Lieberman's experience in Washington against him and argued that his 18 years in the Senate and candidacy for national office undermined his contention that he could change the culture in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0083169

The format of the debate, which included one-minute answers from each of the five candidates, diffused the arguments and muted the messages of Mr. Lieberman and Mr. Lamont, who have been sparring for months. But like the three-way debate on Monday, the challengers seemed to jar Mr. Lieberman, a veteran debater and orator.

Indeed, Mr. Lieberman was cut off several times by the moderator, Bob Schieffer, the chief Washington correspondent of CBS news and the host of the program "Face the Nation," when he ran over his allotted time for answers. The debate was taped in front of hundreds of people at the Bushnell Theater here and was to be broadcast on WFSB in Connecticut at 7 p.m. on Thursday.

After all four of his opponents railed against the war — the Green Party candidate Ralph Ferrucci said troops should be pulled out "right now" and Timothy Knibbs, the Concerned Citizens Party candidate, said the United States should get out "immediately" — Mr. Lieberman insisted that any discussion about it in Congress should include those who do not favor immediate withdrawal.

"We cannot and will not stay in Iraq forever," he said. "My commitment to Iraq is not indefinite or unconditional. We need to stay there as long as there is a reasonable prospect with our help of building a free and independent Iraq, which will be a whole different path in the Arab world." As he went on, Mr. Lieberman was cut short after his time ran out and Mr. Schlesinger responded sharply:

"You see this is what happens when you spend six years running for president and vice president of the United States, you begin to believe you are actually in the executive branch of the government."

When Mr. Lieberman repeated his recent call to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Mr. Knibbs took a jab, suggesting it was because the senator had been on the "short list" to replace him.

Still, the overall tone of the debate was far more measured and substantive than either Monday or the primary debate, with questions ranging from domestic issues like social security and gas prices to the threats from North Korea and Iran.

Mr. Lamont criticized a bill Mr. Lieberman sponsored that called for "regime change" in Iran.

"Reminds us an awful lot of how we got into Iraq," he said. "I think first and foremost we've got to use hard-headed tough negotiations, working in concert with our allies, try sanctions and force as a backup."

Mr. Schlesinger made it clear that he agreed with Mr. Lieberman on that issue, saying that it would be impossible to negotiate with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran. Mr. Lieberman did not back off his support for the legislation, saying it was because "there are some leaders you can't negotiate with."

"History reminds us in the case of Hitler and Osama bin Laden that they said exactly what they ultimately did," Mr. Lieberman said. "He wants to wipe out Israel and he has told thousands in the town square of Tehran: Imagine a world without the United States of America. That is possible in our time."

In previous debates, Mr. Lamont has appeared off-kilter and nervous. On stage, he seemed slightly more comfortable, though he often spoke quickly during his answers. Mr. Schlesinger, who gave a dramatic performance in his first debate this week, appeared calmer, though he continued to deliver lines that drew several whoops and laughs from the audience. Even Mr. Lieberman chuckled when Mr. Schlesinger derided Mr. Lamont's wealth and the millions he has spent in his campaign. But Mr. Lieberman was more often the recipient of the barbs from Mr. Schlesinger, who derided him as a tax-and-spend liberal whom conservative voters should not trust.

Later, he said Mr. Lieberman did not understand the "real world" between the "Potomac and Hollywood."

"If you had someone doing a job for 18 years, and after 18 years their record was one of complete failure, what would you do? What do you think should happen with that person?," Mr. Schlesinger said before turning to Mr. Lamont and asking, "You're a businessman, what would you say about someone like that?"

Quietly, Mr. Lamont responded, "It's time to go."

Even as Mr. Lieberman hammered the concept of bipartisanship and invoked his credentials as an independent, he spoke of the prospect of becoming chairman of the Homeland Security committee if the Democrats take over the Senate.

Schlesinger Shines In Senate Debate (NLD)

By Ted Mann

DOJ_NMG_0083170

New London (CT) Day, October 19, 2006

Hartford — Once again, U.S. Sen. Joe Lieberman and challenger Ned Lamont squared off in a debate Wednesday. And once again, all the good lines were stolen by the guy whose campaign was left for dead months ago, even in his own party — Republican Alan Schlesinger.

Schlesinger, running a more-than-distant third to Lieberman and Lamont in recent public opinion polls, reprised the animated, jesting style he had shown earlier in Wednesday's debate at the Bushnell in Hartford, which was taped for broadcast at 7 tonight by WFSB-Channel 3.

And most of his sharpest jabs — like those of the two other candidates, Ralph Ferrucci of the Green Party and Timothy Knibbs of the Concerned Citizens Party — were aimed at Lieberman.

As the candidates grappled with a question about the war in Iraq, and how they would handle the eventual withdrawal of troops, Schlesinger suggested both Lamont and Lieberman were implying they'd have more control over what happens in that country than they would actually enjoy if elected. And he also got in a swipe at Lieberman's national campaigns in 2000 and 2004.

"You see, this is what happens when you spend six years running for president and vice president of the United States," Schlesinger said. "You get to believe that you're actually in the executive branch of the government.

"No one on this stage, no one on this stage is going to pull the troops out immediately," he continued. "What we need to do is help the president, help the administration, help the Congress come up with some sane answer so that our troops will come home naturally. That's the only thing that makes sense."

Little new material was presented. With five candidates sharing the stage, answers were quick, and both Lieberman and Lamont largely served up re-mixed renditions of their usual stump speeches.

Lamont charged the Bush administration with leading the country into a foolhardy war, and Lieberman with "cheering him on all the way."

Lieberman accused Lamont of distorting his record, and touted his own record of alliances with Republicans as more effective for his constituents.

In between the two of them, gesturing broadly, often bowing in the direction of Lamont or Lieberman as he addressed them, was Schlesinger — a former state representative and mayor of Derby whose candidacy has been so star-crossed thus far that his approval ratings have sunk as low as the margin of error and his own party, from the governor to the president, has refused to formally endorse him.

But Schlesinger shined Wednesday as he had in a debate in Stamford, and his attacks on the incumbent Lieberman seemed to please Lamont's fans as much as they did Schlesinger's own.

In a spat over Social Security, in which Lieberman reiterated his opposition to partial-privatization proposals for the program even as Lamont noted that the senator had "been on both sides of the issue" in the past, Schlesinger drew the only applause.

"I say we repeal congressional pensions and put the Congress under Social Security like the rest of us," he said.

After Lieberman mentioned the Social Security trust fund, a prime topic in the senator's vice presidential campaign in 2000, Schlesinger turned to Lieberman, impassioned, to insist that the program's funding is in jeopardy.

"I'm telling you," he cried. "From the bottom of my heart! This thing is not funded. It's IOUs from Joe Lieberman and Al Gore."

Lamont's campaign could benefit from the debate-stage ascendance of Schlesinger, whose campaign seemed derailed months ago by revelations he had gambled under a fake name. But Schlesinger's appeals Wednesday were to the very voters who have helped Lieberman overcome animosity within his own party to build a lead over Lamont since the primary — Republicans, conservatives and moderates.

Schlesinger even seemed to gift-wrap a punch line for his Democratic rival at the close of the debate, asking Lamont what he would do with an employee who had failed to fix a problem after working for 18 years, the length of time Lieberman has spent in the Senate.

"Probably time to go," Lamont dutifully responded, to laughter from the half-filled auditorium.

DOJ_NMG_0083171

Outside the theater, Schlesinger was ebullient, and refused to concede that he might play the role of spoiler by siphoning conservative votes from Lieberman.

"Joe Lieberman took the votes away from me," he said. "I'm just getting 'em back."

A Lamont campaign volunteer stood nearby, and shouted out for quiet when a driver in a pickup truck honked his horn.

"Let Alan speak," he said.

Poll Finds Support For Tax Increase (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

A large majority of Northern Virginia residents want the state to spend more money to fix the region's roads and rails, and more than three-quarters say they wanted the opportunity to raise local taxes to do it, a new Washington Post poll shows.

Overall, the survey finds deep resentment among the region's voters toward their government in Richmond, particularly the General Assembly. Only 9 percent of likely Northern Virginia voters polled said they were "very satisfied" that the government is working for the best interests of their part of the commonwealth. Forty-eight percent of those voters said they were dissatisfied, compared with 37 percent in other parts of the state.

At the same time, those likely voters living in the Washington suburbs gave extremely high marks to Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), despite his having so far failed to make good on his campaign promise to help solve the region's transportation problems. Almost 80 percent of Northern Virginians approve of the job he is doing as governor, the poll found.

That result suggests that General Assembly members in Richmond are taking the brunt of the blame for the stalemate over transportation funding that consumed lawmakers for much of the year. In the poll, 55 percent of the region's likely voters blamed lawmakers, especially Republicans, for the failed special session last month. Only 11 percent blamed Kaine.

Asked for their assessment of the job General Assembly members are doing, just 42 percent of Northern Virginians gave a positive response, compared with 56 percent in other parts of the state.

The results highlight a truth about the Washington suburbs: There is desperation for a traffic fix and frustration with a state government that has not been able to deliver one.

"Every day it gets worse," said Elias Ullah, 32, an independent voter and father of two who commutes from Manassas to Alexandria. "I'd like to pay more taxes. The time you're wasting [in traffic] is more valuable than the tax money you would pay."

Northern Virginia has been struggling for years with highways that become congested daily, a Metro system that doesn't reach the largest population or work centers and aging roads and bridges that need repair. Officials and business leaders have put the price tag for fixing those problems in the tens of billions of dollars.

Four years ago, voters in Northern Virginia rejected a regional sales tax increase that would have raised $5 billion over a decade. Now, the poll suggests that people in the region might think differently if given a second chance.

Seventy-six percent of likely Northern Virginia voters said they want the opportunity to vote again on a local tax increase. And about half of those voters said they would support a general tax increase or higher fees and tolls to pay for new roads, bridges and mass transit.

"I'm not in favor of paying more taxes, but people have to be willing to raise their taxes to pay for public needs," said Karen Rosenbaum, 68, of Arlington.

Del. Timothy D. Hugo (R-Fairfax), who voted against a package of tax increases during the special session, said Northern Virginia commuters would feel differently if they knew that Republicans in the House had pushed to use the state's surplus for transportation against the wishes of others in the legislature.

"It would have been a step in the right direction," he said of the GOP plan. "When people see there is a huge surplus, their answers will be, 'Spend that money first.' "

The statewide poll of 1,004 likely voters in November's election was conducted Oct. 10-12 and has a margin of error of plus or minus three percentage points.

Despite intense support for action in Northern Virginia, the poll suggests that people in other parts of the state feel less urgency about transportation problems.

DOJ_NMG_0083172

For example, just 9 percent of the people in Lynchburg and Southside Virginia and 16 percent in Richmond said it is "extremely important" that the state spend more on roads. That compares with 40 percent of people in Northern Virginia who said the transportation needs are "extremely important."

There is a measure of hope for Northern Virginians: Two-thirds of respondents in the rest of Virginia were willing to allow regions to raise their own taxes to fund transportation.

Statewide, however, voters remain split about how to finance the needed work.

Asked how they would prefer government to pay for new transportation projects, 17 percent said higher taxes on all Virginians would be their first choice. Twenty-three percent said government should reduce spending on other services. And 32 percent said government should increase user fees, such as tolls.

Elected leaders in Northern Virginia said they are not surprised by the results, especially the expression of frustration with General Assembly members.

"They treat us like a bank," Fairfax County Board of Supervisors Chairman Gerald E. Connolly (D) said of the legislature. "If we have needs, they are transparently uncaring and unresponsive while they are taking billions of dollars in sales and income tax revenue. Our voters are smart. They get it. That's not a good deal."

Connolly and other elected officials in Northern Virginia have pushed for statewide tax increases that would boost transportation spending statewide. Those efforts have been blocked largely by Republicans in the House of Delegates, who say they oppose any general tax increase to pay for road improvements.

Del. Leo C. Wardrup Jr. (R-Virginia Beach), chairman of the House Transportation Committee, said members of the public are often willing to say they will support tax increases for roads until they are presented with a specific plan to do so.

"When people talk about, 'Yes, we're willing to see a rise in taxes,' the next question is, 'Who's it going to be on?' " he said. "I really question the veracity of these polls."

The House GOP has paid for its own polls, which it said show no appetite for tax increases in Northern Virginia or elsewhere.

Members of both parties in the General Assembly have promised to discuss transportation again when they return to Richmond in January. But most express little hope of reaching a compromise soon.

Instead, many Virginia politicians are expecting a spirited debate about who's to blame as all 140 House and Senate seats come up for election next year.

Polling director Jon Cohen and staff writer Eric M. Weiss contributed to this report.

Bloomberg's Car Is Stolen In New Jersey (NYT)

By Sewell Chan And Nate Schweber

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

A gray 2001 Lexus owned by Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg was stolen in a carjacking in Hackensack, N.J., yesterday in which two thieves assaulted a personal employee of the mayor, took the car and ditched it about seven miles away, according to the authorities.

The employee, Gradimir Bosnjak, 62, was on an errand to pick up a colleague when the assault and carjacking occurred at 8:43 a.m., the police in Hackensack said. Though the car was recovered a few hours later, the thieves — a man and a woman who the authorities said attacked Mr. Bosnjak — were not apprehended.

The mayor, whose public schedule yesterday included a morning announcement at the central branch of the Brooklyn Public Library and the Mets playoff game at Shea Stadium last night, was not involved in the carjacking.

Mr. Bosnjak, who lives in Astoria, Queens, is one of several personal employees of Mr. Bloomberg, who lives in a town house on the Upper East Side. Mr. Bloomberg, whose net worth is estimated at $5.3 billion, owns several cars, including the Lexus, according to public records. But he often takes the subway to work accompanied by his police detail.

The crime startled residents in a neighborhood of two-family houses in the Fairmount section of northern Hackensack, in Bergen County.

DOJ_NMG_0083173

Mr. Bosnjak had parked the car on Willow Avenue near Herman Street when a woman approached the driver's side. Mr. Bosnjak had already lowered the window.

"She asked for money — $5 for bus fare — and he says, 'I don't have any,' " said Capt. Frank Lomia, the commander of the detective division at the Hackensack Police Department. "He rolls up the window. The second suspect jumps into the front seat, yells at him and says, 'What did you do to her?' He punches him in the face, then the first suspect reaches into the window that's still open and starts grabbing and pulling at him."

Mr. Bosnjak fought back, but the couple managed to force him out of the mayor's car. The man climbed into the driver's seat while the woman raced around to the other side and also got in. Then they sped off, at one point making a sharp turn and running over the front lawn of a house.

Mr. Bloomberg's car was found around 11 a.m. in front of Parkway Friendly Service, an auto body shop at 30-09 Broadway, along Route 4 in Fair Lawn, about seven miles west of Hackensack. The vehicle had dirt and grass on the front bumper but was otherwise undamaged, Captain Lomia said.

Mr. Bosnjak, who was not robbed, declined medical treatment and was taken to police headquarters, where he was interviewed, Captain Lomia said.

"He seemed like a very nice gentleman," Captain Lomia said. "I would say he's a tough guy. He fought off his attackers. He was able to strike back at the male — he hit him back in the face a couple of times and was able to hit him in the ribs. He fought them off bravely — not something I would recommend to people."

While at the station, Mr. Bosnjak received a telephone call from Mayor Bloomberg, who asked what had happened and expressed concern, according to the mayor's press secretary, Stu Loeser.

"The mayor appreciates the Hackensack Police Department's hard work and hopes that those who committed this crime are swiftly brought to justice," Mr. Loeser said.

The car was examined by investigators from the Bergen County sheriff's office, then released to Mr. Bosnjak, who had a second set of keys with him. Mr. Bosnjak left the police station around 4 p.m.

Police said the two carjackers were both in their mid-20's. The woman was described as being 5 feet 7 inches tall, with light brown skin, a thin build and a nose ring and wearing a light blue jacket. The man was described as being 5 feet 8 inches tall, with dark skin and a thin build and wearing a black cap.

"They got the vehicle and they did go somewhere," Captain Lomia said. "Was that their whole motivation? It sure looks that way."

Chad Clark, 20, who lives in Hackensack, said he was walking by at 8:45 a.m. and saw the police talking with the victim, who was dressed in a tan suit, a white shirt and a tie. "He had a black eye and there was blood on the side of his face," Mr. Clark said. "He looked pretty bad."

Mr. Clark said while he was taking his younger sister to a neighbor's house for a ride to school, he had seen a woman and a man three times, walking up and down Main and Herman Streets. They were looking at houses and appeared confused.

"They looked like they were lost," Mr. Clark said.

The mayor entered his town house in Manhattan around 6 p.m. and left a short while later. He did not answer questions from a reporter. Two women who left the house said they could not comment.

Around 6:30, Mr. Bosnjak returned to his apartment in Queens and declined to answer questions from reporters, saying he was too tired.

Former Mayor Edward I. Koch said yesterday that around 2000, his personal car was stolen while it was parked outside the Queens home of his driver, a retired police officer. "We never recovered it," Mr. Koch said. "Now there's an additional bond between the mayor and myself."

Run, Barack, Run (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

Springfield, Illinois

DOJ_NMG_0083174

Barack Obama should run for president.

He should run first for the good of his party. It would demoralize the Democrats to go through a long primary season with the most exciting figure in the party looming off in the distance like some unapproachable dream. The next Democratic nominee should either be Barack Obama or should have the stature that would come from defeating Barack Obama.

Second, he should run because of his age. Obama's inexperience is his most obvious shortcoming. Over the next four years, the world could face a genocidal civil war in Iraq, a wave of nuclear proliferation, more Islamic extremism and a demagogues' revolt against globalization. Do we really want a forty-something in the White House?

And yet in his new book, "The Audacity of Hope," Obama makes a strong counterargument. He notes that it's time to move beyond the political style of the baby boom generation. This is a style, he said in an interview late Tuesday, that is highly moralistic and personal, dividing people between who is good and who is bad.

Obama himself has a mentality formed by globalization, not the S.D.S. With his multiethnic family and his globe-spanning childhood, there is a little piece of everything in Obama. He is perpetually engaged in an internal discussion between different pieces of his hybrid self — Kenya with Harvard, Kansas with the South Side of Chicago — and he takes that conversation outward into the world.

"Politics, like science, depends on our ability to persuade each other of common aims based on a common reality," he writes in his book. He distrusts righteous anger and zeal. He does not demonize his opponents and tells audiences that he does not think George Bush is a bad man.

He has a compulsive tendency to see both sides of any issue. Joe Klein of Time counted 50 instances of extremely judicious on-the-one-hand-on the-other-hand formulations in the book. He seems like the guy who spends his first 15 minutes at a restaurant debating the relative merits of fish versus meat.

And yet this style is surely the antidote to the politics of the past several years. It is surely true that a president who brings a deliberative style to the White House will multiply his knowledge, not divide it.

During our talk, I reminded Obama that at some level politics is about power, not conversation. He pointed out that he'd risen from nothing to national prominence in a few years so he knew something about acquiring power, but he kept returning to his mode, which is conversation, deliberation and reconciliation.

The third reason Obama should run for president is his worldview. At least in the way he conceptualizes the world, he is not an orthodox liberal. In the book, he harks back to a Hamiltonian tradition that calls not for big government, but for limited yet energetic government to enhance social mobility. The contemporary guru he cites most is Warren Buffett.

He has interesting things to say about the way culture and economics intertwine to create urban poverty. He, conceptually, welcomes free trade and thinks the U.S. may have no choice but to improvise and slog it out in Iraq.

The chief problem in his book is that after launching off on some interesting description of a problem, he will settle back, when it comes time to make a policy suggestion, into a familiar and small-bore Democratic proposal. I'd give him an A for conception but a B-minus for policy creativity.

Obama, who is nothing if not honest about himself, is aware of the problem, and has various explanations for it. And what matters at this point is not his platform, but the play of his mind. He is one of those progressives, like Gordon Brown in Britain, who is thinking about the challenges of globalization outside the normal clichés.

Coming from my own perspective, I should note that I disagree with many of Obama's notions and could well end up agreeing more with one of his opponents. But anyone who's observed him closely can see that Obama is a new kind of politician. As Klein once observed, he's that rarest of creatures: a megahyped phenomenon that lives up to the hype.

It may not be personally convenient for him, but the times will never again so completely require the gifts that he possesses. Whether you're liberal or conservative, you should hope Barack Obama runs for president.

The G.O.P.'s Bad Bet (NYT)

By Charles Murray

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

Las Vegas

DOJ_NMG_0083175

LAST week President Bush signed a law that will try to impede online gambling by prohibiting American banks from transferring money to gambling sites. Most Americans probably didn't notice or care, but it may do significant political damage to the Republicans this fall and long-term damage to Americans' respect for the law.

So, a month before a major election, the Republicans have allied themselves with a scattering of voters who are upset by online gambling and have outraged the millions who love it. Furthermore, judging from many hours of online chat with Internet poker players, I am willing to bet (if you'll pardon the expression) that the outraged millions are disproportionately electricians, insurance agents, police officers, mid-level managers, truck drivers, small-business owners — that is, disproportionately Republicans and Reagan Democrats.

In the short term, this law all by itself could add a few more Democratic Congressional seats in the fall elections. We are talking about a lot of people (an estimated 23 million Americans gamble online) who are angry enough to vote on the basis of this one issue, and they blame Republicans.

In the long term, something more ominous is at work. If a free society is to work, the vast majority of citizens must reflexively obey the law not because they fear punishment, but because they accept that the rule of law makes society possible. That reflexive law-abidingness is reinforced when the laws are limited to core objectives that enjoy consensus support, even though people may disagree on means.

Thus society is weakened every time a law is passed that large numbers of reasonable, responsible citizens think is stupid. Such laws invite good citizens to choose knowingly to break the law, confident that they are doing nothing morally wrong.

The reaction to Prohibition, the 20th century's stupidest law, is the archetypal case. But the radical expansion of government throughout the last century has created many more.

For example, all employers are confronted with rules and regulations from Occupational Safety and Health Administration and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission that they regard with contempt — not because they cut into profits, but because they are, simply, stupid. They impede employers yet provide no collateral social benefit. And so employers treat the stupid regulations as obstructions to be fudged or ignored. When they have to comply, they do not see compliance as the right thing to do, but as placating an agency that will hurt them otherwise.

The same thing applies to lesser degrees to all of us who find ourselves doing things that we know are pointless (think of various aspects of tax law) only because we fear attracting a bureaucracy's attention. For millions of Americans, our day-to-day relationship with government is increasingly like paying protection to the Mafia — keeping it off our backs while we get on with our lives.

The temptation for good citizens to ignore a stupid law is encouraged when it is unenforceable. In this, the attempt to ban Internet gambling is exemplary. One of the four sites where I play poker has blocked United States customers because of the law, but the other three are functioning as usual and are confident that they can continue to do so. They are not in America, and it is absurdly easy to devise ways of transferring money from American bank accounts to institutions abroad and thence to gambling sites.

And so the federal government once again has acted in a way that will fail to achieve its objective while alienating large numbers of citizens who see themselves as having done nothing wrong. The libertarian part of me is heartened by this, hoping that a new political coalition will start to return government to its proper functions. But the civic-minded part of me is apprehensive. Reflexive loyalty to the rule of law is an indispensable cultural asset. The more honest citizens who take for granted that they are breaking the law, the more their loyalty to the law, and to the government that creates it, is eroded.

Common Sense-Impaired (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

This copy is for your personal, non-commercial use only. To order presentation-ready copies for distribution to your colleagues, clients or customers, use the Order Reprints tool at the bottom of any article or visit:

www.djreprints.com.

• See a sample reprint in PDF format.

• Order a reprint of this article now.

Common Sense-Impaired

October 19, 2006; Page A18

The 1990 Americans with Disabilities Act reflected a generous national impulse to provide the most opportunity to all Americans. But the law has also sometimes led to overzealous interpretations and court suits that can defy common sense -- and endanger the broader public.

A case in point is last week's ruling by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals that United Parcel Service has violated federal law by banning drivers who are deaf. While acknowledging that federal law requires drivers of trucks heavier than 10,000 pounds to be able to hear, a three-judge panel of the oft-overruled court ruled that UPS was obliged to prove that allowing the deaf to drive one of its ubiquitous brown vehicles would be unsafe.

Part of the problem here appears to be the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The EEOC filed a brief in the case arguing that, because UPS already hires drivers with risk factors such as previous accidents, it would be discriminatory for it not to accept other risks too. Previously, the EEOC sued UPS unsuccessfully to force it to hire drivers who can see out of only one eye. And a few weeks ago the EEOC sued ExxonMobil, alleging discrimination because the oil giant won't allow pilots over the age of 60 to fly its jets -- despite a federal law prohibiting pilots over 60 from flying commercial passenger planes.

Certainly, deaf Americans can now do many jobs that were unfairly denied them in an earlier era. But professional driving remains the kind of work that also involves public safety. UPS drivers have to keep to a tight schedule, often amid crowded urban traffic where the ability to hear is needed to prevent accidents to other cars and pedestrians. A company such as UPS is obliged to take such precautions if only to protect itself against liability. The Ninth Circuit has once again let its egalitarian impulses trump the larger public good.

URL for this article:

http://online.wsj.com/article/SB116121673704597098.html

Copyright 2006 Dow Jones & Company, Inc. All Rights Reserved

This copy is for your personal, non-commercial use only. Distribution and use of this material are governed by our Subscriber Agreement and by copyright law. For non-personal use or to order multiple copies, please contact Dow Jones Reprints at 1-800-843-0008 or visit www.djreprints.com.

Bush: U.S. Will Stop N. Korea Nuke Moves (AP)

AP, October 19, 2006

President Bush said Wednesday the United States would stop North Korea from transferring nuclear weapons to Iran or al-Qaida and that the communist regime would then face "a grave consequence."

Bush refused to spell out how the United States would retaliate. "They'd be held to account," the president said in an ABC News interview.

In light of North Korea's Oct. 9 test detonation of a nuclear bomb, Bush warned that any transfer of nuclear material elsewhere in the world by the North would be considered a grave threat to the security of the United States. He previously used "grave threat" in relation to Iraq's Saddam Hussein, whose government was toppled in the U.S.-led war in 2003.

"If we get intelligence that they're about to transfer a nuclear weapon, we would stop the transfer, and we would deal with the ships that were taking the — or the airplane that was dealing with taking the material to somebody," the president said.

Asked how he would retaliate, Bush would not be specific, "You know, I'd just say it's a grave consequence."

"The leader of North Korea to understand that he'll be held to account. Just like he's being held to account now for having run a test," Bush said.

The United States repeatedly has said it does not intend to attack the North. But the Bush administration also has refused to take any military option completely off the table.

Shifting to Iraq, Bush said intensifying violence now might be compared with the Tet offensive in Vietnam beginning in 1968. The Viet Cong and North Vietnamese armies undertook a series of attacks that shook America's confidence about winning the war and eroded political support for President Johnson.

"There's certainly a stepped up level of violence, and we're heading into an election," Bush said. But he added, "My gut tells me that they have all along been trying to inflict enough damage that we'd leave. And the leaders of al-Qaida have made that very clear."

Bush said al-Qaida was very active in Iraq. "They are dangerous. They are lethal. They are trying to not only kill American troops, but they're trying to foment sectarian violence.

"They believe that if they can create enough chaos, the American people will grow sick and tired of the Iraqi effort and will cause government to withdraw," he said.

The military said Wednesday that 11 U.S. troops died in combat amid a security crackdown in Baghdad, putting October on track to be the deadliest month for American forces since the siege of Fallujah nearly two years ago.

Bush said the news of casualties "breaks my heart" but said it is surrender "if you pull the troops out before the job is done."

Rice Seeks To Calm Asia Amid Fear Of A Second Test By North Korea (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad, Neil King Jr. And Gordon Fairclough

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

As reports circulated that North Korea could be preparing to conduct a second nuclear test, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice sought to ease jitters in Japan following the first explosion.

But a second test, while certain to provoke widespread condemnation, could provide useful insight into North Korea's technical capability and its intentions, scientists and military analysts said.

Visiting Tokyo at the start of a five-day visit to Asia and Russia, Ms. Rice promised that the U.S. would use the "full range" of its powers to defend Japan.

In addition to encouraging strict enforcement of sanctions against Pyongyang, Ms. Rice is urging countries in the region not to react to the test by pursuing development of their own nuclear weapons. Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said after meeting with Ms. Rice that the government "is absolutely not considering a need to be armed by nuclear weapons."

The Oct. 9 blast was relatively small for an atomic test, leading analysts to conclude that it was either a larger weapon that failed or a small device. The explosion was smaller than the first tests by the seven countries that acknowledge having nuclear weapons -- though a smaller bomb could still be lethal in explosive power and radioactive fallout.

Pyongyang called the test a success, but has withheld any data on the explosion or pictures of the device.

U.S. officials said they doubt that the nuclear device was deliberately small, chiefly because a small explosive is technically more difficult to build.

U.S. intelligence officials have assumed for some time that North Korea probably had one or more nuclear devices. But they have doubts that North Korea is close to mastering the technology needed to build a bomb compact enough to be put inside a long-range missile.

With so little known about the device, it is also possible the country created the equivalent of a so-called dirty bomb, a conventional explosive combined with radioactive material.

U.S. officials said satellite pictures showed activity in North Korea suggesting another test could be in the works. To develop a nuclear arsenal, analysts say, the country would likely conduct many tests and try to make them bigger. "Given the small yield of the first test, the scientific tendency will be to increase the size of the yield in a second test, if it were to happen," said Han Yong Sup, a professor at Korea National Defense University in Seoul.

Jon Wolfsthal, a fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, said people shouldn't believe a second test signals that the first one was a failure. "They wouldn't want to test a weapon they don't have a lot of confidence in," said Mr. Wolfsthal, especially given the country's limited supply of weapons-grade plutonium. "The North Koreans are clearly in the nuclear business for the long haul," he said.

The Institute for Science and International Security, a Washington arms-control think tank, estimates that North Korea has managed to obtain between 20 kilograms (44 pounds) and 53 kilograms of weapons-grade plutonium. That could be enough to manufacture four to 13 warheads, depending on their size and sophistication.

Japan Tells Rice It Will Not Seek Nuclear Weapons (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0083178

By Thom Shanker And Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

TOKYO, Oct. 18 — The government of Japan assured Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice today that it has no intention of pursuing a nuclear weapons program, despite North Korea's detonation of a nuclear device.

"The government of Japan has no position at all to consider going nuclear," said Taro Aso, Japan's foreign minister. "There is no need to arm ourselves with nuclear weapons, either."

His statement came during a joint news conference in which Ms. Rice vowed that the full range of American military commitments to Japan remained undiminished.

"The United States has the will and the capability to meet the full range — and I underscore full range — of its deterrent and security commitments to Japan," Ms. Rice said.

North Korea's nuclear test set off political tremors throughout the region and raised fears that several of the advanced economic and technological powers might seek their own nuclear deterrent, setting off a new Asian arms race.

Japan is certainly a nation with the nuclear know-how to move rapidly, if it chose, toward creating a nuclear arsenal.

Hawks in the Japanese political establishment have said the nation should engage in a debate over going nuclear, but have stopped short of calling for Japan to embark on a nuclear program. But given the legacy of World War II and constitutional restrictions that limit Japan's military to a defense force, even the idea of a debate over a nuclear arsenal is a significant change.

Earlier today, in fact, Mr. Aso told a committee in Parliament that it was "important" to discuss whether Japan should acquire nuclear arms, while stressing that it had no immediate plans to do so. Mr. Aso criticized the long-held taboo in Japan, the only country to have suffered from atomic bombs, against considering acquiring nuclear arms even "at a time when a country next to us comes to have them."

"We can't consider, we can't talk, we can't do anything and we can't exchange opinions — that's one way of thinking," Mr. Aso said. "I believe it is important to have various discussions on it as another way of thinking."

"The reality is that it is only Japan that has not discussed possessing nuclear weapons, and all other countries have been discussing it," he added.

Mr. Aso became the second high-ranking politician close to Prime Minister Shinzo Abe to voice the need for a frank discussion on nuclear arms. On Sunday, Shoichi Nakagawa, the policy chief and one of the top four officials of the governing Liberal Democratic Party, made similar remarks on a television program.

The remarks, albeit followed by quick denials of any intention of acquiring nuclear arms, represent the first time that such prominent politicians have spoken so publicly about the need to open the debate over the issue. They are likely to fuel the fear in Asia of a remilitarized Japan, as well as worries among policy-makers in the United States that the North's nuclear test will trigger a nuclear arms race in this region.

In recent years, under former Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, Japan shed several other longtime taboos by deploying troops to Iraq and participating in the U.S.-led missile defense shield.

Upon becoming prime minister last month, Mr. Abe said that his priorities would be to revise the U.S.-imposed pacifist Constitution and eliminate a longtime ban on engaging in collective self-defense.

Within the terms Secretary Rice chose in offering assurance to Japan — that American military power remains committed to treaty obligations to defend Japan and deter other nations from attacking — was the strong signal that Japan has no need to build its own nuclear arsenal.

There was also a message meant for the North Korean leadership to hear, a repetition of Mr. Bush's signals last week that the American military is poised to respond to any attack on its ally.

Senior advisers to the secretary of state have said that while Japan is a stable democracy and a trusted ally, any sign encouraging Japan to go nuclear would have dangerous implications. State Department officials express concerns that no nation could manage the regional turmoil if numerous Asian states, many with simmering historic hostilities, joined the nuclear club.

DOJ_NMG_0083179

In particular, officials fear that any Japanese declaration of a decision to start a nuclear weapons program would prompt another American ally in the region, South Korea, to do the same, and might inspire Taiwan to follow — all actions that would greatly anger China.

Secretary Rice travels on this week to Seoul, South Korea, Beijing and Moscow in an effort to rally North Korea's neighbors to add muscle to enforcing a Security Council resolution on sanctions that some regional powers already have interpreted to suit their national interests.

In many ways, her first stop, here in Tokyo, is the easiest, as Japan and the United States have the most unified public view on efforts to limit, and eventually end, North Korea's nuclear program.

Japan Has No Plans For Nukes; Watch On N. Korea Continues (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel And Emi Doi

McClatchy Newspapers, October 19, 2006

TOKYO - Japan told visiting Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Wednesday that it has no plans to develop its own nuclear weapons, as Asian countries watched North Korea for signs it is planning further nuclear tests.

Rice arrived in Tokyo, the first stop of a four-nation tour, to reaffirm in person the United States' long-standing commitment to Japan's defense and snuff out any trend toward a regional arms race.

In the aftermath of North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test, some Japanese politicians have openly asked whether the country should take another look at its own prohibition against nuclear weapons.

But Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said after talks with Rice: "As far as Japan is concerned, we, the government of Japan, have no position at all to consider going nuclear."

Rice, at a brief press conference with Aso, issued a stern warning to North Korea that the United States would come to Japan's defense if necessary.

"The United States has the will and capability to meet the full range - and I underscore, full range - of its deterrent and security commitments to Japan," Rice said.

She was to meet Thursday with new Prime Minister Shinzo Abe for talks that include how to enforce U.N. sanctions that allow for inspection of North Korean cargo.

Japan sees itself as a potential North Korean target and has announced its own unilateral sanctions, including a ban on ship visits and trade imports.

Still, Aso emphasized diplomacy, saying, "We intend to keep the door open to dialogue at all times."

Rice agreed, saying the United States did not want to escalate the crisis.

News reports this week have said that U.S. intelligence agencies have detected additional activity around North Korea's underground nuclear test site, although it is not known whether a second test is imminent.

The United States is committed to Japan's defense under a 1960 mutual security treaty.

Discussion of nuclear weapons is a sensitive topic in Japan, the only nation to have suffered a nuclear attack. Still, Japan has an extensive supply of plutonium for its civilian nuclear power industry, and experts believed it could develop nuclear arms in years, if not months, if it chose to.

On Sunday, the policy chief of Japan's Liberal Democratic Party, Shoichi Nakagawa, said in a televised interview that Japan's constitution does not rule out the option of possessing nuclear arms.

"There could be an argument that possession of nuclear weapons diminished the likelihood of being attacked as we could fight back in such an event," Nakagawa said. "There can be discussions, of course."

While Nagakawa later softened his remarks, they provoked an immediate backlash.

Tetsuo Saito, of the New Komei Party, LDP's coalition partner, said: "We will never possess nuclear arms. We should not even discuss the matter as it causes concerns to the world."

On the U.N. sanctions, Rice assured the Japanese that they are not meant to be "a blockade or a quarantine" on North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0083180

Japanese officials and aides to Rice were discussing procedures for inspecting North Korean ships carrying suspicious cargo.

Yomiuri Shimbun, a leading Tokyo daily, reported Wednesday that Japan would tell Rice that its Maritime Self-Defense Forces will cooperate in ship inspections.

Japan, Acting To Calm U.S. Worries, Rules Out Building Nuclear Arms (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

TOKYO, Oct. 18 -- Japan "is absolutely not considering" building a nuclear arsenal in response to the North Korean nuclear test, Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso said Wednesday, moments after Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice reiterated that Japan was protected by the American nuclear umbrella.

Rice arrived here Wednesday on the first stop of a tour through northeast Asia and Russia. Her trip is aimed at allaying concerns and coordinating strategy against the Pyongyang government in the wake of the test.

The question of whether Japan would go nuclear has stoked worries within the U.S. government and increased tensions in the region. Earlier in the day, Aso told a parliamentary committee that while Japan's nonnuclear principles remain unchanged, "it's important to have discussions on the matter."

The ruling party's policy director on Sunday also urged a debate on whether Japan should consider developing its own nuclear deterrent. Japan is the world's only victim of a nuclear attack, and it has consistently refused to allow the United States to store nuclear weapons on its territory. But experts say Japan has a large supply of plutonium from its civilian nuclear power program, giving it access to the material necessary to quickly make the switch to a strategic nuclear program.

In response to a question at a news conference with Rice, Aso said: "There is no need to arm ourselves with nuclear weapons. For Japan's own defense . . . we have the commitment, and that commitment has been reconfirmed by Secretary Rice."

"Japan has answered this question," Rice said. "The role of the United States is to make sure that everybody, including the North Koreans, know very well that the United States will fully recognize and act upon its obligations under the mutual defense treaty" with Japan.

Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, who is to meet with Rice on Thursday, also reiterated Wednesday that his government would not discuss building a nuclear bomb. "That debate is finished," Abe testily told reporters.

Speaking to reporters as she flew to Asia, Rice acknowledged that a nuclear arms race was a concern, which is one reason she planned to use the trip to assure Japan and South Korea that they remain under U.S. protection. "I think through doing that we can mitigate some of the potential for a truly destabilizing set of events to take place in the region in response to the North Korean test," she said.

During a speech in Shanghai in 2004, Vice President Cheney warned that, if faced with a reality that North Korea has a stockpile of nuclear weapons, other nations in the region "may conclude their only option is to develop their own capabilities, and then we have a nuclear arms race unleashed in Asia."

South Korea and Taiwan are also considered potential candidates to begin nuclear weapons development.

Nuclear Arms Spread 'hard To Stop' (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And David Pilling

Financial Times, October 19, 2006

Donald Rumsfeld, US defence secretary, on Wednesday said it was "practically impossible" to prevent countries from proliferating nuclear weapons if they had that aim.

"This is one of the hardest things we do...There's so much moving around the world by land, sea and air that is is practically impossible, not impossible, but certainly it would take a lot of countries co-operating with a high degree of cohesion," Mr Rumsfeld told a military audience in Alabama.

"The only thing that would do it [prevent proliferation] will be a high degree of cohesiveness and co-operation on the part of the international community," Mr Rumsfeld added. "And that has been something that has been lacking."

DOJ_NMG_0083181

His comments come as Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, began a round of shuttle diplomacy in north-east Asia in an effort to co-ordinate effective implementation of United Nations sanctions against North Korea, which include efforts to prevent the communist state from proliferating nuclear weapons.

Ms Rice, who will meet Shinzo Abe, Japan's prime minister, on Thursday, is due to fly on to Seoul where she and Taro Aso, Japan's foreign minister. They will be joined by Ban Ki-moon, South Korea's foreign minister and the next UN secretary-general.

In Tokyo on Wednesday, Ms Rice met Mr Aso to try to find ways in which Japan could help enforce sanctions on Pyongyang without transgressing its pacifist constitution.

Japan has opened discussions on offering logistical support, such as fuelling, to US ships sent to inspect vessels coming in and out of North Korean ports.

Mr Abe's government already operates a similar service for American ships in the Indian Ocean under a special law that has just come up for annual revision. But providing logistical support in inspection operations could drag Japanese ships into conflict if North Korean ships resisted, military analysts said.

Hiroshi Suzuki, deputy cabinet secretary, said some cabinet ministers had raised the possibility of Japanese ships being able to fire back in self-defence. The government wanted to ensure that rules of engagement were clear and that personnel on the scene would not be left in an ambiguous position.

Speaking before Ms Rice's arrival, Thomas Schieffer, US ambassador to Tokyo, said: "We recognise that Japan has specific considerations because of constitutional issues. It is not as easy for them to participate in a sanction regime as it is for others." But he said Washington remained confident Japan could help in a "meaningful way".

Mr Suzuki said Tokyo wanted to discuss other issues with Washington, including the efficacy of its nuclear umbrella, which took on added importance in view of the North Korean threat. Japan, he said, maintained "solid adherence" to its three non-nuclear principles – not to possess, develop or trade nuclear weapons.

On Wednesday Mr Aso told parliament Japan had every right to discuss the desirability of possessing nuclear weapons, even though he was against any change. His remarks prompted Mr Abe to say the nuclear debate was "finished".

Pyongyang's Nukes: How Dangerous Are They? (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON

In July 1955, researchers from North Korea's Academy of Sciences traveled to Moscow to attend a conference on nuclear energy. Shortly thereafter, the Kim Il Sung regime began sending specialists to a new institute in Dubna, a city devoted to Soviet nuclear physics. Their mission: learn the basics of splitting the atom.

From that seed, a bomb may have grown. On Oct. 9 - more than a half century after that first delegation left Pyongyang - North Korea conducted a nuclear test in the northeastern region of Kilju.

The test was small, and possibly a failure. But US experts say that given the length of time the North Koreans have been at work, and the apparent importance of nuclear weapons to the country's leadership, they may now continue to test until they get it right.

They might not have labored five decades just to produce a scientific demonstration. At this point, they could be perfecting something else: a deliverable nuclear arsenal.

"My own view is that they are building a smaller weapon in line with a device that could fit on a ballistic missile," says David Albright, a physicist and president of the Institute for Science and International Security (ISIS) in Washington. Possibility of a second test

At the time of writing, North Korea had not conducted a second nuclear explosion. But US satellite imagery reportedly has revealed increased activity around several possible test sites.

"We're concerned about further action by the North Koreans, but further action by the North Koreans will only deepen its isolation, which is pretty deep right now," said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Wednesday in Tokyo.

DOJ_NMG_0083182

North Korean officials, for their part, did not rule out a second test. In a rare interview with a Western news organization, Ri Gun, director-general of the Foreign Ministry's American affairs bureau, told ABC News that another test would be "natural."

That is just what worries nuclear experts in the United States.

According to a statement issued by the office of John Negroponte, US director of national intelligence, the explosive yield of the Oct. 9 test was "less than a kiloton." It is possible that this relatively low yield was intentional, the result of a proof-of-principle design using minimal fissile material. But it is much more likely to indicate a test fizzle, say experts.

"They will want to test until they get it right," said Michael Swaine, a senior associate in the China program at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington, at an Oct. 12 seminar on the North Korean situation.

Such misfires aren't necessarily symbols of incompetence. Almost all declared nuclear powers have had them. In October 1951, a US bomb test named Buster Able failed not once, but twice. The Soviets had a misfire in 1954. In May 1957, Britain's first attempt at exploding a hydrogen bomb produced only a quarter of the expected yield.

In the case of North Korea, whatever went wrong, it probably was not due to haste. Satellite photos of the suspected test site released Oct. 13 by the Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC) show that neither buildings nor roads changed much from late 2005 to October 2006.

"The North Koreans probably did not rush the test," wrote physicist Matthew McKinzie, an NRDC consultant, in an analysis of the photos.

Indeed, the photos show that excavation activity for the test may have been carried out in February 2005.

Instead, the misfire may indicate that the device was a somewhat sophisticated plutonium-fueled bomb, according to the NRDC.

Via atmospheric sampling, US intelligence has determined that plutonium was used in the North Korean test, according to news reports. For such a weapon to explode efficiently, the plutonium core must be "squeezed" by conventional explosives in a highly precise manner.

"It is possible that the detonators igniting the high explosive that compresses the plutonium did not fire simultaneously and thus only produced a partial yield," concludes the NRDC analysis. Why alarm rose in the 1980s

Though North Korea's interest in nuclear science was well known in the West, it was not until the mid-1980s that US intelligence began to become alarmed about Pyongyang's intentions.

Until 1984, North Korea was not viewed as a serious nuclear proliferation threat. The Central Intelligence Agency had thought the country's nuclear program to be rudimentary, and not capable of producing the fissile material needed for weapons, according to "Spying on the Bomb," a recent book about US nuclear intelligence by Jeffrey Richelson.

But in 1986, a top-secret CIA reassessment titled "North Korea: Potential for Nuclear Weapons Development," drawing on unspecified new information, held that Pyongyang might indeed be capable of a making a bomb. The CIA speculated that North Korea's motives might be forcing political concessions from South Korea, hedging against other Asian powers going nuclear, or deterring a US nuclear response in case of hostilities on the Korean peninsula, according to Mr. Richelson, a senior fellow with the National Security Archive.

US concerns then began to mount by the year. In 1987, North Korea received from a West German company a small annealing furnace capable of helping to produce centrifuge rotors for uranium enrichment. An inquiry by German intelligence concluded in 1990 that North Korea had possibly obtained crucial information on uranium melting from Pakistan in the late 1980s.

Media reports indicate that North Korea allegedly did business with the notorious Pakistani proliferator A.Q. Khan throughout this period. Dr. Khan might have provided everything from rotor designs to a Chinese design for a basic atomic device, according to a Congressional Research Service study on North Korea's nuclear trade.

When North Korea withdrew from the Non-Proliferation Treaty in 2003, it apparently moved quickly to process weapons-grade plutonium from power reactors that had been subject to international inspections. It is that fuel that probably powered this month's test.

Further tests might increase North Korea's confidence in its weapons design. Pyongyang might also decide that another explosion would increase the deterrent value of its arsenal.

DOJ_NMG_0083183

However, more tests might also shrink North Korea's small plutonium stockpile. That makes it all the more likely that North Korea's scientists are perfecting a deliverable weapons, says Mr. Albright of ISIS.

"If you have a chance to test, you want to test something more in line with what you want to deploy," he says.

With Cash, Defectors Find North Korea's Cracks (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

BANGKOK — Last March, Lee Chun-hak, a 19-year-old North Korean, went to the Chinese border to meet with a North Korean money trafficker. Using the trafficker's Chinese cellphone, Mr. Lee talked to his mother, who had defected to South Korea in 2003. She told him she was going to get him out.

Mr. Lee missed his mother and his sister and brother, and he had a persistent, if half-formed, desire. "I wanted to go to a country that is more developed," he said, "even more developed than South Korea."

In June, a young North Korean man appeared suddenly at his home with a message: "Mother is looking for you." The man then took him by bicycle and foot to the border and handed him over to a North Korean soldier. At the soldier's direction, Mr. Lee was ordered to leave his identification card and his Kim Il-sung badge, which is worn by all North Koreans to honor the nation's founder.

The soldier then escorted Mr. Lee across the Tumen River, where on the other side two Chinese men in plainclothes handed the soldier his bribe. Mr. Lee was free to go.

The increasing ease with which people are able to buy their way out of North Korea suggests that, beneath the images of goose-stepping soldiers in Pyongyang, the capital, the government's still considerable ability to control its citizens is diminishing, according to North Korean defectors, brokers, South Korean Christian missionaries and other experts on the subject. Defectors with relatives outside the country are tapping into a sophisticated, underground network of human smugglers operating inside North and South Korea, China and Southeast Asia.

Learning anything about such a secretive and unpredictable country as North Korea, which isolated itself further by carrying out a nuclear test on Oct. 9, is difficult. Scraps of information provided by defectors often prove unreliable, influenced as they can be by the organizations that shelter and support them while also championing political or religious causes.

But snapshots of life inside the North, and a picture of this smuggling network, emerged from interviews with 20 North Koreans in Bangkok, as well as with brokers, Christian missionaries, government officials and people working in private organizations, in both Thailand and South Korea. The North Koreans in Bangkok were interviewed independently and had all recently arrived in Thailand.

Pieced together, the accounts provide glimpses of a government that, while still a repressive police state, is progressively losing the paramount role it used to enjoy in society, before it found itself incapable of feeding its own people in the famine of the 1990's. The power of ideology appears to be waning in this nation of about 22.7 million as people have been left to scrounge for themselves, and as information has begun to seep in from the outside world.

The effects of money and corruption appear to have grown sharply in recent years, as market liberalization has allowed ordinary people to run small businesses and has enabled people with connections to prosper in the booming trade with China.

In a country whose borders were sealed until a decade ago, defectors once risked not only their own lives but those of the family members they left behind, who were often thrown into harsh prison camps as retribution. Today, state security is no longer the main obstacle to fleeing, according to defectors, North Korean brokers, South Korean Christian missionaries and other experts. Now, it is cash.

"Money now trumps ideology for an increasing number of North Koreans, and that has allowed this underground railroad to flourish," said Peter M. Beck, the Northeast Asia project director in Seoul, South Korea, of the International Crisis Group, which has extensively researched the subject in several Asian countries and is publishing a report. "The biggest barrier to leaving North Korea is just money. If you have enough money, you can get out quite easily. It speaks to the marketization of North Korea, especially since economic reforms were implemented in 2002. Anything can be bought in the North now."

DOJ_NMG_0083184

"The state's control is weakening at the periphery," Mr. Beck said, explaining that most refugees came out of the North's rural areas but few from around Pyongyang, where the state's grip remained strong.

During the North's great famine in the mid- to late 1990's, a tide of 100,000 to 300,000 North Koreans is believed to have simply washed into China, and tens of thousands are still believed to be living there illegally, according to human rights organizations. These days, the number of refugees is believed to be much smaller, though there are few reliable figures.

According to the South Korean government, of the 8,740 North Koreans who are known to have fled to the South since the end of the Korean War in 1953, nearly 7,000 arrived in the last four years alone.

But the cost of getting out is significant, according to experts, defectors, brokers and missionaries. There are bribes for the soldiers stationed at the heavily guarded border, a regular cut to their supervisors, money handed to a chain of officials. And that is just on the North Korean side.

At the high end, $10,400 will buy a package deal to get someone out of North Korea and, armed with a fake South Korean passport, on a plane or boat to South Korea within days, according to brokers and a 40-year-old North Korean woman now in South Korea who recently extracted her 14-year-old son. But most North Koreans in South Korea pay on average about $3,000 to get relatives out through China and then Southeast Asia or Mongolia.

Some exits are short-term. One 37-year-old North Korean in Seoul, an employee at a large auto parts maker, said he went to China in April to meet a friend, a journalist in North Korea whom he had not seen in 10 years. For a few hundred dollars, smugglers took the journalist to Yanji, a bustling Chinese town on the border with North Korea, where the two spent the weekend drinking and catching up, the man said in an interview in Seoul.

Like many interviewed for this article, he asked that his name be withheld, for fear of reprisals against friends and relatives still in North Korea. He carried stacks of a South Korean newspaper, The Chosun Ilbo, for the journalist, who had no interest in reading the political stories. Instead, he devoured the business pages, though he puzzled over words like "online," and marveled at how far the South had outpaced the North economically.

At the end of the weekend, the defector returned to Seoul and his journalist friend to North Korea.

"Doing this would have been unimaginable a few years ago," he said. "This kind of corruption didn't exist back then. Now, everything revolves around money."

Escaping a Shaky Economy

After the end of the cold war, North Korea's economy collapsed and its leaders adopted a strategy of trying to secure its energy and other essentials by threatening to become a nuclear power. They have adhered to this strategy even as they put into effect economic reforms in 2002, adopting market prices, allowing citizens to run small businesses and joining with South Korea in economic projects.

Though still shaky, the North's economy has improved thanks to trade with China and South Korea. It grew by 2.2 percent in 2004, the sixth consecutive year of expansion, according to the Bank of Korea, South Korea's central bank. Defectors and brokers said North Koreans were fleeing their country to rejoin relatives in the South or to look for economic opportunities — not because they were starving, as they were in the 1990's. The threat of political persecution remains, of course.

In Seoul, Do Sung-hak, 39, a North Korean who came to the South in 2002, said his older brother was sent to prison three years ago after someone reported the brother's private comments that North Korea was not opening its economy fast enough.

A few months after his release early this year, the brother fled the North with Mr. Do's help. He is now in Thailand.

Mr. Do, who works as a security guard, said he had arranged to get about 20 people out of the North, using ethnic Korean-Chinese contacts he had made while living for six years in northeast China.

After receiving a request, Mr. Do said he would call a Korean-Chinese intermediary, who would then call a North Korean with a Chinese cellphone that works inside North Korea near the border. The North Korean or a partner would then travel to the relative's hometown — the price of the service varying according to the distance — and take that person back to the border, where he or she would then talk to the relative in South Korea on a cellphone and make arrangements.

"It doesn't matter if the person lives in the middle of the country — of course, it takes longer, maybe 10 days," Mr. Do said. "It's only a question of money."

DOJ_NMG_0083185

North Koreans living in the South also send money to their relatives back home through the same method, with the brokers taking at least a 20 percent fee, brokers and North Korean defectors said.

A 49-year-old broker in Seoul — nine of whose clients have arrived in Thailand recently — said she operated the same way, adding that those involved in the business in North Korea were Communist Party members.

"You can do that kind of work — being able to travel freely inside North Korea — only if you're a party member," said the woman, who added that she earned $2,500 to $3,000 a month.

The demand for this smuggling service has risen along with the increasing number of North Koreans living in South Korea. The North Koreans in the South pay to get their relatives out by working to pay for the fees, borrowing money or using resettlement money awarded to them by South Korea.

One River, Many Hardships

The case of Lee Chun-hak, the 19-year-old who fled the North on June 28, is a typical one. For the past two months, he has been in the Immigration Detention Center in Bangkok, where his mother, Kim Myung-shim, 46, visited him from Seoul the other day.

Mrs. Kim fled to South Korea in 2003, remarried and began working to arrange the defection of Mr. Lee and her two other children, who lived with her former husband in a province bordering China.

The three children were set to leave in late 2005. But before crossing the Tumen River into China, Mr. Lee balked — he did not want to leave his father and grandmother. His older sister and younger brother went ahead and, thanks to the $5,200 paid to brokers, were smuggled into Mongolia and arrived in South Korea last February.

Mr. Lee returned to his everyday life, going to school and, like many others, earning a little money by working at a nearby gold mine. People farmed corn and beans in the area where the surrounding mountains have been stripped bare for firewood.

The economy had improved in recent years, as the authorities allowed people to moonlight at places like the gold mine and to start small businesses. Local residents ate regularly, Mr. Lee said, though the portions were small. Still, he saw perhaps only two or three cars a day, and most people walked or rode bicycles.

After a few months, his sister in Seoul persuaded him to leave. Mr. Lee was now an adult and would find it hard to keep living with his father, who had remarried, Mrs. Kim said.

So on June 27, after his sister had made arrangements with a broker, the North Korean man picked Mr. Lee up in his hometown and took him by bicycle to a spot near the border, where he spent the night, he said. The next afternoon, they rode the bicycle and then walked to the Tumen River. Mr. Lee waded across, accompanied by the soldier.

"As long as you pay the soldiers, you can cross," Mrs. Kim said, adding that she had paid $3,600 to the brokers for her son's escape — $1,000 for the North Korea leg and $2,600 for China.

He found his way through China and Laos to Thailand where, following the advice of the brokers, he gave himself up to the authorities. Thailand does not repatriate North Korean refugees, incarcerating them instead while their cases are processed through the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in Bangkok. The process takes about three to four months, after which the North Koreans are sent to South Korea, though the United States recently accepted nine North Korea refugees.

Having learned that news in Bangkok, Mr. Lee said he no longer wanted to go to South Korea. "I want to go to the United States to study and become a scientist."

Doubts About an Ideology

Many of the North Koreans interviewed in Thailand said they wanted to go to the United States, even though they were reared in a country that has demonized America for decades. In school in the North, one defector said, she had had been taught that Americans were "inhuman, promiscuous and dictatorial."

"Even today, I still sometimes refer to the United States as 'Imperialist America,' " she said, laughing.

But as a fourth grader, the woman said, she began to have doubts about that image of America, after she happened upon a photograph in a magazine. As she recalled, it showed a tightrope walker balanced on a wire between high-rise buildings in Washington. The implicit message was that the United States was such an inhumane country that it forced people to perform such jobs, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0083186

"But what I remembered about that photo was the tall buildings," she said. "There was also a beautiful park and clean, wide streets. It was fascinating. There was nothing like that where I grew up."

North Korea still unleashes daily attacks against the United States through its official media, but the desire of many of the defectors interviewed to go to the United States suggests that the power of ideology is waning.

"After spending a few months in China, they change their minds about the United States," said a South Korean missionary who regularly visits the North Koreans at the detention center. "In China, they have access to so much information. They look at Web sites and exchange instant messages with people in South Korea."

Lee Chan, 36, who fled North Korea one year ago and entered Thailand in June, agreed that anti-American ideology was not as strong as it was in the past.

"People's perceptions of the United States have changed inside North Korea," he said. "I'll give you one example. If you're caught watching an American movie, the authorities will just swear at you — nothing else."

In Bangkok, where South Korean Christian missionaries care for the defectors while trying to convert them, Lee Chun-hak's mother, Mrs. Kim, was worried that her son had become too friendly with Mr. Lee, the defector who had emerged as a leader of the detainees. She was angry that her son had started smoking under Mr. Lee's influence.

"Please look after Chun-hak," the mother said to Mr. Lee, adding that her son had birthmarks on his head and face that foretold a great future. "That's why I'm sending him to America."

"Please guide my son," she said, "even though he's doing well alone."

Mr. Lee, showing her a pack of Marlboros, said, "He's doing well — he doesn't smoke expensive cigarettes like I do."

"Stop smoking!" the mother said.

A missionary began praying for Lee Chun-hak.

"Pray to God to send you to America," the mother exhorted her son.

North Korea Heads Toward Hunger (CSM)

By Donald Kirk

The Christian Science Monitor, October 19, 2006

SEOUL, SOUTH KOREA

Even as missile and nuclear tests alienate humanitarian aid donors, North Korea is facing a cold winter in which it is unlikely to be able to feed its people.

The danger of widespread suffering raises the critical question of how the world can unite in a forceful response to North Korea's nuclear test - the focus of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's visits this week to Tokyo, Seoul, and Beijing - and still rescue the North's hungry people.

Compelled to ask for huge donations of food at the height of a famine that killed some 2 million people in the 1990s, North Korean leader Kim Jong Il was confident enough last year to order the World Food Program and other aid-givers to leave or vastly reduce their programs.

But the North may again need aid - at a time when missile tests in July, followed by the nuclear test this month, have reduced donors' desire to rush in to help.

"There is relatively little humanitarian assistance going in now," says Anthony Banbury, the UN World Food Program's regional director for Asia. "The willingness of donors to meet those needs has not been very strong."

The WFP says it needs $100 million this year to fulfill its goals for North Korea. So far, it has received only 10 percent of that total.

The United States has given more than $1.1 billion since 1995, 60 percent of which has gone to food aid. Forty percent was energy aid sent through the 1994 program - now shut down - designed to provide twin energy reactors in exchange for a shutdown of the North's nuclear program.

The US cut donations to the WFP this year after North Korea ordered the WFP to slash the size of its mission in Pyongyang from nearly 50 people to 10 people and shut its five regional offices, from which inspectors tried to monitor distribution.

DOJ_NMG_0083187

South Korea, which suspended food aid after the North's nuclear test, sharply reduced food donations, on which the North depended to make up a shortfall of more than 1 million tons of rice, after the July missile tests. It relented when North Korea pleaded for help after severe flooding in August.

But it sent only half of the 100,000 tons it had said it would send in "emergency" aid - compared with 500,000 tons last year. That was the largest source of food for the North after China, which is also believed to have sharply cut shipments. Both the Chinese and South Korean programs have been entirely independent of the WFP - and monitoring has been weak.

The reluctance to try to stave off another famine contrasts with the response in 1995, when North Korea for the first time asked the World Food Program to help.

By 1997, aid shipments through the program crested at more than 500,000 tons a year, with the US leading all donors. But the WFP last year sent in less than 100,000 tons, half of it from the US.

South Korean officials oppose shutting off economic contacts, much less boarding and interdicting North Korean ships, but say they are in a quandary when it comes to donations of rice.

"It's a kind of dilemma," says Kang Jong-suk, an official at the Unification Ministry, which had been avidly pursuing reconciliation. "South Korea wants to send some humanitarian aid, but there is a barrier because of the UN resolution."

He says as well "the problem of transparency" inside North Korea, which means that, "We cannot monitor what will happen."

That inability to monitor has played a significant role in other donors' willingness to offer aid.

"The US has very strong reservations ... because of conditions imposed by the North Koreans," says Mr. Banbury of the WFP.

"Those conditions are so onerous, it's very hard for donors," he adds. "It's not just specific restrictions. It's an overall atmosphere. It's a constant struggle to do our work in North Korea."

South Korean officials fully expect Secretary Rice, when she arrives here Thursday, to pressure them to scale down investment in the Kaesong special-economic zone and the Mount Kumkang region, showcase projects seen as prying the North open to broader contacts.

The irony, in the view of Banbury, is that the UN Security Council resolution specifically exempts humanitarian assistance from the categories barred for shipment to North Korea, ranging from luxury goods to components for missiles, nuclear warheads, and other heavy weapons.

One reason that North Korea cut down inspections was apparently confidence that harvests would improve. The harvest was better last year, but this year, flooding and erosion have damaged prospects.

"So you have less food, a smaller harvest, and a large number of people who do not have access to food," says Banbury.

He opposes giving up. "Walking away would stop assistance to millions of people and would stop an avenue of dialogue," he says. "It's better to stay engaged than to not stay engaged."

Opinions vary widely, though, on how firmly to enforce the sanctions imposed by the UN - or whether to renew efforts to reopen dialogue.

Kim Dae Jung, the former South Korean president who initiated the Sunshine policy of North-South reconciliation after his election in 1997, supports dialogue - not just renewal of the six-party talks on the North's nuclear program, but direct US-North Korean dialogue.

"The US objects to talking directly to North Korea," he says, citing as precedents President Nixon's visit to China in 1972 and US negotiations with North Vietnam before the signing of the 1973 Paris peace agreement.

"We have to encourage them to talk," Mr. Kim goes on. "There have to be negotiations and giving and taking."

More sanctions, he says, will invite "strong responses" leading to an escalation of tension and "new problems" in which China will step to the aid of the North and "countries like Cuba and Venezuela will try to help North Korea."

For aid-givers, the overriding concern is keeping North Koreans from starvation regardless of sanctions.

"We take the news that the internal situation is deteriorating very seriously," says Kay Seok, North Korean researcher for Human Rights Watch. "The right of food is one of the most fundamental human rights. If you die of hunger, what is the point of talking about freedom?"

DOJ_NMG_0083188

But others wonder about the degree to which food aid is alleviating suffering.

"Reports show the malnutrition rate did not improve very much" as a result of food donations, says Joanna Hosaniak, senior officer with the Citizens Alliance for North Korean Human Rights, which aids North Korean refugees.

"Refugees from the northern part of North Korea say they didn't receive humanitarian assistance, or it was diverted after the monitoring group was gone," she adds.

The only solution, she says, is for North Korea to "divert resources from developing nuclear weapons to feeding its people."

Erica Kang at Good Friends, a South Korean group that analyzes North Korean issues and advises on policies, summarizes the aid conundrum.

"Everyone wonders if they should go on with humanitarian aid," she says. "It's pretty much the ordinary people who suffer the most. This is a winter coming. Thousands of North Koreans are suffering the consequences of problems they didn't make."

Kim's Seoul Brothers (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

Condoleezza Rice arrived in Seoul today to rally opposition to North Korea's nuclear blackmail, and we hope two names were at the top of her list of talking points: Kaesong and Mt. Kumgang.

The Kaesong industrial park and Mt. Kumgang resort are the centerpieces of the South's misbegotten "sunshine policy" of engagement with the North. They are also money machines for Kim Jong Il, contributing to the record $1 billion North-South trade last year.

Now that U.S.-led financial sanctions have reduced the North's cash flow from counterfeiting and drug-smuggling, money from the two sites is even more critical to the survival of Kim's regime. And right on time for Pyongyang, a spokesman for South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun said Sunday that the two sites would be exempt from the new sanctions passed unanimously a day earlier by the U.N. Security Council. Nothing like sending Kim a mixed message.

If South Korea keeps going down this road, it should at least understand the costs. Specifically, any chances for passing the free trade agreement currently being negotiated with the U.S. will be dead. Most Democrats are skeptical of free trade from the start, and there's no chance Republicans will ratify a pact with a country that so blatantly undermines American security interests by propping up a rogue nuclear power.

We normally separate trade from security issues, believing that free trade promotes broader freedoms. But South Korea's cash transfers to Kaesong and Mt. Kumgang are such a blatant case of propping up tyranny that this may be the exception that proves the rule. In any case, free trade deals are hard enough to pass on Capitol Hill without also asking President Bush to spend his scarce political capital to defend a trading partner that provides Kim Jong Il with enough cash to keep his generals in cognac while keeping his people in chains.

Even before last week's nuclear test, South Korea's demand that Kaesong products be included in the free trade pact had raised alarms. Jay Lefkowitz, U.S. envoy for human rights in North Korea, raised the issue in an April article for The Wall Street Journal Asia. Mr. Lefkowitz pointed to the exploitation of North Korean workers at Kaesong and noted that the industrial park provided a convenient channel for the South to funnel money to Pyongyang. South Korea responded by demanding that Mr. Lefkowitz be fired.

Now Human Rights Watch has issued a report amplifying Mr. Lefkowitz's concerns. Thirteen South Korean companies operate factories at Kaesong, employing 8,200 North Koreans to produce watches, clothes, shoes, plastic containers, electrical cords, car parts and other items. More companies plan to launch operations at Kaesong soon, with the aim of employing 730,000 Northerners by the end of 2012.

Human Rights Watch points to official figures showing that Kaesong workers toiled an average of 54.9 hours a week last year and received an average of $64.40 a month -- a sum that fell to $42 after Pyongyang took its cut. The latter is a violation of Kaesong labor law, which was adopted by both countries and requires that wages be paid directly to North Korean workers. Pyongyang demands that the wages go through the central government, however, and South Korean companies comply. Kaesong workers also lack basic rights, including the right to free association and collective bargaining.

DOJ_NMG_0083189

Elsewhere in the world, notably in China at Shenzhen in the 1980s, free trade zones were intended as a genuine economic opening to the larger world. Kaesong was advertised as something similar when it began, but it became clear long ago that Kim Jong Il has no intention of any larger economic engagement.

Kim has had years to show he's serious about economic reform but there's nothing to show for it. The U.S. and Japan are even now offering normal relations if he'll give up his nuclear weapons; he won't do it because opening his country could mean an end to his rule. Last year he even banned the private agriculture markets that were feeding urban areas. In Kim's world, Kaesong is nothing more than a fund-raising operation so he can stay in power.

The news yesterday was that Kim has told China that his response to the U.N. sanctions will be to explode three more nuclear bombs as "tests." And why not, as long as he knows he can count on his patrons in Seoul to keep him in hard currency? As for South Koreans, they should understand that they can have Kaesong trade with North Korea, or a free trade agreement with the U.S. They can't have both.

Iran Warns Against U.N. Nuke Sanctions (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, October 18, 2006

Iran warned on Wednesday that a likely U.N. Security Council resolution for imposing sanctions against Tehran would wreck any possibility for a compromise to resolve the standoff over the country's disputed nuclear program.

France has said a sanctions resolution will likely be circulated at the council by the end of this week. Support for sanctions is growing among leading members after weeks of talks between the European Union and Iran failed to persuade Tehran to suspend uranium enrichment and start broader negotiations over its nuclear ambitions.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, insisted Wednesday that continuing talks with EU foreign policy Chief Javier Solana is "still possible."

But he warned that "in the case that a new resolution is passed by the Security Council, we will not be in the current point to resume possible talks."

"Resorting to arm-twisting through the Security Council would be considered a security threat to Iran and will change (Iran's) behavior," he said in an interview with the semi-official news agency Mehr.

Larijani said the West knows that their path would incite regional crisis, but he reiterated that Iran is ready for unconditional talks.

Iran, which insists its nuclear program is peaceful, repeatedly has said it would continue enrichment and is not intimidated by the possibility of sanctions.

"Iran will pursue its legitimate right, applying legal and diplomatic means," Foreign Ministry spokesman Ali Hosseini said Wednesday, according to state television. "Tehran has no doubt of its righteous way in insisting on its right to exploit nuclear energy for peaceful purposes."

Enrichment is a key process that can produce either fuel for a nuclear reactor or the material for a warhead. The United States and some in Europe accuse Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons, while Iran says its program is aimed only at generating energy.

Solana, who has led talks with Iran, said he spoke to Larijani on Monday but "the situation hasn't changed," and Iran continues to refuse to suspend its nuclear enrichment program. Solana and Larinani launched the talks in a last bid to find a compromise after Iran ignored an Aug. 31 deadline set by the Security Council to stop uranium enrichment.

European Union foreign ministers said after a meeting in Luxembourg on Tuesday that they have no choice but to back diplomatic talks at the United Nations about sanctions on Iran.

The ministers backed a decision by the U.N.'s five permanent Security Council members — the U.S., Russia, China, Britain and France — and Germany to pursue limited sanctions on Tehran while keeping the door open to future talks.

The six countries offered Iran a package of economic incentives and political rewards in June if it agreed to consider a long-term moratorium on enrichment and commit to a freeze on uranium enrichment before talks to discuss details of their package.

DOJ_NMG_0083190

Iran Seems Unmoved By Specter Of Sanctions Against North Korea (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

TEHRAN, Oct. 18 — For the most part, Iran's leaders have offered silence on what lessons they draw from the sanctions that the United Nations Security Council adopted last weekend to punish North Korea for its nuclear test — other than to say, as they have in the past, that they intend to continue what they call a peaceful nuclear program.

On Monday, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said the sanctions on North Korea would not deter Iran. And on Tuesday, he said efforts aimed at preventing Iran from having nuclear technology were doomed to fail, the state-controlled IRNA news agency reported.

At the United Nations, Britain, France, Germany and the United States are working on a Security Council resolution calling for sanctions against Iran for defying the organization's call to stop enriching uranium. The resolution, which they hope to introduce early next week, may include a ban on nuclear or missile cooperation with Iran. On Tuesday, the 25 European Union foreign ministers met in Luxembourg and agreed to call for limited sanctions on Iran.

After four months of talks with Javier Solana, the director of foreign policy for the European Union, Iran defied a Security Council resolution and refused to suspend its uranium enrichment program in August.

"Some Western countries have turned the U.N. Security Council into a weapon to impose their hegemony and issue resolutions against countries that oppose them," Mr. Ahmadinejad said Monday, as quoted by state-run television. Iran "won't be intimidated," he added.

On Tuesday, he weighed in again. "Some oppressive countries intend to create discord in order to dissuade the Iranian nation from reaching the summits of dignity and glory, including using nuclear technology for peaceful purposes," Mr. Ahmadinejad said, according to IRNA. "But with God's kindness, they will be defeated."

Hard-line newspapers close to Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and to Mr. Ahmadinejad warned this week that Iran would respond to any sanctions.

The daily Jomhouri Islami wrote in an editorial on Monday that Iran could take steps that would jeopardize economic and political interests of European countries. The editorial did not offer details, but Iran could restrict sales of oil, or switch to currencies other than the dollar for its large oil trades.

In much harsher language, the daily Kayhan warned Tuesday that if Europeans favored sanctions on Iran, then Iran would act.

"Europe could have learned a lesson from what happened in Afghanistan, Iraq and during the 33-day war in Lebanon, and not underestimate the capability of the Islamic Republic of Iran for taking revenge on its enemies," it said.

Israel Expands Fight On Border In Gaza (WT/AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Israeli tanks and infantry took up positions on the Egypt-Gaza border yesterday for the first time since the pullout from Gaza a year ago, killing two Palestinian gunmen as the army broadened its search for arms-smuggling tunnels.

Palestinian security officials said Israeli troops and tanks moved into the border town of Rafah before dawn yesterday and took over a section of the frontier, including the area around the Rafah border terminal.

The army said Israeli forces were pressing an operation to uncover tunnels used by Palestinian militants to smuggle weapons from Egypt. The army said it has uncovered five tunnels so far.

Israel has sent tanks and troops in and out of Gaza and stepped up air strikes against suspected militants and weapons caches since Hamas-linked militants tunneled under the border in late June and attacked an Israeli army post, killing two soldiers and capturing another, Cpl. Gilad Shalit.

Yesterday morning, Israeli troops killed two Hamas militants as they approached army positions in Rafah, the army and Palestinians said.

DOJ_NMG_0083191

Hamas said in a statement one of the two was a senior participant involved in Cpl. Shalit's abduction.

Israel said militants have smuggled large quantities of weapons over and under the border since Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza last year.

Army spokeswoman Capt. Noa Meir said Israel would continue military operations as long as needed to block the flow of arms, which she said included guns, explosives and anti-tank rockets.

"The tunnels are part of a production line meant to kill Israelis, and it's our job to stop it," she said.

Briefing reporters during a visit to Moscow, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said the operation was limited.

"We have no intention of staying anywhere in Gaza," he said.

The Palestinian officials said troops carried out house-to-house searches and bulldozers leveled agricultural land near the border. Troops also surrounded the Rafah border terminal, where about 60 Palestinian security personnel remained, the officials said.

The crossing, the only land bridge from Gaza to the outside world without passing through Israel, has been closed most of the time since violence flared in June.

Internal Palestinian violence continued yesterday amid a power struggle between the governing group, Hamas and the rival Fatah movement. A Hamas activist was fatally shot as he left a mosque in the West Bank city of Nablus, apparently by Fatah gunmen. At a Hamas demonstration later, protesters blamed Fatah and its leaders, including Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Hamas called a strike in the city for today.

Meanwhile, Israel's Supreme Court said a Palestinian student should be allowed to study for a doctorate at Israel's Hebrew University in Jerusalem. The court gave the parties a week to find a solution before issuing a ruling.

The student, Sawsan Salameh, 29, lives in a West Bank village a 15-minute drive from the university campus.

Israel Finds 9 Tunnels From Gaza Strip Into Egypt (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

TEL AVIV — The Israeli army announced Wednesday that it had uncovered nine tunnels between the Gaza Strip and Egypt in a sweep designed to prevent Palestinian militants from smuggling in the types of advanced weapons used by Hezbollah in the recent conflict in Lebanon.

The incursion, which began Tuesday night, was Israel's first along the border strip since withdrawing from Gaza last year. The Israeli military said it found seven completed tunnels, one more than 60 feet deep, and two others in the early stages of construction.

At least two Hamas fighters died during clashes with the troops near the Rafah border crossing.

Israel wants to avoid a repeat of its experience this summer in southern Lebanon, where, in the eyes of many Israelis, too little had been done over the years to prevent Hezbollah from building up an impressive arsenal. That war ended indecisively but felt like a defeat to many Israelis still angry with the nation's political and military leaders.

"There will be no blind-eye policy in the face of the attempts to transform the Gaza Strip into south Lebanon," Defense Minister Amir Peretz said Wednesday as tanks and troops operated along the border strip known as the Philadelphi corridor.

Israeli officials say that in the last year, Palestinian guerrillas hoping to counter Tel Aviv's vast military edge have smuggled tons of arms and explosives into Gaza through tunnels.

The weapons, the Israelis say, include 122-millimeter Grad rockets, which reach farther and pack a bigger punch than the homemade Kassams that militants have long fired into communities in southern Israel. Militants have launched at least four Grad-type rockets since spring, though they have caused no casualties, say Israeli intelligence officers.

Militants also are believed to have imported dozens of antitank weapons like those Hezbollah's fighters employed with some success against Israel's armored forces in Lebanon.

A senior army intelligence official also told the Israeli Cabinet during a private session Sunday that Palestinian groups had smuggled antiaircraft missiles into Gaza, according to Israeli media reports. Such weapons would pose a threat to Israel's overwhelming airpower, which it has wielded to strike at militants launching rockets into Israel and to back up ground troops.

DOJ_NMG_0083192

"Being able to shoot a helicopter down would be considered a great success by Palestinian guerrillas," said Yiftah Shapir, who analyzes weapons proliferation in the Middle East at the Institute for National Security Studies in Tel Aviv.

Israeli officials have yet to make public any evidence to support the claims, and there has been no sign yet that Palestinian fighters have used the most sophisticated weaponry they are alleged to have acquired.

Hamas officials deny the smuggling charges and accuse Israel of seeking a pretext for a broad and punishing military operation in the Gaza Strip that is aimed at destabilizing the Hamas-led government.

Palestinians also note that Israel is constantly improving its arsenal.

"Our enemy is all the time using a different kind of forbidden weapons against innocent civilians, and nobody cares about that," said the spokesman for Hamas' military wing, who goes by Abu Obeida.

Yusef Rizqah, the Hamas government's information minister, compared the arms-smuggling allegations to the Bush administration's claims before the 2003 invasion of Iraq that Saddam Hussein's regime was stockpiling weapons of mass destruction.

The possibility of wider fighting looms in light of Israeli warnings of intensified military actions aimed at Kassamlaunching crews and weapons storehouses. Officials in Tel Aviv say smuggling has shot up since the Israeli withdrawal last year left Gaza's southern border in the hands of the Palestinians and Egyptians.

The army has carried out numerous raids and other operations since launching a broad incursion after Palestinian militants tunneled under the border with Israel on June 25, killing two Israeli soldiers and taking a third back into Gaza. The fate of the captured soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, remains unknown.

Israeli officials say Palestinian militants have long sought better weapons, and in some cases succeeded in getting them. But officials and analysts contend that the guerrillas learned from the example of Hezbollah, which suffered heavy losses but nonetheless surprised Israeli commanders with the breadth and sophistication of its arsenal during the 34-day conflict in Lebanon.

Some analysts say that in assessing the Gaza situation, Israel must draw its own lessons from the war in Lebanon. Military commanders say Hezbollah became a formidable combat foe through an ambitious drive to arm itself after the Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon in 2000.

"The big debate in the Israeli security system now is whether to go in now, to kill it [the arms buildup] while it is small, or to wait for another year," said Shalom Harari, a former intelligence officer who is a counter-terrorism researcher at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya.

Israeli officials estimate that Palestinian militants have smuggled into Gaza thousands of rifles and more than 15 tons of TNT since Israeli soldiers left.

Of concern to Israel is that Palestinian groups could challenge Israel's traditional advantage on the battlefield, where fighters with limited-range rocket-propelled grenades have faced off against tanks. Officials say Palestinians have smuggled more than two dozen Russian-built Concourse antitank missiles, which can travel more than two miles and penetrate the thickest reinforced armor.

Brig. Gen. Yossi Baidatz, head of research for Israeli army intelligence, told government ministers during the Sunday meeting that antiaircraft missiles also were being smuggled, local media reported.

The newer Grad surface-to-surface rockets can reach up to 18 miles; the Kassams have a range of six or seven miles. The longer range would give militants the ability to target cities such as Ashkelon and Ashdod from sites deeper inside Gaza, officials said.

Upgraded weaponry also could give militants a chance to score what they would deem a public-relations coup in battle, analysts said.

Still, an extended army campaign against suspected arms caches could mean sending forces deep into densely populated areas of Gaza, a move fraught with risk for both sides.

"This is something nobody has a taste for, except for the most extreme right wing. Nobody wants to go back into Gaza," said Shapir, the weapons-proliferation expert. "The question remains what to do. There is no good answer."

DOJ_NMG_0083193

Evangelicals Lobby Bush On Sudan Crisis (AP-Y)

By Rachel Zoll

AP, October 19, 2006

Liberal and conservative evangelicals set aside their political differences Wednesday to urge that President Bush do more to end the humanitarian crisis in the Darfur region of Sudan.

The Rev. Jim Wallis, head of the liberal Sojourners/Call to Renewal, an evangelical social justice movement, and the Rev. Richard Land, head of the public policy arm of the Southern Baptist Convention, are among the leaders of the Evangelicals for Darfur campaign.

"I believe the president does care deeply about this," said Land, a longtime Bush family supporter. "I see this as helping strengthen the president's hand and enable the president to do what's in his heart to do."

The White House press office did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Religious groups from many faiths have been lobbying world leaders to help the Sudanese since rebel groups rose up against the Khartoum government in early 2003. More than 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million have been displaced since then, escalating the situation into one of the world's worst humanitarian crises.

But Wallis said world attention to the region has been sporadic, and evangelical leaders think time is running out to prevent what many consider government-backed genocide. The Sudanese government is accused of letting the Janjaweed militia of Arab nomads commit atrocities against villagers.

"Until we resolve this, we can't stop talking about it," Wallis said.

The U.N. wants to send 20,000 U.N. troops to Darfur to replace an ill-equipped and understaffed African Union force that has not been able to quell the violence. Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir argued that U.N. forces would start a "re-colonization" of Africa.

Evangelical leaders said they are not calling for U.S. military intervention, but instead want the U.S. to use its authority as a world leader to get a multinational force into the country.

The campaign includes print newspaper ads, a letter-writing campaign to Bush and other activities. Among the supporters are some of the top names in the evangelical movement: the Revs. Ted Haggard and Rich Cizik of the National Association of Evangelicals; the Rev. Samuel Rodriguez of the National Hispanic Christian Leadership Conference; and the Rev. Geoff Tunnicliffe of the World Evangelical Alliance.

Leaders are asking to meet with Bush to discuss their concerns.

Cizik said in the midst of the fight against terror, the administration may be reluctant to "upset a Muslim capital, who will then call in other extremists to fight the Crusader West." The Khartoum government is predominantly Muslim. Some American Muslim leaders have dismissed evangelical lobbying on Sudan as anti-Islam.

Land said Bush has not been more forceful because of a lack of popular support for action in his administration and Congress, concern that the nation can't make another overseas commitment and the "lack of sufficient demand from the American people that something be done."

Land rejected any suggestion that the White House is ignoring evangelicals on Sudan.

Former Bush aide David Kuo has just released a book in which he claims that evangelicals were embraced for political gain at the White House, but were derided privately as "nuts."

Said Land: "I have no doubt about the president's commitment to this issue."

Evangelicals Urge Darfur Action (WT)

By Julia Duin

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

Twenty-four liberal and conservative evangelical leaders representing at least 50 million Americans called on President Bush yesterday to "stop the genocide" in Darfur, saying he is the only world leader in a position to do so.

In a conference call, five of them promised to put the immense resources of the country's evangelical Christian populace at the president's disposal on behalf of the beleaguered inhabitants of western Sudan.

DOJ_NMG_0083194

"Unless the president acts to rally world leadership to put pressure on the government of Khartoum to stop this genocide, it will not stop," said Richard Land of the Southern Baptist Convention's Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission.

"We must not allow this genocide to continue," said Geoff Tunnicliffe, international director of the World Evangelical Alliance. "We must say, 'Not on our watch.' "

Evangelicals, Mr. Land added, can "strengthen the president's hand" in taking what could be an unpopular step domestically in a nation already committed militarily around the world.

"We'll do everything we can to rally support in Congress and the United Nations ... to defy the genocidal government of Khartoum," he said. To date, he added, "there has been a lack of sufficient demand by American people that something be done. But it has been my observation that when Washington feels the heat, they see the light."

"Darfur should be on the front pages until this is resolved," said Jim Wallis, editor of Sojourners magazine and a founder of the Call to Renewal network. "But it falls off the front page again and again. We cannot resolve this until we stop [merely] talking about it."

Mr. Wallis' group, which represents the evangelical left, has teamed up with 23 mostly conservative evangelical groups or leaders in placing radio and newspaper ads urging Mr. Bush to push for a multinational force in western Sudan. Several of the leaders are seeking to meet personally with the president -- a fellow evangelical -- to discuss the issue.

"We're the growth factor in American religion," said Mr. Land, citing figures showing that evangelicals constitute as much as 40 percent of America's 300 million residents. "There are a lot more of us than there used to be."

The leaders said they felt constrained to speak out in a society in which they have emerged as the new center.

"Evangelicals and conservative Catholics are the moral voice of gravity in America," said Richard Cizik, vice president for governmental affairs for the National Association of Evangelicals. "To the extent we represent our constituency is the extent to which the rest of society follows."

Plus, "When evangelicals speak, governments listen," said Mr. Cizik, who has been involved in recent years in dialogue with moderate Muslim heads of state.

"Arab leaders are interested in what evangelicals think," he said. "The president has to use his bully pulpit on this issue. If we fail as evangelicals, people die."

Suicide Boats Explode In Sri Lanka Port, Killing 16 (NYT)

By Shimali Senanayake

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, Oct. 18 — Powerful explosions rocked an important southern tourist and port town in Sri Lanka for the first time on Wednesday, apparently extending the war in this country to a stronghold of the Sinhalese ethnic majority.

The government said suicide boats of the secessionist Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, disguised as fishing boats, had been detonated near a navy base.

While the death toll was low — one sailor and 15 rebels — the attack was significant because the recent surge in fighting between the government and the rebels had largely been concentrated in the Tamil-dominated north and the east.

“The L.T.T.E. wanted to create some kind of backlash in this very sensitive Sinhalese-majority area,” said the Defense Ministry spokesman, Keheliya Rambukwella. “Their other motive may have been to hit economic and commercial interests by targeting this popular tourist destination. They failed miserably.”

The coastal town of Galle, about 70 miles south of the capital, Colombo, was hit hard by the Asian tsunami in December 2004 but until now was unscathed by the civil war between Sri Lanka’s Sinhalese-dominated government and the Tigers, who are fighting to establish a separate homeland for the Tamil minority.

“The hotel shook, due to the repeated explosions,” said Hiran Cooray, director of the Lighthouse Hotel, the biggest in Galle and an architectural landmark.

The attack was quickly followed by sporadic violence, with angry mobs attacking Tamil-owned stores in the town and smashing windows.

DOJ_NMG_0083195

The Tigers did not comment on the attack, but they were quick to blame the government for subsequent airstrikes on eastern rebel strongholds, in which they said a civilian had been injured. The military denied aiming at civilians.

The attack in Galle took place two days after a suicide bomber rammed a truck into a navy convoy about 100 miles northeast of the capital, killing nearly 100 people, mostly sailors.

The two sides are to resume peace talks on Oct. 28 in Geneva, but there is little optimism.

U.S. Objections Lead Spain To End Venezuela Deal (NYT)

By Renwick McLean

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

MADRID, Oct. 18 — Spain's foreign minister said Wednesday that a deal to sell military aircraft to Venezuela had been canceled because American government objections made it unfeasible.

The Bush administration denied Spain's request in January, saying that the sale would strengthen the government of President Hugo Chávez, which is hostile to American interests, and destabilize the region. Permission from the White House was needed because the aircraft would use American technology.

EADS-CASA, the company that sought to build the airplanes, had said after the Bush administration's rejection that it would seek alternative technology from another country.

On Wednesday, Miguel Ángel Moratinos, the foreign minister, announced that the company, a division of the European defense company EADS, had decided to drop those plans. "The company tried to find alternatives for that transfer of technology, and it reached the conclusion that the economic effort required to carry it out would not be profitable," he said during a news conference in Madrid. The company did not respond to telephone calls seeking comment.

The aircraft deal, which involved the sale of 12 military transport planes, was signed in November as part of a broader agreement between Spain and Venezuela that was valued at 1.7 billion euros, about $2.1 billion.

Spanish officials say that the aircraft deal would have created hundreds of jobs. They also dispute the American contention that the sale would have a destabilizing effect, contending that transport planes are not suited for attack missions that could threaten Venezuela's neighbors.

In his comments, Mr. Moratinos suggested that the government would continue backing Spanish companies that seek deals with Venezuela in the future.

"We favor any business initiative with anyone in Latin America or any country that we feel fulfills the norms of trade, good behavior and good conduct," he said.

The Spanish announcement comes as Venezuela is struggling to win international support for its bid to gain Latin America's open seat on the United Nations Security Council next year. Spain has endorsed Guatemala for the position.

Efforts to obtain comment from the Venezuelan Embassy in Madrid were unsuccessful. But during a brief visit to Madrid on Tuesday, José Vicente Rangel, the Venezuelan vice president, attributed the demise of the deal to "limitations on Spanish sovereignty," an apparent allusion to American opposition to the sale, the Spanish news agency Europa Press reported.

The American decision in January to reject Spain's request for permission to make the sale threatened to sour relations between the two countries just as they were recovering from the tension that originated with Spain's decision to withdraw from Iraq in April 2004.

American officials have expressed unease over Madrid's refusal to adopt a hard-line approach to Venezuela, but stressed that the American position on the deal stemmed from its concerns over Mr. Chávez, a leftist populist, not Spanish policy.

Nicaragua Wants To Construct Alternative To Panama Canal (USAT/AP)

By Julie Watson

USA Today, October 19, 2006

SAN JORGE, Nicaragua — Dusting off a dream that dates back 500 years, Nicaragua wants to build an $18 billion alternative to the increasingly overloaded Panama Canal.

DOJ_NMG_0083196

Officials are drafting legislation, conducting feasibility studies and lobbying internationally for the project, first considered by Spanish explorers who scanned the Central American coast in the 1500s for a navigable waterway from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean.

"The prospect of having something like this is probably better now than at any time in the past," said Marc Hershman, an international shipping expert at the University of Washington School of Marine Affairs. "There's huge growth in cargo shipping around the globe, and it's going to accelerate more and more."

Panamanians will hold a referendum Sunday, and polls predict they will approve widening their 92-year-old canal. Nicaraguan officials insist there isn't a rivalry, saying there's enough traffic to sustain two waterways, and theirs would be able to handle bigger ships.

Nicaragua's proposed canal would be 173 miles long. From the Caribbean, it would run along the San Juan River, which forms Nicaragua's southern border with Costa Rica and lets out into Lake Nicaragua. From the western side of the lake, 12 miles of canal would be built across the Isthmus of Rivas to reach the Pacific.

Many in the shipping industry have been looking "more closely at another canal with wider capabilities and a deeper channel" than Panama, Hershman said.

Nicaragua's outgoing president, Enrique Bolanos, says a canal could be built in 12 years and would open the way for giant tankers from Asia that cannot squeeze through Panama's 50-mile waterway.

The Nicaraguan option could cut a day off shipments between California and New York, while Chinese tankers could save as much as 36 days and $2 million on their round trips to the U.S. East Coast, Bolanos said.

Daniel Ortega, the Sandinista leader who is the front-runner in the presidential election Nov. 5, is on record as supporting the plan.

Panamanian officials say Nicaragua's proposal is pushing them to move ahead with their $5.25 billion expansion. "For us, Nicaragua is serious. This is not just speculation," said Adolfo Ahumada, director of the Panama Canal, which earned $1 billion last year.

About 5% of the world's maritime trade crosses through the Panama Canal, but its growth is limited: 10% of the world's ships are too big for it. Others wait in long lines, losing time and money.

Bolanos estimates the shipping business will grow by at least 5% annually until 2025.

Georgians Deported From Russia As 2-nation Diplomatic War Heats Up (USAT)

By Nora Fitzgerald Special For

USA Today, October 19, 2006

MOSCOW — Russian authorities pressed ahead this week with deportations of Georgians living illegally in the country, signaling the Kremlin won't let up a diplomatic war with its Soviet-era satellite state.

A Georgian man set to be deported from Russia died after suffering an asthma attack on Tuesday. The Georgian Embassy accused Moscow of depriving him of medical help during five days of detention.

Russia has deported more than 540 Georgians — 140 on Tuesday alone — this month. Russia retaliated with the expulsions after neighboring Georgia detained four Russian military officers on charges of espionage Sept. 27.

Georgian Ambassador Irakli Chubinishvili and human rights organizations including the Moscow Helsinki Group, say Moscow has embarked on a systematic campaign of ethnic harassment that is expanding to include other non-Russians.

In recent years, Georgia has sought to distance itself from Moscow's influence and seek closer ties with the United States and European Union. Its relations with Russia started to deteriorate in 2004 when Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili began to seek membership in NATO, once the archrival of the Moscow-run Warsaw Pact.

Also at issue: ongoing disputes over Georgia's two breakaway regions, Abkhazia and South Ossetia. The two regions, whose bids for separation from Georgia are supported by Russia, are monitored by Russian peacekeepers. About a third of the 300,000 ethnic Georgians who fled Abkhazia's conflict in 1993 settled in Russia, says the Georgian Diaspora group in Moscow.

DOJ_NMG_0083197

Russian President Vladimir Putin accused Georgia's government of "an act of state terrorism" when it detained the four men as spies last month. Even though they were soon released and returned to Russia, Moscow started taking action against Georgia and Georgians living in Russia.

•Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said last week that Russia would continue to ban all transport to Georgia — except for the transfer of detainees.

•Russia imposed a freeze on all postal deliveries to Georgia.

•Russia's state Duma last week proposed a ban on Georgian leaders entering Russia.

Before the new flap, imports of Georgian wine and mineral water had been halted because of alleged impurities.

"Of course this is having an economic impact," the Georgian ambassador told reporters last week. Georgia relies on Russia for energy supplies and trade.

Last Thursday, Georgia announced it had blocked the next round of talks on Russia's bid to join the World Trade Organization to retaliate for Moscow's embargos.

Tuesday, three days before a European Union-Russian summit, the EU urged Moscow to stop "targeting Georgians" and said it was concerned about the humanitarian consequences for the estimated 1 million Georgians living in Russia.

Tatyana Lokshina, head of DEMOS, a Moscow-based human rights think tank, said Putin's response to Georgia "has sent a signal that nationalism is safe."

Russia has long been a magnet for Georgians, who can earn more here than at home, where the average salary is $100 per month.

Chubinishvili, the Georgian ambassador, said Georgians have been picked up by police and put on flights to Georgia, sometimes without having a chance to retrieve their belongings. He said some were deported because their visas had expired.

The Georgian Cultural Center in Moscow was raided by police. Alexander Gavrilov, a spokesman for Moscow City Hall's education department, has said that some schools had received a police request for a list of children with Georgian names.

"We are strengthening control over the stay of foreign citizens in Russia," Mikhail Turkin, deputy head of the Federal Migration Service, said Oct. 6. "Everything was done by the law."

David Kakachia, general director of the Genatsvale restaurant on Moscow's New Arbat Street, said he closed voluntarily for four days last week. "Police came and checked everything," said Kakachia, 28, who is from Abkhazia. He said his family fled the breakaway republic in 1993. "They said they came because there was a decision to check everywhere Georgians are working. Nobody likes pressure on them because of their nationality."

The crumbling Georgian consulate on Ostozhenka Street in central Moscow has become a crisis center for Georgians living in Russia. Consulate employees are manning two hotlines 24 hours a day.

Georgia's consul, Zurab Pataradze, who is supervising the hotline effort, said he did not know how many people called every day. "We are too busy to count," he said.

U.S. Stands By Decision On Kodori Gorge (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

A top State Department official denied yesterday that the Bush administration supported a Russian-backed U.N. resolution critical of Georgia last week in order to win Moscow's support for a package of sanctions against North Korea over its nuclear missile test.

But with tensions between Moscow and Tbilisi, Georgia's capital, escalating sharply over the past month, two top Georgian lawmakers expressed disappointment with the U.S. vote and said it would only help Russia's long-term goal of "regime change" in its small southern neighbor.

"We are grateful to our friends that [the resolution] was not as bad on the one Russia originally proposed, but we were certainly not happy with it," said Nikoloz Rurua, deputy chairman of the committee on defense and security in Georgia's parliament.

DOJ_NMG_0083198

"It misrepresents the facts of our dispute, and even worse, it could be perceived by Russians as giving them a license to act freely in the future. That is the greatest danger," he said yesterday in Washington.

The Georgia resolution was adopted just before the U.N. Security Council voted unanimously to sanction North Korea. But U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Daniel Fried told reporters on a visit to Tbilisi yesterday there was no horse-trading over the two votes.

"To say that the United States traded something for something else is an absurd allegation without any foundation," said Mr. Fried, who rejected the suggestion the resolution was a "defeat for Georgia."

The resolution renewed the expiring mandate of a U.N. observer group monitoring the standoff between Georgia's central government and the Russian-backed separatist enclave in Abkhazia. Russia has long offered diplomatic and military backing to Abkhazia.

But the new resolution included new, Russian-backed language that called on Georgia to refrain from "militant rhetoric" and "provocative" actions in the Kodori Gorge, a disputed region on the unofficial border with Abkhazia that Georgian troops reclaimed in a bloodless operation in July. The U.N. text also praised the "stabilizing role" of Russian troops stationed in Abkhazia as a "peacekeeping force."

U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John R. Bolton issued a statement after Friday's vote defending the Kodori operation as an "exercise of Georgia's sovereign right." He expressed regret that Moscow had pushed the critical Georgia resolution without coordinating with Western countries trying to resolve the standoff.

U.S. diplomats say they were able to soften an earlier Russian text that criticized the July Kodori operation and demanded Georgian troops withdraw.

Always tense Georgia-Russia relations have deteriorated in recent days over Moscow's furious reaction to the very public arrest and expulsion of four Russian officers on espionage charges last month. Russia cut transportation and postal links with Georgia in retaliation, and began what critics say is a targeted harassment campaign against Georgians living in Russia.

Despite Mr. Fried's denials, many in Georgia and Russia see the U.N. vote as the price the United States paid for the North Korea resolution. Both Georgian President Mikhail Saakhashvili and Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov reportedly lobbied Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in advance of the vote.

Mr. Saakhashvili told reporters in Tbilisi after the vote that Moscow "pushed all of its efforts towards exchanging its support for Western countries over North Korea and Iran for a carte blanche on the resolution on Georgia."

George Bokeria, deputy chairman of the Georgia parliamentary committee on legal issues, said, "Russia's ultimate goal is regime change in Georgia, and this vote was blackmail to help them achieve that goal."

He added, "If the West keeps giving into blackmail, Moscow will keep doing it over and over."

Charities In Russia Stymied By New Law (WT)

By Michael Mainville

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

MOSCOW -- Dozens of human rights groups and humanitarian charities will be forced to suspend work in Russia today after missing a deadline for registering under a law against foreign support of nongovernmental agencies.

Russian President Vladimir Putin approved the law, which faced widespread criticism internationally, earlier this year.

It allows authorities to shut down nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) if they fail to register again with Russia's Justice Ministry, provide financial data and submit program plans for approval.

The estimated 400 to 500 foreign-funded NGOs operating in Russia had until yesterday to hand in their requests for registration.

NGOs will be allowed to continue submitting requests until Jan. 18 but will not be allowed to work without registration until they do. They will remain legal entities, however, allowing them to maintain offices and pay staff.

A list published yesterday on the Federal Registration Service Web site showed 80 NGOs whose registration had been approved, including British charity Oxfam, the Ford Foundation and the Carnegie Center. Foreign adoption agencies accounted for most of the list.

DOJ_NMG_0083199

Among the organizations that failed to obtain registration were Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, the International Republican Institute (IRI) and the National Democratic Institute (NDI).

"We won't be able to do anything substantive," said Allison Gill, the director of the Moscow office of Human Rights Watch, which was unable to obtain the necessary documents to apply before yesterday's deadline. "We won't be able to issue press releases, interview victims of human rights abuses, do public advocacy -- any of the real work that matters."

Some NGOs, including Amnesty International, IRI and NDI, were able to submit documents in time but have yet to win approval from registration officials.

Officially, authorities must respond to registration requests within 30 days, but NGO representatives say bureaucrats can delay the process with requests for additional documents.

"We expect they'll be finding 'mistakes' in our documents," said Sergei Nikitin, the Moscow representative of Amnesty International. "I don't know when we'll be able to get back to work. If I'm being really optimistic, it could be a few months."

The United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs said that four foreign NGOs doing extensive humanitarian work in the North Caucasus, including the Danish Refugee Council and the International Rescue Committee, had suspended their operations in the region until they could obtain registration.

Registration officials have said NGOs are to blame for missing the deadline and that many have had to resubmit documents that were riddled with errors.

But NGOs say they haven't been given enough time to come up with the reams of documents required for registration and complain that many of the government's demands are unrealistic.

Among the information needed, for example, are extensive background details, including passport numbers and addresses, on NGO founders, no matter how old the group is or if its founders are long dead.

"The whole process has been absurd," Ms. Gill said.

Even if they do manage to get registered, foreign NGOs face another hurdle on Oct. 31, when they must submit financial and program plans for next year.

The law gives individual bureaucrats the right to reject any program proposal that they think threatens Russia's state interests.

NGOs say this could prevent them from working in sensitive regions, such as the conflict-ridden republic of Chechnya, or from funding groups that can be critical of authorities.

Critics say the new law is part of wider Kremlin crackdown on civil society, opposition groups and news organizations under Mr. Putin.

The Russian government has countered that many groups posing as NGOs are actually criminal or terrorist organizations.

Russian lawmakers have also accused foreign-backed NGOs of supporting opposition groups in Russia seeking to overthrow the government in a popular uprising similar to the recent revolutions against pro-Moscow regimes in Ukraine and Georgia.

U.K.'s Criticism Of Practices Of Muslims Raises Tensions (WSJ)

By Deborah Ball And Cassell Bryan-low

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

LONDON -- A furor over Muslim women wearing veils is aggravating long-simmering tensions between the British government and the nation's large Muslim population, illustrating conflicts between the government's goals of protecting religious rights and fostering a cohesive society.

The United Kingdom traditionally has taken a different approach than countries such as France in its effort to accommodate its Muslim communities. It did so by allowing Britain's 1.6 million Muslims, about 2.8% of the population, broad freedom to follow their religious customs, rather than trying to mandate assimilation.

But in an environment that is already tense because of incidents of Islamist terrorism on British soil, the government has raised the question of how separate Muslims have a right to be.

DOJ_NMG_0083200

Until now, criticism of Muslim practices such as wearing the full veil, or niqab, had been confined to fringes of British society. The issue burst into the mainstream last month when Jack Straw, speaker in the House of Commons and former foreign secretary under Prime Minister Tony Blair, said in a newspaper column that he asked Muslim women to take off their veil when visiting his office. He argued that the veil, which covers the head and face and has a slit for the eyes, is "a visible statement of separation and difference."

Then last week, a U.K. school suspended a teacher for refusing to remove a veil that left only her eyes uncovered. Mr. Blair this week came out in support of the suspension, in a move that is likely to rile religious leaders. He said many people are questioning how Islam "comes to terms with and is comfortable" with the modern world.

Opposition leaders have echoed Mr. Blair's position.

Education Secretary Alan Johnson insisted in a speech yesterday that faith-based schools must go further to help defuse community tensions. He said the government plans to introduce legislation to ensure that 25% of places in new, publicly funded faith-based schools are open to children of families of other faiths, or no faith. "Schools should cross ethnic and religious boundaries, and certainly not increase them," Mr. Johnson said. Of England's 7,000 publicly funded faith-based schools, eight are Muslim and the vast majority are related to Christian denominations.

Britain's newly surfaced tensions echo those that have long been in the open elsewhere in Europe over religious dress. France, for instance, bans students from wearing head scarves and other conspicuous religious symbols in schools.

But in Britain, the tensions threaten to stymie Mr. Blair's efforts to improve communication with the Muslim community. That has been a government priority as it toils to stamp out home-grown radicalism and lessen the chance of further terrorist attacks on British soil.

The Blair government has struggled to build bridges with the Muslim community. Mr. Blair's initiatives to improve dialogue have included several measures targeted at female members of the community, such as hosting a meeting of 40 Muslim women at his No. 10 Downing St. residence this year.

Behind The Veil (NYT)

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

The way the issue of full-face veils has seized Britain, you would think veiled women were everywhere. In fact, one has to wonder how many are regularly encountered by Jack Straw, the leader of the House of Commons, or any other Briton.

Yet Mr. Straw's comments that the veil damages relations between people of different ethnic backgrounds has fired a furious debate, with Tony Blair and Romano Prodi, the British and Italian prime ministers, rising in agreement and Muslim leaders indignantly protesting. The issue in need of serious discussion is not the niqab — the veil that covers all but a woman's eyes — but the larger question of the place of Europe's Muslim minority.

Even if Mr. Straw is correct in describing the niqab (used by a small minority of European Muslims) as a barrier to assimilation, or to communication, it is still not the source of the current anxiety.

The problem is that the discovery of jihadists in Europe — whether those who plotted 9/11 or the Madrid or London bombings — has made non-Muslim Europeans far more suspicious of the large Muslim minorities among them and what they perceive as a self-imposed isolation. Those suspicions have, in turn, bolstered the arguments of a small minority of Muslim leaders who call for more isolation.

The real debate should be about the failure of European governments to address the sources of immigrant discontent — which include high unemployment and discrimination — and about the failure of Muslim leaders in the West to counter the rise of extremism in their communities.

The public attacks on a religious custom by Mr. Straw and Mr. Blair will only feed the suspicions of non-Muslim Europeans and the sense of stigma and segregation among European Muslims.

Promoting Serbia, For A Price (WP)

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083201

Republican lobbying shop Barbour Griffith & Rogers has picked up a client that won't be an easy sell to the U.S. government, but at least it pays well.

The contract is with the government of Serbia for $60,000 a month, from July 28, 2006, through Jan. 31, 2009. If all goes as planned, that would amount to a total of $1.8 million.

Barbour Griffith's work for Serbia, which wants to join the European Union, comes at a time of tense negotiations over the independence of Kosovo and its ethnic Albanians as well as the Serbian government's apparent lack of interest in finding war crimes suspect Ratko Mladic. Kosovo has been administered by the United Nations since 1999, when a U.S.-led NATO bombing campaign drove Serbian forces out.

For $60,000 a month, Barbour Griffith will "provide strategic counsel and tactical planning on foreign policy matters regarding Serbia before the U.S. government," according to the contract the firm included in its foreign-agent filing with the Justice Department. The contract was signed by Milan Parivodic, the minister for international economic relations, as O'Dwyer's PR Daily first reported.

The firm's lobby registration with Congress answered the question on specific lobbying issues this way: "Provide guidance and counsel with regard to issues impacting the bilateral relationship between the U.S. and Serbia."

The Barbour Griffith team working for Serbia includes Robert A. Blackwill , former deputy national security adviser in the Bush administration, and Andrew Parasiliti , former foreign policy adviser to Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.). Blackwill is president of Barbour Griffith & Rogers International , the lobby shop's foreign policy arm, and Parasiliti is vice president.

Blackwill was in Serbia in May 2005 and spoke at the University of Belgrade. According to a copy of his speech, he expressed optimism about Serbia's future, and urged the Bush administration recognize "the need to collaborate with Serbia to achieve lasting progress in this region." But, noting his "own private views," he also said: "If the final status of Kosovo is not reached soon, the region risks a new eruption of violence. That would also push back for many years Serbia's full reentry into Europe and into the international community."

Barbour Griffith doesn't usually say much about its work for clients. Parasiliti went so far as to say: "We are pleased to be able to work for the government of Serbia."New on the Avenue

Two Democratic lobbyists are rebranding their work and forming a new lobby shop, Avenue Solutions . Laurie Sullivan was previously co-founder of Sullivan & Baldick and Tracy Spicer worked there.

The level of interest in Democratic lobbyists will depend partly "on the results on Nov. 7. I think business is going to pick up," Sullivan said, though she added that Avenue Solutions has a pretty good book of business now. The firm represents such clients as Aetna, Northwest Airlines and the National Cable and Telecommunications Association.

Sullivan, a Democratic activist, ran government relations for Aetna in Connecticut. Spicer earlier was a longtime aide to Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), including a stint as political director.

Nick Baldick , who specializes in grass-roots and political work, formed a new company, too, Hilltop Public Solutions . Sullivan said they will still collaborate on projects.Gorilla Gets a Voice

While some folks think of AARP as an 800-pound gorilla, the seniors and boomers-plus lobby wants to make sure its voice is heard during policy debates, particularly as Washington turns to the presidential campaign cycle after the Nov. 7 midterms . So AARP created the post of publicity director and hired Brian Marriott for the job.

Marriott comes off a five-year stint as special assistant for media relations to the Federal Communications Commission chairman, first for Michael K. Powell and then Kevin J. Martin. He was political director in Missouri for the 2000 Bush-Cheney campaign and worked in the 2004 campaign.

While noting that there is a perception -- or "misperception" -- that AARP tilts to the left, media relations director Mark Kitchens says AARP did not "consider politics to be part of the equation" in hiring Marriott.

Kitchens says the new job is designed to help the group frame its issues and get out front in public debate. "We want to play and continue to play an even more robust role," he said.

Marriott, 33, says this is "a very exciting time to be here, with baby boomers starting to reach the age of retirement," adding to AARP's influence.Here and There

DOJ_NMG_0083202

Also moving about town . . . Peggy Binzer , senior FDA health counsel to the Senate Budget Committee, is joining the public health preparedness practice of the McKenna Long & Aldridge law firm. Her last day on the Hill was yesterday.

Erich Mische , most recently chief of staff to Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), recently left the Hill for the lobby shop mCapitol Management . But he's not going too far. Mische remains a political adviser to Coleman.

Wendy Helgemo has joined the National American Indian Housing Council as director of its Office of Governmental Affairs. A member of the Ho-Chunk Nation of Wisconsin, she previously was a staff attorney at the office of general counsel of the National Indian Gaming Commission.

Gail Ravnitzky-Silberglied , former chief of staff to Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Calif.), has moved to the Jewish Coalition Against Domestic Abuse as executive director.

Israel Sex Cases Defy Machismo Of The Warrior (NYT)

By Dina Kraft

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

TEL AVIV, Oct. 18 — For decades it was widely accepted that some of Israel's top military officers and government ministers considered sexual encounters with female employees a seigneurial right.

A society built partly on the conscious effort to project an image of strength tended to overlook such harassment. In fact, a certain amount of male rakishness often added to a prominent man's allure. The alleged womanizing by national legends like Moshe Dayan, for example, was considered part of their mystique.

But the ground is shifting rapidly under the feet of the current crop of leaders as a result of legal and societal changes. This week, the police recommended charging President Moshe Katsav with the rape of two former employees, the most serious criminal allegations ever made against an Israeli leader. And on Tuesday, Justice Minister Haim Ramon went on trial, accused of kissing a soldier against her will.

"When I was in the army it was assumed that the office of every senior officer was essentially a harem for him," said Michael Oren, an historian and a senior fellow at the Shalem Center, a Jerusalem research institute, who served in the military 30 years ago. "Israel is emerging from adolescence into adulthood."

In 1998 a sweeping sexual harassment law, inspired in part by American legislation, was passed by the Israeli Parliament, making such behavior illegal anywhere, whether in the street or the workplace.

Soon afterward, a major turning point came: the trial of Yitzhak Mordechai, a former general who was Israel's defense minister and a prime ministerial hopeful. He was forced to resign after being convicted of sexual assault and harassment.

His very public trial followed charges filed by several women who had worked for him in the government and during his long, highly decorated career in the army.

For years trying Israeli leaders for such crimes was unheard-of. The founders of Zionism sought to create "the new Jew" — aiming to transform Jews who lived in the Diaspora, perceived as bookish and weak, into men of muscle and power.

The militarization of Israeli society that eventually followed in the wake of successive wars with Arab neighbors seemed to cement Israel's male-dominated character. And while that has not changed completely, the question of sexual harassment is getting real attention, especially in the army, which is the epicenter of such activity and the institution with the most influence on the society.

In the last 10 years the army, into which nearly all Jewish 18-year-old Israelis are drafted, has begun intensively promoting awareness of sexual harassment and the consequences that can follow for those who cross the line. Several highly publicized cases in which senior officers were suspected of having sexually assaulted female soldiers made the army's efforts more urgent.

Many female soldiers work in clerical positions. A senior officer often has several 18- and 19-year-old women serving as secretaries.

The shift in the approach of the army toward harassment comes as it has opened itself up to placing women in roles traditionally thought to be the exclusive purview of men. Women now serve as pilots, artillery crew members, gunnery instructors and officers in charge of men.

DOJ_NMG_0083203

As part of the army's efforts to educate its members about sexual harassment, all conscripts receive a letter during basic training describing the issue and where to turn if they encounter such behavior.

Workshops are held with soldiers and officers to increase awareness, and there is a 24-hour phone line for complaints and advice. Those suspected of harassment or assault are taken before a special committee that has the power to demote or discharge the accused, said Lt. Col. Liora Rubinstein, the deputy adviser to the chief of staff on women's issues.

Many career officers have lost their jobs that way, she said.

"I can tell you, when I was drafted it was not spoken about," said Colonel Rubinstein, who has served in the army for 20 years. "It was not part of our consciousness. Officers know now what is expected of them."

Nonetheless, advocates for women's rights and others say the hesitancy of many accused men in army and civilian life to acknowledge responsibility is evidence that while the old era may be over legally, much remains to be done so that men understand the new rules.

For example, Mr. Mordechai insisted that he had done nothing wrong. "The more cases we have and the more women stand up and go and complain and are not afraid, there will be a change," said Rina Bar-Tal, chairwoman of the Israel Women's Network.

But Ms. Bar-Tal said she was hesitant to declare a social transformation in what was still a patriarchal society. "The law is there and the police abide by the law, and the infrastructure of our legal system is working," she said. "I see that as a very positive note."

The high-profile nature of recent cases like that of President Katsav, whose office is largely ceremonial, has made the issue a major topic of public discussion.

"The central ethical issue is the ease with which a respected and authoritative employer can manipulate the confusion, panic and dependence that characterize a young female employee in the public sector," Avirama Golan wrote in a column in the daily Haaretz titled "All the President's Women."

It has also led to broader examination of the country's history. Old school notions of masculinity were part of being a nation in an almost constant state of war, said Mr. Oren, the historian. "It was all caught up in Israeli machismo, which had a certain role in order to establish a nation at arms," he said.

Avigail Moor, a psychologist and expert on violence against women in Israel who is chairwoman of the women's studies department at Tel Chai College, said of the tales of sexual conquest that circulated around some powerful Israeli men, "It was common knowledge that their titles gave them that prerogative.

"It was also made out to look very romantic. Young women serving in these high-status platoons were almost led to believe that it was something that spoke highly of them if they were chosen to be a sexual partner of a high commanding officer."

The militaristic nature of Israeli society has eased, partly as it feels more secure and partly as Western influence has increased. An effort by the army to prevent its male soldiers from crying at the funerals of their fallen comrades, for example, has failed. In the past such open displays of grief were considered a sign of weakness.

Yael Dayan, a former lawmaker and the daughter of Moshe Dayan, sponsored the sexual harassment legislation. She recalls being mocked during debate on the bill by some male colleagues and constituents. The comments, and the sense of backlash, have not ended, she said.

She added: "At traffic lights people stop me and say: 'Are you satisfied now? You got the president.' "

Mr. Erdogan's Turkey (WSJ)

By Michael Rubin

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

Five years into the war on terror, inept U.S. diplomacy risks undercutting a key democracy (and ally) that President Bush once called a model for the Muslim world. The future of Turkey as a secular, Western-oriented state is at risk. Just as in Gaza and Lebanon, the threat comes from parties using the rhetoric of democracy to advance distinctly undemocratic agendas. Turkey has overcome past challenges from terrorism and radical Islam; always its system has persevered. But now, as Turkish politicians and officials work to defend the Turkish constitution, U.S. diplomats interfere to dismiss Turkish concerns and downplay the Islamist threat.

DOJ_NMG_0083204

A crisis has simmered for months, but earlier this month Ankara erupted. On Oct. 1, President Ahmet Necdet Sezer warned parliament, "The fundamentalist threat has not changed its goal to change the basic characteristics of the state." The next day, as Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan visited the Oval Office, Gen. Yasar Büyükanit, chief of Turkey's armed forces, warned cadets of growing Islamic fundamentalism and promised "every measure will be taken against it." Usually such warnings are enough to keep those transgressing on the constitutional separation of mosque and state in check.

Enter U.S. Ambassador Ross Wilson. At an Oct. 4 press conference he said: "There is nothing that worries me with regards to Turkey's continuation as a strong, secure, stable and secular democracy." He dismissed opposition concern about the Islamism of Mr. Erdogan's ruling Justice and Development Party (known in Turkish as the AKP) as "political cacophony." His remarks were consistent with those of his State Department superiors. Last autumn, Daniel Fried, assistant secretary of state for European Affairs, said "The development of the AKP into a democratic party . . . has mirrored and supported the development of Turkish political society as a whole in a liberal and democratic direction." He described the AKP as "a kind of Muslim version of a Christian Democratic Party."

Why are so many Turks angry at Washington's dismissal of their concerns? While democrats fight for change within a system, Islamists seek to alter the system itself. This has been the case with the AKP. Over the party's four-year tenure, Mr. Erdogan has spoken of democracy, tolerance and liberalism, but waged a slow and steady assault on the system. He endorsed, for example, the dream of Turkey's secular elite to enter the European Union, but only to embrace reforms diluting the checks and balances of military constitutional enforcement. After the European Court of Human Rights upheld a ban on headscarves in public schools, he changed course. "It is wrong that those who have no connection to this field [of religion] make such a decision . . . without consulting Islamic scholars," he declared. Then in May 2006, his chief negotiator for accession talks ordered the removal, from a negotiating paper, of reference to Turkey's educational system as secular.

The assault on the secular education system has been subtle but effective. Traditionally, students had three choices: enroll at religious academies (so-called Imam Hatips) and enter the clergy; learn a trade at vocational schools; or matriculate at secular high schools, attend university and pursue a career. Mr. Erdogan changed the system: By equating Imam Hatip degrees with high-school degrees, he enabled Islamist students to enter university and qualify for government jobs without ever mastering Western fundamentals. He also sought to bypass checks and balances. After the Higher Education Board composed of university rectors rejected his demands to make universities more welcoming of political Islam, the AKP-dominated parliament proposed to establish 15 new universities. While Mr. Erdogan told diplomats his goal was to promote education, Turkish academics say the move would enable him to handpick rectors and swamp the board with political henchmen.

Such tactics have become commonplace. At Mr. Erdogan's insistence and over the objections of many secularists, the AKP passed legislation to lower the mandatory retirement age of technocrats. This could mean replacement of nearly 4,000 out of 9,000 judges. Turks are suspicious that the AKP seeks to curtail judicial independence. In May 2005, AKP Parliamentary Speaker Bülent Arinç warned that the AKP might abolish the constitutional court if its judges continued to hamper its legislation. Mr. Erdogan's refusal to implement Supreme Court decisions levied against his government underline his contempt for rule of law. Last May, in the heat of the AKP's anti-judiciary rhetoric, an Islamist lawyer protesting the head scarf ban shouted "Allahu Akbar," opened fire in the Supreme Court and murdered a judge. Thousands attended his funeral, chanting pro-secular slogans. Mr. Erdogan was absent from the ceremony.

There have been other subtle changes. Mr. Erdogan has replaced nearly every member of the banking regulatory board with officials from the Islamic banking sector. Accusations of Saudi capital subsidizing AKP are rampant. According to Turkish Central Bank statistics, in the first six months of this year, the net error -- money entering the Turkish economy for which regulators cannot account -- has increased almost eightfold compared to 2002, the year the AKP came to power. According to the opposition parliamentary bloc, debt amassed under Mr. Erdogan's administration is equal to total debt accrued in Turkey between 1970 and 2000. Erkan Mumcu, a former AKP minister who now heads the center-right Motherland Party, accused the AKP in June of interfering in Central Bank operations. Accordingly, President Bush's Oval Office statement, based on State Department talking points -- congratulating "the prime minister and his government for the economic reforms that have enabled the Turkish economy to be strong" -- may have hampered transparency, if not reform.

DOJ_NMG_0083205

In the past year, the AKP anti-secular agenda has grown bolder. AKP-run municipalities now ban alcohol. Turkish Airlines recently surveyed employees about their attitudes toward the Quran. On July 11, Mr. Erdogan publicly vouched for the sincerity of Yasin al-Qadi, a Saudi financier identified by both the U.N. and U.S. Treasury Department as an al Qaeda financier.

When Mr. Erdogan began his political career, he did not hide his agenda. In September 1994, while mayor of Istanbul, he promised, "We will turn all our schools into Imam Hatips." Two months later he said, "Thank God Almighty, I am a servant of the Shariah." In May 1996, he called for a ban on alcohol. In the months before his dismissal from the mayoralty, his cynicism was clear. "Democracy is like a streetcar," he quipped. "You ride it until you arrive at your destination and then you step off."

Diplomacy should not just accentuate the positive and ignore the negative. When a country faces an Islamist challenge, PC platitudes do far more harm than good. At the very least, U.S. diplomats should never intercede to preserve the status quo at the expense of liberalism. Nor should they even appear to endorse a political party as an established democracy enters an election season. It is not good relations with Ankara that should be the U.S. goal, but rather the triumph of the democratic and liberal ideas for which Turkey traditionally stands.

Mr. Rubin is a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

DOJ_NMG_0083206

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, OCTOBER 19, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Palestinian Puzzle (WP) ... 4
Torture Victim Barred From Visiting U.S. (AP) ... 5
Detainee Files Motion For His Prosecution (DENP) ... 6
U.S. Army Colonel To Investigate Gitmo (AP-Y) ... 7
Congress To Courts: 'Get Out Of The War On Terror' (WSJ) ... 8
A Dangerous New Order (NYT) ... 9
The Unlearned Lessons Of Abu Ghraib (WP) ... 9

Homeland Response:

Government Skeptical Of Threat Against NFL Stadiums (AP) ... 11
Government Skeptical Of Threat To Stadiums (WP) ... 11
Threat Made To 7 Stadiums; U.S. Is Skeptical (NYT) ... 11
Skeptical Authorities Pass Along NFL Stadium 'dirty Bomb' Threat (USAT) ... 12
Intelligence Plan Targets Training, Keeping Personnel (WP) ... 12
Privacy Group Sues FBI For Database Info (WP/AP) ... 13
2nd Circuit Upholds Verdicts In Multibillion-Dollar World Trade Center Insurance Dispute (LAW) ... 14
Flood Risk Doesn't Stop Rebuilders (USAT) ... 15
South Spent Millions On A Hurricane Season That Wasn't (WP) 16

War News:

Iraq Violence, 'No Child' Occupy Bush (WP) ... 17
Eyeing The Exits From Iraq (LAT) ... 18
Burns: Bush Has Plan To Win War In Iraq (AP-Y) ... 18
Burns' Remark Draws Comparison To Nixon (USAT) ... 19
McCain: More Troops Needed In Iraq (AP) ... 20
'Dramatic Change Of Direction' Coming For Iraq (WT) ... 20
Our Strategy Is Not Static (USAT) ... 22
U.S. Toll Soars As Fight For City Rages (USAT) ... 23
Provincial Intelligence Director Among Latest Iraqi Deaths (LAT)23
Death Toll Mounts For US Forces In Iraq (FT) ... 24
One-Day Iraq Toll Is Highest For U.S. In Many Months (WP) ... 25
11 More U.S. Troops Reported Killed In Iraq (MCT) ... 26
11 U.S. Troops Killed In Combat As October Toll Hits 70 (WT/AP) ... 27
Marines Plan To Recall Some Battalions (AP-Y) ... 28
Militias Splintering Into Radicalized Cells (WP) ... 29
Ramadan Spent Behind Locked Doors (USAT) ... 30
The 655,000 Fraud (WSJ) ... 31
Rumsfeld: Terror Threat Not Exaggerated (AP-Y) ... 32
Rummy's Other Role (WP) ... 32
Iraq's Premier In Talks With Key Shiite (AP) ... 33
Iraqi Leader Meets With 2 Key Shiites (NYT) ... 34
Seeking To Shore Up Support, Maliki Meets With Iraqi Clerics (LAT) ... 35
Courts-martial Ordered In Iraqis' Deaths (USAT/AP) ... 36
8 To Face Courts-Martial (NYT/AP) ... 36
Ex-commander Talks At Abu Ghraib Hearing (AP-Y) ... 36
NATO Strikes Kill 9 Afghan Civilians (AP) ... 37
A Military Path To Citizenship (WP) ... 39

Corporate Scandals:

Enron: The Tale Of Two Sentencings (WSJ) ... 40
Stock Option Tremors Hit Md. Firm (BSUN) ... 41
SafeNet Officials Resign As Part Of Options Probe (WSJ) ... 42
SafeNet's Top 2 Executives Resign After Stock Options Inquiry (WP) ... 43
Senate Panel Seeks Details On McGuire's Exit Pay (WSJ) ... 43
McGuire's Deal Is Focus Of U.S. Senate Inquiry (MINNST) ... 44
UnitedHealth Pressed Over Ex-CEO's Pay (FT) ... 45
Investing (BSWK) ... 45
Ex-Delphi Execs Face Civil Fraud Charges (DEN) ... 47

Criminal Law:

78 Charged In Bankruptcy Fraud Sting (AP-YBIZ) ... 49
Feds Charge 78 With Bankruptcy Fraud (CNN) ... 50
Nationwide Fraud Sweep Nets 3 In Pa. (PTR) ... 50
Feds Crack Down On Bankruptcy Fraud (UPI) ... 51
Ariz. Residents Indicted In Bankruptcy Fraud (AZREP) ... 51
Weldon Undecided On Letter (PHI) ... 51
7 Plead Guilty In Stolen Body Parts Case (FINDLAW/AP) ... 52
Funeral Home Directors Plead Guilty In Organ Smuggling Case (AFP-Y) ... 53
Death Penalty Out On A Technicality (WT) ... 53
Ex-clerk To Testify About Page Scandal (AP-Y) ... 54
Key Figures In Foley Scandal Testify Today To Ethics Panel (USAT) ... 55
Ethics To Hear Key Testimony (RC) ... 55
Louisiana Page Not Central To Inquiry, Lawmaker Says (NYT) . 56
Foley Lawyers Tell Accused Abuser's Name (AP-Y) ... 57
109th Congress Just Can't Resist (USAT) ... 57
Congressman Faces Questions Over Who Paid For Pacific Trip (NYT) ... 58

Rep. Sweeney Didn't Report Marianas Trip With Abramoff Colleague (AP) ... 59
Bob Ney, Guilty But Still At Capitol (NYT) ... 60
Cunningham Offered To Testify From Jail (RC) ... 61
Ignoring Red Flags (WP) ... 62
Blago's Indicted Fundraiser Due In Court Again (CHIT) ... 62
Beauprez Ad Has Illegal Classified Info (STPPP) ... 63
FBI Asked To Join Beauprez Ad Investigation (CSG) ... 64
Prosecutors Want Postponement In Pellicano Trial (LAT) ... 65
Jail Guard In O.C. Held As Bribery Suspect (LAT) ... 65
Murder Trial Lies With Conspirator (WT) ... 66
Feds Net 125 Nationwide In Kid-Porn Case (AP) ... 66
Miami Man Sentenced For Being Teen's Pimp (MH) ... 67
Young, Cold And For Sale (NYT) ... 67
Council Alters, Then Extends Emergency Anti-crime Efforts (WT) ... 68

Civil Law:

North Slope Family Seeks $40 Million From BP (FAIRDNM) ... 69

Civil Rights:

US Club Owner Gets 10 Years For Forced Labor, Trafficking (AFP-Y) ... 70
Anti-Illegal Immigration Group Questioned About Letter (AP) ... 71
Barnes Calls Off Voter ID Action Contempt Order No Longer Sought (AJC) ... 71
Shift Change Blamed For Poor Service (TSSC) ... 71
Affirmative Action Debate In Michigan Could Influence Nation (CHIT) ... 72
Panel Suggests University Amend For Past Slavery Ties (NYT) 74
Controversial Ad Links MLK, GOP (WP) ... 75
New Laws And Machines May Spell Voting Woes (NYT) ... 76

Antitrust:

3 Indicted In Price-fixing Conspiracy (WT) ... 78
Samsung, Hynix Officials Charged With Price Fixing (Update5) (BLOOM) ... 79
2 Koreans, One American Charged In Chip Price-fixing Probe (AFP) ... 80
Three More Semiconductor Execs Indicted For Price-fixing (IDG) ... 80
Three More Execs Indicted In Computer Memory Price-fixing Scandal (AP) ... 81
Bayer Settles Price-Fixing Case (AP-YBIZ) ... 81
Chicago Deal Could Force Rivals' Hands (WSJ) ... 82
Antitrust Suit Says Avaya Maintenance Policy Is Anti-competitive (AP) ... 83
Critics Target Federal Circuit (LAW) ... 84

Environment:

As Climate Changes, Large Firms Look At Global-Warming Practice Areas (LAW) ... 87
Pollinators' Decline Called Threat To Crops (WP) ... 88
Evangelicals Rally Behind Environmental Cause (LAT) ... 89
Evangelicals Broaden Their Moral Agenda (WP) ... 90

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Agents Break Up Money - Laundering Ring (AP) ... 91
26 Arrested In Global Money Laundering Case (WT) ... 92
DEA Warns Of Soft Drink-cough Syrup Mix (USAT) ... 92
Former Soldier Admits To Role In Drug Smuggling (AP) ... 93
Chicago Police Raid Targets Bad Heroin (AP) ... 93
Major Drug Sweep On South Side (CHIT) ... 94
Harold Ickes Housing Project Targeted In Police Drug And Gangs Sweep (CD) ... 94
South Side CHA Drug Bust Produces Dozens Of Arrests (WBBM) ... 95
Spring Valley Drug Dealer Gets 11 Years In Federal Prison (JN)95
Freedom For Sale, Part 1 (MNT) ... 96
Colo., Nev. To Vote On Easing Pot Laws (USAT) ... 97
Lions Confused By Rogers' Suspension (AP) ... 97
Lions' Rogers Is Suspended For Jets' Game And 3 More (NYT) 98
Runners Of Meth Superlab Get 15Yrs (AP) ... 99
Few States Allow Forms Spelling Out Patients' Wishes (USAT) 99
Gang Leaders Get Life Terms (VALLTH) ... 100
Salem-area Pipe-bomb Case Leads To An Arrest (SALSJ) ... 100
Ad Aims To Instill Fear Of Yankton (SFAL) ... 102
Johnson Wants Justice Department Posters Pulled (AP) ... 102

Immigration:

Former Nazi Guard Freed To Uncertain Fate (FREEP) ... 102
Flow Of Immigrants' Money To Latin America Surges (NYT) ... 103
Immigrants Sending $45 Billion Home (WP) ... 104
Suit: Arizona Targets Money Wired From Immigrant Communities (CHIT) ... 105
Crossing Guards In Training (LAT) ... 106

Tax:

IRS Aims To Limit A Deferral Strategy (WSJ) ... 109

Congress-Administration:

N.C. Testing Praised (WSJ) ... 110
Bush In N.C. (EDN) ... 111
Bush Goes On Base-building Trip To N.C. (AP-Y) ... 112
Bush Touts No Child Left Behind (UPI) ... 113
Bush Touts Education Program (LAT) ... 114
Social Security Benefits To Rise In 2007 (AP-Y) ... 114
Social Security Benefits To Increase 3.3% (NYT/AP) ... 115
Social Security Raise For Elderly And Disabled (LAT) ... 116
Social Security Checks To Rise 3.3% In 2007 (WSJ) ... 116
Government Retirement Benefits To Rise 3.3% (WP) ... 116
Cost Of Living, A Fickle Formula (WP) ... 118
Inside The Beltway (WT) ... 119
Congress's Dismal Grades (WP) ... 120
Catching Conflicts At The FDA (LAT) ... 121

Other News:

Dow Cracks 12,000, Sets Another Record (USAT) ... 121
GOP Tries To Shift Focus To Economy (WT) ... 122
Lower Energy Prices Help Consumer Price Index Decline 0.5% (NYT) ... 122
Consumer Prices Fall, But Core Measure Inches Higher (WSJ)123

DOJ_NMG_0083208

Consumer Prices, Construction Starts Supply Good News (USAT) ... 124
Falling US Fuel Prices Ease Fears Of Recession (CSM) ... 125
Demand For Gasoline Surges As Prices Take A Dive (USAT) . 126
Has Diesel Grown On The United States? (WP) ... 127
Mr. Pombo's Map (NYT) ... 128
Oil-Price Drop Challenges OPEC Unity (WSJ) ... 128
Study Of Cancers At IBM Is Released (WSJ) ... 129
Universal Health Care: We Can't Afford Not To (USAT) ... 130
High Hopes, And Higher Home Prices, In Anacostia (WP) ... 131
3 Doctors Assail Lilly Study Of Sepsis Drug (NYT) ... 132
Eli Lilly's Role In Treatment Is Cited (WSJ/AP) ... 133
Debate Surrounds End-of-life Health Care Costs (USAT) ... 134
Bush Sidelined As Defeat Looms (FT) ... 136
Bush Limits Role On The Campaign Trail (FT) ... 137
Laura Bush, Unlike George, A Hit On Republican Campaign Trail (BLOOM) ... 137
First Real Test Of Rove's Game Plan (FT) ... 139
How Republicans Hope To Hold The Senate (Time) ... 139
Practically No One Thinks Republicans Can Hold The House (RC) ... 141
Fight For Congress Extends Into GOP Strongholds (LAT) ... 142
Uphill Hike For Republicans In Colorado (WSJ) ... 144
Democrats Set Sights On Wins In Ohio (WP/AP) ... 145
DNC To Borrow Money For Last-minute Tossups (WT) ... 147
Conservative Voters Likely To Stay Home (WT) ... 148
Moderates In Kansas Decide They're Not In GOP Anymore (WP) ... 149
Poll Signals More Republican Woes As Disapproval Of Congress Grows (WSJ) ... 150
Democrats Would Reverse Bush's Work (WT) ... 152
Judge Bars Notices At Polls On Votes For Foley's Substitute (NYT) ... 154
Upstart Leaves The Campaigning To The Congressman (WP) 154
Senate Could Dust Off 50-50 Deal (RC) ... 155
Allen, Webb Pull In Presidents As They Beef Up Push To Nov. 7 (WP) ... 157
Star Power To Fill War Chests (WT) ... 158
Allen Changes Direction On War In Iraq (DPHR) ... 159
Allen For Senate (WT) ... 159
Clinton Urges Dems To Question Criticism (AP-Y) ... 160
Clinton Reflects On His 2 Terms And Hits Hard At Republicans (NYT) ... 161
Clinton Lists Differences With GOP, Administration (WP) ... 161
Clinton Comeback (NSWK) ... 162
Fall TV Lineup Filled With Political Spots (USAT) ... 164
Tables Turned For The G.O.P. Over Iraq Issue (NYT) ... 166
Linking Iraq To The War On Terror Has Downside For GOP (RC) ... 168
Iraq Is Big Issue For Voters Seeing The Upside Of War (NYT) 169
McCaskill Calls For Rumsfeld's Firing; Talent Does Not (CCT) 171
Many Jabs In Missouri Senate Debate, But No KO (SLPD) ... 172
Iraq War Key Point Of Dispute In Senate Race (BSUN) ... 173
Blacks Divided On Whether Hoyer's 'Slavish' Remark Was Racist (WT) ... 173
Lieberman Debates Rivals About Iraq War (AP-Y) ... 174
Lieberman's Iraq Stance Draws Fire In Debate (NYT) ... 175
Schlesinger Shines In Senate Debate (NLD) ... 176
Poll Finds Support For Tax Increase (WP) ... 177
Bloomberg's Car Is Stolen In New Jersey (NYT) ... 178
Run, Barack, Run (NYT) ... 179
The G.O.P.'s Bad Bet (NYT) ... 180
Common Sense-Impaired (WSJ) ... 181
Bush: U.S. Will Stop N. Korea Nuke Moves (AP) ... 182
Rice Seeks To Calm Asia Amid Fear Of A Second Test By North Korea (WSJ) ... 182
Japan Tells Rice It Will Not Seek Nuclear Weapons (NYT) ... 183
Japan Has No Plans For Nukes; Watch On N. Korea Continues (MCT) ... 184
Japan, Acting To Calm U.S. Worries, Rules Out Building Nuclear Arms (WP) ... 185
Nuclear Arms Spread 'hard To Stop' (FT) ... 185
Pyongyang's Nukes: How Dangerous Are They? (CSM) ... 186
With Cash, Defectors Find North Korea's Cracks (NYT) ... 187
North Korea Heads Toward Hunger (CSM) ... 190
Kim's Seoul Brothers (WSJ) ... 192
Iran Warns Against U.N. Nuke Sanctions (AP) ... 193
Iran Seems Unmoved By Specter Of Sanctions Against North Korea (NYT) ... 193
Israel Expands Fight On Border In Gaza (WT/AP) ... 194
Israel Finds 9 Tunnels From Gaza Strip Into Egypt (LAT) ... 195
Evangelicals Lobby Bush On Sudan Crisis (AP-Y) ... 196
Evangelicals Urge Darfur Action (WT) ... 197
Suicide Boats Explode In Sri Lanka Port, Killing 16 (NYT) ... 197
U.S. Objections Lead Spain To End Venezuela Deal (NYT) ... 198
Nicaragua Wants To Construct Alternative To Panama Canal (USAT/AP) ... 199
Georgians Deported From Russia As 2-nation Diplomatic War Heats Up (USAT) ... 199
U.S. Stands By Decision On Kodori Gorge (WT) ... 200
Charities In Russia Stymied By New Law (WT) ... 201
U.K.'s Criticism Of Practices Of Muslims Raises Tensions (WSJ)202
Behind The Veil (NYT) ... 203
Promoting Serbia, For A Price (WP) ... 203
Israel Sex Cases Defy Machismo Of The Warrior (NYT) ... 204
Mr. Erdogan's Turkey (WSJ) ... 205

DOJ_NMG_0083209

TERRORISM NEWS:

Palestinian Puzzle (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

Through a picture window, the former Howard University professor was admiring the garden sanctuary he'd created behind his Northern Virginia home. There are fig and apple saplings, fragrant bushes of mint and oregano, morning glories tilting toward the warm October sun. Clumps of fat green tomatoes hug the fence.

"I'm under home incarceration," explained Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, who is accused of being a terrorist supporter. "I have to do something."

After two years of house arrest, the business professor is to go on trial in Chicago today, accused of being a part of a sprawling U.S. network that helped the Palestinian group Hamas. The Justice Department regarded the case so important that Attorney General John D. Ashcroft himself announced the indictment of Ashqar and two co-defendants in 2004.

"Today, terrorists have lost yet another source of financing and support for their bombs and bloodshed," Ashcroft said at the time.

Prosecutors say they have abundant evidence that Ashqar moved money for Hamas through his U.S. bank accounts and served as a go-between for some of the organization's leaders -- even passing on a request to kill a rogue Hamas operative.

Those acts allegedly occurred before the U.S. government first designated Hamas a terrorist group in 1995. The indictment charges that Hamas, nonetheless, was carrying out attacks aimed ultimately at destroying Israel -- and thus was a "criminal enterprise" under federal racketeering laws, which are more commonly applied to drug gangs and Mafia figures.

Ashqar denies being a member of Hamas, which won a majority in the Palestinian parliament in January. But the soft-spoken professor clearly sees himself as a Palestinian fighter -- albeit one living in a suburban split-level with a basketball hoop. Twice, he has refused to testify before grand juries investigating Hamas's activities in the United States, launching hunger strikes that left him emaciated.

"If I am targeted by Israelis, I understand. They are my enemy," he said in an interview last week. "But to be targeted by Americans? I can't comprehend."

Ashqar is one of several Northern Virginia Muslims to be accused in recent years of aiding Hamas, the Islamic Resistance Movement. Like them, the professor offers a far different image than the chanting, AK-47-waving Hamas supporters who appear on the TV news.

A short, bespectacled man in black pinstriped slacks, Ashqar led a visitor across thick, Persian-style carpets into his home in Springfield. It is a slice of the Levant in Fairfax County: The bookshelf holds both the Koran and "A Passion for Excellence," by management guru Tom Peters. Beethoven trilled from a cellphone, the newest toy of Ashqar's 10-year-old nephew, who lives with him and his wife, Asma.

"He cannot stop placing phone calls and getting his friends to call him," Ashqar said, with typical parental exasperation.

But Ashqar's focus is 6,000 miles away. He devours Palestinian newspapers online. In 2005, he ran in absentia for Palestinian president, getting less than 3 percent of the vote. When Ashqar refers to "my town," he means the village of Seida, nestled amid plum orchards in the West Bank, where his journey to Palestinian activism began.Occupation as Slavery

Ashqar was 9 when Israel took control of the area from Jordan after the 1967 Middle East war. He still remembers his fear and anger.

"Before the Israeli occupation, there were no restrictions. We could go wherever we wanted to," Ashqar said, his hands fluttering. "We used to stay up late, to play, to stay with the relatives, the friends."

The Israelis installed checkpoints and a 7 p.m. curfew, he recalled, and his older brother was detained for six weeks without explanation. Ashqar himself would spend 16 days in a cramped jail cell in 1981, accused of participating in an anti-Israel demonstration, he said.

"I consider the occupation as a form of slavery," Ashqar declared.

In college, Ashqar became a leader in a growing student movement that fused political activism with conservative Islam. The movement was dominant at the Islamic University of Gaza, where Ashqar began teaching business administration in 1985. Several professors eventually became leaders of Hamas, a Palestinian nationalist movement which includes a broad social-service network as well as an armed wing.

After Israeli authorities closed the college, Ashqar headed to the University of Mississippi in 1989 to pursue his doctorate in business on a U.S. government scholarship.

Prosecutors in Chicago say that the quiet graduate student shifted tens of thousands of dollars through his Mississippi bank accounts to Hamas activists. Evidence of his support for the group is overwhelming, they say.

For example, in December 1993, FBI agents slipped into Ashqar's apartment and discovered "a treasure trove of Hamas-related documents," according to the prosecution's court filings. They included minutes of confidential Hamas meetings; details of recent Hamas attacks on Israeli soldiers; and a fax from Mousa Abu Marzook, a Falls Church businessman, asking Ashqar to arrange the transfer of $40,000 to another Palestinian activist, according to the court filings.

Marzook is also charged in the Chicago indictment. He was deported by U.S. authorities in 1997 and is a top official in Hamas's political bureau, believed to be living in Syria. The third defendant in the case is Muhammad Salah, an Illinois businessman.

Ashqar used his telephone as "a kind of switchboard," linking Hamas operatives in various countries who couldn't call each other directly, according to the prosecution's court documents. In December 1993, according to the documents, Ashqar passed on a message from one operative to a senior Hamas official in Syria, calling for the execution of a rogue Hamas member who had killed three men. Unbeknown to Ashqar, the FBI was listening in.

Ashqar and his attorney, William B. Moffitt, have declined to discuss the charges, saying they will argue their case in court.

The indictment lists no pro-Hamas actions by Ashqar after March 1994, other than his refusal to testify before grand juries. The U.S. Treasury Department designated Hamas a terrorist organization in January 1995.

But the indictment mentions several deadly attacks by Hamas members on Israeli soldiers and civilians starting in 1992. And in April 1994, Hamas's military wing claimed responsibility for a car bombing against a bus in the Israeli farm town of Afula that killed seven. It was the start of a wave of suicide bombings by Palestinians over the next several years, part of an escalating conflict that would claim thousands of lives on the two sides.'What Can I Await?'

Ashqar pulled some 8-by-10 glossies out of a drawer in a carved wooden table in the living room.

"Let me show you some pictures," he said.

They show him standing in front of a friend's house in August 1998. Ashqar's pale, emaciated arms poke from a pale-blue hospital shirt. His face, normally a jowly oval, has collapsed into a triangle, his chin a bearded point.

Ashqar had just emerged from a New York prison hospital after a hunger strike that lasted six months, during which he was force-fed. He was detained for refusing to testify before a grand jury investigating Marzook and Hamas financing.

"I can't see myself as a collaborator against my people," he said softly.

Ashqar has pleaded innocent and says he rejects terrorism or suicide bombings. "Israel is a reality," he said, explaining that he favors a separate state for the Palestinians. He scoffed at al-Qaeda, "these crazy people of September 11."

But since 1991, Ashqar said, law-enforcement officials have been pressuring him to provide information, questioning his university professors and causing him to lose jobs. The Justice Department opened an investigation in 1996 into Palestinian immigrants, including Ashqar, who appeared to be moving around large sums of money, a former official said.

The Palestinians "really did use some of this money for charitable and religious purposes," said Mark Flessner, a former prosecutor involved in that investigation. But the probe appeared to show that "they would take a small percentage to support terrorism."

Flessner said the investigation was shut down in 2000 after numerous internal disputes, some over the use of classified information.

By 1997, Ashqar moved to Northern Virginia to be near friends in the Muslim community.

"People were very sympathetic with him. He became a well-known person" after his hunger strike, said Mohamad al-Hanooti, an imam who often preaches at Dar al-Hijrah in Falls Church, where Ashqar was elected to the governing board.

Ashqar was an assistant professor at Howard until 2003, when the university declined to renew his contract. That year, he was again jailed for refusing to testify before a grand jury in Chicago.

The current indictment came a year later. Ashqar has been out on a $2.6 million bond secured by the properties of friends in the Washington area. Local Muslims have raised tens of thousands of dollars for his legal defense.

If he is acquitted, he expects to be deported. If he is convicted of racketeering, Ashqar could face life in prison. It is a frightening prospect, he acknowledged. But he said he would survive because of his faith.

"That's very important in my thinking," he said, walking through his garden, an ankle bracelet monitoring his movements. "If I go to jail for the rest of my life, what can I await? Just a reward from God."

Staff writer Peter Slevin and staff researchers Meg Smith and Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Torture Victim Barred From Visiting U.S. (AP)

By WILLIAM C. MANN, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083211

WASHINGTON -- Syrian torturers could find nothing to implicate Canadian Maher Arar in al-Qaida or any other terrorist ties. An official Canadian government report agreed with that finding and recommended that Arar be compensated for his 10 months in a Syrian prison.

Still, Arar remains on the U.S. government terror watch list. And the United States has not admitted fault for holding him incommunicado for a week, then, five days after his first telephone call, putting him on a private jet and flying him to the Syrian prison.

Arar and his American lawyer, Michael Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights, were invited to Washington on Wednesday to receive human rights awards from the rights advocates Institute for Policy Studies. Ratner came from his New York headquarters to accept for the center, a longtime campaigner against torture and other abuses.

Because the watch list will not let Arar enter the United States, he had to stay in Canada and participate by telephone in a discussion of his case and of the U.S. law signed Tuesday by President Bush on treatment and prosecution of detainees. At the awards presentation, he delivered a videotaped message of thanks in which he described his ordeal, which began on Sept. 26, 2002, at New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport and ended with his arrival in Canada in early October 2003.

The award "means that there are still Americans out there who value our struggle for justice," he said. "We now know that my story is not a unique one. Over the past two years we have heard from many other people who were, who have been kidnapped, unlawfully detained, tortured and eventually released without being charged with any crime in any country."

John Cavanagh, the institute's director, told Arar he had asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to clear Arar's name and let him come. Gonzales did not reply, Cavanagh said. At the Justice Department, a spokesman said he was unaware of the letter and could not comment.

Gonzales has said Arar was deported to the country where he was born. A representative of the Immigration and Naturalization Service was there when he was put on the plane, Arar said in his videotaped talk, and he said he told her the Syrians would torture him.

"She said something like: 'The INS is not the body or the agency that signed the Geneva Convention convention against torture.' For me what that really meant is, 'We will send you to torture, and we don't care.'"

Cavanagh told Arar over the telephone that he was selected for the Letelier-Moffitt Human Rights Award "partly for your courage in helping to catalyze the global movement against torture and this term of 'rendition': deportation for torture."

Last week, Canadian Justice Dennis O'Connor issued a three-volume report on the Arar case that made 23 recommendations for policy changes and reparations to Arar, a software engineer.

"I am able to say categorically that there is no evidence to indicate that Mr. Arar has committed any offense or that his activities constitute a threat to the security of Canada," O'Connor said. He said it was almost certain that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had sent erroneous information on Arar to the Americans.

The official U.S. line on Arar, as related Sept. 29 by State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, is "the people who made the decisions at the time ... determined a couple of things: One, that this individual posed a threat to the United States based on the information that they had; and two, that they were able to assure themselves, they had the reasonable expectation that this individual was not going to be maltreated."

Detainee Files Motion For His Prosecution (DENP)

By Bruce Finley, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, October 19, 2006

A man from the Pakistan-Afghanistan borderlands jailed for more than two years after the FBI targeted him as a possible Denver-based terrorist - but never charged him - has begun a last-ditch legal gambit to resume his life with his U.S.-citizen wife and four kids.

Still in prison in Colorado, Haroon Rashid has filed a motion in federal court to force the government to prosecute him.

It's an unusual effort to break out of the legal limbo that has derailed his life - and lives of others jailed since Sept. 11, 2001, in the government's war on terrorism.

After charging 441 detainees in terrorism and terrorism-related cases, federal authorities have won 261 convictions, a new Justice Department study found. Most of the convictions were for petty offenses, not terrorism.

An undetermined number of suspects including Rashid still are detained. Some 150 cases are pending.

U.S. officials say secret evidence supports a hardline approach. Prosecutors are trying "to prevent terrorist acts before they can occur," Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said.

But civil liberties leaders question basic fairness.

DOJ_NMG_0083212

"Yes, we want to be safe, but do we want to sacrifice our liberties in the process? ... If you want to always be safe, you could lock everybody up. But that's not what our system is based on," said Judy Rabinovitz, senior attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union. Rashid's case and others "amount to preventive detention," she said.

Rashid made his move, through his attorney Jeff Pagliuca, after U.S. Attorney Troy Eid filed a motion Oct. 2 to drop a lesser immigration charge the government pursued as the FBI's initial terrorism case evaporated, court records show.

By dropping the immigration charge, Eid had planned to clear the way for Rashid to be deported back to his native Pakistan for misdemeanor assault. In 2003, a jury found Rashid guilty of assaulting a street-gang member he said threatened his kids. He received a 401-day sentence that was mostly suspended.

Now Rashid's motion - to block federal prosecutors from dropping their case - aims to delay his deportation and further clear his record. He's been held in federal custody at his lawyer's request to avoid deportation until the federal case is resolved.

Rashid comes from Quetta, along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border, an unsettled hotbed of anti-U.S. sentiment where Taliban forces are on the rise. His wife and kids say they dread moving there if he is deported but would do so to be together.

"Mr. Rashid is a decent man . ... It doesn't do anybody in our country any good to have this man deported back to Pakistan on a misdemeanor," Pagliuca said.

"I'd rather have Mr. Rashid here taking care of his children, not back in Pakistan. ... This case shouldn't have been filed in the first place."

Chief U.S. District Judge Lewis Babcock must decide how to handle this jam - with feds asking to drop their charges and Rashid asking for a trial to exonerate himself and let his family stay a bit longer in the country.

Rashid already has served more time in prison than would be possible if prosecutors won a conviction on the lesser immigration charge they're now trying to drop.

He immigrated to the United States legally in November 1997. His wife, Saima Saima, and her father, Abdul Qayyum, are naturalized U.S. citizens. Rashid worked driving an airport shuttle as they raised their kids.

Federal agents began investigating him and his family in 2002 after President Bush and then- Attorney General John Ashcroft vowed to use every legal tool they could to detain and prosecute possible terrorists. Rashid had visited Pakistan that year.

Denver-based FBI Special Agent Mike Castro testified at a 2003 detention hearing that there was evidence Rashid bragged he fought against U.S. soldiers in Afghanistan and that he was in Colorado awaiting orders to carry out violent acts.

Said Pagliuca: "I don't believe it. Why didn't they charge him as a terrorist? There's no evidence of terrorism."

Castro and Immigration and Customs Enforcement Special Agent Ross Godwin, members of a Joint Terrorism Task Force, went to California and questioned Imran Khan, son of Rashid's father-in-law by a previous marriage, who had entered the United States in August 1997 with Rashid's wife.

The agents sought Kahn as a source on Rashid and others. Though they lacked a warrant, they arrested Khan and hauled him back to Colorado in shackles, court records show.

In a 2004 court order, Judge Babcock stated that "the terrorism implications of this case have since evaporated" and that "there was confusion about how and under what authority an FBI and (immigration) agent working in concert in a mixed civil and criminal investigation should conduct their investigation."

Federal officials recently have rebuffed repeated efforts to interview Rashid at a federal prison in Englewood. He was held previously at a federal immigration prison in Aurora.

Family members can visit, including a toddler born during Rashid's confinement.

The older children regularly ask about their father and beg to stay in their schools.

U.S. authorities "are breaking this family. We've been patient. ... This is very unfair," Rashid's wife said in a Denver mosque. "They still think he's a terrorist."

Staff writer Bruce Finley can be reached at 303-954-1700 or bfinley@denverpost.com.

U.S. Army Colonel To Investigate Gitmo (AP-Y)

By Mike Melia, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

A U.S. Army colonel arrived at Guantanamo Bay Wednesday to investigate allegations that guards at the prison abused detainees, a military spokesman said.

Col. Richard Basset, who is based at U.S. Southern Command headquarters in Miami, was appointed after Marine Sgt. Heather Cerveny said in a sworn statement that guards she met in a Guantanamo bar last month spoke of hitting detainees and denying them water. She said the guards described it as common practice in the prison where about 450 detainees are held on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

DOJ_NMG_0083213

Cerveny is a paralegal for Marine Lt. Col. Colby Vokey, an attorney for a Guantanamo detainee. Vokey filed a complaint to the Pentagon's Inspector General's office alleging that detainee abuse was ongoing at the prison.

Basset will conduct interviews for up to a month on the isolated detention center in southeast Cuba, command spokesman Jose Ruiz said by telephone from Miami. He has authority to interview any member of the military Joint Task Force that runs the prison regardless of rank, Ruiz said.

"He's going to interview everyone he thinks he needs to talk to to be able to establish the facts," he said.

He will submit his findings to the commander of the U.S. Southern Command, which oversees the detention center.

Vokey and Cerveny have been ordered by the U.S. Marine Corps not to speak with the media about their allegations, the U.S. Marines public affairs department said.

Congress To Courts: 'Get Out Of The War On Terror' (WSJ)

By John Yoo

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

During the bitter controversy over the military commission bill, which President Bush signed into law on Tuesday, most of the press and the professional punditry missed the big story. In the struggle for power between the three branches of government, it is not the presidency that "won." Instead, it is the judiciary that lost.

The new law is, above all, a stinging rebuke to the Supreme Court. It strips the courts of jurisdiction to hear any habeas corpus claim filed by any alien enemy combatant anywhere in the world. It was passed in response to the effort by a five-justice majority in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld to take control over terrorism policy. That majority extended judicial review to Guantanamo Bay, threw the Bush military commissions into doubt, and tried to extend the protections of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions to al Qaeda and Taliban detainees, overturning the traditional understanding that Geneva does not cover terrorists, who are not signatories nor "combatants" in an internal civil war under Article 3.

Hamdan was an unprecedented attempt by the court to rewrite the law of war and intrude into war policy. The court must have thought its stunning power grab would go unchallenged. After all, it has gotten away with many broad assertions of judicial authority before. This has been because Congress is unwilling to take a clear position on controversial issues (like abortion, religion or race) and instead passes ambiguous laws which breed litigation and leave the power to decide to the federal courts.

Until the Supreme Court began trying to make war policy, the writ of habeas corpus had never been understood to benefit enemy prisoners in war. The U.S. held millions of POWs during World War II, with none permitted to use our civilian courts (except for a few cases of U.S. citizens captured fighting for the Axis). Even after hostilities ended, the justices turned away lawsuits by enemy prisoners seeking to challenge their detention. In Johnson v. Eisentrager, the court held that it would not hear habeas claims brought by alien enemy prisoners held outside the U.S., and refused to interpret the Geneva Conventions to give new rights in civilian court against the government. In the case of Gen. Tomoyuki Yamashita, the court refrained from reviewing the operations of military commissions.

In Hamdan, the court moved to sweep aside decades of law and practice so as to forge a grand new role for the courts to open their doors to enemy war prisoners. Led by John Paul Stevens and abetted by Anthony Kennedy, the majority ignored or creatively misread the court's World War II precedents. The approach catered to the legal academy, whose tastes run to swashbuckling assertions of judicial supremacy and radical innovations, rather than hewing to wise but boring precedents.

Thoughtful critics point out that because the enemy fights covertly, the risk of detaining the innocent is greater. But so is the risk of releasing the dangerous. That's why enemy combatants who fight out of uniform, such as wartime spies, have always been considered illegals under the law of war, not entitled to the same protections given to soldiers on the battlefield or ordinary POWs. Disguised suicide- bombers in an age of WMD proliferation and virulent America-hatred are more immediately dangerous than the furtive information-carriers of our Cold War past. We now know that more than a dozen detainees released from Guantanamo have rejoined the jihad. The real question is how much time, energy and money should be diverted from winning the fight toward establishing multiple layers of review for terrorists. Until Hamdan, nothing in the law of war ever suggested that enemy status was anything but a military judgment.

While there may be different ways to strike a balance, this is a decision for the president and Congress, not the courts. The Constitution gives Congress the authority to determine the jurisdiction of federal courts in peacetime, and also declares that habeas corpus can be suspended "in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion" when "the public Safety may require it." Congress's power is even greater when it is correcting the justices' errors. Courts are ill-equipped to decide whether vast resources should be devoted to reviewing military detentions. Or whether military personnel's time should be consumed traveling back to the U.S. for detainee hearings. Or whether we risk revealing information in these hearings that might compromise the intelligence sources and methods that may allow us to win the war.

DOJ_NMG_0083214

This time, Congress and the president did not take the court's power grab lying down. They told the courts, in effect, to get out of the war on terror, stripped them of habeas jurisdiction over alien enemy combatants, and said there was nothing wrong with the military commissions. It is the first time since the New Deal that Congress had so completely divested the courts of power over a category of cases. It is also the first time since the Civil War that Congress saw fit to narrow the court's habeas powers in wartime because it disagreed with its decisions.

The law goes farther. It restores to the president command over the management of the war on terror. It directly reverses Hamdan by making clear that the courts cannot take up the Geneva Conventions. Except for some clearly defined war crimes, whose prosecution would also be up to executive discretion, it leaves interpretation and enforcement of the treaties up to the president. It even forbids courts from relying on foreign or international legal decisions in any decisions involving military commissions.

All this went overlooked during the fight over the bill by the media, which focused on Sens. McCain, Graham and Warner's opposition to the administration's proposals for the use of classified evidence at terrorist trials and permissible interrogation methods. In its eagerness to magnify an intra-GOP squabble, the media mostly ignored the substance of the bill, which gave current and future administrations, whether Democrat or Republican, the powers needed to win this war.

Mr. Yoo, professor of law at Berkeley and visiting scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, served in the Bush Justice Department from 2001-03. He is the author of "War By Other Means" (Grove/Atlantic 2006).

A Dangerous New Order (NYT)

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

Once President Bush signed the new law on military tribunals, administration officials and Republican leaders in Congress wasted no time giving Americans a taste of the new order created by this unconstitutional act.

Within hours, Justice Department lawyers notified the federal courts that they no longer had the authority to hear pending lawsuits filed by attorneys on behalf of inmates of the penal camp at Guantánamo Bay. They cited passages in the bill that suspend the fundamental principle of habeas corpus, making Mr. Bush the first president since the Civil War to take that undemocratic step.

Not satisfied with having won the vote, Dennis Hastert, the speaker of the House, quickly issued a statement accusing Democrats who opposed the Military Commissions Act of 2006 of putting “their liberal agenda ahead of the security of America.” He said the Democrats “would gingerly pamper the terrorists who plan to destroy innocent Americans’ lives” and create “new rights for terrorists.”

This nonsense is part of the Republicans’ scare-America-first strategy for the elections. No Democrat advocated pampering terrorists — gingerly or otherwise — or giving them new rights. Democratic amendments to the bill sought to protect everyone’s right to a fair trial while providing a legal way to convict terrorists.

Americans will hear more of this ahead of the election. They also will hear Mr. Bush say that he finally has the power to bring to justice a handful of men behind the 9/11 attacks. The truth is that Mr. Bush could have done that long ago, but chose to detain them illegally at hidden C.I.A. camps to extract information. He sent them to Guantánamo only to stampede Congress into passing the new law.

The 60 or so men at Guantánamo who are now facing tribunals — out of about 450 inmates — also could have been tried years ago if Mr. Bush had not rebuffed efforts by Congress to create suitable courts. He imposed a system of kangaroo courts that was more about expanding his power than about combating terrorism.

While the Republicans pretend that this bill will make America safer, let’s be clear about its real dangers. It sets up a separate system of justice for any foreigner whom Mr. Bush chooses to designate as an “illegal enemy combatant.” It raises insurmountable obstacles for prisoners to challenge their detentions. It does not require the government to release prisoners who are not being charged, or a prisoner who is exonerated by the tribunals.

The law does not apply to American citizens, but it does apply to other legal United States residents. And it chips away at the foundations of the judicial system in ways that all Americans should find threatening. It further damages the nation’s reputation and, by repudiating key protections of the Geneva Conventions, it needlessly increases the danger to any American soldier captured in battle.

In the short run, voters should see through the fog created by the Republican campaign machine. It will be up to the courts to repair the harm this law has done to the Constitution.

The Unlearned Lessons Of Abu Ghraib (WP)

By Christopher Graveline

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083215

President Bush has signed into law Congress's latest attempt to clarify our country's position on proper treatment of detainees and the boundaries of legitimate interrogation techniques. Unfortunately, this legislation demonstrates that both the administration and Congress have failed to learn important lessons from what Bush described as the "biggest mistake that's happened so far" in Iraq: the detainee abuses at Abu Ghraib.

By dissociating potential criminal responsibility from overly aggressive interrogation practices that could be classified as "minor" breaches of the Geneva Conventions, and setting up a situation in which different interrogation practices can be used by our military and the CIA, our national leadership has ensured more abuse scandals.

As part of the Army judge advocate general team investigating and prosecuting the Abu Ghraib soldiers, I crisscrossed the globe interviewing witnesses, collecting documents and studying our national policies, searching for went wrong at that prison. The evidence demonstrated that most of the photographed abuse had little or nothing to do with interrogation; it was done for sport by prison guards. But we also found disturbing conduct by military and civilian interrogators.

The interrogation abuses could be linked to three main areas of breakdown: confusion in the military ranks about what was acceptable behavior, given the conduct of civilian contractors and "other governmental agencies"; migration of certain techniques within the intelligence community without an understanding of how to implement them properly; and exploitation of the ambiguity in apparently innocuous interrogation tactics.

The new law does nothing to remedy these weaknesses.

First, our military and civilian intelligence agencies do not operate in mutually exclusive bubbles. A great deal of interaction occurs as military units capture suspected personnel, hand them over to interested agencies and, often, witness the interrogations. Our service members, especially Special Operations forces, will see the double standard -- the CIA's and the military's. This blurring was a main complaint of Abu Ghraib prison guards.

Army Maj. Gen. George Fay, who investigated Abu Ghraib, wrote in his report that "CIA detention and interrogation practices led to a loss of accountability, abuse, reduced interagency cooperation, and an unhealthy mystique that further poisoned the atmosphere." The power of the CIA's mystique to influence our soldiers should not be underestimated. Army guards reported seeing unknown men in civilian clothes dropping prisoners off and telling the guards not to give the detainees identification numbers, contrary to usual practices under the Geneva Conventions. The civilians exuded an air of confidence that suggested they knew exactly what they were doing and that this departure from the norm was allowed. Similar issues were unearthed in the interrogation booth, including one instance of a man dying during a CIA interrogation at Abu Ghraib.

The CIA conducted its own internal abuse investigation but never reported the results to any military authority in Iraq, creating resentment, the impression of a double standard and confusion in the military ranks as to what were acceptable practices. Having strict controls over interrogations and the ability to hold individual interrogators responsible for their actions is another important lesson stemming from abuses seen in Iraq.

Chief Warrant Officer Lewis Welshofer, an Army interrogator, exploited the ambiguous language of the "harsh" interrogation approach to wrap an Iraqi general in a sleeping bag, tie electrical cords around the bag and sit on the man's chest in an attempt to scare him with suffocation. The general died. (This was not at Abu Ghraib.) Welshofer was convicted by the military of negligent homicide. But given the language of the new law, it is unclear whether a civilian interrogator performing the same actions would be prosecuted, since it would be impossible to prove that the interrogator "specifically intended" to torture or inflict "severe or serious physical or mental pain."

The new law grants too much latitude in an area where precision and oversight are critical. If confusion reigned in Washington during the past several weeks over whether waterboarding or other, "harsher" techniques would be permissible under the legislation, imagine the results when our agents and service members are faced with the same question halfway around the world and years removed from this debate -- especially if the threat of criminal responsibility is gone.

The better route would have been to authorize mirror-image interrogation techniques for both the CIA and the military and to maintain the possibility of criminal prosecution if an interrogator exceeds these authorized approaches. All interrogators would have more than enough flexibility to obtain necessary information simply by using the approaches recently rewritten into the new Army field manual that governs interrogation.

Now we must wait to see what interrogation rules the president will promulgate for the CIA. Given the administration's rhetoric, there seems little hope for a cure for the systemic problems exposed at Abu Ghraib.

The writer, who served as an active-duty Army JAG officer for more than seven years, participated in the prosecution of 10 soldiers for detainee abuse at Abu Ghraib prison.

DOJ_NMG_0083216

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Government Skeptical Of Threat Against NFL Stadiums (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

AP, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — A Web site is claiming that seven NFL football stadiums will be hit with radiological dirty bombs this weekend, but the government on Wednesday expressed doubts about the threat.

The warning, posted Oct. 12, was part of an ongoing Internet conversation titled "New Attack on America Be Afraid." It mentioned NFL stadiums in New York, Miami, Atlanta, Seattle, Houston, Oakland and Cleveland, where games are scheduled for this weekend.

The Homeland Security Department alerted authorities and stadium owners in those cities, as well as the NFL, of the Web message but said the threat was being viewed "with strong skepticism." Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said there was no intelligence that indicated such an attack was imminent, and that the alert was "out of an abundance of caution."

"The department strongly encourages the public to continue to go about their plans, including attending events that involve large public gatherings such as football games," Knocke said.

The FBI also expressed doubt about the threat.

The nation's alert level remains at yellow, signaling an elevated risk of an attack. The threat level for airline flights is at orange, a higher level, where it has been since a foiled plot to bomb U.S.-bound commercial jets was revealed on Aug. 10.

Government Skeptical Of Threat To Stadiums (WP)

By Spencer Hsu And Mark Maske, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security has notified the NFL and law enforcement agencies of an Internet threat to detonate radiological "dirty" bombs outside seven stadiums hosting games Sunday, but immediately dismissed the threat as noncredible.

"We view this with the strongest of skepticism, and we strongly encourage the American public to go about their daily lives and to attend large gatherings, and to go to football games," DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said.

The department issued the notice "out of an abundance of caution," and routinely shares 1,200 reports a year with state, local and private sector officials, Knocke said. "In this case there is no credibility," he said.

The notice, which the NFL received Tuesday, cited games in New York, Miami, Atlanta, Seattle, Houston, Cleveland and Oakland, Calif.

"Our stadiums are very well protected through the comprehensive security procedures we have in place," NFL spokesman Greg Aiello said in a statement.Barber May Cut It Short

When he arrived in training camp this past summer, New York Giants tailback Tiki Barber talked at length about the possibility of retiring in the next few years to pursue his interests in broadcasting and other businesses.

Barber, the NFL's rushing leader, now says his departure could come sooner rather than later. He said during a conference call with reporters yesterday that he is leaning toward retiring after this season, echoing comments that he made in the New York Times.

Barber, 31, said it was "too early in the year to say it for sure," but added: "I've been considering it for a few years now. It comes to a point where your body just doesn't want to take it anymore [and] you see other opportunities out there. I'm excited about the rest of my life as well as I am about this football season, so we'll see what happens."Welbourn Set to Return

Retired offensive tackle John Welbourn reportedly is set to rejoin the Kansas City Chiefs. The Kansas City Star reported yesterday that Welbourn will join the team next week. Welbourn was the Chiefs' starter at right tackle last season but abruptly retired in the offseason. He was suspended by the NFL for six weeks for a reported violation of the league's steroid policy. He'd been suspended for the first four games of last season for a violation of the policy. . . .

The Dallas Cowboys re-signed veteran safety Marcus Coleman. They'd released him over the weekend, just after he'd returned from serving a four-game suspension for violating the league's substance abuse policy.

Threat Made To 7 Stadiums; U.S. Is Skeptical (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083217

WASHINGTON, Oct. 18 — A threat of radiological bomb attacks at seven professional football stadiums was posted this week on an Internet site, but domestic security officials said Wednesday that they had no reason to place credibility in it.

The statement, which said the attacks would come Sunday, was specific enough to lead officials of the Homeland Security Department to notify the National Football League and the seven cities, a spokesman for the department, Russ Knocke, said.

The notification was made out of an "abundance of caution," Mr. Knocke said, rather than because officials believed that the stadiums might actually be attacked.

"We strongly encourage the American public to continue to go about daily lives, including going to football games," Mr. Knocke said. "At the same time, the public should continue to be vigilant and report any abnormal or suspicious activity to authorities."

The Federal Bureau of Investigation said in a statement, "The credibility of the threat is questionable."

The posting on an English-language Web site and under a title of "New Attack on America Be Afraid" appeared Monday. It said so-called dirty bombs would be detonated on Oct. 22 outside stadiums at professional football games in Atlanta; Cleveland; Houston; Miami; New York; Oakland, Calif.; and Seattle.

Skeptical Authorities Pass Along NFL Stadium 'dirty Bomb' Threat (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Homeland Security Department notified football stadium owners in seven cities Wednesday about a threat to set off radioactive bombs during upcoming games, but said it's highly likely that the claim is a hoax.

"We strongly encourage the public to go about their plans, including attending events that involve large public gatherings such as football games," department spokesman Russ Knocke said.

Homeland Security notified officials in New York, Miami, Atlanta, Seattle, Houston, Oakland and Cleveland that an English-language website called www.thefriendsociety.com had posted a warning on Oct. 12 about "dirty bombs," so-called because they contain radioactive charges. The site claimed that the bombs would be delivered by trucks to the mostly open-air stadiums and detonated Sunday.

Knocke said the department routinely distributes threat information so that state and local officials, companies and others "have the same information we do."

"The department views (the threat) with strong skepticism. … There is no credible intelligence to suggest such attacks."

Homeland Security did not change the threat level, now at yellow or "elevated" risk for terrorist attack, either nationally or for NFL football stadiums.

The threat level for airlines has been at orange, or "high" risk of attack, since Aug. 10, when London authorities exposed an alleged terrorist plot to blow up U.S.-bound planes.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko called the credibility of the threat "questionable" but said government officials passed it on because the information was public — in this case, posted on the Web.

NFL spokesman Greg Aiello noted that Homeland Security judged the threat "not credible." He said the league's stadiums are "very well-protected through the comprehensive security procedures we have in place, including pat-downs and bag searches."

In Miami, Dolphins spokesman George Torres said "safety is of paramount importance to us at every event."

Intelligence Plan Targets Training, Keeping Personnel (WP)

By Karen Deyoung And Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

U.S. intelligence efforts are hampered by inefficient methods for recruiting, training and assigning personnel, according to a new human resources plan that calls for a more "corporate" business model and increased cooperation within the 16-agency intelligence community.

Among the problems cited by the "Strategic Human Capital Plan" prepared for John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, is an inability to compete with the private sector for the "best and the brightest" workers in language, scientific and technological skills. Security-clearance restrictions have impeded hiring a diverse workforce, including noncitizens with critical expertise in other countries and cultures.

The plan is the latest step in Negroponte's effort to bring the disparate intelligence agencies under one umbrella. Investigations and inquiries have cited rivalry, differing standards and poor communication among agencies as a key factor in not preventing the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. The 2004 Intelligence Reform Act, which established Negroponte's office and addressed other recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission, calls for increased integration and an elimination of overlap.

DOJ_NMG_0083218

Published internally in June as an unclassified document and released yesterday by the nongovernmental Federation of American Scientists' Secrecy News blog, the plan sets an outline for hiring, training and benefits policies and directs each agency to develop a plan to contribute to overall goals.

It calls for creating an "all source" workforce by setting overarching goals for numbers and quality and for "determining the optimum mix of military, civilian, contractor and other human resources," as well as creating a "cohesive" leadership culture.

Although intelligence agencies have been flooded with recruits the past five years -- the CIA received 140,000 rÃ©sumÃ©s in 2005 -- attracting and keeping people with "a deep understanding of other societies, their values, cultures, religions and languages" remains a priority, CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield said.

The plan cites a workforce imbalance created by the post-Sept. 11 influx of young recruits at a time when senior officials have been retiring and mid-level managers have been departing for better-paying or more interesting jobs. Nearly 40 percent of current CIA employees have been hired in the past five years, and up to 20 percent of the agency workforce will be eligible for retirement over the next five.

Many new employees of intelligence agencies, particularly in critical areas of analysis and human intelligence, "are not seeking a 25-to-30-year career," the plan reports. Instead, like others at their age and experience level, "they see a future with multiple jobs and a variety of employers."

In addition, new employees "have far different styles of work, interaction, dress, leisure, even language" that portend "a potential 'culture clash' " with older supervisors and top level officials.

The plan recognizes the growing tendency of intelligence agencies to use contractors rather than their own personnel. This has been particularly true of the rapidly growing intelligence elements within the Defense Department, which spend up to 85 percent of the intelligence budget. More than two-thirds of the employees of the Pentagon's Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA), begun in 2002 to supervise force protection for Defense facilities at home and abroad, have been supplied under private contracts at costs considerably above government pay scales.

"Increasingly, the IC [intelligence community] finds itself in competition with its contractors for our own employees," the plan laments. For example, Lockheed Martin posted a job offer last month for an "Advanced Special Operations Officer" to provide administrative and operational support at Fort Bragg, N.C., on a part-time basis with a salary of $43,000 for a 90-day rotation.

The applicant must have current Department of Defense top-secret security clearance with "sensitive compartmented information" eligibility -- likely to be obtained only by working in a government intelligence agency.

Part of the reason for the turn to contractors, according to the plan, rests with budget ceilings that Congress or the White House Office of Management and Budget have placed on the agencies, as well as the past uncertainties of steady funding to support a permanent government workforce.

The study describes the irony that "those same contractors recruit our own employees, already cleared and trained at government expense and then 'lease' them back to us at considerably greater expense."

The situation has already led to an investigation by the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, and the plan discloses that the OMB has asked Negroponte's group to study contracting because it believes "inherently governmental" work is improperly being outsourced.

Negroponte's office is seeking to have its own level of staffing raised to allow more permanent hires, the plan says.

Personnel surveys disclosed in the plan indicated that intelligence workers are largely satisfied with the work they do but are unhappy with senior leaders and the manner in which promotions are handled.

Only 42 percent of those responding said their senior leaders generated high levels of motivation and commitment to the job. The lowest response came when 29 percent agreed with steps taken to deal with poor job performers and 54 percent believed creativity was rewarded.

Privacy Group Sues FBI For Database Info (WP/AP)

By Dan Caterinicchia, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A privacy-advocacy group has sued the U.S. government for information about an FBI database of more than 700 million personal records set up after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

The Electronic Frontier Foundation said it sued the Justice Department because the FBI failed to respond to Freedom of Information Act requests on its "Investigative Data Warehouse."

The lawsuit also charges the FBI has not posted a public notice describing the criteria on personal information included in the database, as required by the Privacy Act of 1974.

In its lawsuit, EFF cites the FBI's April 2004 report to the 9/11 Commission and subsequent remarks from agency executives that said the agency began developing the database after the terrorist attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0083219

The 9/11 report said the database was first delivered in January 2004 and "contains all data that can legally be stored together... (providing) a single access point to several data sources that were previously available only through separate, stove-piped systems."

The FBI has said the database provides FBI agents and analysts with "instant access to photographs, biographical information, physical location information, and financial data for thousands of known and suspected terrorists," according to a March 2005 speech by John E. Lewis, deputy assistant director of the counterterrorism division.

"Nearly 12,000 users can access it via the FBI's classified network from any FBI terminal throughout the globe," Mueller told the Senate Judiciary Committee earlier this year. "And, nearly 30 percent of the user accounts are provided to task force members from other local, state, and federal agencies."

In an op-ed piece in The New York Times last month, John Miller, assistant director of the FBI, wrote that IDW "can search more than 700 million records from more than a dozen agencies and match them against our own investigative records."

The San Francisco-based EFF, which recently opened a Washington office with two attorneys from the Electronic Privacy Information Center, filed the lawsuit Tuesday in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. The EFF said the FBI failed to meet deadlines for responding to the group's FOIA requests.

"On the one hand, the FBI has touted the creation of this database, but on the other hand, it hasn't complied with the legal requirements that apply to the creation of something like this," David Sobel, EFF's senior counsel in Washington, said Wednesday.

FBI spokesman Paul Bresson declined to comment on the lawsuit, but said IDW "simply unifies previously and lawfully acquired data from other established databases into one place."

"It should also be noted that even though the E-Government Act does not require IDW to undergo privacy impact analysis, FBI policy does require it," Bresson wrote in an e-mail. "As a result we have conducted several privacy impact assessments at different times as new data sets are added."

Earlier this month, EFF sued the Justice Department for records concerning electronic-surveillance tools including one that appeared to be a successor to the FBI's abandoned Carnivore program.

The FBI developed Carnivore to read e-mails and other online communications among suspected criminals, terrorists and spies, but privacy groups and lawmakers complained it could collect much more than allowed by a warrant.

2nd Circuit Upholds Verdicts In Multibillion-Dollar World Trade Center Insurance Dispute (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, October 19, 2006

World Trade Center leaseholder Larry Silverstein's attempt to win at least $2 billion more from insurers on the theory that the two airplane attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, were two separate occurrences was rebuffed Wednesday.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a Southern District of New York jury verdict that the bulk of insurance policies covering the Trade Center treated the terror attacks as a single occurrence.

However, the court also upheld a victory awarded Silverstein by the jury in the second phase of trial, agreeing that temporary insurance policies in effect when terrorists leveled the buildings required treatment of the attack as two occurrences. That ruling meant that nine insurance companies will have to pay double the roughly $1 billion in coverage under their policies.

Judges John M. Walker Jr., Jose Cabranes and Rosemary Pooler decided the appeals in SR International Business Insurance Co. v. World Trade Center Properties, lead docket 04-4500-cv. Walker wrote the opinion of the panel.

The ruling is likely the final resolution of a massive insurance dispute that began shortly after the terror attacks. Silverstein originally sought more than $7 billion. He has been awarded about $4.5 billion.

Silverstein had agreed on a 99-year lease for the World Trade Center buildings in the spring of 2001, and spent the summer negotiating a multilayer insurance program that provided for $3.54 billion in coverage on a "per occurrence" basis.

But for all but one of the insurers, final insurance contracts had not been signed when the hijackers steered two planes into the North and South towers at 8:48 and 9:03 on the morning of Sept. 11.

The litigation began when one insurance company filed suit seeking a declaratory judgment in the Southern District on its obligations under the still-to-be-completed insurance policies.

Silverstein filed counterclaims seeking to double the $3.54 billion to over $7 billion, setting up one of the largest, and certainly the most emotional, insurance fights in history.

Southern District Judge John Martin held that three insurers were governed by the so-called "WilProp" form -- the form Silverstein's insurance broker used during negotiations. The form treated the destruction by two planes as one occurrence.

DOJ_NMG_0083220

Judge Martin also denied summary judgment to Silverstein on his claim that the undefined term "occurrence" in the policy of Travelers Indemnity Co., one of the companies with the most at stake in the litigation, meant that, as a matter of law, the attacks were two occurrences.

The 2nd Circuit affirmed Judge Martin. Due to Martin's retirement from the bench, the case was reassigned to Chief Judge Michael Mukasey, who proceeded to hold a two-phase trial.

NO EVIDENTIARY ERRORS

In the first phase, a jury found that nine of 12 participating insurers and 20 Lloyd's of London syndicates were bound by the WilProp form -- leaving Silverstein with only a single-occurrence recovery.

But three insurers were found not to be governed by the form and they were joined in the second phase of the trial by six insurers who conceded the same. The jury in the second phase found that all nine insurers were subject to payments on a two-occurrence basis.

Wednesday, the circuit rejected Silverstein's arguments on phase one, and did the same for the losing insurers arguments in phase two. Both sides had argued that they should have prevailed as a matter of law and the issues never should have reached a jury.

The circuit also disagreed with both sides' claims that the verdicts were marred by evidentiary errors and flawed jury instructions.

"Not surprisingly, however, neither side admits that any errors contributed to the judgments in their favor," Walker wrote. "As a result, we are led to believe that the same type of error that would require us to set aside one set of judgments are unfounded when it comes to the other set of judgments -- and vice versa."

On Silverstein's claim that the issue never should have reached a jury, Judge Walker said, "The Silverstein parties ignore unfavorable evidence and rely on inferences that the jury was not required to make."

Of the nine insurers who lost the second phase of the trial, eight appealed. One settled with Silverstein.

The circuit rejected their claims that expert testimony as to custom and usage in the insurance industry should not have been allowed and that evidence of custom and usage in the industry was insufficient to send the matter to the jury.

"We conclude that the Silverstein Parties brought forth evidence sufficient to establish an industry custom that insurers utilize a narrow definition of 'occurrence' in their industry forms," Judge Walker said.

Similarly, the circuit found Silverstein had produced enough evidence of intent by the negotiating parties to show that the two plane attacks amounted to two occurrences.

Barry Ostrager of Simpson Thacher & Bartlett represented SR International Business Insurance in the first phase of the trial and acted as lead counsel in the litigation because the company had a lead role in the coverage, more than 25 percent. A Silverstein victory would have doubled the approximately $975 million SR was obligated to pay.

"Judge Musakey did a masterful job handling two hotly contested trials -- these were emotionally charged trials that took place just blocks from the World Trade Center," Ostrager said.

Ostrager said he did not believe there were any constitutional issues that would give rise to an appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"Honestly I don't think there is any enormous surprise here -- I don't think the Silverstein parties are going to be shocked that the jury verdict on behalf of Swiss Re was affirmed," he said.

Silverstein said in a statement Wednesday that he was "gratified" that the circuit upheld the jury's finding that the attacks "were two events for the purposes of determining how much the insurers have to pay."

He continued, "Over the past five years, the World Trade Center insurers have engaged in an all-out campaign to shirk their legal and moral obligation to honor their policies and help finance the rebuilding of the World Trade Center. All the money owed by the insurers is needed and has been committed to the rebuilding ... The court has spoken yet again, and the time has come for all of the insurers to finally pay what they owe."

Silverstein was represented by Herbert M. Wachtell of Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz.

Flood Risk Doesn't Stop Rebuilders (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, October 19, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — Nearly three-fourths of New Orleans homeowners applying for federal grants say they'll rebuild their Katrina-damaged homes in flood areas even though city restrictions are unlikely to prevent their houses from being wiped out if the levees fail again.

DOJ_NMG_0083221

The restrictions, which say that the city's homes must be raised at least 3 feet to avoid flooding, have come under fire from some local officials and government watchdog groups. They say 3 feet of elevation is not needed in areas that did not flood after Hurricane Katrina, and 3 feet is too low in areas that saw 20 feet of water.

Even the Federal Emergency Management Agency says thousands of houses could flood again if they are rebuilt under the new rules. “If there is another catastrophic event, flooding will occur,” says Doug Bellomo, a deputy director of risk analysis at FEMA.

The Louisiana Recovery Authority, which controls billions in federal relief money, expects about 53,000 New Orleans homeowners to apply for federal grants. The grants provide up to $150,000 for uninsured losses, and residents can use the money to rebuild or relocate.

So far, 14,534 New Orleanians have applied for grants; about 10,634 have said they want to rebuild where they were.

“The taxpayers are going to be subsidizing unwise construction,” says Robert Hunter, director of insurance for the Consumer Federation of America. About $7.5 billion is available to homeowners.

The New Orleans City Council adopted the 3-foot rule on Sept. 1 to avoid losing millions in federal grants. The recovery authority has said parishes that don't adopt the rules will be excluded from receiving some of the relief money.

St. Bernard Parish, where all but 50 homes flooded, is considering rejecting the rules. “Our goal is not to adopt them,” says St. Bernard Councilman Craig Taffaro. “We don't agree with the science.”

Paul Rainwater of the recovery authority says the rules are “not perfect,” but will help residents get much-needed flood insurance.

South Spent Millions On A Hurricane Season That Wasn't (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

MIAMI -- Anticipation of the 2006 hurricane season turned countless families here and in a vast swath of the Southeast into survivalists.

Households stockpiled ready-to-eat meals. They scarfed up emergency radios, propane stoves, satellite phones, shutters, candles, canned goods. Hordes plunked down $500 and up for home generators.

The predictions of another scary storm season and the memory of last year's record-setting disasters inspired fear and a spending spree of hundreds of millions of dollars.

"The main uncertainty in the outlook is not whether the season will be above normal, but how much above normal it will be," National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration forecasters announced in May. That forecast called for eight to 10 hurricanes and noted that the year might be "hyperactive."

Now comes a humbling moment for prognosticators: Those predictions were wrong.

Although the season doesn't end officially until Nov. 30, the peak time has passed, and meteorologists concede that its totals will almost certainly fall far short of the dire predictions issued as the summer began. In fact, the year's storm totals probably will not even reach the averages of the past 10 years.

"I think everyone agreed it was going to be an active season, but we were all wrong," said Philip Klotzbach, co-author of well-known predictions issued by a Colorado State University team.

He began a recent presentation with a rueful quotation from 19th-century mathematician Francois Arago: "Never, no matter what may be the progress of science, will honest scientific men who have regard for their reputations venture to predict the weather."

"Anyone who makes forecasts about the weather gets picked on all the time," Klotzbach said. "There's an art to it."

The NOAA forecast at the beginning of the season called for eight to 10 hurricanes, but so far there have been five. It said there would be four to six "major" hurricanes -- that is, Category 3, 4, or 5 strength -- but so far there have been only two.

The forecast from the Colorado State team was in general agreement with NOAA's predictions. But it went further and offered that there was a 95 percent chance of a hurricane making landfall in the United States.

None did, however, making the year seem especially quiet in the portion of the country known as Hurricane Alley.

What has accounted for the mild season, according to forecasters, is the unexpected onset of El NiÃ±o, which stifled storm development, as it has in previous years. Also, the steering currents over the Atlantic tended to keep Atlantic storms from making landfall, curving them northward and back out to sea.

The relatively calm season stands in marked contrast to the nervousness it inspired at the outset, when concerns about the dangers of Atlantic hurricanes seemed to have reached a historic climax.

The 2005 season had been the busiest recorded, and some scientists had begun to regard heightened hurricane activity as a sign that Earth's climate is out of whack, a symptom of global warming.

DOJ_NMG_0083222

Then, at the start of the season, forecasters issued the alarmingly specific predictions that more danger lay ahead. The seasonal forecasts are based on ocean temperatures and atmospheric conditions.

"If you think the 2006 hurricane season cannot be any worse than last year," National Hurricane Center Director Max Mayfield said at a hurricane conference, "I'm here to tell you otherwise."

As a result, many who had once scoffed at hurricane warnings and parodied the batten-down-the-hatches urgency of television forecasters now allowed that this season, they were preparing to hunker down if necessary.

Foil-wrapped ready-to-eat meals flew off the shelves at sporting goods stores. So did gas stoves and solar showers and battery-operated fans.

Help Jet, a West Palm Beach company, offered $500 memberships to Floridians who wanted to guarantee a seat on a private flight out of harm's way in the event of an approaching hurricane. As last year's troublesome evacuations showed, leaving is difficult when everyone else is on the road, too.

"It was something we'd never seen before," said Julie Abreu, a buyer for Jet's Florida Outdoors, a Miami sporting goods store, where purchases of hurricane-related items doubled. "It was busy the whole year."

During a 12-day period in May, when the state of Florida allowed hurricane preparation items to be bought tax-free, an estimated $550 million worth were purchased, according to state figures. The total hurricane spending in the state was probably much higher, however, because those estimates did not include items such as plywood, which were not part of the tax-free program.

"In this period of increased tropical activity, it is vital for all Floridians to prepare," Gov. Jeb Bush (R) advised constituents. Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour (R) likewise initiated an eight-week hurricane awareness program.

Among those swept up in the meteorological tension was a neighborhood in Hollywood, Fla., where more than a dozen households banded together to negotiate a discount on large generators costing $15,000 to $20,000.

Some, like Victor DeBianchi, spent more than $50,000 getting ready. In addition to his home generator, he bought hurricane shutters and impact-resistant glass for his home.

"What better way to ensure that nothing would happen?" DeBianchi, a probate lawyer, asked wryly. "I really did think there would be something this year. But I'm glad I did it. It's peace of mind."

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Violence, 'No Child' Occupy Bush (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher And Peter Baker

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

GREENSBORO, N.C., Oct. 18 -- President Bush said Wednesday that the current surge of violence in Iraq "could be" comparable to the Tet Offensive during the Vietnam War, a succession of battles that became a milestone because it helped turn the American public against the conflict and its political leadership.

Bush has strongly resisted comparisons between Iraq and Vietnam, but with U.S. casualties continuing to mount, he agreed to an interviewer's analogy and said he detected a spike in attacks timed to the congressional elections in three weeks with the goal of forcing the United States to lose its will.

"My gut tells me that they have all along been trying to inflict enough damage that we'd leave," Bush said in an interview with George Stephanopoulos of ABC News. "And the leaders of al-Qaeda have made that very clear. They believe that if they can create enough chaos, the American people will grow sick and tired of the Iraqi effort and will cause [the] government to withdraw."

Stephanopoulos asked Bush whether he agreed with New York Times columnist Thomas L. Friedman, who wrote that the real "October surprise" of this campaign season is what "seems like the jihadist equivalent of the Tet offensive." Bush nodded. "He could be right," the president replied. "There's certainly a stepped-up level of violence, and we're heading into an election."

The Tet Offensive was a rolling series of operations by the Viet Cong against U.S. and South Vietnamese forces beginning at the Vietnamese new year in January 1968. Historians consider Tet a military defeat for the Viet Cong because it lost so many men and captured no significant objectives. But it was also a powerful propaganda victory for the Viet Cong, because it brought the bloody war home to many Americans watching television. With support for the war eroding, President Lyndon B. Johnson abandoned his reelection campaign two months later.

Bush's interview with ABC came as he visited North Carolina to highlight his education program. The president visited a fast-improving elementary school to make a pitch for expansion of the No Child Left Behind law when it comes before Congress for reauthorization next year.

DOJ_NMG_0083223

Bush said the law should include vouchers for low-income students to attend private or parochial schools while offering salary incentives for teachers whose students show sharp improvement on standardized tests or who work in tough schools. He also wants the law's requirements for annual standardized testing, which currently apply to most elementary and middle school students, extended to high schools.

"The reauthorization of this important bill is going to be a top priority of mine," Bush said. "And it's not only just the reauthorization, it's the strengthening of the bill and not the weakening of the bill."

The changes sought by Bush are certain to face stiff opposition in Congress, where many Democrats contend that Bush has not provided enough funding to implement the measure. When the law was enacted in 2001, he was forced to drop his call for vouchers in the face of Democratic opposition.

In a speech at Waldo C. Falkener Elementary School, Bush said the law is spurring educational improvements here and elsewhere. The percentage of third-graders reading at grade level at Falkener has increased to 76 percent from 46 percent three years ago.

Bush said the law's requirement for annual testing of students in grades three through eight and its provisions for publicly funded tutoring for struggling students are helping to close the achievement gap separating many white and Asian students from many blacks and Hispanics.

"The gap is closing, and that's incredibly important for the United States of America to see that achievement gap close," Bush said. "How do we know? Because we're measuring."

After his speech, Bush visited the Victory Junction Gang Camp for children with life-threatening illnesses. NASCAR driver Kyle Petty and his wife, Pattie, founded the camp in memory of their son Adam. The day ended with a dinner at the Greensboro home of businessman Louis DeJoy, chairman of New Breed Logistics Inc. The event was expected to raise $900,000 for the Republican National Committee.

Baker reported from Washington.

Eyeing The Exits From Iraq (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

AMERICAN PATIENCE WITH THE WAR in Iraq is wearing thin. It's no longer just liberal blue-staters fed up with the Bush administration's foreign policy, or Republican members of Congress annoyed at this albatross during campaign season. The administration itself seems to be growing impatient with the situation in Iraq — especially the unwillingness or inability of the government in Baghdad to put an end to sectarian violence.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki was worried enough to call the White House on Monday to check on his job security. According to presidential spokesman Tony Snow, the Iraqi leader wanted to know whether there was any truth to the rumor that he would be replaced soon if things didn't turn around. President Bush reportedly offered his support. A word of caution to Maliki: If Bush told you you're doing "a heck of a job," you should be worried.

Whatever was said, Bush's tone must have made an impression. On Tuesday, Maliki's government dismissed the two most senior police commanders from their posts. It's well known that members of the police forces moonlight as Shiite death squads fomenting much of the ethnic strife in Iraq. The purge of the leadership is a welcome step, but only one of many that must be taken by the Iraqis to prevent full-blown civil war.

Yet the situation is fraught because the United States is only one of Maliki's overseers. To survive politically, he also needs to keep Muqtada Sadr happy. This is no easy balancing act. Sadr is the anti-American cleric who controls a faction of Shiite parliamentarians that backs Maliki, as well as the Al Mahdi army. Civil war is all but inevitable if such private armies are allowed to flourish. Tensions between Baghdad and Washington over Sadr were on full display Wednesday, after U.S. forces grudgingly released one of his senior aides at the government's request.

The episode will only feed U.S. commanders' exasperation at getting involved in what looks increasingly like a civil war. The cost to Americans of getting caught in the middle is getting painfully higher, after troops were redeployed to become more directly involved in the effort to stem the flow of violence. On Wednesday, the Pentagon announced that 11 U.S. troops had been killed this week, bringing the month's toll so far to 70.

Historian and Times columnist Niall Ferguson, though no fan of the decision to invade Iraq, has observed that this country's most successful occupations have been its longest, in Germany and Japan. But Maliki is right to be worried. Unless things start changing, even the staunchest neocons in Washington are going to start looking for the exits.

Burns: Bush Has Plan To Win War In Iraq (AP-Y)

By Matt Gouras

AP, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083224

Sen. Conrad Burns says he believes President Bush has a plan to win the war in Iraq but is keeping it quiet, a statement Democrats pounced on Wednesday as reminiscent of comments made during another divisive war.

Burns, at a debate Tuesday night with Democratic challenger Jon Tester, said he believes Bush has a plan to win — but added: "we're not going to tell you what our plan is."

Burns, who has said repeatedly the country must stay in Iraq as long as it takes to win the war, also seemed to suggest a new path may be needed in Iraq. He pointed to fellow Republican Sen. John Warner of Virginia, who has recently called for a new strategy in Iraq.

"We have to change our tactics with the enemy and how it changes its tactics," said Burns, a member of the Senate Appropriations defense subcommittee. "And in some cases, we have not been able to do that. I agree with Senator Warner and his assessment. If we don't change, we will pay a heavier price. But we cannot lose it."

Democrats likened Burns' comments to statements by President Nixon that led to news reports that he had a "secret plan" to end or win the war in Vietnam. Like Nixon, Burns never used the word "secret" but made it clear it wasn't in the president's or the country's interest to discuss any plans he has for winning the war.

Matt McKenna, a Tester campaign spokesman, said Burns' comments were eerily similar to Nixon's.

"I think the comparison is two politicians who put their own ambitions above the safety and success of the troops," McKenna said Wednesday.

In a tense exchange with Tester, who is ahead in recent polls, Burns hammered the Democratic challenger for his call on the president to develop a plan for withdrawing troops from Iraq.

"He wants everyone to know our plan. That's not smart," Burns said.

"He said our president (doesn't) have a plan. I think he's got one, but he's not going to tell everybody in the world," Burns added. "If you want to go out and spar for a fight, are you going to tell your enemy what your plan is? I don't think so."

Burns later said: "There is a plan. We're not going to tell you, Jon."

McKenna said the comments were those of a senator behind in recent polls who wants to keep his job.

"Nobody actually believes that he (Burns) has a plan, or even a seat at the table where plans are made," McKenna said.

Burn's spokesman, Jason Klindt, said the senator is adamant that details of a plan to win should not be released, including any deadline for troop withdrawal.

He said he doesn't know if Burns knows any specifics of a Bush administration plan to win the war in Iraq.

"I think he knows the general strategy," Klindt said.

Burns' Remark Draws Comparison To Nixon (USAT)

By John Bacon And Sarah Elkins

USA Today, October 19, 2006

Montana Democrats on Wednesday blasted GOP Sen. Conrad Burns for saying in Tuesday's debate that he believes President Bush has a plan to win the war in Iraq but is keeping it quiet.

“We're not going to tell you what our plan is,” Burns told Democrat Jon Tester. Matt McKenna, a Tester spokesman, likened Burns' comments to statements by President Nixon that led to rumors of a “secret plan” to end or win the war in Vietnam. “The comparison is two politicians who put their own ambitions above the safety and success of the troops,” McKenna said.

Burns' spokesman Jason Klindt said Burns is adamant that details of a plan to win should not be released. Klindt said he doesn't know if Burns knows any specifics of a plan, but added, “I think he knows the general strategy.”

A recent Montana State University-Billings poll released Wednesday showed Tester leading Burns 46%-35%, with 14% undecided.

‘Affordability agenda' in Vt. draws fire

Vermont gubernatorial hopeful Scudder Parker dismissed Republican Gov. Jim Douglas' self-described “affordability agenda,” calling it “an agenda of electability.” Douglas has said he is dedicated to reducing the costs of higher education, health care, property taxes and housing.

Parker cited the Vermont Housing and Conservation Board, saying state residents have “the Legislature, not Jim Douglas, to thank for funding the program that makes housing more affordable for Vermonters.” Douglas' campaign said he supported the funding by signing the budgets that contained them.

Defeated Tenn. candidate backs GOP foe

All apparently is forgiven between two Republicans who battled it out for the Senate nomination in Tennessee. Former congressman Ed Bryant, whose campaign called Bob Corker the “king of lies” and a fraud, is featured in a new TV ad endorsing Corker, the nominee.

DOJ_NMG_0083225

“Bob Corker and I had a bit of a spirited primary for the United States Senate, but you know, there wasn't a day I didn't respect Bob,” Bryant says in the ad airing statewide. Michael Powell, adviser to Rep. Harold Ford, the Democratic candidate, said, “The only thing we are left to ask is, when was Bob Corker's new spokesman lying about Bob Corker's character — in the primary ads he paid for, or the one Bob Corker is paying for?”

McCain: More Troops Needed In Iraq (AP)

By Mike Glover

AP, October 19, 2006

McCain says more troops needed to quell 'classic insurgency'

DES MOINES, Iowa - Arizona Sen. John McCain on Wednesday said more combat troops are needed in Iraq to quell a "classic insurgency," and he rejected calls to reduce U.S. troop levels in the country.

"A lot of mistakes have been made in Iraq and they've been well documented," McCain told reporters. "That doesn't change the fact that, in my view, we cannot fail."

McCain spoke before a luncheon fundraiser at which he raised $40,000 for Republican congressional candidate Jeff Lamberti, who is challenging Democratic U.S. Rep. Leonard Boswell in central Iowa's 3rd District.

At his news conference, McCain conceded that his argument for sending more troops to Iraq runs counter to what many other politicians are saying.

"My view, which is clearly a minority view, has been for a long period of time that we need more troops on the ground," said McCain. "I don't think it's a civil war, but the level of sectarian violence is too high, it's way too high and it has to be reduced."

McCain argued that the only way to lower the level of violence is to boost the American military presence.

"We need to put down what is now a classic insurgency," he said. "If we set a date for withdrawal, it would have consequences that would mean the situation would quickly deteriorate into a chaotic one and chaos would spread to the region."

In addition to raising money, McCain also planned to tour an ethanol plant with Lamberti in the central portion of the state as he tested the waters for a run at the Republican presidential nomination.

His views on ethanol have shifted slightly as he begins to focus on Iowa's leadoff precinct caucuses, which launch the presidential nominating season.

"I think ethanol is a very important part of our effort to reduce our dependence on foreign oil," said McCain.

When the price of oil soared past $40 a barrel, ethanol began to make financial sense and McCain said he favored encouraging the industry _ within limits.

"I do not support subsidies for ethanol," said McCain. "I think they can stand on their own feet."

Democrats quickly seized on the issue, noting votes Lamberti had made opposing requirements that ethanol be added to gasoline.

"The McCain-Lamberti event is an election year stunt that does nothing but underscore Lamberti's checkered past when it comes to ethanol," said Boswell spokesman Mark Daley.

McCain sought the Republican nomination in the 2000 election cycle, but he skipped the Iowa caucuses to focus on New Hampshire's leadoff primary. That won't be the case should he decide to again seek the nomination, McCain said.

"When I ran last time I was the outsider and we had a very limited amount of funds and staff, and we had to focus our efforts on New Hampshire," said McCain. "The Iowa caucuses are a vital aspect of the election process."

McCain said he will make a decision about seeking the nomination early next year.

'Dramatic Change Of Direction' Coming For Iraq (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

The escalating violence raking Baghdad and other Iraqi cities is pushing that nation's leaders, neighboring Arab countries and U.S. advisers to consider a dramatic change of direction in the conduct of the war.

Leaks from a U.S. task force headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III are contributing to the widespread sense that the Bush administration is preparing for a "course correction" in the coming months.

The options cited most frequently in Washington include the partition of Iraq into three ethnic- or faith-based regions, and a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops, with some remaining in neighboring countries to deal with major threats.

Another scenario is being discussed -- and taken seriously in Iraq -- by many of Iraq's leading political players, under which the U.S.-trained army would overthrow struggling Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and replace him with a strongman who would restore order while Washington looks the other way.

DOJ_NMG_0083226

Falah Hassan al-Naqib, a Sunni politician who served as minister of the interior in the interim government led by Iyad Allawi until last year, told The Washington Times he has met repeatedly with American and Iraqi generals to discuss alternative courses of action.

"All of them have a 'Plan B,' because if the situation continues as it is, they will have to defend themselves -- not just find bodies all over," Mr. al-Naqib said this summer at his house in Baghdad.

Mayhem has continued in Baghdad despite a U.S. decision to redeploy some 8,000 U.S. troops into the capital over the summer. Officials yesterday reported the deaths of 10 American troops across the country, putting October on track to be the deadliest month in almost two years.

On Monday, The Washington Times reported that Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, was "more sober" and "more concerned" about the ability of the Iraqi security forces when he privately briefed senior military and civilian leaders in Washington last week. Defense sources said he had appeared more upbeat over the winter about the Iraqi security force's progress.

The sources said, however, Gen. Casey was not pessimistic and still thinks the U.S. will win in Iraq. Gen. Casey's spokesman said the general thinks the Iraqi security forces have made great progress and are on track to take over more counterinsurgency missions.

Others in the Bush administration have contributed to the sense that the al-Maliki government has been put on a short leash, with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice saying on a trip to the region Oct. 6 that Iraqi leaders "don't have time for endless debates on these issues. ... They have really got to move forward."

Days before that, Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, said on CNN that the Iraqi government, "in the course of the next two months, has to make progress in terms of containing sectarian violence."

Similarly, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, told reporters after a trip to Baghdad this month that Congress will have to make "bold decisions" if the Iraqi government does not bring the sectarian killings under control.

Even Mr. Baker, whose bipartisan commission is expected to hand its recommendations to the Bush administration after the congressional elections, said on ABC's "This Week" that "I happen to think, and I think it's fair to say our commission believes, that there are alternatives between the stated alternatives ... of stay the course and cut and run."

President Bush reassured Mr. al-Maliki in a telephone call on Monday that there was no deadline hanging over his administration, but that has done little to quell the speculation.

The most talked-about scenarios for a "Plan B" include:

·Phased withdrawal: Under this plan, U.S. troops would be gradually withdrawn over a period of months and a reserve force would be redeployed elsewhere in the region.

"Our troops have become the primary target of the insurgency," argued Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, who laid out a plan for an immediate withdrawal in November. "They are united against U.S. forces and we have become a catalyst for violence. ... I believe with a U.S. troop redeployment, the Iraqi security forces will be incentivized to take control."

He proposed the creation of a "quick reaction force" and an "over-the-horizon presence" of Marines in the region to deal with urgent problems such as signs that al Qaeda was gaining control of an area.

Similar arguments have been made by Richard A. Clarke, who provided national security advice to the last four presidents, and Edward N. Luttwak, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

CBS reporter David Martin recently quoted a source in the Baker commission saying the group may recommend a scheme under which 5 percent of U.S. troops are withdrawn from Iraq every two months.

Opponents of the plan -- including most Iraqis -- argue that without a strong U.S. troop presence, the country would quickly fall into a vicious civil war and terrorists would be able to establish safe havens from which to harass neighboring U.S. allies.

·Partition: Under this plan, notably advocated by Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, Iraq would be divided into Sunni, Shi'ite and Kurdish regions, each enjoying a high degree of autonomy.

A viable central government would remain responsible for border defense, foreign policy, oil production and revenues under the scheme worked out by Mr. Biden and Leslie H. Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations.

While acknowledging that decentralization would not immediately end the problem of murderous militias affiliated with the various political parties, Mr. Biden argued in a May 1 speech in Philadelphia that this was the best way to begin rolling them back. "The regions can become magnets for the militia, integrating them into local forces, and eventually into the national force."

This solution would win quick acceptance from the Kurds, who already enjoy a high degree of autonomy in their oil-rich northern region and have little interest in what happens in Baghdad.

Many Shi'ites -- who control the southern oil fields -- would also welcome the arrangement, and this month pushed through a new law opening the door to the establishment of an autonomous region in the south.

DOJ_NMG_0083227

The Sunnis, stuck in the middle of the country with no oil and few other resources, could be brought along with a constitutional amendment guaranteeing them 20 percent of all present and future oil revenues, argued Mr. Biden, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

"That's ... far more than they'd get otherwise, since the oil is in the north and south, not the Sunni center."

Mr. Baker, however, has already expressed skepticism about the idea, noting that there is no easy way to divide up Baghdad and other major population centers like Kirkuk, where ethnic and religious groupings are closely intermingled.

There are also fears that an autonomous Shi'ite region would quickly fall into the orbit of Iran, while the Sunni region would be ungovernable, offering a safe haven for al Qaeda and related terrorist groups to mount attacks on U.S. allies like Saudi Arabia and Jordan.

·Coup in Baghdad: While given little credence in Washington, this scenario is being widely talked about in Iraq and in neighboring countries, both on the streets and among senior political and military officials.

According to the scenario, the new U.S.-trained army, along with elements of Saddam Hussein's Ba'athist-led army, would stage a coup to oust the al-Maliki government and replace it with one led by a more effective figure -- by most accounts Mr. Allawi.

One Iraqi Sunni living in Dubai, who is in close contact with Sunni generals in exile in both the United Arab Emirates and Saudi Arabia, said those generals have been discussing such a "Plan B" with secular Shi'ites and U.S. officials for months.

These officers reportedly are convinced that Miss Rice has been discussing such ideas during a series of visits to Saudi Arabia over the past eight months.

Mr. Allawi, a secular Shi'ite who led the government before the 2005 legislative elections, is known as a strong man with backing from both secular Shi'ites and Sunnis tired of the sectarian killings. The politician also is liked by U.S. intelligence agencies, which were disappointed that his party was unable to win more seats in the parliamentary elections.

"The army scenario is not a bad scenario for the United States," said Robert Killebrew, a retired Army infantry colonel and national security analyst who predicted civil war in Iraq more than a year ago. "U.S. policy issues in the Middle East and Iraq do not require a democratic Iraq, it only requires a stable and friendly Iraq," he said.

Under this scenario, the Dubai-based Sunni source said, the army would gradually bring back elements of Saddam's former army, removing a major grievance that is driving the insurgency.

"The insurgency will come under control as most of them are concerned with keeping Iraq as one country. This is the most important for them and for the surrounding Arab countries," said the former officer.

According to most coup talk, the United States would publicly condemn the move but support the new government after a decent interval.

"My preference would be that there would be a certain amount of sanctimonious hand-wringing and saying that we don't agree with the overthrow of a democratically elected government," said Mr. Killebrew. "But we will continue to support the Iraqis in their fight against the insurgency, which would be de facto support."

Our Strategy Is Not Static (USAT)

By Mark Kimmitt

USA Today, October 19, 2006

Most militaries know that success in war argues against an inflexible approach to strategy and tactics. Militaries that remain foolishly consistent and unable to react to an evolving tactical environment are likely to fail. The enemy we face in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere in the war on terrorism is a thinking enemy, and a thinking enemy will always seek to find an operational advantage, a seam in our defenses, or a weakness in our plan and tactics.

That is not happening. Since the beginning of combat operations in Iraq in March 2003, coalition forces have continuously adapted to a changing environment, not only to respond and react to a thinking enemy, but to also develop better tactics to defeat the enemy's own seams, weaknesses and disadvantages.

Some have gone so far as to suggest that our forces are simply reacting to the evolving tactics of the enemy. Quite the opposite; operations in Iraq are developed from a position of advantage and superiority and do not cede initiative, nor innovation, to the enemy.

We are empowering Iraqi security forces to take on more and more of the security responsibilities, and helping to strengthen Iraq's unity government. The permanent, democratically elected government has been in place for fewer than 150 days, while most of the Iraqi battalions in the field today have existed for fewer than two years.

The idea that coalition forces have pursued a static tactical policy in Iraq is a myth and a disservice to our innovative, creative and adaptable troops. Our troops know that the fight in 2006 is far different from the fight in 2003, and they know the importance of changing their tactics correspondingly. They know that victory in the field goes to the best trained, the best equipped and the smartest force, and the high price to be paid if they do not adapt and prevail. They know that, tactically, staying the course is the wrong way to defeat an enemy, but they also recognize that consistency in strategic guidance, combined with patience and persistence to see the job through, is the right way to win.

DOJ_NMG_0083228

U.S. Toll Soars As Fight For City Rages (USAT)

By Rick Jervis And Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, October 19, 2006

CAMP TAJI, Iraq — A U.S. and Iraqi offensive to wrest control of Baghdad from insurgents and sectarian death squads is producing some of the most intense fighting of the war and a spike in American deaths.

The U.S. command reported Wednesday that 10 American troops had been killed the day before in Iraq, making it one of the deadliest days for U.S. forces this year. Another soldier was killed Wednesday, bringing the death toll this month to 70.

At least a third of the recent fatalities happened in Baghdad. At the current pace, October would be the deadliest month since November 2004 when 137 troops died.

Much of the violence in the capital is religious warfare, putting U.S. forces in a sensitive position between warring factions.

"It's been a tough month," said Col. James Pasquarette, a brigade commander headquartered at this base about 12 miles north of Baghdad. "We haven't had this sectarian issue in the past. It's more intense than in past years."

Sectarian death squads don't typically target U.S. convoys, said Maj. Brandon Newton, with the 7th Squadron, 10th Calvary Regiment near Baghdad.

But U.S. patrols are dispatched to intervene between warring sects, sometimes parking themselves at night between Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods and exposing their patrols to roadside bombs, he said.

"We're fighting some bad people," he said.

After going five months without a death, the squadron lost eight soldiers this month, said Lt. Col. David Thompson, the squadron's commander.

Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, a spokesman for coalition troops in Baghdad, said U.S. and Iraqi forces are aggressively clearing areas of the city.

"We're very successful right now, and the enemy is pushing back," Withington said.

About 15,000 coalition troops and 45,000 Iraqi police and soldiers are engaged in the Baghdad fight.

Some of the increased violence in Baghdad and other parts of Iraq is related to the holy month of Ramadan, when religious fervor is high.

The U.S. military said attacks this year have increased 20% during the holy month compared with the weeks leading up to Ramadan. Ramadan ends this weekend.

In a continuing effort to find a political solution to the religious warfare, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki consulted Wednesday with Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, an influential Shiite spiritual leader, and Muqtada al-Sadr, an anti-American Shiite cleric, the Associated Press reported.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said the spike in deaths would not make President Bush reconsider his options in Iraq.

"His strategy is to win. The president understands not only the difficulty of it, but he grieves for the people who have served with valor," Snow said.

Soldiers at a forward operating base north of Baghdad said the deaths are a sobering reminder of the dangers that loom for them outside the razor-wire confines of their base.

"It hurts. It hurts deeply," said Staff Sgt. John Calhoun, 41.

"We're the only family we all have out here. And when we lose our brothers, it hurts."

Provincial Intelligence Director Among Latest Iraqi Deaths (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi And Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

BAGHDAD — At least 10 U.S. troops were killed in five combat episodes during a 24-hour period ending Tuesday, the U.S. military announced today.

The latest casualties bring to 69 the number of U.S. military personnel killed in October, according to icasualties.org, a website that tracks deaths in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

At least seven Iraqis were killed and 30 were injured today in attacks targeting U.S. and Iraqi security forces and sectarian gang killings targeting civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0083229

A roadside bomb killed the director of intelligence for the Amara province in southern Iraq. Four of his guards were also killed.

Tribal elders and political leaders also attempted to cool tempers at a summit in the Salahuddin province, near the city of Balad, the site in recent days of one of the country's worst outbreaks of sectarian violence.

The latest deaths put October on track to be the deadliest for U.S. troops in Iraq since November 2004, when Marines stormed the insurgent-controlled city of Fallouja in a weeks-long ground offensive. The current month coincides with the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which has been a time of sharp increases in attacks in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003.

"We expected the attacks to rise during Ramadan," said Lt.. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a spokesman for the U.S. military.

Six of the U.S. soldiers died in three separate roadside bomb and small-arms attacks around Baghdad. Another three, attached to the 3rd Brigade of the Army's 4th Infantry Division, were killed as a result of unspecified enemy action in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad. A fourth soldier was wounded in the incident.

A Marine assigned to Regimental Combat Team 7 died in a hostile fire incident in Al Anbar province, the Sunni Arab insurgent stronghold west of the capital.

The trial of Saddam Hussein and his co-defendants on charges of committing genocide against Iraq's Kurdish population in the late 1980s resumed today despite the continued absence of defense attorneys boycotting the trial. An unidentified Kurdish victim recounted a tale of his escape from the firing squad.

Trapped on a truck, listening to the gunshots and screams of other victims, the witness and others plotted to overtake the guards, with the strongest leading the charge.

"Maybe three or four of us will be killed but the others will survive," the witness recounted.

As the guards opened the door to the bus, one of the victims lashed out but was shot and killed. After a scuffle, the guards opened fire on the truck, killing several people.

The witness said he fainted. The next thing he realized was that bodies fell on top of him, he said, describing what he at first thought was the sound of water.

"It was a scary sound," he said, quickly realizing it was the sound of gurgling blood.

He was tossed into a ditch full of bodies. "I fell on a body," he said. "He was still alive. It was his last breath."

The guards continued shooting as he ran away. The witness said he took off clothes as he ran because "the skin has the same color as the sand" and he didn't want the guards to detect him.

It was a full moon and as the man made his way through the desert, he saw it was full of mounds that he believes were mass graves.

"I ran and ran," he said. "I saw light in the distance and ran toward the light."

At 4 a.m., the witness reached a house where he asked for help and food, which he was given. Eventually, he made his way to the Kurdish city of Irbil, where he hid until 1991, when Hussein lost authority over northern Iraq after the Persian Gulf War.

Death Toll Mounts For US Forces In Iraq (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, October 19, 2006

American forces are coming under increased attack in Iraq as October shapes up to be one of the worst months for US casualties during the war.

The deaths of nine soldiers and one marine on Tuesday raised the US death toll for October to 71, putting the month on course to be the third worst for military fatalities since the 2003 invasion. According to Pentagon figures, the military lost 137 troops in November 2004 – the worst month so far in the war – and 135 in April 2004.

US military commanders have attributed the latest rise in military deaths to increased violence during Ramadan in addition to US forces more actively engaging insurgent groups and sectarian death squads, particularly in Baghdad.

The rise in US deaths comes as Republicans come under mounting pressure over the war, which has claimed the lives of almost 2,800 troops. Increased anxiety about Iraq has placed the Grand Old Party in jeopardy of losing control of one, or possibly both, houses of Congress.

Aside from deaths, the US has suffered more than 21,077 casualties in Iraq, with more than 9,500 of those troops injured so badly that they did not return to action.

President George W. Bush has repeatedly argued that Iraq is making political progress and that the US will stay the course.

But his administration is becoming increasingly frustrated at the apparent inability of the Iraqi government to stem the rise in bloodshed, particularly in Baghdad where up to 10,000 US troops are working with 44,000 Iraqi forces. Senior Republicans have recently been more vocal in questioning the administration's strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0083230

General John Abizaid, the top US commander in the Middle East, in July told Congress that reducing violence in Baghdad was key to avoiding civil war. But since his testimony, the number of military deaths in Iraq has greatly accelerated.

General Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs, last week said sectarian violence was now the biggest problem in Iraq. He said coalition forces had reduced violence by about 50 per cent in the 50 sectors of Baghdad that they have "cleared" with Iraqi forces. But in a sign of the difficulty in curbing the violence in the Iraqi capital, he acknowledged that sectarian death squads remained active at night even in those areas.

Donald Rumsfeld, the US defence secretary who famously described the initial insurgency as a bunch of "dead-enders" and is coming under heavier criticism for his handling of the war, on Tuesday repeated his mantra that the war cannot be lost "militarily".

The US public is losing patience with Mr Bush over the rising violence, which has prevented the Pentagon from reducing troop numbers from the current level of about 140,000 to 100,000 by the end of this year.

A recent CNN poll found that 64 per cent of respondents disapproved of the way Mr Bush is handling the war, with 64 per cent also opposing the war. Fifty-one per cent said Democrats would do a better job of handling the war.

· President George W. Bush compared Iraq and the Vietnam war for the first time when he said Thomas Friedman, a New York Times writer, "could be right" in saying the violence in Iraq was the "jihadist equivalent of the Tet offensive".

"There is certainly a stepped-up level of violence and we're heading into an election," Mr Bush told ABC News. The Tet offensive helped turn US public opinion against the war, and led to President Lyndon Johnson deciding to abandon his re-election bid. A White House spokeswoman said Mr Bush was only trying to make the point that "the enemy is trying to affect the psyche of Americans".

One-Day Iraq Toll Is Highest For U.S. In Many Months (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 18 -- A roadside bombing and other attacks killed 10 American troops across Iraq on Tuesday, the U.S. military reported Wednesday, making it the deadliest day of combat for U.S. forces in 10 months.

The one-day toll, part of what the U.S. military has said is a 43 percent increase in attacks on U.S. and Iraqi forces in the capital since midsummer, occurred as casualties among Iraqi troops and civilians are soaring far higher than at any previous time in the war, according to U.S. and Iraqi tallies.

The deaths underscore the surging nature of sectarian violence and the increasing lethality of roadside bombs, which claim the most American lives in Iraq despite efforts to bolster armor and use high-technology devices to disable bombs.

Five of the American troop deaths Tuesday were caused by bombs. Four soldiers were killed in Baghdad about 6:50 a.m. when a planted bomb exploded under their vehicle, the U.S. military said in a statement. Another bomb killed a single soldier north of the capital.

Three soldiers died in combat east of Baghdad, in Diyala province, the military said. One soldier was killed in north Baghdad when armed men attacked his patrol, and a Marine died in combat in the predominantly Sunni province of Anbar, in western Iraq. Since the summer, Baghdad has surpassed Anbar as the most hostile place in the country for U.S. and Iraqi forces.

Tuesday's deaths, along with the death of an American soldier in Baghdad by small-arms fire on Wednesday, brought the number of total U.S. troop fatalities for October to 70, including 67 killed in action.

One hundred and twenty-five American troops were killed in action in November 2004, and 126 were killed in action in April 2004, during U.S. offensives in Najaf and Fallujah.

The Iraqi victims of violence on Wednesday included 30 men whose bodies were found dumped around Baghdad after they had been blindfolded, cuffed and shot, the Interior Ministry said. Ministry officials said most had also been tortured, which often involves puncturing victims' skulls, torsos and limbs with electric drills. The victims were all under 30, the ministry said.

The deaths reported by officials and published in the news media represent only a fraction of the thousands of mutilated bodies winding up in Baghdad's overcrowded morgue each month. U.S. and morgue officials say 90 percent of the killings are now carried out execution-style, with repeated shots to the head and body, usually after the victim had been kidnapped and tortured.

Most bodies are found dumped on Baghdad's streets each morning after a night of curfew, when only government security forces are supposed to be out.

Bodies are increasingly being dumped in and around Baghdad in fields staked out by individual Shiite militias and Sunni insurgent groups. Iraqi security forces often refuse to go to the dumping grounds, leaving the precise number of bodies in those sites unknown.

DOJ_NMG_0083231

Civilian deaths, unlike those of American troops, often go unrecorded. No count exists of all the civilians killed in the spiraling violence since U.S.-led forces entered Iraq. President Bush earlier this year put the number at 30,000 but gave no sources. Indices drawing only on the deaths reported by news organizations put the figure closer to 50,000.

A study published last week in the Lancet medical journal in Britain estimated the true toll was 655,000. Researchers derived their figure from surveys of Iraqis, who were asked to show death certificates to verify deaths in their families caused by the war. The methodology of that survey has been challenged.

U.S. Defense Department statistics show average daily Iraqi troop casualties jumped to 120 in the three months ending September, up from 80 in the previous quarter.

In September, 2,667 Iraqis were killed in Baghdad alone; the government has yet to release last month's figures for all of Iraq.

U.S. officials sought Wednesday to bolster support for the war.

"It will be long, and it will be hard. I wish it were otherwise," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said in a speech at Maxwell-Gunter Air Force Base in Montgomery, Ala. "Certainly, seeing the violence on television is a temptation for people to wonder: How will it end?"

"There are those who say, Well, it is somebody else's problem," he said. But he voiced confidence that "the wave of violence" in Iraq will ultimately be defeated, saying Iraqi security forces are growing more capable.

Rumsfeld described a recent meeting at Bethesda Navy hospital with a wounded Marine who had served in Iraq as an embedded trainer with the Iraqi military. "If the American people will just give us time," he quoted the Marine as saying.

Asked whether the 10 deaths Tuesday would make Bush reconsider his plans for Iraq, White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "No, his plan is to win."

"The president understands not only the difficulty of it, but he grieves for the people who have served with valor," Snow said in Washington. "But as everybody says correctly, we've got to win. And that comes at a cost."

Some U.S. military leaders in Iraq have said they are puzzled by the rise in violence since midsummer. Military spokesmen attribute the most recent climb to a typical increase in attacks during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan and say they expect the toll to drop when Ramadan ends in coming days.

"It's a dangerous place, and we're trying to mitigate the risk," Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad, said Wednesday.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who heads a government led by Shiite religious parties, traveled to Najaf on Wednesday to seek consensus with two of the country's most influential Shiite leaders about quelling the skyrocketing sectarian violence.

"I came so that the security and political situation can be stabilized, allowing the government to turn its attention to reconstruction," Maliki told reporters between meetings with Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who commands one of the country's most powerful political blocs and militias.

At Maliki's request, the U.S. military freed a Sadr official in Baghdad whom it had held overnight, U.S. and Iraqi officials said. Ali al-Dabbagh, a spokesman for Maliki, said the official was innocent. Aides said the official was a Sadr office manager in the heavily Shiite Baghdad neighborhood of Shoula.

Maliki has blocked U.S. military moves toward a crackdown on Sadr's militia as a whole. "The issue of militias should be solved politically," Dabbagh said in a telephone interview Wednesday.

Staff writer Ann Scott Tyson in Washington and special correspondents Saad al-Izzi in Baghdad and Saad Sarhan in Najaf contributed to this report.

11 More U.S. Troops Reported Killed In Iraq (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, October 19, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - The U.S. military announced Wednesday that 11 American troops had been killed in Iraq since Tuesday, mostly in Baghdad, the apparent result of the United States' latest attempt to quell intensifying violence in the capital.

So far, 70 American troops have been killed in Iraq this month. If the death toll continues at this rate, the monthly tally will be the highest since November 2004, when the U.S. military staged an offensive on the Iraqi city of Fallujah and the number of Americans killed during the month was 137.

U.S. troops increasingly have been patrolling the streets and conducting house-to-house sweeps in the capital in an attempt to stop the sectarian violence, which in some places has divided neighborhoods street by street. The troops have helped clean up streets littered with garbage and in some places the remnants of car bombings, and they've encouraged shop owners to reopen their businesses.

DOJ_NMG_0083232

But the security plan, in place since the summer, hasn't produced evidence of significant improvements. Securing Baghdad is the linchpin of sustaining the Iraqi government and allowing American forces to leave, many experts say.

The plan also has exposed some of the weaknesses of handing over operations to Iraqi security forces. So far they haven't appeared prepared to tackle the burgeoning sectarian violence.

On Wednesday, at least another 29 Iraqis' bodies were found throughout the capital, including three in the southern Baghdad neighborhood of Dora and two in Shaab, in eastern Baghdad, two of the areas that U.S forces targeted in the security sweeps.

Police think residents often are killed in one neighborhood and their bodies dumped in another. Although statistics in Iraq are no longer reliable, police reports collected from the top provinces show that nearly 800 Iraqis have been killed so far this month.

In a recent military operation in Baghdad, Iraqi forces, who were supposed to take the lead, leaned heavily on U.S. troops for guidance. Many Sunni Muslim residents said they allowed the mostly Shiite Muslim Iraqi security forces to search their homes only because American troops accompanied them.

The early stages of the operation yielded few arrests or weapons, prompting many to think that the insurgency had left the targeted communities. Wednesday's announcement suggested that they were moving back in.

The latest attacks on American troops began just before 7 a.m. Tuesday when four soldiers died west of Baghdad in a roadside bomb attack. Two hours later, a soldier was killed when his convoy was attacked in northern Baghdad. Another soldier died Tuesday afternoon north of the capital in a roadside bomb attack.

Three soldiers from the 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team, 4th Infantry Division, were killed Tuesday during combat in the northeastern province of Diyala, which is nearly evenly split between Sunnis and Shiites and where violence is high.

In the Sunni province of Anbar, a Marine from Regimental Combat Team 7 was killed during fighting.

A soldier died Wednesday afternoon in southern Baghdad during small-arms fighting.

"We work to mitigate risks to our forces every day while aggressively conducting operations in support of the government of Iraq to bring security to the people of Iraq," U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Christopher Garver said Wednesday in a statement.

11 U.S. Troops Killed In Combat As October Toll Hits 70 (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Eleven more U.S. troops were slain in combat, the military said yesterday, putting this month on track to be the deadliest for U.S. forces since the siege of Fallujah nearly two years ago.

The military says the sharp increase in U.S. casualties -- 70 this month -- is tied to Ramadan and a security crackdown that has left American forces more vulnerable to attack in Baghdad and its suburbs. Muslim tenets hold that fighting a foreign occupation force during Islam's holy month puts a believer especially close to God.

As the death toll climbed for both U.S. forces and Iraqi civilians, who are being killed at a rate of 43 a day, the country's Shi'ite-dominated government remained under intense U.S. pressure to shut down Shi'ite militias.

Some members of the armed groups have fractured into uncontrolled, roaming death squads out for revenge against Sunni Arabs, the Muslim minority in Iraq, who were politically and socially dominant until the fall of Saddam Hussein in 2003.

There have been signs in recent days of mounting strain between Washington and the wobbly government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who felt compelled during a conversation with President Bush this week to seek his assurances that the Americans were not going to dump him.

Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari yesterday blamed American officials who had overseen Iraq before its own government took nominal control for bringing the country to the present state of chaos.

"Had our friends listened to us, we would not be where we are today," Mr. Zebari said in an interview.

Asked which friends he was referring to, he said: "The Americans, the Coalition [Provisional Authority], the British. OK? Because they didn't listen to us. They did exactly what they wanted to do. ... Had they listened to us, we would have been someplace else [by now], really."

Despite the climbing death toll, the U.S. military says it is making progress in taming runaway violence in the capital as it engages insurgents, militias and sectarian death squads, rounds up suspects, and uncovers weapons caches and masses of stockpiled explosives.

The latest American death occurred yesterday, when a soldier was killed after his patrol was attacked by small-arms fire south of Baghdad. Ten Americans were killed Tuesday -- nine soldiers and a Marine -- the highest single-day combat death toll for U.S. forces since Jan. 5, when 11 service members were killed across Iraq. There have been days with a higher number of U.S. deaths, but not solely from combat.

DOJ_NMG_0083233

October is on track to be the deadliest month for U.S. forces in Iraq since November 2004, when military offenses primarily in the then-insurgent stronghold of Fallujah, 40 miles west of Baghdad, left 137 troops dead, 126 of them in combat.

"It breaks my heart because behind every casualty is somebody with tears in their eyes," Mr. Bush told ABC News. "I think the hardest part of the presidency is to meet with families who've lost their loved one."

With Iraq becoming a major issue in the Nov. 7 midterm elections in the United States, White House spokesman Tony Snow was asked whether the rising toll would cause Mr. Bush to alter course.

"No, his strategy is to win," Mr. Snow said. "The president understands not only the difficulty of it, but he grieves for the people who have served with valor."

Marines Plan To Recall Some Battalions (AP-Y)

By Robert Burns, Ap Military Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

The Marines are drawing up plans to send back to Iraq at least some reserve combat battalions that have already served one tour there, officials said Wednesday — the first time such units would be returned to the war.

The plan to remobilize those reserve forces is designed to relieve some of the growing strain on active-duty Marines.

A Marine Corps spokesman, Lt. Col. Scott Fazekas, said Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld gave the Marines the go-ahead to conduct detailed planning on how the battalion reactivations would be done. Initially, Fazekas said Rumsfeld had approved the plan itself. Later he said the approval was for detailed planning.

Eric Ruff, a spokesman for Rumsfeld, said Wednesday evening that no specific proposals have been presented to Rumsfeld. "The Marines are reviewing a range of options and concepts for future consideration by the secretary and, to date, nothing has been approved," Ruff said.

The Army, which is organized differently than the Marine Corps, has not sent any of its National Guard combat brigades back to Iraq for a second tour, although it is considering making more use of the Guard. Both the Marines and Army have sent reserve support units and active-duty forces to Iraq multiple times.

The return of Marine Reserve combat battalions to Iraq would begin in 2008, according to a senior Marine officer who discussed the subject on condition he not be identified because no official announcement has been made. Thus, the first picked to go back probably would be remobilized next year to train for the mission.

The plan, put forward by Gen. Michael Hagee, the Marine commandant, could be modified as the situation in Iraq changes, officials said. For planning purposes, the Marines are working out future force rotations that would include at least one Reserve combat battalion starting in 2008.

The Marines have decided to take this unusual step in order to alleviate a problem that both the Marines and the Army are wrestling with as the Iraq war rages on unabated: wear-and-tear on the active-duty troops, who are getting far less time at home to recuperate and retrain than military leaders would like.

The short respites between combat tours are not only a morale issue but also an obstacle to providing soldiers and Marines with sufficiently varied training and adequate time to attend professional development schools.

The Marines, for example, are not doing as much training for large-scale, high-intensity combat — combining their air, land and sea forces — as they normally would do, officials said. They do, however, have the time to do high-intensity combat training on a smaller scale, in addition to counterinsurgency training for Iraq missions.

The Marines have 24 active-duty combat battalions. At any given time, nine of them are in Iraq.

To increase the amount of time between deployments, the Marines have decided to make more use of their reserve combat battalions, of which there are nine. The main restriction the Marine Corps faces is a 24-month limit on the amount of time a reservist can be mobilized, so those who were on active duty for more than 12 months the first time will not be remobilized, since the planned mobilizations would be for 12 months, Fazekas said.

The Marine plan does not represent a change in the 24-month policy, which is set by the partial mobilization order signed by President Bush in 2001. It pertains to deployments for Iraq, Afghanistan and other places deemed part of the global war on terrorism.

Marine battalions typically serve seven-month tours in Iraq. Marine Reserve units are mobilized for 12 months, to include pre-deployment training, seven months in Iraq and then a period of demobilization.

The Marines have not yet decided which of the nine Marine Reserve battalions would be the first to be recalled for another tour in Iraq, Fazekas said.

DOJ_NMG_0083234

He said officials would examine which battalion is best prepared for a second combat tour, based on the number of Marine reserves in its ranks who are still eligible for mobilization, the condition of the unit's equipment, the state of its training and other factors.

The last of the nine Marine Reserve combat battalions to serve in Iraq is the 1st Battalion, 24th Marines, based in Michigan and Ohio. The battalion is operating in the Fallujah area in western Anbar province.

Militias Splintering Into Radicalized Cells (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The young Shiite men, some wearing black masks, glided from house to house in search of Sunni Muslim men. They arrived at the two-story dwelling of Mohammed Hussein clutching a bomb, neighbors said. As his mother stood at the front gate, they detonated it. Shrapnel and glass flew, sending her to the hospital. A wall fell on a neighbor, sending him to his grave.

Hussein, who is Sunni, arrived home an hour later and immediately blamed a man called Aziz Dinar. Residents in this western Baghdad neighborhood of Hurriyah -- in Arabic, it means freedom -- said Dinar heads the local office of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr and elements of his militia, the Mahdi Army.

"We know he is behind all the incidents taking place in Hurriyah," Hussein, 29, a civil servant, said with confidence. "He is the one who destroyed our house."

But in an interview, a leader in Sadr's movement in western Baghdad denied knowing Dinar. "This Aziz Dinar does not represent us in Hurriyah. There are other representatives," said Abdul Hadi al-Mohammadawi. "I have never heard of him."

In the void forged by the sectarian tensions gripping Baghdad, militias are further splintering into smaller, more radicalized cells, signifying a new and potentially more volatile phase in the struggle for the capital.

Iraqis and U.S. officials blame militias for mass kidnappings and slayings, for setting up unauthorized checkpoints and for causing much of the recent carnage.

Senior U.S. military and intelligence officials say they have identified at least 23 militias -- some are Sunni, but most are Shiite. Some are paramilitary offshoots of the Mahdi Army or have broken away entirely from Sadr's command structure. Others seem inspired by Lebanon's Shiite Hezbollah guerrilla movement.

"In some ways it makes it easier for me because I have digestible doses I can deal with that might not be reinforcing one another," a senior U.S. military official said at a recent briefing with reporters, speaking on condition of anonymity. "But at the same time, it creates problems for me because it is harder to find them when they are splintered, to identify who they are."

The new breed of militias embody the changed texture of violence in the fourth year of war -- from attacks against Baathists and loyalists of former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein, to attacks on average Iraqis purely because of their sect or their wealth. They appear more localized and more ruthless than their predecessors. They deploy death squads and explode bombs to destroy houses. They have carved neighborhoods into fiefdoms, governing through fear and intimidation.

The fragmentation poses new obstacles to U.S. and Iraqi forces trying to quell the sectarian strife that U.S. commanders fear could plunge the nation into civil war. Militias have already replaced the Sunni Arab insurgency as the biggest challenge to U.S. efforts to bring stability to Iraq. Senior U.S. military officials privately acknowledge they do not have the manpower to conduct urban sweeps in every neighborhood or prevent areas they have cleared from again becoming havens of lawlessness and killing.

Nowadays, in some parts of Baghdad, it is not uncommon to hear residents blame small militias, criminal gangs, rogue death squads or assassins for their woes -- instead of Iraq's two major militias, the Mahdi Army and the Badr Brigades, an arm of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a powerful Shiite religious party.

In the mostly Shiite neighborhood of al-Amil, the Haider Hamida gang rules. It has about 50 Shiite members, mostly young, jobless men from poor sections of the neighborhood, residents said. They orbit around shops, street corners and checkpoints. Many have ties to the Mahdi Army or are still members, residents said.

The gang is named after the pseudonym of its chief executioner, a short, skinny man in his early 20s with black hair and a thin moustache. Some residents said he was a member of a police commando unit. Both U.S. and Iraqi officials have expressed concern over the infiltration of Iraqi police units by militias and death squads. Hamida is said to have killed at least 100 people in recent months.

"We started hearing about his gang after Samarra. They became active after this incident," said Majid Abu Sara, 43, a Sunni resident of al-Amil, who asked that his full name not be used because he feared for his safety. He was referring to the February bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, about 65 miles north of Baghdad, that triggered cycles of sect-based revenge killings. Most of the other splinter groups also emerged after the attack.

DOJ_NMG_0083235

The Haider Hamida gang arrived at Abu Sara's parents' doorstep three months ago, he recalled. They placed an improvised bomb at the front door, near their car. Within seconds, the house and the car were engulfed in flames. Abu Sara's 90-year-old father, his 70-year-old mother and 10 other relatives fled out the back.

"They displaced them just because they are Sunni," said Abu Sara, describing the motive for the attack. "My parents have not gone back."

At a recent briefing with reporters, another senior U.S. military official carried a list of the 23 militias. He began to rattle off names -- "Iraqiya Hezbollah, Khadimiya Brigades" -- but an aide stopped him, noting that he was revealing vital intelligence.

In August, U.S. and Iraqi troops conducted house-to-house sweeps in the western neighborhood of Ghazaliya, part of its Operation Together Forward to bring security to the capital. At the time, U.S. officials asserted that there was progress in pushing out militias and insurgents, and bringing down violence.

But by September, after the sweeps, "we saw death squads at least come in," a senior coalition intelligence official said at a recent briefing with reporters, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity. The death squads had links to groups inside Iraqi government ministries, he said.

One reason for the militia splintering is that differences have emerged within Sadr's movement over his decision to join Iraq's political process. The senior coalition intelligence official said he knew of at least "six major players" who have left Sadr's movement because they no longer find him radical enough and see him as "too accommodating to the coalition."

Yet many of the new groups, described as rogue elements, continue to link themselves with the Mahdi Army.

"They will execute operations and obtain funding under the guise of Jaish al-Mahdi," said the senior coalition intelligence official, using the Arabic name for the Mahdi Army. "But they are effectively beyond his control," he said, referring to Sadr.

These groups represent a threat to Sadr's image and political aspirations at a time when he controls four government ministries and 30 seats in the Iraqi parliament.

"There are definitely lots of terrorists who have used the Sadr office to achieve their goals to ruin the reputation of this army which has struggled for the service of the people," said Mohammadawi. "The Sadr office is trying very hard to capture any terrorist elements which could harm the security of society and Iraq in general."

When gunmen in police cars and police uniforms raided the offices of an Iraqi satellite television channel, killing at least eight people, suspicion immediately fell on the Mahdi Army. Hours after the slayings, Sadr released a strongly worded statement warning that he would release the names and excommunicate any Mahdi Army militiamen who were conducting attacks against Iraqis.

The senior coalition intelligence official said he believed that Sadr was honestly trying to take control of his forces.

In neighborhoods such as al-Amil, the attacks have become bolder. Haider Hamida walks the streets without wearing a mask, said residents. Two months ago, he and some members of his gang stopped a car at a checkpoint and targeted a man who sold milk in the neighborhood, recalled Ahmed Abu Abdallah, another resident.

"Haider pulled him out of the car and they started hitting him with pistols on his head," said Abu Abdallah. "They put him in their truck and drove off." Later that day, the man's relatives found his body dumped less than a mile from the checkpoint.

U.S. officials are concerned that the Shiite splinter groups could reach out to the Shiite rulers in neighboring Iran for support. They share the same ideology, and Iran is eager to provide funding, said the senior coalition intelligence official.

"As time goes on, you're going to continue to see elements break off the organization and become sort of these semi-independent or independent players, but none of them remain independent for long," said the official. "They all find a sponsor."

In Hurriyah, Aziz Dinar acts as if he has strong backers. Residents said he has become wealthy through kidnapping for ransom and looting local stores. Poor youths from the neighborhood continue to sign up for his militia.

"He killed a couple of his own neighbors from his own street," said Hussein. "The whole area was surrounded by his men. They carried rocket-propelled grenades. The Iraqi army was in the neighborhood, but they did nothing.

"That day, he told people, 'I do whatever I like.' "

Ramadan Spent Behind Locked Doors (USAT)

By Zaid Sabah

USA Today, October 19, 2006

BAGHDAD — In better times, the faithful would be jammed shoulder-to-shoulder into the Al-Bakri Mosque in Baghdad's Khadra district for prayers during Ramadan. Streams of chanting worshipers, sometimes numbering as many as 500, would spill into the mosque's courtyard and the street outside.

On a recent Friday evening, the most important day for Ramadan prayers, 17 men stood in the mostly empty mosque. Seven of them were guards.

DOJ_NMG_0083236

"This is the worst Ramadan ever," said Ammar Ahmad, 22, one of the attendees. "We used to go out after breaking the fast and chat with friends, playing dominos and chess in the teahouses. All that's gone."

Ramadan, which began this year in late September and ends this weekend, is one of the holiest periods on the Muslim religious calendar. It is a time of daily fasting, prayers and peaceful introspection. The evenings are traditionally spent breaking the fast, visiting friends and strolling along neighborhood streets.

For the past several years in Iraq, violence has spiked during Ramadan, making it difficult for many people to go out as freely as they would like. This year, however, has been even worse. The religion-based nature of much of the violence, new curfews and random militia checkpoints have most people staying home behind locked doors, according to many people in Baghdad.

"Our major concern is the death squads and the dead bodies found daily tortured and executed," said Jehan Hashim, 60, a homemaker. "Even last year's Ramadan was better. We would go out by car, and there were no death-squad checkpoints."

The U.S. military warned that violence would spike. "Historical trends tell us that the attacks will generally increase by 20%" during Ramadan, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the top military spokesman in Iraq, said last week. "We assume it will still get worse before it gets better."

The sectarian nature of the violence has brought danger closer to home. Violence between Sunni and Shiite Muslims escalated after a Shiite shrine in Samarra was bombed in February.

Death-squad killings in Baghdad rose to 1,450 in September from 450 in February, according to U.S. military statistics.

The Iraqi government has imposed curfews. Car travel is barred in Baghdad from 9 p.m. to 6 a.m. Pedestrians have to stay off the streets from 11 p.m. to 6 a.m.

Sheik Abdel Karim al-Samarae, a leading cleric of the Sunni Islamic Party, said many mosques have been closed or occupied by Shiite militias. They've also had to stop handing out meals to the poor to break the daily fast, he said. Free distribution of the meals — called iftar — is a tradition.

"Ramadan this year has been hard on Iraqis," he said. "People's lives during Ramadan revolve around the mosque, and the militias have deprived us from them."

Ali Satar al-Zubeidi, a 20-year-old Shiite student, has good memories from past Ramadans: long evening strolls through parks with friends, talks with neighbors, relatives crowding into his parents' home for iftar.

"Now, no one visits because of the security situation," he said. "Now, you break your fast and you're stuck in front of the TV. It's our only entertainment. This Ramadan has no flavor at all."

Mohammed Khalil, who runs a pharmacy in Baghdad, said he took his family out last year after iftar to pick up pastries.

This year, they lock themselves inside their home after dark, he said. "Our traditions are vanishing day by day," Khalil said.

The 655,000 Fraud (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

"Ateam of American and Iraqi epidemiologists estimates that 655,000 more people have died in Iraq since coalition forces arrived in March 2003 than would have died if the invasion had not occurred."

So read a story in last week's Washington Post on the new John Hopkins-led study -- published in the British medical journal Lancet -- purporting to document "excess deaths" in Iraq. "We have no reason to question the findings," the Post quoted a Human Rights Watch official as saying. The article was fairly typical of reporting on the Lancet study, which has also been all over television and radio, as well as Internet sites such as Google and Yahoo! news.

All of which leaves us wondering if reporters and editors have enough sense anymore to ask basic questions about such enormous numbers, or whether they are simply too biased against the Bush Administration and its Iraq policy to do so. The 655,000 figure is more than 10 times higher than previous estimates of violent deaths in Iraq since the U.S. invasion, and it is larger than the number of Germans killed by allied bombing during all of World War II and larger than the number of Americans who died during our own Civil War.

While it's obvious that Iraq has a terrible problem with sectarian violence at the moment, we find it hard to believe killing on the scale of Antietam or Gettysburg has been going on without anybody having noticed until the statistical wizards from Johns Hopkins showed up.

The 655,000 figure turns out to be an extrapolation based on a very inadequate sampling process. Pollster Steven E. Moore, who has worked extensively in Iraq, pointed out in an op-ed on this page yesterday that the Lancet study is based on information from a mere 47 "cluster points" around Iraq and 1,849 total interviews.

By contrast, a 2004 U.N. survey of Iraq used 2,200 cluster points for more than 21,000 interviews. The Johns Hopkins researchers also appear to have collected no demographic data on their subjects, so the group cannot be compared to census data to check if it is representative. "I wouldn't survey a junior high school, no less an entire country, using only 47 cluster points," Mr. Moore wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0083237

Iraq Body Count -- a nonpartisan outfit that keeps track of Iraqi mortality figures -- has also issued a devastating critique of the Lancet/Johns Hopkins survey. It points out that the study implies that a thousand Iraqis died violently every day in the first half of 2006, with fewer than a tenth of them being noticed by "public surveillance mechanisms" and the press, as well as "incompetence and/or fraud on a truly massive scale by Iraqi officials in hospitals and ministries." It adds that death totals of the Lancet magnitude "are unnecessary to brand the invasion and occupation of Iraq a human and strategic tragedy."

Of course, the latter is precisely the agenda of the majority of those trumpeting the Lancet findings. Their goal isn't merely to nail the Bush Administration for incompetence in failing to achieve a sustainable victory in Iraq. They also, and perversely, want to discredit the war as a moral enterprise by suggesting there's no difference between Saddam Hussein's now well documented mass murders and the violence taking place today.

Omar Fadil, who with his brother writes from troubled Baghdad at IraqTheModel.com, has no doubt that the Lancet figure is a gross exaggeration. "All they want is to prove that our struggle for freedom was the wrong thing to do," he writes. "This fake research is an insult to every man, woman and child who lost their lives."

Rumsfeld: Terror Threat Not Exaggerated (AP-Y)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, October 19, 2006

Americans must take a lesson from history and not believe the terrorist threat has been exaggerated or will go away, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Wednesday.

He described a new, more ruthless and lethal terrorist enemy, "with no territory to defend, no treaties to honor, that measures progress in terms of decades, not days."

"With this sort of enemy, we cannot afford — and indeed could not survive — another holiday from history," Rumsfeld said.

Contending there are those who say terrorism is "somebody else's problem, or it will go away," Rumsfeld countered that America has no choice but to go on the offensive. And he urged patience with the Iraqi and Afghan governments as they struggle to build their democracies.

Rumsfeld's call for perseverance comes three weeks before the November elections, as members of Congress face a public growing increasingly unhappy and impatient with the war in Iraq.

In remarks to students at the Air Force's war college at Maxwell-Gunter Air Force Base in Montgomery, Ala., Rumsfeld also acknowledged that the Iraq war, like other battles, "has not been a steady, smooth glide path."

And he offered no firm prediction on when U.S. troops levels will be substantially reduced there.

"There's going to be violence in that country, I suspect, for some time," he said. "But if we do our job well, and if we are doing a good job in training and equipping the Iraqi forces, we ought to be able to reduce down our forces in the months ahead, as we pass off more and more responsibility."

He said the enemy is unpredictable and frequently adapts to changing conditions, such as when insurgents began to use roadside bombs and other explosive devices after convoys became better protected against traditional attacks. He has made similar concessions before.

In Iraq, meanwhile, sectarian violence continues to rage in Balad, north of Baghdad, prompting the U.S. military to send troops there to back up the Iraqi Army.

The ongoing attacks in and around the capitol city have pushed the death toll of American troops to nearly 70 this month, putting October on track to be the deadliest month for coalition forces since January 2005.

Rumsfeld's speech echoed statements he made in August, when he warned an American Legion convention in Salt Lake City that the U.S. must not repeat the World War II-era mistake of trying to appease the enemy, even as fascism took hold.

While Rumsfeld did not specifically cite Bush critics in the speech, irate Democrats took issue with any suggestion that opponents of the Iraq war could be likened to those who wanted to appease Adolf Hitler before World War II.

While at the base Wednesday, Rumsfeld also met with Howard and Carol Payne, whose son Brad, a marine from Pike Road, Ala., was killed in Iraq by a roadside bomb on October 6.

___

Associated Press staff writer Phillip Rawls contributed to this report from Montgomery, Ala.

On the Net:

Defense Department: http://www.defenselink.mil

Rummy's Other Role (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0083238

By Sally Quinn

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

Don Rumsfeld is the shrewdest person in Washington. He understands better than anyone that somebody has to be in line to take the blame when things go wrong. So far he has been willing to do so. But not much longer.

The drumbeat to get him out of the Pentagon has reached deafening proportions. Republicans and Democrats, the generals, the media, Colin Powell, Condi Rice, Andy Card, the first President Bush, and even Laura Bush all want him gone. Until now George W. Bush has resisted all of the pressure to get rid of his defense secretary. But those in the know say that the president may have reached the point where he realizes that Rumsfeld has outlived his usefulness.

Still, the president must be aware on some level that once the pugnacious, outspoken and flak-attracting Rumsfeld leaves the stage, the focus will be on the president. Whether Bush realizes it or not, this is about a scapegoat.

In the Bible, the high priest would transfer the sins of the people onto a goat, and, as it was written, "the goat shall carry all the sins of the people into a land where no one lives, and the man shall let it loose in the wilderness."

(The word for scapegoat in Hebrew means, literally, "into hell.")

Rumsfeld has seen others take on the role of scapegoat. Look what happened to Nancy Reagan. When she was first lady, she rightly realized that Donald Regan, the chief of staff, was causing her husband enormous damage. What she hadn't realized was that Regan was filling the role of scapegoat for the president. When Don Regan was finally fired, Nancy herself was made the scapegoat. She then took the brunt of criticism for the errors of her husband's administration.

It is hard for the American people to turn completely against the president. It seems tantamount to patricide. We're much more comfortable being able to blame someone else for the president's mistakes. Laura Bush will never be the scapegoat. For now, it's Rumsfeld.

Vice President Cheney is not eager to replace him. And he would never fire Rumsfeld, who was his mentor and who hired him for three government jobs during the Ford administration, including as his deputy when Rumsfeld was chief of staff. (In fact, Cheney's Secret Service code name was "Back Seat.") In any event, Cheney is low-profile, secretive, nonconfrontational -- and presumably too experienced to allow himself to be easily made the scapegoat. But if Rumsfeld goes, the attention and criticism can be directed only to Cheney, or to Bush.

And it's improbable that Rumsfeld can last. He may not have an exit strategy for Iraq, but, old Washington hand that he is, he undoubtedly has one for himself.

I suspect that he has already told the president and Cheney that he will leave after the midterm elections, saying that the country needs new leadership to wind down the war. And he will resign to take a job in some sort of humanitarian venture, thereby creating the perception that he is a caring person who left of his own accord to devote the rest of his life to good works.

Bush and Cheney, who don't want him gone, will then have to contend with the reality of the new situation: One goat must be sent off into the wilderness. Who will it be?

Iraq's Premier In Talks With Key Shiite (AP)

By Abdul-Hussein Ridha, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki consulted with Iraq's Shiite spiritual leader and a radical, anti-U.S. cleric Wednesday in a bid to enlist support for efforts to build political consensus and tackle widening sectarian violence.

Al-Maliki's call on Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and Muqtada al-Sadr came as the Shiite prime minister faces growing U.S. pressure to show more resolve in dealing with the daily carnage of sectarian bombings and attacks.

"I came (to see al-Sistani) so that the security and political situation can be stabilized, allowing the government to turn its attention to reconstruction," al-Maliki told reporters after his meeting with al-Sistani in the holy city of Najaf.

Al-Maliki, whose more than four months in office have seen a marked deterioration in security, also sought to project the independence of his government from perceived U.S. influence.

"The Iraqi government is a government of national unity that came to power through the will of the Iraqi people," he said. "The Iraqi people are the only authorized party that can remove this government or allow it to continue."

Al-Sistani, who usually shuns the media, had no immediate comment, but the visit underscored the influence wielded by Iraq's top Shiite cleric on the government.

Following a meeting between the two men in July, the Iranian-born al-Sistani issued a strongly worded statement that upbraided al-Maliki's government for its failure to provide security and services and fight corruption.

President Bush assured al-Maliki in a telephone conversation Monday that he has no plans to pull troops out of Iraq and told him to ignore rumors the United States intended to enforce a deadline for Baghdad to rein in sectarian violence.

DOJ_NMG_0083239

Al-Maliki told Bush he was concerned because he had been hearing that the United States was giving him just two months to establishment a government capable of operating without U.S. help, according to White House spokesman Tony Snow

Snow said it was not clear where the two-month deadline rumor had come from, although it appeared to reflect growing frustration in Congress and across the country about Al-Maliki's lack of progress.

Al-Maliki also called on al-Sadr, whose support was crucial to the prime minister's election to his job earlier this year.

Al-Sadr is the founder and leader of Iraq's most feared militia, the Mahdi Army, which is blamed for much of the sectarian violence in Iraq. His supporters, however, have 30 of parliament's 275 seats and are part of the Shiite alliance that won last December's general elections.

"We are in a very difficult security situation," al-Maliki said after his talks with al-Sadr. "It is constantly the concern that we carry to every meeting with the political and religious centers of power."

In comments to reporters, al-Sadr appeared to soften his opposition to plans by the Shiite bloc in parliament to introduce a federal system in Iraq that would allow provinces to join together in autonomous regions similar to the one established by the Kurds in northern Iraq in 1991.

Al-Sadr, like Sunni Arab politicians, had maintained that federalism could lead to the eventual breakup of Iraq.

But on Wednesday he said the decision should be left to the Iraqi people to make.

"Federalism, like anything else, is left up to the Iraqi people. If they approve it, then there should be no problem," he said after meeting al-Maliki in Najaf.

Al-Maliki's talks with al-Sistani and al-Sadr in Najaf coincided with the announcement in Baghdad earlier Wednesday that a much-anticipated national reconciliation conference would be start in the Iraqi capital Nov. 4.

The conference, which was originally scheduled to start this Friday, is designed to try and build a political consensus to deal with the country's deepening economic and security woes.

Iraqi Leader Meets With 2 Key Shiites (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 18 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, in a bid to shore up his government in the face of American doubts and unrelenting sectarian violence, met separately today with two of Iraq's most powerful Shiite leaders, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American cleric.

The meetings, which occurred separately and in private in the Shiite holy city of Najaf, came at a critical time for the government of Mr. Maliki, who has been under intense pressure from American officials and some Iraqi leaders impatient with his failure to take aggressive steps to end the country's sectarian strife, including the dismantling of militias tied to the country's most powerful Shiite political parties.

Also today, the American military announced that 11 American troops had died in Iraq on Tuesday, making it one of the deadliest days for Americans since the beginning of the conflict.

Though details of the conversations with Ayatollah Sistani and Mr. Sadr were sparse, it seemed clear, in light of the pressures Mr. Maliki is under, that the prime minister's principal focus with both men would have been how to handle the militias.

At the crux of Mr. Maliki's problem lies Mr. Sadr, who controls one of the largest blocs in Parliament as well as a volatile militia, the Mahdi Army, that has been blamed for helping to drive the deadly cycle of sectarian revenge.

American commanders have been pressing Iraqi officials to launch an all-out assault against the Mahdi Army's strongholds, but Mr. Maliki, who relies on Mr. Sadr for political backing, has resisted.

These tensions played out today when the Maliki government demanded that the American military command release a senior aide to Mr. Sadr who had been captured on Tuesday on suspicion of attacking American forces and of directing kidnappings, killings and torture of Sunni Arabs and Shiites.

The American military command provided no explanation for the release of the aide, Sheik Mazin al-Saedi, except to say it was in response to a request by the Iraqi government. "It's a government of Iraq issue," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a military spokesman in Baghdad.

The urgency for American commanders trying to quell the violence has been accentuated by the sudden rise in the death toll among American troops in Iraq.

The deaths of 10 of the 11 troops on Tuesday were caused by enemy attacks, including bombings and firefights, and the 11th died of "nonhostile" causes, military officials said, using a term that often refers to accidents or illness.

At least 70 American troops have died so far this month, putting October on pace to be third deadliest month of the conflict.

The total, after only 18 days, already exceeds that of most other months since the start of the invasion in March 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0083240

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said the sudden surge in troop deaths would not force President Bush to alter his war plans.

"No, his strategy is to win," Mr. Snow said in Washington. "The president understands not only the difficulty of it, but he grieves for the people who have served with valor. But as everybody says correctly, we've got to win. And that comes at a cost."

Six of the deaths on Tuesday occurred in or near Baghdad, where American and Iraqi have been concentrating their focus since August in an effort to stem the spiraling violence and stop the capital from slipping out of the government's control.

One of those soldiers was shot while on patrol in northern Baghdad; another died when a bomb exploded next to his vehicle just north of Baghdad; and four soldiers were killed when a bomb was detonated near their vehicle just west of Baghdad, the military said.

Three soldiers were killed and one was wounded while on a combat mission in Diyala Province, north of Baghdad, the military said, and a Marine died Tuesday from wounds sustained during combat in Anbar Province.

The two deadliest months for American troops since the beginning of the war have been associated with major offensives.

Some 137 American troops died in November 2004, the same month as the second siege of Falluja, where the Americans battled Sunni Arab rebels. In April 2004, a bloody month that saw the first siege of Falluja and pitched battles between the Americans and Mr. Sadr's militia in Najaf, 135 American troops died.

In contrast, the military has not conducted any major operations this month.

Mr. Maliki took office in May, and since then senior American officials have repeatedly said that the first six months of his administration would be crucial.

During a telephone call with President Bush on Monday, the Iraqi premier disclosed that this timeline was weighing on his mind and asked about rumors that the Americans would replace him soon if they were unsatisfied with his progress. Mr. Bush reassured Mr. Maliki that he had American support.

At a news conference in Najaf, following his meeting with Ayatollah Sistani, Mr. Maliki behaved like a man vindicated. The Iraqi people, he said, "are the only ones who can vote yes to continue or no to stop this government." He added that his government would be subjected to its own review, not an American one.

Mr. Sadr, whose militia twice battled the American military in protracted uprisings in 2004, criticized American policy toward Iraq. "The Iraqi government has the right to act and no one has the right to intervene, not the Americans or any other country," he said.

But in recent days, top officials in Mr. Maliki's government have been taking steps that seem to be responses to demands for changes at the highest levels of government.

On Tuesday, the Maliki government, which has been under pressure to purge Iraq's security forces of militia and sectarian influence, announced that it had removed the two most senior police commanders from their posts the day before.

And in recent days, the government formed a special committee with a mandate to study and overhaul its security agencies.

Mr. Maliki's visit to Ayatollah Sistani underscored the influence of the spiritual leader. During a news conference following their meeting, the prime minister said he had paid the ayatollah a visit "so that that the security and political situation can be stabilized, allowing the government to turn its attention to reconstruction."

Seeking To Shore Up Support, Maliki Meets With Iraqi Clerics (LAT)

By Saad Fakhrildeen And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

NAJAF, Iraq — Prime Minister Nouri Maliki met with influential Shiite Muslim clerics in this city of seminaries and shrines Wednesday, seeking support for his beleaguered government.

Maliki conferred with Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, Iraqi Shiites' most revered cleric, and Moqtada Sadr, the radical leader of a political movement and militia considered a cause of Iraq's security woes. Both are key backers of Maliki's Shiite-dominated administration.

The visit came as Maliki faces rumors that the United States is seeking to replace him because of dissatisfaction with his attempts to pacify sectarian strife.

But Maliki, who received fresh assurances of support from President Bush on Monday, dismissed speculation that he was in any danger of being pushed aside. "The Iraqi government … did not show up with the tanks," he told reporters. "It came by the will of the Iraqi people through the stations of democracy, elections and the constitution."

Maliki's handling of security, especially his seeming inability to rein in Shiite militias, has drawn suspicion from the country's Sunni Arab minority and has frustrated U.S. officials. The American military this week complied with Maliki's request to release a detained cleric who served in Sadr's anti-U.S. movement and is suspected of being a militia leader.

DOJ_NMG_0083241

Maliki defended the release, saying the country was moving to find "political solutions" for the militia issue and to make certain "nobody is arrested unless he committed a real crime against Iraq and Iraqis."

With Sadr at his side during a second news appearance, Maliki also hinted that he was seeking ways to lessen the influence of militias such as Sadr's Al Mahdi army, which often polices Shiite neighborhoods in Baghdad and southern cities. "We found a rejection of killing and holding weapons and support for the concept that the state provides security and protection for the citizens," he said.

Sadr called on Iraqis to avoid a sectarian "bloodbath," and warned the U.S. to stay out of Iraq's domestic affairs.

"Many of the Americans' interventions inside and outside Iraq have worsened the situation, whether in Lebanon, North Korea or other countries where security is worsening," he told reporters.

Courts-martial Ordered In Iraqis' Deaths (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 19, 2006

EVANSVILLE, Ind. — Eight soldiers from the 101st Airborne Division and three Marines were ordered Wednesday to be court-martialed on murder charges.

Four of the soldiers are accused of raping a 14-year-old girl and killing her, her parents and her younger sister. Two of them could get the death penalty if convicted.

Four other soldiers from the 101st are charged with murdering three Iraqi men during a raid.

The soldiers facing the prospect of a death sentence are Sgt. Paul Cortez and Pfc. Jesse Spielman. Both are accused of raping Abeer Qassim al-Janabi in March at her family's home in Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad.

Spc. James Barker and Pfc. Bryan Howard are also charged in the case, but the military is not seeking the death penalty.

Former private Steven Green, who was discharged from the Army for a “personality disorder” in May before the allegations became known, will face murder charges in federal court in Kentucky.

Military prosecutors have said the five — all from the 502nd Infantry Regiment — planned the attack after seeing the girl at their checkpoint near the family's home.

Defense lawyers argued in previous hearings that the soldiers were emotionally ragged. Their unit had suffered months of attacks that felled dozens of comrades.

In statements given to military investigators, Spielman was described as a “look-out.” His lawyers said they were shocked that he could get the death penalty.

“According to the government's evidence … Jesse isn't even a principal in murder and rape,” said Craig Carlson, Spielman's lawyer.

Four soldiers from the division's 3rd Brigade also will be tried in a separate court-martial on charges of murdering three Iraqi detainees during a raid on a village north of Baghdad. Those soldiers are Pfc. Corey Clagett, Spc. William Hunsaker, Staff Sgt. Raymond Girouard and Spc. Juston Graber.

Also, three Marines from Camp Pendleton in California will face courts-martial on murder and kidnapping charges in the death of an Iraqi man in the town of Hamdania, the Marine Corps said. Lance Cpl. Tyler Jackson, Lance Cpl. Robert Pennington and Cpl. Trent Thomas would not face the death penalty.

8 To Face Courts-Martial (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

EVANSVILLE, Ind., Oct. 18 (AP) — Eight soldiers from the 101st Airborne Division at Fort Campbell, Ky., were ordered Wednesday to face courts-martial in killings connected to their service in Iraq.

Two of the soldiers, Sgt. Paul E. Cortez and Pfc. Jesse V. Spielman, could face the death penalty in the rape of a 14-year-old Iraqi girl and killing of her family in March.

The military said it would not seek the death penalty for two other soldiers, Specialist James P. Barker and Pfc. Bryan L. Howard, who are also accused in the rape and killings.

Four other soldiers, Pfc. Corey R. Clagett, Specialist William B. Hunsaker, Staff Sgt. Raymond L. Girouard and Specialist Juston R. Graber, will face a separate court-martial in the killing of three Iraqi detainees during a raid in May.

Ex-commander Talks At Abu Ghraib Hearing (AP-Y)

By David Dishneau

AP, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083242

An Army Reserve officer accused of ignoring abuses of Iraqi detainees at Abu Ghraib prison was a daily visitor to the "hard site," where some detainees were stripped naked as an interrogation technique, a former military police commander testified Wednesday.

Capt. Donald Reese's testimony supported government allegations that Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, as director of the prison's interrogation center, knew about the abuse and lied about it.

Reese testified on the third day of Jordan's Article 32 investigation, the military equivalent of a grand jury hearing. The hearing to determine whether Jordan, the highest-ranking soldier charged in the scandal, should be court-martialed for any of the 12 charges he faces. He could face up to 42 years in prison if convicted.

Reese was commander of the 372nd Military Police Company, which guarded the hard site at Abu Ghraib in the autumn of 2003, when most of the abuses documented in photographs seen around the world occurred.

Prosecutor Lt. Col. Jon Pavlovcak asked him Wednesday how often he had seen Jordan inside the hard site, a building that housed prisoners held for interrogation.

"Every day, sir," Reese replied.

Reese testified that he couldn't remember whether Jordan had ever told him directly why some prisoners were naked. But Reese acknowledged having told Maj. Gen. Antonio M. Taguba during Taguba's 2004 investigation of the Abu Ghraib scandal that he had had a conversation with Jordan about it.

Taguba's report quotes Reese as saying, "He just said it's an interrogation method that we use."

Reese testified Wednesday that he remembered being told, although not necessarily by Jordan, that some prisoners were naked due to lack of clothing, refusal to wear clothes and for disciplinary reasons.

A defense witness, Civilian interrogator Steven Pescatore, testified that Jordan didn't seem to be in charge of interrogations when Pescatore was at Abu Ghraib from late September to mid-November 2003, despite Jordan's title as director of the Joint Interrogation and Debriefing Center.

"He seemed to have some kind of support role, but he was never anyone I went to or through regarding interrogations," Pescatore said.

Pescatore said he worked through a chain of command that included Capt. Carolyn Wood, who ran a unit called the Interrogation Control Element, and Col. Thomas Pappas, who commanded the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade and took over direct supervision of the interrogation center.

Pescatore likened Jordan's role at Abu Ghraib to that of a city mayor, responsible for troop support.

The timing of Jordan's responsibilities at Abu Ghraib is important because four of the alleged offenses are said to have occurred between Sept. 17 and Dec. 24, 2003.

Jordan, a civil affairs officer with military intelligence training, had been sent to Abu Ghraib to run the center as Pappas' deputy, according to Pappas' testimony Tuesday.

Pappas hasn't been criminally charged. He was reprimanded and fined $8,000 for once approving the use of dogs during an interrogation without higher approval.

Eleven lower-ranking soldiers have been convicted of crimes at Abu Ghraib and several officers also have been reprimanded for their roles in the scandal.

Jordan, 50, is now assigned to the Intelligence and Security Command at Fort Belvoir, Va. The charges against him include cruelty and maltreatment for allegedly subjecting detainees to forced nudity and intimidation by dogs, dereliction of duty, making false official statements and willfully disobeying orders.

NATO Strikes Kill 9 Afghan Civilians (AP)

By Kathy Gannon, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

Airstrikes by NATO helicopters hunting Taliban fighters ripped through three dried mud homes in southern Afghanistan as villagers slept early Wednesday. At least nine civilians were killed, including women and children, said residents and the provincial governor.

Shellshocked, angry villagers in Ashogho condemned the attack, which set back NATO's hopes of winning local support for their tough counterinsurgency campaign. The airstrikes came at about the same time a rocket struck a house in a village to the west, reportedly killing 13 people.

"I am not Taliban! We are not Taliban!" Gulab Shah shouted by the rubble of the ruined houses in Ashogho.

Kandahar provincial Gov. Asadullah Khalid said it appeared that no Taliban fighters were in the village at the time of the airstrikes, which left giant pieces of mud packed with straw scattered along Ashogho's narrow lane.

DOJ_NMG_0083243

Bibi Farida, a 6-year-old whose red hair was matted with dirt, fidgeted and bit down on her scarf as she remembered the assault. Her voice was barely a whisper. "I cried. I just cried."

The 2 a.m. raid in the Zhari district of Kandahar province was only half a mile from the scene of September's Operation Medusa, one of the most ferocious battles between Western forces and insurgents since the ouster of the Taliban regime in 2001.

NATO's International Security Assistance Force said in a statement that Wednesday's operation in Kandahar was believed to have caused several civilian casualties. The alliance said the operation was meant to detain people involved in roadside bomb attacks in Panjwayi district, which borders Zhari.

NATO said it regretted any civilian casualties and that it makes every effort to minimize the risk of collateral damage.

Khalid, who traveled Wednesday to Ashogho, about 15 miles west of Kandahar city, said nine people were killed, including women and children, and 11 wounded. Residents said 13 were killed, including four women, and 15 wounded. The governor stuck with his figures when contacted late Wednesday by The Associated Press.

Since late 2001, there have been numerous incidents of civilians killed in military operations against Taliban and al-Qaida fighters, although U.S.-led coalition and NATO forces say they go to extreme lengths to avoid civilian casualties. The international troops accuse insurgents of blending in with local populations while attacking foreign and Afghan soldiers. Many other civilians have been killed in Taliban attacks, including scores in recent suicide bombings.

President Hamid Karzai has repeatedly demanded that NATO and U.S.-led coalition forces take more care when conducting military operations in residential areas to avoid civilian casualties, which undermine his government's already weak standing in parts of the country.

Khalid said Karzai expressed his sympathy after he called the president on his cell phone from the village. "He told them how he hurt for them and how sad he was for their loss," Khalid said.

One of the homes that was attacked had only one wall standing, and looked ready to topple over. A blast ripped a hole through the middle of another.

Shah, whose dirty green baggy pants were hiked up past his ankles, the sign of a deeply conservative man, gestured toward the destroyed homes:

"If the foreign soldiers were so smart that they knew there were Taliban here, why didn't they see the women and children who were sleeping? Why do they want to kill us? How can they help us rebuild if they want to kill us? Maybe they should leave," he shouted.

Khalid said it seemed clear from the villagers that no Taliban fighters were in their village when the bombing occurred.

"It is hard to know when the Taliban are moving around from one place to another, but it seems they weren't here," he said.

He has promised to rebuild the homes.

As he walked away from the angry villagers and climbed into his car, Khalid whispered to himself: "And how are we supposed to bring security to the country with this kind of thing happening?"

Elsewhere Wednesday, a rocket hit a house during a nighttime clash between suspected Taliban insurgents and NATO and Afghan security forces in the farming village of Tajikai in Helmand province's Grishk district, 135 miles west of Kandahar city, police said.

Abdul Rehman, a resident contacted by phone, said the rocket was fired from an aircraft and that the attack killed 13 villagers inside the home. He said relatives of the dead told him all those inside the dried mud house — five women, five children, three men — were killed, including the house's owner, Nabi Khel.

The rocket attack came after Afghan police called in NATO air support during the clash, which began late Tuesday and left one Taliban militant killed and three police wounded, said provincial police chief Ghulam Nabi Malakhel.

"A civilian home was hit by a rocket, but it's unsure which side fired it," Malakhel said. "There were some civilian casualties."

Squadron Leader Jason Chalk, a NATO spokesman, said alliance jets and helicopters fired rockets and dropped bombs on Taliban positions in the area after 2 a.m. Wednesday but could not confirm that they hit a civilian house.

"For the moment, it's impossible to substantiate that claim," Chalk said, adding that the Taliban had been using mortars in the area of the clash. About 100 families live in Tajikai.

Southern Afghanistan this year has faced the deadliest spate in violence in the country since the ouster of the Taliban regime by U.S.-led forces five years ago, as newly deployed NATO troops have battled resurgent militants. In Operation Medusa, NATO reported it had killed more than 500 suspected Taliban fighters.

The tough military action has brought with it a risk of civilian deaths. In May, 17 villagers were killed when coalition warplanes attacked Taliban forces in Kandahar province. The U.S. military, which said dozens of militants also died in the fighting, expressed regret over the deaths.

DOJ_NMG_0083244

The worst reported incident of civilian deaths from foreign military action in Afghanistan came in July 2002, when a U.S. airstrike in Uruzgan province killed 46 civilians and wounded 117, many of them celebrating at a wedding party.

A Military Path To Citizenship (WP)

By Max Boot And Michael O'Hanlon

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

America is a land of immigrants. Their spirit of resolve, adventure, hard work and devotion to an idea bigger than themselves has made this country great. Whatever one thinks of the immigration debate today, particularly the problem of illegal immigrants, foreigners have played a central role in the building of America. Many have done so as soldiers, among them Baron von Steuben and the Marquis de Lafayette in the War of Independence.

Now is the time to consider a new chapter in the annals of American immigration. By inviting foreigners to join the U.S. armed forces in exchange for a promise of citizenship after a four-year tour of duty, we could continue to attract some of the world's most enterprising, selfless and talented individuals. We could provide a new path toward assimilation for undocumented immigrants who are already here but lack the prerequisite for enlistment -- a green card. And we could solve the No. 1 problem facing the Army and Marine Corps: the fact that these services need to grow to meet current commitments yet cannot easily do so (absent a draft) given the current recruiting environment.

Not only would immigrants provide a valuable influx of highly motivated soldiers, they would also address one of America's key deficiencies in the battle against Islamist extremists: our lack of knowledge of the languages and mores in the lands where terrorists reside. Newly arrived Americans can help us avoid trampling on local sensitivities and thereby creating more enemies than we eliminate.

Skeptics might point out that in the just-concluded fiscal year, the military met most of its recruiting and retention goals. But this was done only by relaxing age and aptitude restrictions, allowing in more individuals with criminal records, and greatly increasing the number of recruiters and advertising dollars. Although we generally support what has been done to date, the logic of these measures cannot be pushed much further.

The Army chief of staff, Gen. Peter Schoomaker, has just forecast that U.S. commitments in Iraq may remain at their current level until 2010. With most soldiers and Marines already on a third or even fourth deployment since Sept. 11, 2001, it's doubtful that the all-volunteer force can withstand such a commitment at its current size. Even if it could, it's unfair to ask so much of so few for so long.

Some might object to our proposal on moral grounds, arguing that it is wrong to rely on "mercenaries" and to use such incentives to get prospective immigrants to fight. We disagree. For one thing, we already rely on tens of thousands of real mercenaries: the security contractors the U.S. government employs from Colombia to Iraq to make up for lack of troops. Immigrants who enrolled in our armed forces would be more valuable because they would be under military discipline and motivated by more than just a paycheck.

As for the risks they would run in Iraq or Afghanistan, these would be no greater than the risks run by previous generations of newcomers who built railroads and skyscrapers and toiled in factories and mines. No one would be forced to serve. No existing immigration quotas would be reduced. The military avenue to citizenship would be a new option, not an obligation.

Nativists need not fear that this would lead to a flood of foreigners. Say we decide to recruit 50,000 foreigners a year for the next three years. That sounds like a lot, but it represent less than 10 percent of the total number coming to the United States anyway -- and less than 10 percent of our active-duty armed forces. This would not radically change the demographics of our society or our military, but it would make a big difference in the size of the rotation base for our ongoing missions.

Despite growing anti-Americanism, U.S. citizenship is still one of the world's most precious commodities, so there should be no shortage of volunteers. Since proficiency in English would presumably be important for those joining the armed forces, we might focus on South Asia, anglophone Africa, and parts of Latin America, Europe and East Asia (the Philippines would be a natural recruiting ground) where English is common as a second language. These regions have more than 2 billion people, tens of millions of whom reach military age each year.

The problem would not be the size of the likely applicant pool so much as our ability to vet individuals for their abilities, their dependability and their commitment. Screening would have to be done to ensure that would-be terrorists did not gain access to the armed forces through this program. That might complicate the process of recruiting from certain countries, especially in the Middle East, but it would hardly put a huge dent in the likely applicant pool.

Unlike most issues in the immigration debate, the idea of offering citizenship to foreigners who first join the armed forces should be a winner for everyone. It is good for immigrants who wish to pursue U.S. citizenship, which they could not otherwise attain. It is good for a beleaguered American military that is simply too small for the tasks it has been handed. And it is good for the country, bringing more hardworking patriots to our shores. Before the all-volunteer force breaks, it is high time to consider the idea of such a latter-day foreign legion.

DOJ_NMG_0083245

Max Boot is a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations and author of "War Made New: Technology, Warfare, and the Course of History, 1500 to Today." Michael O'Hanlon is a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and co-author of "Hard Power: The New Politics of National Security."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron: The Tale Of Two Sentencings (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

The surprisingly lenient prison sentence given recently to Enron Corp. former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow highlights the benefits of cooperating with federal criminal authorities. The coming sentencing of former Enron President Jeffrey Skilling is likely to demonstrate the dangers of fighting them.

Mr. Fastow's six-year prison sentence came after the disgraced executive helped federal prosecutors nab others at Enron, including Mr. Skilling -- who was convicted, along with former company chairman Kenneth Lay, on conspiracy and fraud charges this year. Mr. Fastow was one of the government's main witnesses in that four-month trial.

Mr. Skilling, by contrast, fought the government with a defense effort that cost tens of millions of dollars. He has vowed to appeal his conviction on 19 counts and has asked the court to let him remain free pending his appeal. The 52-year-old Mr. Skilling is scheduled to be sentenced Monday by Judge Sim Lake and observers believe that he could get in the range of 20 years imprisonment. (Mr. Lay died several weeks after the trial of heart-related problems; this week his conviction was vacated, under established law that wipes away convictions for defendants who die before appeal.)

The likely discrepancy in prison terms for Messrs. Fastow and Skilling, widely considered to be two of the central figures of the Enron scandal, illustrates that there has never been a better time in the white-collar-crime world to rat on your colleagues.

Over the past half-decade, prison terms for financial crimes have ratcheted up. Where a convicted corporate executive could once expect probation or a few years in prison, a first-time offender now faces as long as life behind bars.

The surest way to avoid such a fate is to admit wrongdoing, cut a deal with prosecutors and help them nab others. The sentencing system "has developed a huge gulf between those who go to trial and those who cooperate," says Kirby Behre, a former federal prosecutor and co-author of a treatise on federal sentencing practices. While Mr. Skilling faces "an astronomical sentence," cooperators such as Mr. Fastow "are still getting sweet deals," says Mr. Behre, a partner in the Washington law office of Paul, Hastings, Janofsky & Walker.

One of the other giant corporate scandals of the past half-decade, WorldCom Inc., saw a discrepancy in the sentences given to its two main figures. Former WorldCom Chief Financial Officer Scott Sullivan cut a deal and testified against his onetime boss, former Chief Executive Bernard Ebbers, who was convicted of conspiracy and securities fraud. Mr. Sullivan received a five-year sentence. Mr. Ebbers received a 25-year sentence. Both are in prison. (WorldCom emerged from bankruptcy as MCI Inc., which was later acquired by Verizon Communications Inc.)

As a wave of possible corporate crime prosecutions looms -- this one involving the backdating of stock options -- the chasm between government cooperators and the people they testify against looms large.

The outbreak of corporate scandals that began with Enron's December 2001 collapse into bankruptcy helped fuel an existing trend toward ever-longer prison sentences for white-collar crime. Little of the rise in prison time has to do with protecting society from an Ebbers or a Skilling, observers say. Neither of those men is likely to be connected to a public company ever again. Rather, a long white-collar sentence is done for punishment and "the message it sends to others about the consequences of serious fraud," says Samuel Buell, a former prosecutor in the Justice Department's specially created Enron Task Force and now a law professor at Washington University in St. Louis, who acknowledges that he would have difficulty determining a proper sentence for Mr. Skilling.

Coming up with an appropriate sentence for the 44-year-old Mr. Fastow also proved complicated. His six-year sentence appears particularly sweet, given that he had agreed to accept a 10-year sentence when he made his plea deal with prosecutors in early 2004. The deal resolved a pending 98-count indictment that could have sent him to prison for 20 years.

However, the sentence still had to be reviewed by a judge. Last year, a Supreme Court decision gave federal judges more leeway in setting sentences. Previously, prison terms had largely been determined by a formula that took into account such factors as a defendant's role in the crime, his acceptance of responsibility, and, in cases of fraud, the dollar loss.

DOJ_NMG_0083246

At Mr. Fastow's recent sentencing hearing, prosecutor John Hueston said the former finance chief's help had been "critical" in unraveling the Enron fraud. He added that without Mr. Fastow "we would not have convicted Mr. Lay." The prosecutor also said the defendant "appeared truly repentant," and he didn't object when a Fastow lawyer recommended a five-year prison term. In taking four years off the agreed-upon sentence, Judge Kenneth Hoyt said he was showing "mercy."

Given the severity of Mr. Fastow's crimes, any reduction from 10 years was "overly generous," said Leslie Caldwell, the original director of the Enron Task Force and now a partner at the Morgan, Lewis & Bockius law firm in New York. A Justice Department spokesman said the government is looking at an appeal.

Nobody expects prosecutors to say nice things about Mr. Skilling at his sentencing hearing in Houston. The government and Mr. Skilling's attorneys are battling over a host of issues that could affect the former Enron president's sentence.

One battle involves which set of sentencing guidelines to use, since amendments over the past half-decade have made corporate-fraud penalties steadily stiffer. The government is arguing for guideline amendments that went into effect Nov. 1, 2001, claiming that the criminal conspiracy continued until Enron's bankruptcy filing a month later. Defense attorneys argue for using the previous set of guidelines, since Mr. Skilling resigned from Enron in August 2001. The choice of guidelines could make a difference of several years or more in his sentence calculation, sentencing experts say. Estimates of the prison term Judge Lake will give to Mr. Skilling range from about 15 years to about 30 years.

Such numbers are a far cry from two decades ago when the federal sentencing guidelines first went into effect. (Before that, sentencing was left pretty much up to individual judges.) If Mr. Skilling were being sentenced under the original guidelines from the 1980s, says one sentencing expert, he would be facing about six to seven years in prison.

Stock Option Tremors Hit Md. Firm (BSUN)

By Jamie Smith Hopkins, Stacey Hirsh And Tricia Bishop

The Baltimore Sun, October 19, 2006

A stock options scandal has claimed the top two executives of Harford County technology company SafeNet Inc., part of an accelerating trend of resignations in corporate America stemming from investigations into whether option awards were rigged to maximize their value.

SafeNet announced Wednesday that Anthony A. Caputo, its chairman and chief executive, and Carole Argo, its president, chief operating officer and acting chief financial officer, voluntarily resigned Tuesday, effective immediately.

Their departure was the result of the company's continuing probe of stock option grants, SafeNet said.

"The issues related to stock options occurred under my leadership and I do not want my continued presence to be a distraction to the important work we perform for our customers every day," Caputo said in a statement Wednesday.

The information encryption and security company, which has contracts with numerous government agencies, tapped independent director Walter W. Straub as its new chairman and interim CEO.

Chris Fedde, senior vice president and general manager of SafeNet's enterprise security division, was named president and chief operating officer. John W. Frederick, SafeNet's vice president and worldwide controller, stepped up as chief accounting officer and interim chief financial officer.

The company, which employs 1,200 globally and about 200 in Harford County, is hiring an executive search firm to find a permanent chief executive and chief financial officer.

Caputo and Argo are the latest in a string of executives who have left their posts amid inquiries into whether options were back- dated to coincide with lows in the stock price rather than at a higher price on the date they were actually granted, ensuring a larger profit. Businesses are allowed to backdate options if they are properly taxed, accounted for and disclosed -- but if the options aren't, the practice is illegal. An option is a right granted by a company to buy its stock at a specified price.

Dozens of companies are under federal or internal scrutiny for stock option practices. Companies ranging from Apple Computer Inc. to McAfee Inc. have in recent weeks announced the resignations or firings of key officials. On Sunday, UnitedHealth Group said its chief executive had resigned.

From 2000 through 2005, SafeNet issued 5.2 million options to all employees, of which Caputo got 691,600 and Argo 295,000, documents filed with the SEC show. In the same period, Caputo exercised 150,000 options worth $6.4 million and Argo exercised 58,500 options worth $1.2 million, according to the documents.

In mid-May, when SafeNet disclosed it had received options-related inquiries from the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission, an analysis by The Sun found a multi-year pattern of grants priced at or near the bottom of short-term dips in the company's stock.

Some options grants to Caputo and other executives bore strike prices -- the amount the executive pays for the shares -- that were identical to the stock's lowest price for a full year. On Feb. 27, 2003, for instance, Caputo received 100,000 options when the stock was $16.47 -- the lowest price of the year. Eight months later, the stock was nearly $43 a share.

DOJ_NMG_0083247

SafeNet's stock, which fell sharply after the probes were disclosed, dropped 79 cents Wednesday, to close at $21.20.

SafeNet formed a board committee in June to investigate the option grants. Last month the Belcamp company said it would have to revise financial statements from 2000 through March 31 because some grants made between 2000 and 2005 were accounted for "using incorrect measurement dates under applicable accounting rules in effect at the time." The additional expense it will have to record could total as much as $20 million, it said.

It was not clear Wednesday how much Caputo and Argo will receive as part of a severance package. Their contracts specify that they are entitled to accrued vacation and six months' severance pay if they voluntarily resign. But Straub, former CEO of a company acquired by SafeNet in 2004, said the board will decide what they will get and whether they will keep their stock options.

As of the end of last year, Caputo held 541,600 options worth $8 million -- all vested, meaning they can be cashed in. Argo held 276,500 options worth $3 million, of which two-thirds were vested.

Straub said the two executives were not asked to resign. He insisted there were no new developments in the investigation to prompt their same-day decisions.

"They both have been major contributors to the company, and they felt it was in the best interest so the management here could focus on the business, which is doing well," said Straub, who added that he is not planning major changes. "I'm sure they mutually agreed that it's time."

Straub would not comment on the internal investigation, other than to say it is continuing and he is aware of no new subpoenas.

At other companies under the shadow of backdating, the trend is for the boards to force the executives out, said Todd C. Weller, an analyst for Stifel Nicolaus & Co. in Baltimore.

"That would imply that either the executive benefited from some of the option backdating or they're taking the fall because it occurred under their watch," he said. Companies also take such action "to mitigate some of the risk from a company liability perspective," Weller said.

Several shareholder lawsuits alleging option manipulation have been filed against the company. Salvatore J. Graziano, a New York lawyer for some of the plaintiffs, said the resignations were "further evidence that wrongdoing occurred."

Daniel Ives, a vice president and analyst for Friedman Billings Ramsey, said Caputo's resignation helps divorce the company from its option troubles but also removes a leader who has been "a key ingredient in the success of the company."

But investors think it could work out for the best, said Weller, who reiterated his "buy" recommendation Wednesday. Jeffrey W. Englander, an independent analyst following the information security industry, said Wall Street "has gotten somewhat frustrated" with the executives' emphasis on acquisitions to drive growth.

None of the analysts owns SafeNet shares.

Caputo has been involved in SafeNet since 1986, first as an investor and soon after as CEO. Argo joined the company as chief financial officer in 1999. They "built a very strong organization," said Straub, the interim CEO.

"Our initial plan is basically to continue to execute our strategy, the strategy that has been developed by the company and the board," Staub said. "Things are progressing well, and our customer engagement is great ... so there's no real change in our vision or what we're doing."

SafeNet Officials Resign As Part Of Options Probe (WSJ)

By Zachary M. Seward

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

SafeNet Inc., a midsize information-security firm, cleared out the top of its executive suite as part of its probe into backdating of stock options.

Anthony A. Caputo, 65 years old, resigned as chairman and chief executive. Carole Argo, 45, president, chief operating officer and acting chief financial officer, also left the company. Neither could be reached to comment.

MORE ON OPTIONS

· Graphic: KLA's options grants1

· KLA Chairman, Sapient CEO Quit2

· Options Scorecard: Companies under scrutiny3

· Perfect Payday: Complete coverage4

The resignations at SafeNet follow similar departures earlier this week at UnitedHealth Group Inc., KLA-Tencor Corp. and Sapient Corp., also in connection to alleged options irregularities. The timing of the departures coincides with the need to file quarterly earnings reports. With a harsh spotlight shining on compensation practices, companies have been scrambling to wrap up internal options probes and make related adjustments to their books before they file their reports with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

SafeNet, of Belcamp, Md., previously said some options grants between 2000 and 2005 "were accounted for using incorrect measurement dates." The company has said it expects to record additional charges, less than $20 million, because of the grants, suggesting they were backdated or otherwise manipulated.

Options give a recipient the right to purchase stock at a set price. Backdating, or saying the options were granted earlier than they were, can create an instant increase in value, reducing an executive's incentive for stock growth. Backdating can also lead to accounting problems. SafeNet has received subpoenas from the U.S. attorney in New York and document requests from the SEC.

SafeNet named Walter W. Straub, 63, chairman and interim chief executive. Mr. Straub has served as an independent director since 2004. The company also promoted two vice presidents. Chris Fedde, 55, was named president and chief operating officer. John W. Frederick, 42, was named chief accounting and interim chief financial officer.

SafeNet garnered some attention this year after netting a contract to provide security for Swift, the international banking cooperative recently disclosed to have permitted U.S.-government monitoring of its transactions.

In 4 p.m. composite trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market, SafeNet's shares fell 79 cents, or 3.6%, to $21.20.

SafeNet's Top 2 Executives Resign After Stock Options Inquiry (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

SafeNet Inc., an information security firm in Maryland, said yesterday that its top two executives resigned after an inquiry into how stock options were issued.

Chairman and chief executive Anthony A. Caputo and President and Chief Operating Officer Carole D. Argo left their jobs immediately. Caputo had been with the company for 20 years, and Argo since 1999.

The two SafeNet executives join about 30 others nationwide who have stepped aside during stock-option inquiries. More than 100 companies have been investigated for the practice of backdating stock options, in which options are dated back to a time when the stock price is lower so the profit is higher after the options are exercised.

SafeNet said earlier that it received a subpoena from the U.S. attorney's office in New York related to the stock options issue. The Securities and Exchange Commission has also sent the firm a letter of informal inquiry requesting information.

An internal investigation at SafeNet continues, but the company has already said that certain options over the past six years were accounted for using incorrect dates. The company plans to restate its results between 2000 and this year.

SafeNet of Belcamp, which is north of Baltimore, specializes in developing encryption technology to protect data for commercial clients such as Bank of America and Nokia, as well as government customers including the Defense and Homeland Security departments. The company had $263 million in revenue last year and $3 million in profit.

Caputo said in a statement that he resigned because he thought it was in the company's "best interests."

"The issues related to stock options occurred under my leadership and I do not want my continued presence to be a distraction to the important work we perform for our customers every day," he said.

The company's board appointed Walter W. Straub, one of the directors, to be chairman and interim chief executive while a search firm tries to find a permanent replacement.

Argo was succeeded by Chris Fedde, who had been senior vice president and general manager of enterprise security.

The company also announced that John W. Frederick, the firm's vice president and worldwide controller, became chief accounting officer and interim chief financial officer.

Straub has been on the company's board since 2004. He previously was president and chief executive of Rainbow Technologies Inc., which merged with SafeNet two years ago.

The stock option inquiry is not the only obstacle the company faces. SafeNet faces possible default on $250 million in debt because it did not file its second-quarter results on time.

Straub said yesterday that the resignations would not affect SafeNet's business.

"Tony and Carole have built a very strong global management team. So from an operations standpoint, our business is in great shape," Straub said.

SafeNet shares fell 79 cents yesterday, to $21.20.

Senate Panel Seeks Details On McGuire's Exit Pay (WSJ)

By Robert Tomsho

The Wall Street Journal, October 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0083249

The Senate Finance Committee, wading once again into the stock-options scandal, asked UnitedHealth Group Inc. for an array of documents related to the $1.1 billion in compensation that William McGuire, its departing chief executive, could receive when he leaves the company.

"The UnitedHealth situation is the most disturbing yet," said Sen. Chuck Grassley, the committee chairman and an Iowa Republican. "The news reports make it sound like the CEO had the board of directors over a barrel and helped himself to whatever he could get, even with the taint of stock-options backdating allegations against him."

Dr. McGuire's attorney, David Brodsky, didn't return a call seeking comment. Mark Lindsay, a UnitedHealth spokesman, said the company "will certainly cooperate fully with the Senate and any other parties looking into this matter."

Dr. McGuire agreed to leave the big health insurer, based in Minnetonka, Minn., on Sunday, after an internal investigation found that millions of stock options, including many to himself, were improperly backdated at the company during his tenure.

On Tuesday, The Wall Street Journal reported that, under the terms of his employment contract, Dr. McGuire could leave with as much as $1.1 billion in stock options, retirement payouts and other benefits. Dr. McGuire and the company are currently negotiating the terms of his departure.

Documents requested by the Senate committee, which held a hearing on the stock-options issue in September, include copies of Dr. McGuire's employment contract, along with related legal opinions and lists of consultants and other outside-compensation advisers.

UnitedHealth is also being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission, federal prosecutors in New York and the Minnesota attorney general.

McGuire's Deal Is Focus Of U.S. Senate Inquiry (MINNST)

By David Phelps And Chris Serres, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 19, 2006

The Finance Committee has requested data about McGuire's employment and severance agreements.

Some of the U.S. Senate's most influential members are taking aim at the multimillion-dollar severance package of outgoing UnitedHealth Group Inc. CEO William McGuire.

Leaders of the Senate Finance Committee on Wednesday asked the Minnetonka company to provide specific information about McGuire's severance package, as well as his employment contract.

"I want to know how a top executive can lose his job for allegedly defrauding his own company's investors, but still get rewarded with a billion dollars for doing it," committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said in a prepared statement.

"Congress has a duty to the taxpayers to find out what happened at UnitedHealth and figure out what to do to stop this flood of backdating scandals."

Grassley, along with ranking minority member Max Baucus, D-Mont., made the request to UnitedHealth Chairman Richard Burke, soon-to-be Chief Executive Stephen Hemsley and James Johnson, chairman of the board's compensation committee.

Baucus accused McGuire and other executives tainted by backdated stock options of "gaming the law to avoid paying their fair share of taxes on stock options and other benefits."

On Sunday, McGuire resigned as chairman and agreed to step down as CEO by Dec. 1. His decision came after an independent review of the company's stock-option program for senior executives found that the options were likely backdated to a low point in the stock's value to maximize profit when the options were exercised at a higher price.

McGuire has more than $1 billion worth of unexercised options. His employment agreement also provides for a lump-sum payout of $6.4 million when he leaves the company and an annual pension of $5.09 million, according to the 2006 proxy statement.

UnitedHealth said Sunday that it is "engaged in discussions" with McGuire over terms of his departure, including his financial benefits, raising the prospect that the CEO could be leaving under different terms than those called for by his contract.

Among the records sought by the Finance Committee are McGuire's employment contract and supporting documentation, any benefits McGuire will receive after he leaves the company, the names of advisers and consultants who helped draft the employment agreement, the amount of federal tax deductions claimed by UnitedHealth with respect to McGuire's compensation since 1994 and steps being taken "to remedy the various failures" cited in the independent review regarding executive compensation.

The committee set a Nov. 9 deadline for UnitedHealth to respond to the requests.

In a separate development Wednesday, UnitedHealth said it arranged a $7.5 billion line of credit for "working capital purposes," as well as to deal with any litigation related to the company's debt.

On Aug. 28, the company received a notice of default from a group claiming to hold UnitedHealth debt securities. The company has said it believes it is not in default and "intends to defend itself vigorously," according to a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Sheryl Skolnick, a stock analyst at CRT Capital Group in Stamford, Conn., said the 364-day revolving credit facility is "insurance" in case the company loses its legal battle with owners of its debt and loses access to capital.

"What they have essentially just done is to arrange exactly enough money on demand to pay off all the debt in case any or all of it is in default," she said.

"It's a huge vote of confidence in the company," she added. "That they could arrange $7.5 billion, virtually overnight, is remarkable."

David Phelps · dphelps@startribune.com · 612-673-7269 Chris Serres · cserres@startribune.com · 612-673-4308

UnitedHealth Pressed Over Ex-CEO's Pay (FT)

By Jeremy Grant In Washington

Financial Times, October 19, 2006

The unfolding stock options backdating scandal at United Healthgroup on Tuesday prompted an outcry from top US lawmakers when Chuck Grassley, chair of the senate's finance committee, demanded details of the departing CEO's severance package.

William McGuire this week resigned from the health insurer when an external probe implicated him in manipulating stock options.

The Wall Street Journal reported on Wednesday that he was likely to walk away with $1.1bn in stock options and other benefits.

When questionable use of stock option compensation hit the headlines, it emerged that scores of companies - either by failing to do the proper accounting or make the necessary disclosures to shareholders - appeared to have improperly awarded options with a lower exercise price than on the day that the award was made.

A probe by law firm Wilmer Hale found Mr McGuire was central to the company's options granting process and that the "full extent and nature" of financial relationships between him and the then-chairman of the company's compensation committee that had created a conflict of interest in 1999 "likely were not disclosed" to the board at the time.

Mr Grassley and the committee's ranking member, Max Baucus, wrote to United Healthgroup, saying: "The news reports make it sound like the CEO had the board of directors over a barrel and helped himself to whatever he could get, even with the taint of stock options backdating allegations against him."

Mr McGuire accumulated $1.6bn in stock options between his appointment in 1991 and the end of 2005.

During the same period, the group's share price rose by 2,500 per cent. Mr McGuire was regarded by Wall Street as one of the most effective CEOs in the US.

But the senators said: "[We] want to know how a top executive can lose his job for allegedly defrauding his company's own investors, but still get rewarded with a billion dollars for doing it."

Among other things, the senators asked United Healthgroup to "provide the amount of federal tax deductions claimed by UnitedHealth with respect to compensation paid to Mr McGuire since 1994; and provide the amount of such deductible compensation that has been "performance-based" and what criteria or metrics were used to determine if compensation was deemed "performance-based."

In September, the committee convened a hearing to hear from the Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the Internal Revenue Service about how they are responding to stock options backdating and what congress can do to help their efforts.

Investing (BSWK)

By Jane Sasseen

BusinessWeek, October 19, 2006

The Ties UnitedHealth Failed to Disclose For years, the health insurer didn't tell investors about personal and financial links between its former CEO and the "independent" director in charge of compensation

In its 1999 proxy statement, UnitedHealth Group made sure investors knew of a few small relationships between its directors and the company. While reassuring shareholders that all the directors on its compensation committee were independent of management, it pointed out that the insurer paid immaterial amounts for insurance policies bought from the company headed by one director, while the law firm of Walter Mondale, another board member, was also the company's corporate counsel.

Following the New York Stock Exchange's 2004 imposition of stricter standards for director independence, UnitedHealth (UNH) had eliminated even those minor ties by the time the 2005 proxy was filed. This time, it told investors that all the members of its comp committee met the NYSE's independence test, and that no relationships or ties existed between directors and the company.

How nice of them to share. Of course, what the proxy neglected to mention were significant personal and financial ties between ousted CEO William McGuire, and William Spears, a New York investment adviser and long-time head of UnitedHealth's compensation committee.

Controversial Agreement Those ties were outlined in a report, released Monday, prepared for the UnitedHealth board by William McLucas, a former head of the SEC's enforcement division and now with the Washington, D.C., law firm of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr. According to the report, Spears has served as a trustee since 1992 for two trusts set up for McGuire's children. And from 1994 to mid-2006, he also acted as an investment manager for McGuire, overseeing assets ranging from $15 million to $55 million in 2006.

In June, 1999, the CEO even invested $500,000 in Spears's money-management firm when he bought it back from the larger conglomerate that then owned it. Several months before, Spears was the company's point person in negotiating what proved to be a highly lucrative, highly controversial employment agreement for McGuire.

Nor is McGuire the only company executive with a financial relationship with Spears. Stephen Hemsley, who was named Oct. 16 to succeed McGuire as UnitedHealth's chief executive, also hired Spears to manage his money. Starting with a $12 million account in 2001, by 2006, Spears was managing $52 million of Hemsley's money as well. As a result of the probe, Spears has agreed to leave UnitedHealth's board (see BusinessWeek.com, 10/16/06, "Hard Times for UnitedHealth").

Declaration of Independence All of which has raised an obvious question: Just how could a director with those substantial—and presumably remunerative—ties to key officers be considered independent? And why weren't those ties made clear to shareholders? "It's a real stretch to say this guy is independent," says Jacob Frenkel, a securities lawyer and former SEC enforcement official. "The company and its principals will be hard pressed to justify a rationale for not disclosing that relationship."

The answer appears to lie in how independence is defined. Before 2004, when the disputed grants occurred, the standards in place were vague. Legal experts say it's unclear whether Spears would have met them. But in the wake of Enron, WorldCom, and other corporate scandals, both the NYSE and Nasdaq strengthened the rules concerning independent directors for the companies listed on their exchanges. The SEC vetted those rules but has no separate requirements for independence of its own.

At the NYSE, where UnitedHealth's stock is listed, all directors on a compensation committee must be independent, meaning they should have no material relationship with the company. A director or an immediate family member can't have been an employee of the company within the last three years, for example, or have been an executive officer of any other firm that has either made payments to, or received payments from, the company in excess of $1 million.

The Element of Surprise But while the rules are explicit in forbidding certain links between the directors and the company, they never specifically address relationships that might exist between directors themselves. Indeed, they're strangely silent on the potential problems that could arise from outside ties between directors. Instead, boards are asked generally to consider the other "persons or organizations with which the director has an affiliation" when assessing the materiality of a director's relationship with the company.

That lack of specificity may have led McGuire, Hemsley, and Spears to conclude that their financial relationships didn't have to be disclosed to investors. But experts say they may have strayed perilously close to the legal edge—and indeed may well have crossed over it. "The question is what was said [to shareholders] about the relationships they had, and whether that would be rendered false and misleading by the new facts," says Donald Langevoort, a professor of securities law at Georgetown University.

"Post-Sarbanes Oxley, there's so much emphasis on director independence that any fact that would come as a surprise to shareholders should be disclosed, so that they won't be surprised." Through a company spokesman, McGuire and Hemsley declined to comment on Oct. 17. Spears also declined to comment.

Close to the Edge If nothing else, those ties should have been reported to the rest of the board, which, under current NYSE rules, would then have been required to assess whether Spears truly qualified as independent. While the board would still have had the right to conclude that Spears' judgment wasn't influenced by those ties, it would have been required to let shareholders know how they reached that conclusion.

"The whole purpose of these regulations is to say that if something is close to the line, it should be disclosed, and a board waiver secured," says John Coffee, a professor at Columbia Law School.

But none of this appears to have happened at UnitedHealth. According to McLucas' report, McGuire and Spears said they believed that the board was aware of the money management relationship in 1999. In October of that year, UnitedHealth's general counsel, David Lubben, sent an e-mail to the company's outside counsel outlining McGuire's financial relationship with Spears, and indicated that some disclosure of a "conflict" had been made to the full board.

Claiming No Knowledge However, McLucas found no documentation or board minutes to back this up and says no other directors recalled being aware of the relationship when Spears was negotiating McGuire's 1999 employment contract. It's unclear when they later learned of those links—or that Hemsley, too, had hired Spears.

And all of the directors said they were unaware that McGuire's investment in Spears's firm, which ended in 2003, had taken place until the recent probes into options began. A source close to the probe says no evidence exists that the directors knew of Spears's role as a trustee for McGuire's children either.

Moreover, there's no evidence that the board reconsidered whether Spears still qualified as an independent director or discussed the need to disclose those financial ties to shareholders after the NYSE tightened up its disclosure rules.

No Job Too Small Governance experts say that the lack of public disclosure appears particularly egregious, in light of the potential sums involved. Directors now are routinely forced to disclose links that appear to offer far less potential for personal gain than may have occurred at United.

If a director works for another firm that does business with the company, or has a relative working for the firm, those links must be disclosed no matter how small the sum or how minor the job. "If the amounts involved are de minimus, that's not going to affect independence," says Robert McCormick, head of proxy research for financial advisers Glass Lewis. But given the amounts of money involved at UnitedHealth, "this deal raises lots of concerns."

While the exact terms of Spears's deal with McGuire and Hemsley aren't known, the relationship appears to have given him plenty of potential for gain. Money managers typically pocket fees starting at 0.5% of assets under management for accounts of around $50 million. For complex investment strategies, the fees could run higher.

How Widespread a Problem? But even at that rate, Spears could have made roughly $250,000 a year from both McGuire and Hemsley for overseeing their accounts. Moreover, in negotiating McGuire's 1999 contract, Spears potentially had a direct interest in increasing McGuire's pay: As a money manager, the more money your client makes and has available to invest, the more you typically earn.

For shareholders, the UnitedHealth disclosures raise a further question: Do directors at other boards have personal ties that have gone unreported as well? For now, there's no way of knowing, because of the lack of clarity in the rules governing such ties.

But that could change. Securities experts say the NYSE will be forced to look closely at the language in the current regulations to see if UnitedHealth or its executives have clearly breached them. Ultimately, the flagrancy of UnitedHealth's weak disclosures could lead the exchanges to beef up their regulations to more explicitly deal with relationships between directors.

Barred for Life The questionable disclosure also raises the legal stakes for all involved. Questions about Spears's independence could bolster attempts by shareholders suing over the alleged backdating of options and McGuire's compensation to win money back from McGuire and even the directors themselves. With the SEC and federal prosecutors still weighing whether to bring civil or criminal charges over the alleged backdating against UnitedHealth and its execs, further charges related to the poor disclosure could also be added.

Columbia professor Coffee also believes that the new revelations could put Spears more squarely in the SEC's sights. If they conclude he misrepresented his independence, they could seek to have him barred for life from serving as a director of a public company. Moreover, Coffee says that if McGuire, Hemsley, or Spears were found to have misled other directors about their relationships, that would increase the chances of criminal charges being filed.

All of that, as much as any change in the NYSE's rulebook, would make clear the fact that such relationships don't pass the smell test. "We would essentially see the regulations strengthened through enforcement," says Frenkel.

Sasseen is a national correspondent for BusinessWeek

Ex-Delphi Execs Face Civil Fraud Charges (DEN)

By David Shepardson

Detroit News, October 19, 2006

SEC says top financial officers used accounting schemes to hide supplier's troubled finances.

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission is expected to file civil fraud charges this month against up to a dozen former Delphi Corp. executives following a 27-month investigation into accounting fraud at the bankrupt Troy auto supplier, people familiar with the situation said.

Among those expected to face civil charges are John Blahnik, the former Delphi vice president of treasury, mergers and acquisitions; Laura Marion, who had served as director of financial accounting and reporting; and Paul R. Free, former chief accounting officer, the people said.

The SEC also is expected to file civil charges against several officials at other companies involved in improper transactions with Delphi, The Detroit News has learned.

Those charged, if they are found liable, could face hefty fines and be barred from serving as a board member or corporate officer at publicly traded companies. Delphi spokeswoman Claudia Piccinin declined to comment Wednesday, except to say that the company continues to cooperate with the SEC.

Last year, Delphi acknowledged several instances of improper accounting and restated several years of earnings.

The SEC's investigation has found that Delphi used varied improper methods to inflate earnings, cash flow and revenue, which hid the declining health of the company, according to people familiar with the matter.

Several large transactions weren't accounted for properly, including a $237 million payment Delphi made to its former parent, General Motors Corp.

The SEC has concluded that Delphi also called some loans from suppliers "rebates" and engaged in false transactions by claiming it had sold precious metals or scrap materials to boost cash flow.

Delphi also failed to notify its board or credit rating agencies about $300 million in European lines of credit it held between 1999 and the end of 2004.

Thanks in part to the now-discredited transactions, Delphi met or exceeded Wall Street earnings expectations in every quarter between 1999 and 2003.

"It's clear they were trying to make that last penny of earnings," said Peter Henning, a Wayne State law professor and former SEC and Justice Department lawyer.

As a result of the accounting errors, Delphi lowered its 2001 earnings by $265 million, cut 2002 net income by $24 million and adjusted its 2003 net loss by $46 million. It said its cash flow was improperly boosted by $200 million in 2000.

Lawyers for many of the former Delphi executives under scrutiny have argued to the SEC that there is no evidence they personally profited from the improper accounting. They also contend that before the Enron debacle and the 2002 corporate reforms, some of the accounting practices in question were commonplace.

It was biggest supplier in '99

After its spinoff from GM in 1999, Delphi was the world's largest auto supplier with revenue of $29 billion.

Last October, Delphi filed for bankruptcy protection and announced plans to close 21 of its 29 U.S. factories, including several in Michigan.

The company is in talks with GM, the UAW and several large investors to finalize a settlement of claims and to allow Delphi to emerge from bankruptcy protection in the second quarter of 2007.

Most of those now restated transactions took place in 2000 and 2001 when Delphi said it was selling off hundreds of millions of dollars in scrap materials and precious metals -- generating income and cash flow -- when in reality the supplier had agreed to buy back the same assets in the future.

Delphi has acknowledged that these were financing transactions and not sales. In another case, Delphi allegedly booked sales of scrap material destined for landfills as expensive electronic inventory as a way to boost its cash flow.

In December 2000, Delphi recorded a $200 million sale of precious metals to Bank One, which improperly boosted its income by $100 million. Delphi didn't disclose that the precious metals never left the factory floors or that it had a contract to repurchase the materials at a fixed price.

In March 2005, following a 10-month internal investigation led by an outside law firm, Delphi ousted Free and its chief financial officer, Alan Dawes, and said many of the company's financial statements were inaccurate.

Most of the former executives under investigation by the SEC agreed to waive the statute of limitations until Oct 31. Several lawyers close to the case have been told to expect SEC charges by then. The commission is scheduled to meet next week in Washington to approve the filing of the complaints in U.S. District Court in Detroit.

It's not clear if Dawes or ex-Chairman and CEO J.T. Battenberg III -- who both have been subjects of the SEC investigation -- will be among those named in the civil complaints. Battenberg was questioned by the SEC earlier this year.

FBI: Criminal investigation

The criminal investigation by the FBI and U.S. Postal Inspection Service continues, led by Justice's fraud section in Washington.

In June, The News reported that at least seven ex-Delphi executives had received "Wells" notices from the SEC, which notify targets of an investigation of the substance of the staff's charges and probable recommendations.

Since then, several other former executives have received notices in a widening probe that includes roughly a dozen former executives. Some former lower-level Delphi employees, who testified before the SEC more than a year ago, recently were notified they were likely to face civil charges.

DOJ_NMG_0083254

Many of the targets have been in settlement talks with the SEC. The SEC has sought to impose stiff fines against former executives -- in some cases nearly $1 million -- in the Delphi investigation. It isn't clear if any settlements have been reached or if Delphi will have to pay a corporate penalty.

Early this month, the five-member SEC received a detailed memo from the staff attorneys investigating Delphi outlining the proposed charges. The commission must approve the filing of any charges.

The SEC's investigation has been led by three attorneys in the enforcement section: Jonathan P. Scott, Kenneth R. Lynch and Anthony Sporkin. All declined comment. The SEC has also scrutinized Delphi transactions with Bank One, GM, Tennessee-based Setech, and BBK Ltd., a Southfield-based turnaround firm. The commission also looked at the role of Delphi's former independent auditor, Deloitte & Touche. All of those companies turned over records to the SEC.

Last November, GM said it had overstated income for 2001 by approximately $300 million to $400 million -- or about 25 to 35 percent -- in connection with supplier credits. GM has said it received an SEC subpoena into "our transactions in precious metal raw materials used in our automotive manufacturing operations, and a federal grand jury recently issued a subpoena in connection with supplier credits."

The investigation into Delphi began after EDS -- another former GM subsidiary -- told the SEC in June 2004 about a $20 million loan in 2001 that Delphi booked as income. The SEC upgraded its probe into a formal investigation in August 2004.

One hurdle to settling SEC claims is the still active criminal investigation into the accounting fraud led by the Justice Department's fraud section. Jack Patrick, the lead Justice Department prosecutor, has been in Detroit in recent weeks working on the case. Patrick declined comment. Lawyers for shareholders who have sued Delphi and its former officers say the suit and the company's October 2005 bankruptcy are "the result of a massive accounting fraud."

"By any measure, the fraud at Delphi -- which hid Delphi's slide into bankruptcy -- is among the most egregious schemes to defraud investors in recent history," the plaintiffs said in a 147-page court filing in Detroit signed by Southfield lawyer Debra Pevos.

The filing suggested there were $440 million in sham transactions.

All of those suits have been consolidated in front of U.S. District Judge Gerald E. Rosen in Detroit, who hasn't ruled on whether they can go forward.

You can reach David Shepardson at (202) 662-8735 or dshepardson@detnews.com.

CRIMINAL LAW:

78 Charged In Bankruptcy Fraud Sting (AP-YBIZ)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, October 19, 2006

78 People Charged in the Past Two Months in National Bankruptcy Fraud Sting

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Nine lawyers, an ex-police officer and an electrician who bribed a former governor were among 78 people charged with bankruptcy fraud in the past two months, the Justice Department said Wednesday.

Eighteen of the arrests came this week alone, said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, who outlined the nationwide crackdown on people trying to conceal more than $3 million in assets.

"In the end, we all wind up paying for fraud, in the form of higher interest rates and fees from companies that offer credit and loans," McNulty told reporters.

Bankruptcy fraud often follows false claims on mortgages, banks and the mail, McNulty said.

The arrests are on track to outpace last year's estimated total of 100 bankruptcy fraud cases, the FBI said.

The names of those charged were not released in Washington, although a department investigator said a former Denver police officer was snared in the two-month sting, dubbed "Operation Truth or Consequences."

Among those charged was Kurt Claywell, an electrical contractor who admitted giving former Connecticut Gov. John G. Rowland expensive champagne and Cuban cigars for access to state contracts. Authorities in New Haven, Conn., said the assets Claywell tried to hide included a boat, a rare book collection, 35 acres of land, $35,000 worth of wine and a gun collection.

A dozen of the arrests came in the Chicago area, where federal prosecutor David Glockner described swindlers who used bankruptcy fraud in home-rescue schemes marketed to people desperate to hang onto their homes.

Under these schemes, homeowners facing foreclosure sell their homes to "investors," prosecutors said. They said the former homeowners then pay rent to the investors with the promise that they can get back both the homes and built-up equity when their finances are healthier.

DOJ_NMG_0083255

Prosecutors said crooked attorneys then declare bankruptcy on behalf of the former homeowners, illegally hiding the sale from the bankruptcy court, paying off the mortgage and pocketing the equity.

The former homeowners then are allowed to buy back the property at full price if they can afford to do so.

"This is the new face of bankruptcy fraud," Glockner said.

Associated Press writers Mike Robinson in Chicago and John Christoffersen in New Haven, Conn., contributed to this report.

Feds Charge 78 With Bankruptcy Fraud (CNN)

By Terry Frieden, Justice Producer

CNN.com, October 19, 2006

Sweep nets 9 lawyers, 1 ex-police officer for concealed assets, fake IDs, docs.

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Bankruptcy fraud charges have been filed against 78 people in a federal operation aimed at protecting the integrity of the nation's bankruptcy system, the Justice Department and FBI announced Wednesday.

Authorities said the nationwide sweep culminated Wednesday with arrests stemming from 18 cases of bankruptcy fraud and related counts.

Those charged include nine lawyers, two bankruptcy petition preparers and a former police officer. The cases involved concealment of more than $3 million in assets, use of false identities and forged documents, and fraudulent receipt of government loans and benefits, officials said.

"Bankruptcy fraud is often the tip of the criminal iceberg, and that makes these prosecutions so important," said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty.

Bankruptcy filings often are the last step of a series of criminal acts that include mortgage fraud, bank fraud, mail fraud, money laundering and defrauding of government programs, he said.

The culmination of "Operation Truth or Consequences" coincided with the anniversary of new bankruptcy laws aimed at combating fraud.

Bankruptcy law not as bad as predicted

Authorities said the 78 people charged were named in 69 prosecutions in 36 judicial districts.

FBI Assistant Director Chip Burrus issued a statement staying the nationwide sweep "highlights the scope of bankruptcy fraud and negative impact on the economy."

Top law enforcement officials planned to announce details of the operation at an afternoon news conference at the Justice Department in Washington.

Nationwide Fraud Sweep Nets 3 In Pa. (PTR)

By Karen Roebuck

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, October 19, 2006

A Sewickley attorney and two other Western Pennsylvania residents were indicted this week as part of a nationwide crackdown on bankruptcy fraud and related crimes.

Attorney Robin L. Grassel, 42, faces two counts of embezzlement from bankruptcy estates. She is among 78 people nationwide -- including nine attorneys -- charged as part of what the U.S. Department of Justice dubbed "Operation Truth or Consequences."

The allegations leveled nationwide include concealing more than $3 million in assets, using fake identities and Social Security numbers, forging documents and defrauding people whose homes were in foreclosure.

The Justice Department announced Wednesday it has set up an e-mail hotline for the public to report suspected bankruptcy fraud. Reports can be sent to USTP.Bankruptcy.Fraud@usdog.gov.

Grassel, also known as Robin Musher, was representing clients in bankruptcy proceedings and administering their funds when she embezzled or misappropriated the funds, the indictment charges.

She embezzled $104,832.94 from the bankruptcy estate of clients identified only as MW and PW and $47,420.28 from Jimmie and Joyce B., according to the indictment.

Bankruptcy trustee Ronda J. Winnecour previously said that Michael and Patti Weber, who filed for Chapter 13 bankruptcy in 2002, sold their Crafton house in 2004 for $104,832.94. A check issued in Winnecour's name for the home's sale was given to Grassel, their attorney, but ended up in Grassel's business account instead of the Webers' trustee account, according to court records.

Catherine Jeter, of Ambridge, Beaver County, was charged with forging U.S. Bankruptcy Court Judge Judith K. Fitzgerald's signature in June on a court order to discharge her bankruptcy case, according to the indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0083256

George Davitch Jr., 62, of Jerome, Somerset County, was charged with making a false statement under penalty of perjury in his 2001 bankruptcy case by failing to report income he continued to receive from an inheritance, according to the indictment.

If convicted, Grassel, Jeter and Davitch, none of whom could be reached for comment, face up to five years in prison and a fine up to $250,000 on each count.

The U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of Pennsylvania is asking that a summons be issued for each of the defendants instead of arrest warrants and suggested unsecured, $10,000 bonds be set for each.

Karen Roebuck can be reached at kroebuck@tribweb.com or (412) 320-7939.

Feds Crack Down On Bankruptcy Fraud (UPI)

UPI, October 19, 2006

U.S. prosecutors have filed criminal charges against 78 people for alleged bankruptcy fraud and related offenses.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said Wednesday federal prosecutors charged individuals in 69 separate prosecutions in 36 judicial districts in a national project called "Operation Truth or Consequences."

The project includes charges filed against nine lawyers, two bankruptcy petition preparers and one former law enforcement officer. Charges include alleged concealment of more than $3 million in assets and the alleged use of false Social Security numbers and false identities.

"Today we send a clear message to those who abuse, for their own criminal financial gain, the bankruptcy system's promise of a fresh start to honest Americans," said McNulty. "A bankruptcy filing is often the last step of a series of criminal acts, including mortgage fraud, bank fraud, mail fraud, money laundering and government program fraud. Bankruptcy fraud is often the tip of the criminal iceberg, and that makes these prosecutions so important."

McNulty also announced the creation of a new Internet hotline for reporting suspected bankruptcy fraud to the Justice Department's U.S. Trustee Program.

Ariz. Residents Indicted In Bankruptcy Fraud (AZREP)

By Dennis Wagner, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, October 19, 2006

Two federal fraud prosecutions under way in Arizona are part of a nationwide campaign to thwart abuse of U.S. bankruptcy courts, according to the Justice Department.

One of the cases was filed in August against attorney James Joseph Everett, 51, who is accused of concealing about $500,000 in assets and income. The other indictment names three family members from southern Arizona accused of seeking bankruptcy protection as part of a larger swindle of government funds.

Those cases are among 69 filed nationally under Operation Truth or Consequences, launched to protect the integrity of the bankruptcy system, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said in a news release.

advertisement

Federal prosecutors also announced the creation of an Internet hotline for reporting suspected bankruptcy fraud at USTP.Bankruptcy.Fraud@usdoj.gov.

McNulty said 18 of the cases were filed Wednesday to deliver "a clear message to those who abuse, for their own financial gain, the bankruptcy system's promise of a fresh start to honest Americans. . . . Bankruptcy is often the tip of the criminal iceberg, and that makes these prosecutions so important."

In Phoenix, Everett was indicted on 34 counts, including money laundering, false declarations and bankruptcy fraud. The U.S. Attorney's Office said he used $300,000 in concealed funds to purchase a house in Paradise Valley. Everett faces a maximum 20-year prison sentence for money laundering, the most serious offense.

The other Arizona case involves Sergio and Sandra Renteria of Willcox and their daughter, Kayla Taylor. They were indicted in August on charges of conspiracy and fraud in connection with an $800,000 loan from the Farm Service Agency. They are accused of failing to repay the loan while selling crops and equipment pledged as collateral. The indictment says Taylor also used loan money to buy a pair of Mercedes Benz cars. Finally, the Renterias are charged with filing for bankruptcy while hiding assets from the court. They face up to 30 years in prison.

Weldon Undecided On Letter (PHI)

By Todd Mason And John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 19, 2006

U.S. Rep. Curt Weldon (R., Pa.) said he hasn't decided whether to release a letter from the House Ethics Committee that he says "closed the case" on whether he used his influence to help his daughter.

The FBI is probing whether Weldon helped his daughter Karen and friend Charles P. Sexton Jr. land $1 million in contracts from a Russian energy firm and a Serbian family with ties to Slobodan Milosevic.

"My kids do their own work," the 10-term congressman told a media scrum yesterday in the Ridley Township Municipal Building after a hearing on flight-path changes at Philadelphia International Airport.

Weldon is in a neck-and-neck race against retired Adm. Joe Sestak, a 31-year Navy veteran who was raised in Springfield, Delaware County. Because of the disclosure of the FBI investigation last week, political observers say the race is now leaning in the Democrat's favor.

Yesterday, Weldon repeated his claim that he presented documents to the Ethics Committee in 2004 when the Los Angeles Times broke the story, and the committee didn't pursue the matter.

Weldon and his attorney, William J. Winning, said they hadn't decided yet whether to release the committee's letter.

A source close to the Weldon campaign said the four-page document, dated Sept. 29, discusses the allegations about Weldon's daughter and dismisses them without issuing a warning or reprimand.

In an e-mail advertisement Monday, headlined "Left-Wing Smears Have Sunk to New Low," the Weldon campaign said the House panel closed the case in 2004, and blamed Democrats for trying to derail Weldon's reelection.

Sources said the FBI had planned to implement the search warrants after the election and, in fact, had been wiretapping some people involved in the case.

The wiretaps and search warrants were approved by federal judges based on a sealed and detailed affidavit from an FBI agent establishing "probable cause" that crimes had been committed. The searches were carried out Monday because agents feared that once suspects in the case knew they were under investigation, evidence might be destroyed, sources said.

Russ Caso, Weldon's chief of staff, told The Inquirer that the Ethics Committee letter was not issued until last month because of the committee's disarray in recent years.

Weldon escalated the attack on Sestak yesterday, saying that a retired FBI agent, Gregory J. Auld, told him that Sestak's campaign had prior knowledge of six FBI raids Monday in Philadelphia and Jacksonville, Fla.

Weldon said Auld "has confirmed to me that a person who works on my opponent's campaign was bragging that the campaign knew three weeks ago" of a major negative development in October.

Ryan Rudominer, a spokesman for Sestak, said: "Curt Weldon's bizarre conspiracy theories are absurd and, of course, false. The idea that our campaign has any influence over the FBI or the Republican-led Justice Department is laughable."

Auld, who worked 32 years for the bureau, operates a private security company in Newtown Square that has performed background checks on behalf of the Weldon campaign.

In an interview last night, Auld said a friend approached him Tuesday at a gym to tell about what the Sestak supporter had allegedly said three weeks ago. Auld would not identify the friend.

Auld said: "My friend told me that a guy wearing a Sestak T-shirt had said, 'Something big is going to be coming down on Curt Weldon in three weeks.' "

Hearing this, Auld said, he approached the unidentified Sestak supporter at the gym and said: "You guys must be happy about what happened over the weekend."

He said the Sestak supporter shrugged and replied: "We sniffed this out two weeks ago."

David Landau, a Sestak adviser, said: "That somehow all of this is being manufactured by Democrats is ludicrous... . This is the Republican National Committee playbook: Blame the Democrats."

Weldon shrugged off observations yesterday by reporters that the probe reportedly began in May, before Sestak had emerged as serious candidate, and that the FBI and the Justice Department answer to a Republican administration.

The investigation "is what it is," Weldon said. "The bureaucracy doesn't change with the presidential leadership." Weldon said he was telling Republicans that "I have to rely on their support for me in the past."

7 Plead Guilty In Stolen Body Parts Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-Seven funeral home directors linked to a scheme to plunder corpses and sell the body parts for transplants have secretly pleaded guilty to undisclosed charges, prosecutors announced Wednesday.

The unidentified directors all agreed to cooperate in an ongoing investigation into what investigators describe as an enterprise to steal bone and tissue from cadavers and sell the material to biomedical supply companies for profit, Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes said.

The seven entered their pleas in closed courtrooms and their names were withheld, but defense attorneys said that among those cooperating was the director of a funeral home that took parts from the body of "Masterpiece Theatre" host Alistair Cooke.

DOJ_NMG_0083258

Funeral Home Directors Plead Guilty In Organ Smuggling Case (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 19, 2006

Seven US funeral home directors have pleaded guilty to trafficking bones and organs taken from hundreds of cadavers, authorities said.

The guilty pleas in New York came eight months after four other people were charged with illegally harvesting bones and organs from more than 1,000 corpses, including the bones of the late veteran BBC broadcaster Alistair Cooke.

The Justice Department announced Wednesday that it had expanded its indictment against the four, Michael Mastromarino, Joseph Nicelli, Lee Cruceta, and Christopher Aldorasi.

"These ghoulish thieves thought they could pull off the crime of the century, stealing bones from the dead, without any thoughts to their victims' families or the transplant recipients who would receive possibly tainted bone and tissue grafts," Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes said in a statement.

Funeral homes in Rochester, Manhattan, Brooklyn and the Bronx have been accused of providing corpses for the organ smuggling scheme.

In announcing the indictment in February, authorities alleged that the four men made millions of dollars selling body tissue to transplant companies.

In many cases, the bones were replaced by PVC pipes so that their theft would not be noticed at a funeral, authorities said.

At the same time, the accused would regularly toss gloves, aprons, and other evidence of their criminal handiwork into the bodies before sewing them back up, prosecutors said.

The bones, tendons, heart valves and other tissue were harvested in a funeral home owned by Nicelli, authorities said.

Cooke -- a nationally recognized broadcaster in Britain -- was best known for his "Letter From America" program which aired weekly on BBC domestic and World Service radio for over 50 years.

He died in New York in March 2004 from lung cancer. He was 95.

Death Penalty Out On A Technicality (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

A federal judge has ruled that prosecutors cannot seek the death penalty against two D.C. men accused of running a violent street gang in Southeast because the government missed a key deadline.

U.S. District Judge Richard W. Roberts ruled that the Justice Department failed to file a timely notice of intent to seek the death penalty against Antwuan Ball and David Wilson. The judge's opinion was issued late Tuesday and made public yesterday.

Mr. Ball and Mr. Wilson are awaiting trial on charges of murder, racketeering and drug trafficking after a joint investigation by the Metropolitan Police Department and the FBI of the so-called Congress Park Crew in Southeast.

In his ruling, Judge Roberts said the "government showed no cause, much less any good cause" for failing to file a notice of intent to seek the death penalty by a court-ordered Sept. 15 deadline.

Prosecutors filed a notice of intent to seek the death penalty Sept. 25. Citing the missed deadline, the judge barred capital punishment in the case Sept. 18.

One week later, prosecutors filed notice to seek the death penalty with a separate motion asking the judge to reconsider his Sept. 18 ruling.

The government attorneys blamed the delay on a misunderstanding about the deadline, the need for more deliberations and the fifth anniversary of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

But Judge Roberts remained unconvinced.

"The government still has offered no explanation for how the anniversary of the September 11 attacks delayed this decision or anything else," the judge wrote in Tuesday's ruling. "It still has offered no reason why the Justice Department could not complete its assessment in the suggested five months I agreed to."

It's not clear whether prosecutors plan to appeal the ruling.

"We are currently reviewing our options but have no further comment at this time," said Channing Phillips, spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office.

In federal cases, the U.S. Attorney's Office must seek approval to appeal a decision from the Solicitor General's Office.

Attorneys for Mr. Ball declined to comment yesterday. Mr. Wilson's attorneys said they were planning to travel to the D.C. Jail yesterday to give their client a copy of the judge's ruling.

"We expected this. We're not surprised the judge was going to uphold his previous ruling," attorney Cynthia Katkish said. "We're all very happy."

DOJ_NMG_0083259

The judge's ruling marks the second setback for prosecutors involving a capital case in the District in recent months.

In August, U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Huvelle threw out key statements by three men charged in the killing of U.S. tourists in Uganda in 1999. The judge said that the government couldn't prove the defendants were not tortured during their capture in Rwanda.

The only other capital-murder defendant awaiting trial in the District is Larry Gooch, whom authorities have called an enforcer for the M Street drug gang in Northeast.

Mr. Gooch, who is charged in five killings, has pleaded not guilty.

Only two capital-murder cases have gone to trial in the District, and each resulted in the defendants' receiving life in prison.

Capital punishment is banned in the District, although it can be sought in federal cases.

Ex-clerk To Testify About Page Scandal (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, October 19, 2006

The former clerk of the House will face ethics investigators Thursday in what could be the most important testimony yet on how GOP leaders handled complaints about Rep. Mark Foley's behavior toward pages — including the early concerns of a Louisiana congressman who testified Wednesday.

The questioning of former Clerk Jeff Trandahl comes after Louisiana GOP Rep. Rodney Alexander spoke with investigators for three hours about how his office handled a complaint last fall from a former page about too-friendly e-mails from Foley.

GOP leaders are facing scrutiny over whether they or their aides did too little to stop Foley's inappropriate behavior toward pages when problems surfaced years ago. The revelations have been followed by weakening poll numbers for Republicans, who insist that no one in their party knew of the sexually graphic e-mails that have scandalized the public.

Trandahl's testimony is critical in determining how many people knew about Foley's behavior with pages and whether there are even more incidents than those reported so far.

Alexander discussed the matter last spring with two top House GOP lawmakers, Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio and campaign chair Tom Reynolds of New York, both of whom say they spoke with House Speaker Dennis Hastert about it. Hastert, R-Ill., has said he does not recall the conversations.

Trandahl confronted Foley, a Florida Republican, last fall over his e-mails to the Louisiana boy and was alerted about inappropriate e-mails Foley sent in 2001 or 2002 to a former page sponsored by Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz.

As the House officer with direct responsibility for the page program, Trandahl is virtually certain to know whether there have been other complaints about Foley, including an alleged incident in which the Florida Republican tried to enter the page dorm while drunk.

The panel is trying to determine whether lawmakers and staff aides acted properly when alerted about Foley's behavior. Trandahl's testimony is crucial to knowing how many people knew about the page issue — and how problems with Foley were handled — before the scandal exploded last month.

Foley resigned from the House on Sept. 29 after being confronted with sexually explicit messages sent in 2003 to a former Oklahoma page.

Trandahl is in position to support testimony by Kirk Fordham, a former top aide to Foley, who has told the ethics panel that he informed top House GOP aides of Foley's inappropriate behavior toward pages years ago. Fordham has testified he told senior House staff aides about the page dorm incident when it happened several years ago.

A key issue is whether staff aides to Hastert knew about Foley's improper behavior before the 2005 episode and whether they told Hastert — who says he knew nothing about Foley and pages prior to the day Foley resigned.

On Wednesday, Foley's most recent chief of staff, Elizabeth Nicolson, testified before the ethics panel.

Alexander sponsored a page who complained of receiving overly friendly e-mails from Foley, including one that asked for a photograph and mentioned a different teen who was in "great shape."

An Alexander aide last fall told an aide to Hastert about the e-mails, setting off a chain of events that led Trandahl and Page Board Chairman John Shimkus, R-Ill., to tell Foley to stop contacting the boy.

Boehner, whom Alexander subsequently alerted about the e-mails last spring, also testifies Thursday. Boehner's public statements are at odds with Hastert. He told a Cincinnati radio station earlier this month that when he approached Hastert about Foley last spring Hastert told him "it had been taken care of."

Hastert and his aides, including powerful chief of staff and confidant Scott Palmer, have yet to testify before the ethics panel.

DOJ_NMG_0083260

Key Figures In Foley Scandal Testify Today To Ethics Panel (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — Two key witnesses will testify before the House ethics committee today on what they knew about former congressman Mark Foley's contacts with teenage boys.

House Majority Leader John Boehner and former House clerk Jeff Trandahl are scheduled to appear before the panel, which is investigating whether lawmakers or congressional staffers ignored or suppressed complaints about Foley's communications with congressional pages.

Their appearances before the committee come less than three weeks before an election that will determine control of Congress. Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned Sept. 29 after being confronted by ABC News with lewd Internet messages that he allegedly sent pages.

At issue is whether congressional leaders should have investigated more aggressively after Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., complained about e-mails that Foley sent to a page Alexander had sponsored. The e-mails were not sexually explicit but the boy's parents asked Alexander to stop Foley from sending them.

Alexander, who testified for three hours before the panel Wednesday, told top staffers in Speaker Dennis Hastert's office last year about the e-mails. At that point, Trandahl, who supervised the page program, and Rep. John Shimkus, an Illinois Republican who runs the page board, confronted Foley and extracted a promise that he would stop contacting the Louisiana boy.

Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., accused the GOP of covering up complaints about Foley because of the upcoming election.

"The Republican leadership in Congress decided to put their political fortunes above the safety of the youngsters," he said at a National Press Club lunch on the elections.

Hastert, R-Ill., has said he knew nothing about the sexually-explicit Internet messages that came to light last month until Foley resigned. Two members of his leadership team, Boehner and Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., said they talked to the speaker about separate non-sexual messages to the Louisiana boy last spring.

In Florida, lawyers for Foley said they revealed to state prosecutors Wednesday the name of a clergyman Foley said abused him as a teen. A joint statement from attorneys David Roth and Gerald Richman said they agreed with the Archdiocese of Miami that the clergy member's name should first be disclosed to the state attorney's office.

Also, a Florida judge ruled that the GOP can't post signs at polling places explaining that votes for Foley, whose name remains on the ballot, will go to a replacement candidate, state Rep. Joe Negron. Reynolds, who heads the House GOP congressional campaign committee, said at the Press Club event he thinks the party can hold onto the Foley seat because voters in the district are "very educated."

Ethics To Hear Key Testimony (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, October 19, 2006

In what could prove to be the turning point in the investigation of former Rep. Mark Foley's (R-Fla.) interaction with House pages — and what Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his staff did or did not know about it — the House ethics committee will take testimony today on the Foley case from former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) will also appear before the panel today — voluntarily and unaccompanied by counsel — but Trandahl is expected to be the star attraction.

Trandahl has retained defense attorney Cono Namorato, and has made no public statements since Foley resigned Sept. 29. Through his attorney, Trandahl has said he will "cooperate fully" with both the FBI's probe and the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct.

Trandahl could provide key testimony as to when senior aides to Hastert were first informed of Foley's alleged inappropriate behavior with male pages. Trandahl also could confirm or dispute the veracity of the timeline of events released by the Speaker's office on Sept. 30.

In that timeline, Trandahl was first contacted by Hastert's deputy chief of staff, Mike Stokke, in the fall of 2005 regarding an e-mail exchange between Foley and a former page. Trandahl discussed the e-mails with a top aide to Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) because his office had sponsored the former page but, according to the timeline, Trandahl was never shown the e-mail exchange, which was later characterized as "over-friendly."

Trandahl then met with Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the House Page Board, and advised Hastert's staff counsel, Ted Van Der Meid, of the meeting. Trandahl and Shimkus questioned Foley on the e-mail exchange and advised him to cease all contact with the former page.

DOJ_NMG_0083261

"The Clerk recalls that later that day he encountered Van Der Meid on the House floor and reported to him that he and Shimkus personally had spoken to Foley and had taken corrective action," the timeline states.

Trandahl's testimony also will be central to corroborating the testimony of Kirk Fordham, Rep. Tom Reynolds' (R-N.Y.) former chief of staff who resigned amid the Foley scandal. Fordham, who worked as a top aide to Foley for 10 years, testified before the ethics committee last week.

Fordham has alleged that he alerted Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, to Foley's inappropriate behavior with pages as early as 2003. Palmer has publicly denied that account. Though his actual testimony is secret, Fordham also reportedly planned to tell the ethics panel that Trandahl was aware of Foley's behavior toward pages and attempted to take corrective action as early as 2000.

Trandahl left the House Clerk post in late 2005 to become the executive director of the National Fish and Wildlife Foundation. He began work in Congress in 1983 and was appointed House Clerk in December 1998 — the same month Hastert was tapped to become Speaker.

When Hastert appointed Trandahl, he was not considered part of Hastert's inner circle. In contrast, the current House Clerk, Karen Haas, worked as a floor aide to the Speaker before succeeding Trandahl.

Also testifying today is Boehner, the first member of the leadership to appear before the investigative panel on this matter.

Boehner has played a more peripheral role in the Foley investigation, as he was not in leadership in the fall of 2005 when the Speaker's office first was notified. Boehner was approached by Alexander about the Foley matter earlier this year, and he has said he recalls subsequently asking Hastert about it. Hastert has said he does not recall that conversation, nor a similar one with Reynolds, the National Republican Congressional Committee chairman, which Reynolds says happened.

Boehner's chief of staff, Paula Nowakowski, appeared before the ethics committee on Tuesday. Alexander met with the committee to give his version of events Wednesday.

Among the Members and aides that still are expected to appear are Palmer, Stokke, Van Der Meid and Reynolds. Spokesmen for Reynolds and Hastert said Wednesday that their bosses had not been contacted by the ethics panel about testifying.

Louisiana Page Not Central To Inquiry, Lawmaker Says (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 18 — The former Congressional page from Louisiana whose e-mail exchanges with Representative Mark Foley set off a Capitol Hill scandal was neither exposed to nor aware of the sexually explicit instant messages that ultimately led to Mr. Foley's resignation, the lawmaker who sponsored the page said.

Representative Rodney Alexander, Republican of Louisiana, said Wednesday that the page, who lives in his district, was not familiar with Mr. Foley's pattern of conduct and should not be a focal point of the investigation.

Mr. Alexander added that even though the former page had received only e-mail messages described as overly friendly, he still had been "exposed to a lot of trauma" since giving copies of his e-mail exchanges with Mr. Foley last year to Mr. Alexander's office.

After news reports about the messages, other former pages came forward with information about instant-message exchanges with Mr. Foley.

"His parents have been almost physically sick about the attention that he's gotten," said Mr. Alexander, speaking to reporters after testifying for three hours before the House ethics committee. "We just look forward to the committee continuing their investigation, and hopefully this will come to a conclusion."

The former page, who told a Congressional aide that Mr. Foley's request for his photograph was "sick, sick, sick, sick," has not been identified and has not spoken publicly about the case. Neither he nor other pages have appeared before the committee, which is investigating whether the House Republican leadership properly handled concerns over Mr. Foley's behavior.

As Mr. Alexander left the closed-door session of the ethics committee on Wednesday, he declined to reveal details of his testimony, the same position taken by other witnesses. He said the questions in the case would be resolved only through interviews with other lawmakers.

"We told them what we know, when we knew it, and what we did about it," Mr. Alexander said. "There are many people who know what we know, and have known it for a lot longer period of time than we've known."

The committee also spent more than three hours questioning Elizabeth Nicolson, who was the chief of staff to Mr. Foley when he resigned on Sept. 29. Ms. Nicolson declined to comment as she left the hearing room early Wednesday evening.

DOJ_NMG_0083262

The committee also intends to examine the conduct of Representative Jim Kolbe of Arizona, the only openly gay Republican in Congress, after a request from members of the Congressional page board to include Mr. Kolbe in the inquiry because of complaints the board had received.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Kolbe, Korenna Cline, said Wednesday that her office had not been contacted by the ethics committee, but that Mr. Kolbe would cooperate with any requests for information.

On Thursday, the House ethics committee is scheduled to hear from the majority leader, John A. Boehner, Republican of Ohio, and the former clerk of the House, Jeff Trandahl. Investigators say they believe Mr. Trandahl can help answer questions about how long Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office knew about Mr. Foley's conduct.

Meanwhile, law enforcement officials said that Federal Bureau of Investigation interviews with a number of former pages had found no evidence that Mr. Foley violated federal sex crime statutes. Federal law generally requires proof that an adult engaged in an overtly sexual solicitation of someone under the age of consent, which varies by state.

Nevertheless, the officials said, there is no sign that the Justice Department's preliminary inquiry is close to an end. Prosecutors have 90 days to conduct such investigations before deciding whether to go forward or shut the inquiry down.

Foley Lawyers Tell Accused Abuser's Name (AP-Y)

By Brian Skoloff

AP, October 19, 2006

Lawyers for disgraced former Congressman Mark Foley said they revealed to state prosecutors Wednesday the name of a clergyman he said abused him as a teen.

The announcement came two weeks after Foley's criminal defense lawyer, David Roth, first said Foley had been abused by a clergyman. The claim came as he responded to accusations that Foley sent sexually explicit Internet communications to teenage boys who worked on Capitol Hill.

Foley, 52, a Florida Republican, resigned last month after being confronted with the Internet exchanges and has since entered a 30-day rehabilitation program for alcoholism, according to his attorneys.

Mike Edmondson, a spokesman for the state attorney's office in West Palm Beach, said Wednesday evening his office had not yet seen the name.

"I'm sure they faxed it over. It could very well just be sitting on the fax machine," Edmondson said.

A joint statement from Roth and Foley's civil attorney, Gerald Richman, said they agreed with the Archdiocese of Miami that the clergy member's name should first be disclosed to the state attorney's office. Edmondson said prosecutors would share the name of the clergyman with the Archdiocese Thursday, as long as it was received by the office before it opened for business.

"To the best of our knowledge, the clergyman no longer resides in the United States," the statement said.

Earlier in the day, Archdiocese spokeswoman Mary Ross Agosta said the church was growing frustrated with the drip of information coming from Foley's attorneys.

"However he wants to tell us, fine, but tell us," Agosta said. "It's very frustrating at this point."

On Tuesday, Richman said that would only say that the priest who allegedly abused Foley is still alive and that the statute of limitations for criminal charges against the man has expired.

Edmondson said Wednesday that to claim outright that the statute of limitations has expired is somewhat misleading because the alleged abuser may have committed similar crimes more recently on other victims.

"There's still a pool of potential victims out there," he said.

Richman did not return a telephone message seeking comment. Roth has declined to discuss the case.

109th Congress Just Can't Resist (USAT)

By Jonathan Turley

USA Today, October 19, 2006

In its waning months, the 109th Congress has finally achieved a status in politics that the 1919 Black Sox achieved in sports: It is a symbol of utter corruption. Over the past two years, the congressional scandals have traversed the universe from the gross to the grandiose to the grotesque: visits from call girls, gifts of Rolls Royces and fancy commodes, sweetheart deals for contractors, high-paying lobbyist jobs for underachieving children, free vacations for members and their families.

Yet, if the young boy saying "say it ain't so, Joe" to Shoeless Joe Jackson perfectly summed up the betrayal of the 1919 World Series, the young male pages pursued by former GOP congressman Mark Foley of Florida perfectly summed up the betrayal of the 109th Congress. The public clearly suspects that, in dealing with Foley, House leaders were more concerned with protecting a House seat than a House page. In a CNN poll, 75% of Americans say the Republicans failed to act responsibly, and 52% believe a coverup was attempted.

DOJ_NMG_0083263

If the page scandal captures the raw depravity that is the 109th Congress, the proposed solution captures its raw audacity. Faced with the abuse of children, some lawmakers have called for the removal of the children. First voiced by Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Ill., some members have indicated that they would terminate the page service after almost 200 years of tradition. As LaHood explained, "We should not subject young men and women to this kind of activity, this kind of vulnerability." When asked whether he was suggesting that his colleagues cannot be trusted with children, he responded, "Well, that's pretty obvious."

Though this might seem like preventing bank robbery by getting rid of banks, it makes sense in the parallel moral universe of the 109th Congress. Indeed, these lawmakers appear to have adopted Oscar Wilde's rule that the only way to be rid of temptation is to yield to it.

Hence, the LaHood proposal: If one cannot deliver one's colleagues from temptation, you must remove the temptation from one's colleagues. Presumably, only then could pedophilic members be able to fully focus on the public good.

Under this logic, pages are the problem — lurking in the halls like sirens of destruction for lawmakers. Apostle Peter warned of such temptation with the devil "as a roaring lion walketh about, seeking whom he may devour." Only the faithful would survive, he cautioned, and "your brethren" would be brought low by "the same afflictions."

Fortunately, LaHood's solution has little support. Yet he and his colleagues may be on to something. While they accept that some members cannot be relied upon to exercise self-restraint with children, they do not address other temptations that have brought their brethren low. For example, why not bar lobbyists? If lawmakers have difficulty showing restraint around children, they've shown even less restraint around lobbyists.

The scandals are too numerous to detail, but various members are under criminal investigation, indictment, or federal custody. Former majority leader Tom DeLay is under indictment in Texas; Rep. William Jefferson, D-La., is still trying to explain $90,000 wrapped in foil in his freezer; GOP congressman Bob Ney of Ohio will likely face prison time after pleading guilty to conspiracy and making false statements while former colleague Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California is already in prison for taking more than $2.4 million in bribes.

In addition to various lawmakers still under investigation in the scandal involving lobbyist Jack Abramoff, members such as Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., Rep. Alan Mollohan, D-W.Va., and others have been accused of self-dealing in steering hundreds of millions of federal funds for personal benefit. Dozens of lawmakers have been criticized for having children or spouses working for lobbyists or accepting exorbitant vacations from outside groups. Just this week, the FBI searched homes in an investigation of whether Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., used his position to steer lobbying jobs to his daughter.

LaHood himself has been accused of questionable deals with lobbyists, including his earmarking of millions of dollars to benefit projects and firms. Some of these earmarks involved lobbyists who once sat on LaHood's fundraising committee. (After the Abramoff scandal, LaHood suddenly announced that he would get rid of his lobbyist-laden committee.) Likewise, LaHood and his wife have also been criticized for their free trips abroad, including one to China paid by the not-for-profit Aspen Institute.

Applying LaHood's logic, the solution is simple: no lobbyists, no lobbying scandals. Indeed, it is possible to remove every historic temptation from the halls of Congress so members can walk to the floor without a distracting thought. We could ban call girls (common in past scandals) and even order both genders to cover themselves with burqas while visiting congressional offices. The result would be a hermetically sealed, temptation-free environment for our morally challenged leaders.

Yet, it is sometimes more efficient to fence in a risk rather than to force everyone else to fence it out. It follows that it would be far better to fence in our lawmakers rather than fence out temptations such as children, pets or suggestively arranged plants.

Neither efficiency nor morality, however, have been particularly great influences on the 109th Congress. And it is a measure of how out of touch LaHood and company have become that they would address the lack of restraint of some lawmakers by eliminating all pages.

I am no biblical scholar, but when Peter promised that "the Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations," I don't think this is what he had in mind.

Jonathan Turley is the Shapiro Professor of Public Interest Law and a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors. He served as a House leadership page in 1977 and 1978.

Congressman Faces Questions Over Who Paid For Pacific Trip (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 18 — Representative John E. Sweeney, an upstate Republican who is in a fierce fight to keep his seat, is facing questions about a trip he took to a western Pacific island with an associate of Jack Abramoff, the powerful Washington lobbyist at the center of an extensive corruption scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0083264

The Times Union of Albany reported yesterday that Mr. Sweeney might have violated House ethics rules when he failed to disclose who paid for a trip that he made in January 2001 to one of the Northern Mariana Islands with Tony Rudy, who worked for Mr. Abramoff.

Mr. Sweeney made the trip to deliver a speech to the Saipan Chamber of Commerce in the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, a territory of the United States. Mr. Rudy was lobbying on behalf of the commonwealth.

The newspaper reported that the Chamber of Commerce says it paid for Mr. Sweeney's visit. But Mr. Sweeney failed to report that the chamber paid for the trip, despite Congressional rules requiring full disclosure of privately financed travel, according to the newspaper. The same rules prohibit lobbyists or lobbying groups from sponsoring Congressional travel.

Responding to the report, Mr. Sweeney's office released a statement saying that he believed the government of the Marianas had paid for the trip. House rules do not require the disclosure of any travel sponsored by the government, including United States territories.

"Congressman Sweeney has always endeavored to comply with every disclosure obligation, including this trip," said Melissa Carlson, his spokeswoman. "If the information the congressman was given proved to be inaccurate, he would immediately take action to self-report and fully comply with all requirements."

Apparently in an effort to head off any more potentially damaging news from the episode, Mr. Sweeney's office released a copy of a letter he sent to the House ethics committee indicating that the Chamber of Commerce might have paid for his trip, and not the government as he initially thought.

"I submit this information to the committee along with a request for guidance as to whether I am in compliance with all House rules or disclosure requirements," he wrote in his letter.

The questions being raised about the trip are an unwelcome development for Mr. Sweeney, who was already confronting a tough re-election fight with a little less than three weeks before Election Day. Throughout the campaign, he has made a series of questionable decisions that his Democratic rival, Kirsten Gillibrand, has used in an effort to portray him as ethically compromised.

Ms. Gillibrand quickly seized on the latest disclosures to go on the offensive again on Wednesday. Without citing evidence, Ms. Gillibrand and her advisers said that the trip might have been paid for by Mr. Rudy, who pleaded guilty in April to charges that he accepted thousands of dollars in illegal gifts in return for influencing legislation on behalf of Mr. Abramoff.

"Sadly, it is no surprise that John Sweeney is in trouble again," Ms. Gillibrand said.

Rep. Sweeney Didn't Report Marianas Trip With Abramoff Colleague (AP)

By Devlin Barrett, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 19, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. -- Rep. John Sweeney may have failed to properly report a 2001 trip with a lobbyist now cooperating in a federal investigation of congressional corruption, but he insisted Wednesday he did not knowingly violate any rules.

Sweeney, R-Clifton Park, asked the House Ethics Committee to tell him if he should submit new paperwork about his reimbursed travel five years ago.

"I don't believe that I'm not in compliance," said Sweeney.

The Times Union of Albany reported Wednesday that the Northern Marianas government denied paying for the congressman's travel. Instead, the executive director of the Saipan Chamber of Commerce said her group financed the trip, the newspaper reported.

Abramoff was lobbying at the time on behalf of the Northern Marianas government, which opposed labor reforms proposed for the U.S. commonwealth.

His colleague, Tony Rudy, who had just left the staff of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay to work for Abramoff, accompanied Sweeney. Rudy is now cooperating in a federal investigation into congressional corruption involving Abramoff.

Sweeney, who has not been linked to the Abramoff corruption case, said Wednesday, "I don't know Jack Abramoff and I've never even met Jack Abramoff."

The congressman's financial forms were reviewed last year by the Department of Justice at the same time records of Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, were reviewed. Ney pleaded guilty Friday to conspiracy and making false statements as part of the Abramoff influence-peddling scandal.

Sweeney sent a letter to the head of the House Ethics Committee on Wednesday asking whether he should amend his disclosure forms, seeking "guidance as to whether I am in compliance with all House Rules or disclosure requirements."

The congressman is in the midst of his most challenging re-election campaign, against Democrat Kirsten Gillibrand.

She has repeatedly accused Sweeney of ethical lapses, and said of the 2001 trip: "Its not clear what's worse: his failure to disclose that a criminal paid for his trip abroad or that he was willing to sing the praises of an island of sweatshops and child prostitution."

DOJ_NMG_0083265

Sweeney spokeswoman Melissa Carlson said the congressman had been told the trip was paid for by the Marianas government, which is a U.S. territory. Lawmakers are not required to report travel paid for by the government.

"If the information the congressman was given proved to be inaccurate, he would immediately take action to self-report and fully comply with all requirements," Carlson told the Associated Press. "The congressman has always acted in good faith with respect to official travel."

Sweeney spoke at the Saipan Chamber of Commerce during the trip, in part because Northern Mariana Islands officials wanted Sweeney to advise them on potential reforms of local businesses that Democrats brand sweatshops.

Sweeney, a former state labor commissioner, said Wednesday that during the trip, "what I saw was very above-board."

Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., an outspoken critic of the Marianas garment industry, said the problems there are obvious.

"The only way you could avoid seeing the abuses in the Marianas is if you were deliberately looking the other way," said Miller. "It is the responsibility of members of Congress to do their own research before going on a trip or entering into a relationship with a lobbyist. By 2001 there was ample documentation of serious abuses in the Marianas."

Chamber of Commerce Executive Director Christine Parke told the Times Union in an e-mail that the chamber "did pay for Mr. Sweeney's expenses out of the proceeds of the dinner." She said she had no supporting documents and could not provide a total cost.

Charles Reyes, spokesman for Marianas Gov. Benigno R. Fitial, wrote to the newspaper: "Our finance office confirms that, based on available financial records, the CNMI government did not make any payment to or for Congressman John Sweeney for any expenses in connection with the congressman's travel to the commonwealth on or about January 2001."

Bob Ney, Guilty But Still At Capitol (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 18 — Representative Bob Ney is headed to prison early next year after pleading guilty to charges of accepting tens of thousands of dollars in illegal gifts from lobbyists. Until then, Mr. Ney, a six-term Republican from Ohio, has a comfortable place to bide his time.

His Congressional office — the one that he has effectively acknowledged selling to the highest bidder — is open for business.

“The office of Congressman Bob Ney,” his telephone receptionist said in a cheery voice Tuesday morning, as if nothing had happened to her boss, the first member of Congress to confess to crimes involving the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Mr. Ney’s brass nameplate still hangs on the wall next to the heavy wooden doors of Room 2438 in the Rayburn House office building, just across the street from the Capitol, and it is likely to remain there for at least a few more weeks.

On Wednesday, much of his staff in Washington apparently worked a half-day, typical for Congressional offices during the pre-election recess. Mr. Ney’s lawyers said the locked doors this afternoon did not mean the office was closed permanently.

The day before, the lawmaker’s aides could be seen wandering in and out of his offices with regularity, all barred from commenting on Mr. Ney’s whereabouts or how he is spending his time. “We’re not allowed to talk with you,” said a young female staff member, clutching a stack of what appeared to be constituent mail.

In his guilty plea last week, Mr. Ney admitted to taking many gifts from Mr. Abramoff, including a 2002 golfing trip to Scotland by private jet, and then lying about them in his financial disclosure forms.

To the dismay of House colleagues eager to remove him as a symbol of the corruption scandals that are tarring several Republican candidates in next month’s Congressional elections, Mr. Ney, defying House leaders, has refused to step down for now, insisting that he owes his staff and his constituents a few more weeks of his time.

Until the House reconvenes after the elections, there is no way under Congressional rules to force him out. Republican House leaders have vowed to make Mr. Ney’s expulsion their first order of business when they return to Washington next month.

The last House member who faced expulsion, James Traficant Jr., a Democrat and a fellow Ohioan, was ousted from his seat in July 2002, four months after his conviction on bribery charges. But unlike Mr. Traficant, who continues to proclaim his innocence from prison, Mr. Ney is holding on to his job even after confessing to crimes.

One of Mr. Ney’s lawyers, William E. Lawler III, said in an interview that the lawmaker wanted to deal with the “odds and ends” of ending an 11-year career in Congress.

“There’s a lot of mechanical stuff that needs to be done — storage, archiving,” Mr. Lawler said.

In entering a guilty plea last week, Mr. Ney said in a statement that he would resign within a “few weeks” but wanted to remain in Congress for now “to make sure my staff members are O.K. and that any open constituent matters and obligations” are dealt with.

DOJ_NMG_0083266

Mr. Lawler was critical of skeptics who question whether Mr. Ney, whose most recent disclosure forms suggest that his only major asset is a second home in Greece worth $100,000 to $250,000, is holding on in Congress mostly because he wants to cash his final paychecks.

"I don't know why people don't accept his explanation at face value," the lawyer said.

The refusal to resign means that Mr. Ney can continue to draw on his $165,200-a-year salary, equivalent to $3,176 for each week he remains in the House, and his Congressional expense account, and to make use of a suite of offices on Capitol Hill, as well as four offices in his district in southeastern Ohio.

His Congressional staff — 16 people, according to the latest House staff directories — is still in place, with salaries totaling more than $70,000 a month. There appears to be a vacancy in the job of press secretary, however; reporters seeking comment from Mr. Ney are routinely referred to his chief of staff, David Popp, who has not returned several calls in recent weeks.

Mr. Ney's official House Web site is still on line, although his Web master has fallen far behind in updating the site. There is no mention of Mr. Ney's legal problems or his guilty plea, and the most recent online news release dates from August. Mr. Ney also retains an open invitation to the House gym.

One of his Congressional perks, free travel, has been curtailed, but not by his House colleagues. The federal judge who accepted Mr. Ney's guilty plea, Ellen Segal Huvelle, ordered him to turn over his passport and barred him from traveling outside the United States until his sentencing hearing, now scheduled for Jan. 19. Under the plea agreement, Mr. Ney could face up to 10 years in prison, but prosecutors are recommending 27 months.

Mr. Ney, despite a criminal record, will be able to begin collecting a Congressional pension of about $30,000 a year in a decade, when he turns 62.

Mr. Lawler, Mr. Ney's lawyer, said he was unsure if the lawmaker was working out of his Capitol Hill offices this week or if he was back in Ohio. Staff members working for other House members in the Rayburn building say they have not seen Mr. Ney for weeks.

"He's in and out," Mr. Lawler said. "I just don't have a lot of information for you."

Cunningham Offered To Testify From Jail (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, October 19, 2006

Former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) has offered to testify about his activities as a member of the House Intelligence Committee to the panel's chairman, Rep. Pete Hoekstra (R-Mich.), but only if Hoekstra personally travels to the North Carolina federal prison where Cunningham is now serving a sentence for bribery-related charges.

Hoekstra turned down the offer to meet with his former colleague, which was outlined in a recent letter from Cunningham to the Michigan Republican. Hoekstra told Cunningham that he wanted a special counsel appointed by the committee, Michael Stern, to conduct any interview with the imprisoned ex-lawmaker.

Cunningham's lawyer, Lee Blalack, was unaware of the letter that Cunningham sent to Hoekstra until informed by the committee. Blalack has stated repeatedly that Cunningham will refuse to testify before the committee even if subpoenaed by the panel.

"I didn't know [Cunningham] was going to send it or had sent it," Blalack said.

Blalack declined to comment further on the letter, but both he and Justice Department officials do not want Cunningham to provide evidence to Congressional investigators until the criminal probe of the bribery scandal that brought down the former lawmaker is completed, which is likely to be in 2007 at the earliest.

Sources close to the case say Cunningham's offer to testify may be rescinded soon.

Disclosure of Cunningham's letter to Hoekstra comes after the Michigan Republican and Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), the ranking member of the Intelligence Committee, have publicly clashed over Harman's decision to release a summary of Stern's investigation, and over the need to subpoena Cunningham.

Harman was aware of Cunningham's letter to Hoekstra, and in a statement released by her office on Tuesday, she said it was "totally inappropriate for the Chairman to be in contact with Cunningham, which he has been."

Hoekstra, for his part, claimed Cunningham's willingness to testify was reason enough to delay the release of Stern's report, the original, classified version of which was completed in May. In July, Stern finished an unclassified version of his report, but Hoekstra has declined to publicly release that document.

"Cunningham has reached out to the committee and offered his testimony, a possibility the independent counsel is still reviewing," Hoekstra said in a statement released Tuesday. "Until a final determination has been reached on securing Cunningham's testimony and [until] the full committee can review the independent counsel's final report, this inquiry cannot be considered complete."

DOJ_NMG_0083267

Hoekstra added that “consistent with the opinion of the D.C. [B]ar that it is unethical to subpoena a witness before Congress who intends to plead the Fifth, I will not issue a subpoena solely for the theatrics of having Cunningham appear and take the Fifth.”

Stern concluded that Cunningham, who is serving a 100-month prison sentence for bribery, fraud and tax evasion, used his seat on the House Intelligence Committee, as well as his position on the powerful Appropriations subcommittee on Defense, to steer $70 million to $80 million in government contracts to two men alleged to have paid him more than $2.4 million in bribes.

One of those men, Mitchell Wade, former CEO of defense contractor MZM Inc., pleaded guilty in February to bribery and election fraud. Wade has not been sentenced yet.

Brent Wilkes, CEO of ADCS Inc., a California-based defense contractor, has been implicated in the case as well but has not been charged.

Ignoring Red Flags (WP)

The Washington Post, October 19, 2006

RANDY "DUKE" Cunningham couldn't have done it on his own. The California Republican, now serving time for taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors, was enabled in his criminality by a system that empowers members of key congressional committees to earmark funds for favored entities, by the secrecy surrounding intelligence spending, and by the compliance of congressional staff members and others who acceded to Mr. Cunningham's spending demands despite their misgivings.

A devastating report -- actually, the devastating executive summary of a still-secret report -- by a special counsel to the House intelligence committee found that the corrupt congressman steered between $70 million and $80 million in government spending to defense contractors Mitchell J. Wade and Brent R. Wilkes. The public deserves to see the full 23-page unclassified version of the report, which has been ready since July. Even more, it deserves to know whether any of those complicit in Mr. Cunningham's misdeeds will be disciplined and how such abuses will be prevented in the future.

The most troubling portion of the report concerns how Mr. Cunningham bullied committee staff members into going along with his funding demands despite their concerns about whether tax dollars were being spent wisely. Mr. Cunningham wasn't only a member of the intelligence panel, the report notes, but also sat on the House Appropriations subcommittee in charge of defense spending. As the summary concludes, Mr. Cunningham's membership on a committee "with the power to impact [the House intelligence committee's] key priorities and his willingness to pressure and intimidate [intelligence committee] staff members were key to the success of the Wilkes/Wade funding requests." In particular, Mr. Cunningham used his clout to get Mr. Wade's company, MZM Inc., funding for a project at the Counterintelligence Field Activity agency, the Pentagon's newest intelligence arm.

"Because of Cunningham's insistence, [committee] staff agreed to support this project, despite staff's concerns that it was a 'pork barrel' project and a waste of taxpayer money," the summary said. Bad enough, but even worse is this: "Over time, [committee] staff learned of numerous 'red flags' associated with the counterintelligence project, including frequently expressed questions about the ethics and integrity of Wade, doubts about the value of the project and MZM's performance, and grave concerns about the propriety of the Cunningham-Wade relationship. Despite these red flags, the responsible . . . staff members continued to accept and support Cunningham's growing requests for this project" from 2003 through 2006.

This is an outrageous dereliction of duty. So what is the response of Chairman Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.)? Mr. Hoekstra has made a useful change in requiring that committee members' earmarks be approved by the chairman and the ranking Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.). But he sounds more unhappy with the move by Ms. Harman to unilaterally release the report than about the findings themselves. Indeed, Mr. Hoekstra said in a news release that "it is reassuring that the committee's independent counsel has found no instances of wrongdoing on the part of other committee members or the committee's staff." If Mr. Hoekstra considers this report reassuring, you have to wonder: What is it that might raise a red flag for him?

Blago's Indicted Fundraiser Due In Court Again (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen And Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, October 19, 2006

After missing his first two federal court hearings last week because of his international travel, Antoin "Tony" Rezko is expected in court Thursday to be arraigned in at least one of the fraud cases against him.

Sources said there was some indication Wednesday that Rezko, a businessman and top fundraiser for Gov. Rod Blagojevich, would arrive as scheduled at the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse, but they declined to elaborate.

Rezko is scheduled to be arraigned at 10:30 a.m. before U.S. District Judge James B. Zagel.

Personnel in Zagel's courtroom had been notified to expect Rezko.

DOJ_NMG_0083268

"It's still on the schedule. We anticipate he will be here," a clerk for Zagel said.

There is a possibility the hearing would have to be delayed until the afternoon to allow Rezko to make it there, sources said.

Rezko's attorney, Joseph J. Duffy, could not be reached Wednesday for comment.

An indictment was unsealed against Rezko last week, charging him with trying to extort millions of dollars from investment firms seeking to do business with the state by leveraging his relationships with high-ranking officials. A second indictment charged Rezko of fraudulently obtaining a $10 million loan for the sale of his pizza business through a straw buyer and retaining ownership. He is scheduled to be arraigned on that charge Thursday.

An arrest warrant has been issued for Rezko, 51, but the FBI has promised not to impede his promised return to the United States. Rezko, a native of Syria who has a home in Wilmette, has not officially been declared a fugitive by law enforcement.

Rezko's attorney, Joseph J. Duffy, said Rezko could not make his initially scheduled arraignment on Friday because he was on a business trip to the Middle East. There was nothing unusual about the travel, and Rezko would return to Chicago to face the charges, Duffy told Zagel and U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve, who is hearing the other case against Rezko. He wants to return to the country, because he is innocent and wants to defend himself, Duffy said at the time.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Christopher Niewoehner did not accuse Rezko of fleeing to avoid prosecution but said blaming his absence on travel "suggests Mr. Rezko has other priorities than attending this case."

Randall Samborn, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, declined to comment Wednesday.

Rezko is scheduled to be arraigned before St. Eve on Friday in the second case, in which he is accused of directing investment firms to make illegal payments to get business from the state's Teachers' Retirement System.

St. Eve has said she could move the hearing to Thursday if Rezko appeared.

jcoen@tribune.com

mo'connor@tribune.com

Beauprez Ad Has Illegal Classified Info (STPPP)

By Steven K. Paulson

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, October 19, 2006

DENVER - Information in an attack ad run by Rep. Bob Beauprez against his Democratic opponent for governor used illegal confidential information from a federal law enforcement database, Colorado authorities said Wednesday.

The Colorado Bureau of Investigation launched a criminal investigation into the ad after gubernatorial candidate Bill Ritter's campaign raised the possibility that the databases were illegally accessed because the information could not be verified through public records.

Director Robert Cantwell said the information came from the National Crime Information Center, a federal database available only to law-enforcement officials.

"Because this is a federally controlled and regulated system, CBI has requested the assistance of the FBI to further pursue the investigation," Cantwell said. "The FBI and CBI will be working jointly to complete the investigation."

Use of the federal criminal database for any purpose other than law enforcement is a crime punishable by fines and up to a year in prison.

The TV ad refers to a suspected illegal immigrant who was arrested in Denver in 2001 on suspicion of heroin trafficking. The ad says that when Ritter was the district attorney for Denver, he chose to seek a plea bargain in the case, the man avoided deportation, and he was later arrested in California on suspicion of sexually assaulting a minor.

The Beauprez campaign has said the information came from an informant and has refused to identify the source.

In a radio debate in Denver earlier Wednesday, Ritter demanded that Beauprez disclose how he got the information, saying the Republican has promised to be accountable for his actions.

"If you're going to talk about accountability ... but you're utilizing information that can only be obtained illegally, we need to know what your source is," Ritter said.

Beauprez responded that Ritter was trying to dodge questions about why he plea-bargained with the defendant mentioned in the ad.

"I think, in fact I know, that the information we've got is absolutely, indisputably true," Beauprez said.

The FBI's involvement "doesn't change anything for us," Beauprez spokesman John Marshall said. "We're going to fully cooperate with whomever we need to cooperate with."

The investigation is an ugly twist in the relatively mild campaign to succeed Republican Gov. Bill Owens, who is prevented by term limits from running again. Recent polls show Beauprez, a two-term congressman, trailing Ritter.

DOJ_NMG_0083269

FBI Asked To Join Beauprez Ad Investigation (CSG)

By Kyle Henley, The Gazette

Colorado Springs Gazette, October 19, 2006

DENVER - A criminal investigation of Bob Beauprez's gubernatorial campaign snowballed Wednesday when state investigators asked the FBI to join a probe of how confidential information was obtained from a federal database.

The Colorado Bureau of Investigation determined Wednesday that Beauprez's campaign had used information in a campaign ad that had to have come from the National Crime Information Center. Under federal law, the only people who can legally access NCIC data are the criminals whose records are there, or members of Congress.

Beauprez, whose campaign has refused to disclose the identity of a person it has referred to as an "informant," is a Republican congressman from Colorado's 7th District.

CBI opened a file against Beauprez late last week, looking into allegations that his campaign illegally used a federal criminal database that is only supposed to be used for law enforcement purposes. It's conceivable the investigation could result in a felony charge.

Information from the database was the foundation for an ad attacking the record of Beauprez's Democratic rival, Bill Ritter, a former Denver district attorney.

"Because this is a federally controlled and regulated system, CBI has requested the assistance of the FBI to further pursue the investigation," CBI Director Karl Wilmes said. "The FBI and CBI will be working jointly to complete the investigation."

Beauprez has denied any wrongdoing, and campaign spokesman John Marshall reiterated that Wednesday.

"We are going to cooperate in every way with law enforcement on this, because we've done nothing wrong," Marshall said.

At a debate last week, Beauprez said the information was obtained from an informant. He said the campaign would demonstrate that the information was obtained legally.

Marshall, however, would not reveal the name of the informant, saying he is protecting a confidential source.

Ritter's campaign asked for the investigation, which has derailed Beauprez's damaging political attacks less than three weeks before the Nov. 7 election.

"The congressman is now on day six of refusing to disclose his source, and, with each passing day, he digs himself a deeper and deeper hole," said Evan Dreyer, Ritter's spokesman. "He has asked voters to hold them accountable. Well, he can rest assured the FBI will hold him accountable."

The Beauprez ads highlighted 152 cases in which Ritter's office offered plea agreements to immigrants — both legal and illegal — to help them avoid deportation.

Last week, the campaign ran a potentially damaging television ad featuring Carlos Estrada Medina, who was arrested in Denver on drug charges but only received probation under a plea agreement. The ad claims Medina was later arrested in California for a sexual abuse of a child.

Several media outlets investigated the ad and could not find any information about a California case involving Medina. Checks under his aliases also turned up nothing.

But over the weekend, Marshall told 9NEWS, a Denver television station, that "in federal criminal databases, the guy's information matches up."

The NCIC contains confidential law enforcement records about criminal histories, fugitives, stolen property, missing persons and other details. The records in the NCIC are only available for law enforcement purposes; it is a crime to access those records for almost any other reason.

The law does, however, allow a member of Congress to access the database if a constituent requests his or her own record.

Marshall insists that no one on the campaign accessed the NCIC and that all the information was obtained through the public domain.

"If anyone had done that on our campaign they would have been fired," he said. "We received information we believed to be credible and lawful and verified it through means we believed to be lawful."

But, according to the CBI, the NCIC was the source of the information.

"The CBI thoroughly reviewed and researched the law enforcement databases and determined that the information regarding ... Medina ... was obtained by accessing the federal crime information system known as NCIC," Wilmes said.

Wilmes would not say who accessed the system, something he said is part of the investigation, which he said will take time to complete.

That's bad news for Beauprez's campaign.

Colorado College political science professor Bob Loevy says he thinks that even if Beauprez is exonerated and found to have done nothing wrong, the damage may already be done.

"It may get cleared up before the election gets here, but even then ... all that many voters hear is FBI investigation and Bob Beauprez," Loevy said. "It is just a losing event for the Beauprez campaign. It also mutes what looks like their strongest issue against Ritter."

Prosecutors Want Postponement In Pellicano Trial (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

Federal prosecutors today urged a judge to reject Anthony Pellicano's request that his wiretapping trial begin as scheduled in February, arguing that the complexity of the case, the number of defendants and other factors justify postponement until next fall.

At the same time, prosecutors told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer that if she agrees with Pellicano's request, the government wants to proceed with a February trial for the former private eye and all of his six co-defendants, all but one of whom have agreed to a delay.

On Monday, the U.S. Attorney's Office and lawyers for five of Pellicano's co-defendants filed a stipulation with the judge saying that a delay in the trial was necessary for defense attorneys to review the vast amount of evidence, including 150,000 pages of documents and 443 recorded conversations.

Pellicano and his attorney opposed the move, arguing that he was ready for trial and was eager to resolve the case because he has been behind bars without bail since his indictment in February.

Jail Guard In O.C. Held As Bribery Suspect (LAT)

By Christine Hanley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 19, 2006

He allegedly took money from one or more inmates to supply them with contraband such as cellphones and bodybuilding substances.

A guard at a federal detention center in Orange County was arrested this week on suspicion of taking bribes in exchange for smuggling contraband to at least one inmate, including cellphones, a small computer, protein powders and other bodybuilding substances, a federal official said.

Jose Abel Flores is a correctional officer at the Santa Ana City Jail, which has a contract to house federal prisoners awaiting trial. Flores, 36, of Corona was taken into custody Monday at the jail.

He is scheduled to appear at a bail hearing today.

Flores' attorney, federal Public Defender Dan McCurrie, could not be reached for comment.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Kenneth B. Julian, the lead prosecutor, said he would probably ask that Flores be held without bail.

According to an arrest affidavit prepared by FBI agent Philip J. Carson, the investigation was carried out with the help of an unnamed inmate who is awaiting sentencing on weapons and drug charges, and who is cooperating with the government in hopes of leniency.

The inmate told Carson that Flores began supplying him with illegal goods in November 2005. Under their arrangement, Flores supplied a Sidekick III cellphone, a hand-held computer commonly used for playing video games, liquid creatine and Hydroxycut pills and food, whenever the inmate asked, according to authorities and the affidavit.

Julian said it was not immediately clear whether Flores was delivering goods to other inmates, though prosecutors "strongly suspect there's other people he supplied."

For his services, Flores was paid several thousand dollars, the affidavit says. On many occasions, Flores collected the money from an associate of the inmate by meeting him at a designated pickup point in Puente Hills, the affidavit says.

Based on this information, investigators mounted a sting operation in which Flores was audiotaped and photographed at the meeting spot carrying out the deals, once in August and again in September, according to the affidavit. Each time, the inmate asked for a cellphone and gave Flores the name and number of an undercover agent posing as the bagman.

During the first sting, Flores told the inmate it would cost him $3,000, and Flores arranged over the phone to meet the undercover agent at a McDonald's in Seal Beach, the affidavit says. A month later, the inmate told Flores he had to flush the phone down the toilet to keep it from being discovered and needed a new one. Initially, Flores said he would charge $2,000. But the next day, he raised the price to $3,000, the affidavit says.

The phone conversations between Flores and the undercover bagman were also recorded, the affidavit says.

DOJ_NMG_0083271

After Carson arrested Flores and read him his rights, the guard admitted accepting $6,000 for bringing two cellphones into the jail, it says.

christine.hanley@latimes.com

Murder Trial Lies With Conspirator (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, October 19, 2006

The trial of a man charged with killing New York Times journalist David Rosenbaum opened yesterday with attorneys on both sides saying that the case hinges on the testimony of the defendant's cousin and admitted co-conspirator.

Michael Hamlin "will confess to you that he and his cousin did this terrible thing," Assistant U.S. Attorney Amanda Haines told jurors during opening statements in the trial of Percey Jordan Jr. "You will find out that the evidence in this case 100 percent corroborates what he is telling you."

Mr. Jordan, 42, is charged with felony murder, aggravated assault and credit-card fraud.

Mr. Rosenbaum, 63, was out for a walk late Jan. 6 when he was beaten and robbed on Gramercy Street near his Northwest home. He died two days later at Howard University Hospital.

Hamlin, 24, pleaded guilty to second-degree murder, robbery and conspiracy and is expected to testify against Mr. Jordan.

He has admitted stealing Mr. Rosenbaum's wallet but said Mr. Jordan hit the journalist on the head with a pipe.

Miss Haines said yesterday that Mr. Jordan shoved the pipe up his sleeve and hid behind a tree before ambushing Mr. Rosenbaum.

"He raised that lead pipe and brought it down, down, down onto Mr. Rosenbaum's head," Miss Haines told the jury. "As Mr. Rosenbaum fell into a crumpled heap, this man sitting right across from you hit him again and again and again."

The D.C. Superior Court jury, which consists of 12 jurors and four alternates, comprises 15 women and one man.

Defense attorney Michael Starr sought to discredit Hamlin in his opening statements.

He said that Hamlin, who surrendered to police after seeing his face broadcast on television, has changed his story repeatedly to cooperate with police and keep himself out of trouble.

"The government has manufactured a case about a completely unbelievable, untrustworthy story they have been fed by Michael Hamlin," said Mr. Starr, who noted a lack of forensic evidence in the case. "That story, the evidence will show you, is false [and] untrue."

Hamlin did not testify yesterday, although jurors heard from several other prosecution witnesses.

Rosemary Tornillo, a resident in the Rosenbaums' neighborhood, testified to passing Mr. Rosenbaum the night he was attacked.

